Also concerning the number of men slaine in this warre, which Dares and Dyctis say to haue bene aboue 600000. on the Troian side, and more than 800000. of the Greekes, it is a report merely fabulous; for as much as the whole fleet of the Greekes was reckoned by Homer, who extolled their armie and deedes as much as he could, to be somewhat lesse than 1200. saile, and the armie therein transported ouer the Greek seas, not much aboue 100000. men, according to the rate formerly mentioned. But it is the common fashion of men to extoll the deedes of their Auncients: for which cause both Homer magnified the Captaines of the Greekes that serued in the warre, and Virgil with others were as diligent in commending and extolling the Troians and their Citie, from which the Romans descended. Yea the Athenians long after in the warre which Xerxes the Persian King made against all Greece, did not forbear to vaunt of the great cunning which Mnestheus the sonne of Petens had shewed, in marshalling the Grecian army before Troy: whereupon, as if it had bene a matter of much consequence, they were so proud, that they refused to yeld vnto Gelon King of almost all Sicily, the Admirallie of their Seas, notwithstanding that he promised to bring 200. good fighting ships, and 30000. men for their defence.

The like vanitie possessed many other Cities of Greece, and many Nations in these parts of the world, which haue striuen to bring their descent from some of the Princes, that warred at Troy: all difficulties or vnlikelihoods in such their Pedigree notwithstanding. But those Nations which indeede, or in most probability came of the Troians, were the Albanes in Italy; and from them the Romans, brought into that Countrey by Aeneas: the Venetians first seated in Padua, and the Countrey adioyning by Antenor: the Chaonians planted in Epirus by Helenus, the sonne of King Priamus. To which Hellenicus addeth, that the posteritie of Hector did resemble such of the Troians as were left, and reigned ouer them about Troy.

§. V I.

Of the distresses and dispersions of the Greekes returning from Troy.

O Concerning the Greekes, they tasted as much misery as they had brought vpon the Troians. For Thucydides notes, that by reason of their long abode at the siege, they found many alterations when they returned: so that many were driven by their borderers from their ancient seats: many were expelled their Countries by faction: some were slaine anon after their arriual: others were debarred from the Soueraignty among the people, by such as had stayed at home. The cause of all which may seeme to haue bene the dispersion of the armie, which weakened much by the calamities of that long warre, was of little force to repell iniuries, being diuided into so many pieces vnder feuerall Commanders, not very well agreeing. For (besides other quarrels arising vpon the diuision of the bootie, and the like occasions) at the time when they should haue set saile, Agamemnon and his brother fell out, the one being desirous to depart immediatly, the other to stay and performe some sacrifices to Minerva. Hereupon they fell to hot words, halfe the fleet remaining with Agamemnon, the rest of them sailed to the Ile of Tenedos; where when they arriued, they could not agree among themselves, but some returned backe to Agamemnon; others were dispersed, each holding his owne course. But the whole fleet was fore vexed with tempests: for Pallas (as Homer saith) would not be perswaded in haste.

They who returned safe were Nestor and Pyrrhus, whom Orestes afterwards slew: also Idomeneus, and Philoctetes, who neuertheless, as Virgil tels, were driuen soone after to seek new seats: Idomeneus among the Salentines, and Philoctetes at Petilia in Italia. Agamemnon likewise returned home, but was forthwith slaine by his wife and by the adulterer Aegisthus, who for a while after vsurped his Kingdome. Menelaus wandring long vpon the Seas, came into Egypt, either with Helen, or (as may rather seeme) to fetch her. Vlysses, after ten yeeres, hauing lost all his company, got home in poore estate, with much adoe recovering the mastership of his own house. All the rest either perished by the way, or were driuen into exile, and faine to seeke out new habitations.

Ajax the sonne of Oileus was drowned; Teucer fled into Cyprus; Diomedes to King Dawnus, who was Lord of the Lapyges in Apulia; some of the Locrians were driuen into Africke, others into Italia, all the East part whereof was called Magna Gracia, by reason of so many townes which the Greekes were driuen to erect vpon that coast. Finally, it appears in Homer, that the Græcian Ladies, whose husbands had bene at the warre of Troy, were wont to call it; The place where the Greekes suffered miserie, and the vnluckie Citie not to be mentioned. And thus much for Troy and those that warred there; the ouerthrow of which Citie, as hath bene said, happened in the time of Haddon Iudge of Israel, whom Samson after a variance or Interregnum for certaine yeeres succeeded.

CHAP. XV.

Of Samson, Eli, and Samuel.

§. I.

Of Samson.

THE birth and acts of Samson are written at large in the 13. 14. 15. and 16. of Judges; and therefore I shall not need to make so a repetition thereof. But these things I gather out of that storie. First, that the Angell of God forbade the wife of Manoah the mother of Samson, to drinke wine or strong drinke, or to eat any vnclane meate, after shee was conceiued with childe; because those strong liquors hinder the strength, and as it were wither and shrinke the childe in the mothers wombe. Though this were euen the counsell of God himselfe, and deliuered by his Angell, yet it seemeth that many women of this age haue not read, or at least will not beleue this precept: the most part forbearing nor drincks, nor meats, how strong or vnclane soeuer, filling themselves with all sorts of wines, and with artificiall drincks farre more forcible: by reason whereof, so many wretched feeble bodies are borne into the world, and the races of the able and strong men in effect decayed.

Secondly, it is to be noted, that the Angell of God refused the sacrifice which Manoah would haue offered him, commanding him to present it vnto the Lord: and therefore those that professe diuination by the helpe of Angels, to whom also they sacrifice, may assuredly know that they are Diuels who accept thereof, and not good Angels, who receive no worship that is proper to God.

Thirdly, this Samson was twice betrayed by his wiues, to wit, by their importunitie and deceitfull teares: by the first he lost but a part of his goods: by the second his life. Quem nulla vis superare potuit, voluptas evertit; Whom no force could ouermaster, Voluptuousnesse ouerturned.

Fourthly, we may note, that he did not in all deliuer Israel from the oppression of the Philistims; though in some sort he reuenged, and defended them: for notwithstanding that he had slaine 30. of them in his first attempt, burnt their Corne in harvest time, and giuen them a great ouerthrow instantly vpon it: yet so much did Israel feare the Philistims, as they assembled 3000. men out of Iuda, to besiege Samson in the rocke or mountaine of Etam, vsing these words: Knowest not thou that the Philistims are Rulers over vs, &c. After which they bound him, and deliuered him vnto the Philistims, for feare of their reuenge; though he was no sooner loosened, but he gaue them an other ouerthrow, and slew 1000. with the iawbone of an Ass.

Lastly, being made blinde, and a prisoner by the treason of his wife, he was content to end his owne life, to be auenged of his enemies, when he pulled downe the pillars of the house at the feast whereto they sent for Samson, to deride him, till which time he bare his affliction with patience: but it was truly said of Seneca, Patientia sepe laesa vertitur in furor, Patience often wounded is conuerted into furie: neither is it at any time so much wounded by paine and losse, as by derision and contumelie.

§. II.

Of Eli, and of the Arke taken, and of Dagon's fall, and the sending back of the Arke.

THE storie of Eli the Priest, who succeeded Samson, is written in the beginning of Samuel; who foretold him of the destruction of his house, for the wickednesse of his sonnes, which he suppressed not, neither did he punish them according to their deserts: whose finnes were horrible, both in abusing the Sacrifice, and prophaning and polluting the holy places: though Leui Ben Gerson, to extenuate this filthy offence forcing the women by the sonnes of Eli, hath a contrary opinion. In this time therefore it pleased God to cast the Israelites vnder the swords of the Philistims; of whom there perished in the first encounter 4000. and in the second battell 30000. footmen; among whom the sonnes of Eli being slaine, their father (hearing the lamentable successe) by falling from his chaire, brake his necke. He was the first that obtained the High-Priesthood of the stocke of Ithamar the sonne of Aaron, before whose time it continued successiue in the race of Eleazar the eldest brother of Ithamar: for Aaron was the first, Eleazar the second, Phinees the sonne of Eleazar the third, Abisue the sonne of Phinees the fourth, his sonne Bocci the fift, Ozi the sonne of Bocci the sixt, and then Eli, as Iosephus and Lysanus out of diuers Hebrew authors haue conceiued. In the race of Ithamar the Priesthood continued after Eli to the time of Salomon who cast out Abiathar, and established Sadock and Achimaas and their successors. The Arke of God which Israel brought into the field, was in this battell taken by the Philistims. For as David witnesseth, God greatly abhorred Israel, so that he forsooke the habitation of Shilo: euen the Tabernacle where he dwelt among men, and deliuered his power into captiuitie, &c.

Now as it pleased God at this time, that the Arke whereby himselfe was represented, should fall into the hands of the Heathen, for the offences of the Priests and people: so did he permit the Chaldeans to destroy the Temple built by Salomon; the Romans to ouerthrow the second Temple; and the Turkes to ouerthrow the Christian Churches in Asia and Europe. And had not the Israelites put more confidence in the sacrament, sacrament, or representation which was the Arke, then in God himselfe, they would haue obserued his Lawes, and serued him onely: which whensoever they did, they were then victorious. For after the captiuitie they had no Arke at all, nor in the times of the Machabees: and yet for their pietie it pleased God to make that familie as victorious as any that garded themselves by the signe in stead of the substance. And that the Arke was not made to the end to be carried into the field as an ensigne; Dauid witnessed when he fled from Absalon. For when the Priests would haue carried the Arke with him; he forbade it, and caused it to be turned into the Citie, vntill these words: If I shall finde fauour in the eyes of the Lord, he will bring me againe: if not, let him doe to me as seemeth good in his eyes.

Sam. 15.

The Troians beleueed that while their Palladium or the image of Minerua was kept in Troy, the Citie should neuer be ouerturned: so did the Christians in the last fatall battell against Saladine carry into the field, as they were made beleuee, the very Croffe whereon Christ died; and yet they lost the battell, their bodies and the wood. But Chrysostome vpon Saint Matthew (if that be his worke) giueth a good iudgement, speaking of those that wore a part of Saint Iohns Gospell about their neckes, for an amulet or preferuative: Si tibi ea non prosunt in auribus, quomodo proderunt in Collo? If those words doe not profit men in their eares, (to wit, the hearing of the Gospell preached) how should it profit them by hanging it about their neckes? For it was neither the wood of the Arke, nor the wood of the Croffe, but the reuerence of the Father, that gaue the one for a memorie of his Couenant: and the Faith in his Sonne, which shed his blood on the other for redemption, that could or can profit them and vs, either in this life or after it.

The Philistims returning with the greatest victorie and glory which euer they obtained, carried the Arke of God with them to Azotus, and set it vp in the house of Dagon their Idoll: but that night the Idoll fell out of his place, from aboue to the ground, and lay vnder the Arke. The morning following they tooke it vp, and set it vp, and set it againe in his place. And it fell the second time, and the head brake from the body, and the hands from the armes, shewing that it had nor power, nor vnderstanding in the presence of God; for the head fell off, which is the seat of reason and knowledge, and the hands (by which we execute strength) were sundred from the armes. For God and the diuell inhabit not in one house, nor in one heart. And if this Idoll could not endure the representation of the true God, it is not to be maruailed, that at such time as it pleased him to couer his onely Begotten with flesh, and sent him into the world, that all the Oracles, wherein the Diuell derided and betrayed mortall men, lost power, speech, and operation at the instant. For when that true light which had neuer beginning of brightness, brake through the clouds of a Virgins body, shining vpon the earth which had bin long obscured by Idolatry, all those foule and stinking vapours vanished. Plutarch rehearseth a memorable accident in that age concerning the death of the great god Pan, as he stileth him, where (as ignorant of the true cause) he searcheth his braines for many reasons of so great an alteration: yet finds he none out but frivolous. For not onely this old Diuell did then die as he supposed, but all the rest, as Apollo, Iupiter, Diana, and the whole rabble became speechlesse.

Now while the Philistims triumphed after this victory, God strooke them with the grievous disease of the Hemorrhoides of which they perished in great numbers. For it is written that the Lord destroyed them. It was therefore by generall consent ordered, that the Arke should be removed from Azotus to Gath or Geth another of the five great Cities of the Philistims; to proue, as it seemeth, whether this disease were fallen on them by accident, or by the hand of God immediately: but when it was brought to Gath and received by them, the plague was yet more grievous and mortall. For the hand of the Lord was against this Citie with a very great destruction, and he smote the men of the Citie both small and great, &c. And being not yet satisfied, they of Gath sent the Arke to Ekrum or Accaron, a third Citie of the Philistims: but they also felt the same smart, and cried out that themselves and their people should be slaine thereby; For there was a destruction and death throughout all the Citie. In the end, by the aduice of their Priests, the Princes of the Philistims did not onely resolute to returne the Arke, but to offer gifts vnto the God of Israel, remembering the plague which had fallen on the Egyptians, when their hearts were hardened to hold the people of God from their inheritance, and from his seruice by strong hand. Wherefore confessing the power of the God of Israel to be almighty, & that their owne Idols were subiect therunto, they agreed to offer a sinne offering, vntill vntill these words; So ye shall giue glorie to the God of Israel, that hee may take his hand from you, and from your gods, and from your land. And what can be a more excellent witnessing, than where an enemy doth approue our cause: according to Aristotle; Pulchrum est testimonium, quo nostra probantur ab hostibus. So did Pharao confesse the liuing God, when he was plagued in Egypt: and Nabuchodonosor, and Darius, when they had seene his miracles by Daniel.

This counsell therefore of the Priests being imbraced, and the golden Hemorrhoides, and the golden Mice prepared, they caused two milch kine to be chosen, such as had not bene yoked, and a new Cart or carriage to be framed: but they durst not driue or direct it to any place certaine, thereby to make tryall whether it were indeed the hand of God that had stricken them. For if the Arke of God were carried towards Bethshemesh and into the territorie of Israel: then they should resolute that from God only came their late destruction. For the Philistims knew that the milch Kine which drew the Arke, could not be forced from their Calues, but that they would haue followed them wheresoever, much lesse when they were left to themselves would they trauell a contrary way. For in the darkest night in the world if Calues be removed from their dammes, the kine will follow them through woods, and deserts by the foote, till they finde them. But the kine trauelled directly towards Bethshemesh: and when they came into the fields thereof, to wit, of one Iosua of the same Citie, they stood still there; which when the Princes of the Philistims perceiued, they returned to Ekrum. After which, God spared not his owne people the Bethshemites, in that they presumed to looke into the Arke. And because they knew God and his commandments, and had bene taught accordingly: he strooke them more grievously then he did the Heathen, for there perished of them fiftie thousand and seuentie. From hence the Arke was carried to Kiriath-iearim and placed in the house of Abinadab, where it is written that it remained twentie yeers in the charge of Eleazar his sonne, vntill Dauid brought it to Hierusalem.

Now whereas it is said, that in the meane while the Arke was in Nob, Mispah, and Gallata, it was the Tabernacle, which was at this time seuered from the Arke: or at least, it was for the present occasion brought to these places, and anon returned to Kiriath-iearim.

§. III.

Of Samuel, and of his Government.

These Tragedies ouerpast and ended, Samuel, to whom God appeared while hee was yet a childe, became now Iudge and Gouvernour of Israel. He was descended of the familie of Chore or Korach. For Leui had three sonnes; Gerson, Cheath, and Merari: Cheath had Amram, and Izaar; of Amram came Moses and Aaron; of Izaar, Chore: and of the familie of Chore, Samuel. His father Elcana a Leuite, was called an Ephraitean, not that the Leuites had any proper inheritance, but because he was of Mount Ephraim, like as Iesse, Dauids father was called an Ephraitean, because borne at Ephrata, or Bethleem. Hannah his mother being long fruitlesse, obtained him of God by prayers and teares: it being an exceeding shame to the Iewish women, to be called barren in respect of the blessing of God both to Abraham that his seed should multiplie as the Starres of Heauen, and the sands of the Sea; as in the beginning to Adam, Increase and multiply, &c. and in Deuteronomie the seauenth; There shall bee neither male nor female barren among you.

Samuel was no sooner borne, but that his mother, according to her former vow, dedicated him to God, and his seruice, to which she deliuered him euen from the dugges. For as the first borne of all that were called Nazarites, might be redeemed till they were five yeeres old for five sheckles, and betweene five yeeres add twentie for twentie sheckles: so was it not required by the Law that any of the race of the Leuites should be called to seruice about the Tabernacle, till they were five and twenty yeeres.

Saint Peter reckons in the Acts the Prophets from Samuel, who was the first of the writers of holy Scriptures, to whom vually this name of a Prophet was giuen, and yet did Moses account himselfe such a one; as in the 18. of Deuteronomie, The Lord thy God will raise up vnto thee a Prophet like vnto mee, &c. But hee is distinguished from those that preceded him, who were called Seers; as Beforetime in Israel, when a man went to seeke an answer

Which region was called Ephrata, as appeareth Iud. 12. 5. whence for distinction we read Ruth. 1. 2. Ephratae is Bethleem, the town of Ephraim, the which is Bethleem in Iuda, Gen. 35. 19. from the region of Ephrata, which is in Mount Ephraim, whence Psal. 132. 7. 6. Ephrata is put for Silo, which was in the Tribe of Ephraim.

answer of God, thus he spake; Come and let us goe to the Seer: for he that is now called a Prophet, was in old time called a Seer. And although it pleased God to appeare by his Angels to Moses, as before to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; yet in the time of Eli, there was no manifest vision; not that God had altogether withdrawn his grace from Israel: but as the Chaldean Paraphrast hath it, those reuelations before Samuels time, were more clouded and obscure. The places wherein Samuel iudged were Maspha or Mispha, seated on a hill in Benjamin neere Iuda: also Gilgal, and Bethel, of which wee haue spoken elsewhere.

The Philistims taking knowledge of the assembly and preparation for Warre at Mispha in the beginning of Samuels government, gathered their Armie and marched towards the Citie: at whose approach the Israelites stricken with feare, and with the memorie of their former slaughters and seruitude, besought Samuel to pray to God for them; who was then performing his sacrifice when the Philistims were in view. But God being moued with Samuels prayers (as he was by those of Moses, when Israel fought against the Amalekites at their first entrance into Arabia.) It pleased him with thunder and tempest to disperse and beate downe the Armie of the Philistims, according to the prophetic of Hanna, Samuels Mother, The Lords aduersaries shall be destroyed, and out of heauen shall be thunder upon them, &c. Iosephus affirms, that a part of the Philistims were swallowed with an earth-quake: and that Samuel himself led the Israelites in the prosecution of their victory. After which Samuel erected a Monument in memorie of this happy success, obtained by the miraculous hand of God; which Iosephus called, Lapidem sortem: Samuel, Ebeneser, or the stone of assistance: and then following the opportunitie and advantage of the victory, the Israelites recouered diuers Cities of their owne formerly lost, and held long in possession of the Philistims, who for a long time after did not offer any inuasion or reuenge. And the better to attend their purposes, and to withstand any of their attempts, the Israelites made peace with the Amorites, or Canaanites, which lay on their backs, and to the North of them, that they might not be assaulted from diuers parts at once; hauing the Philistims towards the West and Sea-coast, the Canaanite toward the North and East, and the Idumite on the South. The estate being thus settled, Samuel for the ease of the people gaue audience and iudgement in diuers places by turnes, as hath bene elsewhere said.

CHAP. XVI.

OF SAVL.

§. I.

Of the deliberation to change the government into a Kingdome.

VT when age now began to ouer-take Samuel, and that he was not able to vnder-goe the burthen of so carefull a government, he put off from himselfe the waight of the affaires on his sonnes, Ioel and Abijah, who iudged the people at Beerseba, a Citie, the very vtmost towards the South of Iudaea. And as the place was inconuenient and farre away, so were themselves no lesse removed from the iustice and vertue of their Father: For the thirst of couetousnesse, the more it swalloweth, the more it drieth, and desireth, finding taste in nothing but gaine; to recouer which, they set the Law at a price, and sold Iustice and Iudgement to the best Chapmen. Which when the Elders of Israel obserued, and saw that Samuel as a naturall man (though a Prophet) could not so well discern the errors of his owne, they prayed him to consent to their change of government, and to make them a King, by whom they might be iudged as other Nations were; who might also leade them to the Warre and defend them against their enemies. For after the ill and lamentable success which followed the rule of Eli his sonnes, when those of Samuel by their first blossomes promised to yeelde fruit no lesse bitter, they saw no way to put the government from out his race, whom they so much reuerenced, but by the choice of a King.

In a cause of so great consequence and alteration, Samuel sought counsaile from God: which surely he did not for the establishing of his owne Sonnes; who being as they were, God would not haue approued his election. Now as it appears by the Text, this speech or motion displeasing him, hee vnto his best arguments to dehort them: which when he perceived to be ouer-feeble, he deliuered vnto them from Gods reuelation, the inconueniences and miseries which should befall them. And yet, all which hee fore-shewed was not intolerable, but such as hath bene borne, and is so still by free consent of the Subjects towards their Princes. For first hee makes them know, that the King will vse their sonnes in his owne seruice to make them his Horse-men, Chariotters, and Foot-men; which is not onely not grieuous, but by the Vassals of all Kings according to their birth and condition, desired: it being very agreeable to subjects of the best qualitie to command for the King in his Warres, and to till the ground no lesse proper and appertaining to those that are thereto breed and brought vp: so are likewise the offices of women-seruants to dresse meate, to bake bread, and the like. But whereas immediately it is threatened, Hee will take your Fields, and your Vineyards, and your best Olive trees, and give them to his seruants; with other oppressions; this hath giuen, and giues daily occasion to such as would be ruled by their owne discretion, to affirme that Samuel describeth heere vnto them the power of a King, gouerned by his owne affections, and not a King that feareth God. But others vpon further examination construe this Text farre otherwise, as teaching vs what Subjects ought with patience to beare at their Soueraigns hand.

The former opinion is grounded first vpon that place of Deuteronomie, where God fore-sheweth this change of government from Iudges to Kings, and after hee had forbidden many things vnto the Kings, as many wiues, couetousnesse, and the like: hee commandeth that the Kings which were to reigne ouer Israel, should write the Law of Deuteronomie, or cause it to be written: and to shew how greatly the King should honour the Law, he addeth, It shall be with him, and he shall reade therein all the dayes of his life: that he may learne to feare the Lord his God, and to keepe all the words of this Law, and these ordinances for to doe them: that hee may prolong his daies in his Kingdome, hee and his Sonnes. But to take away any other mans field, say they, is contrary to the Lawes of God, in the same booke written. For it is said, That which is just and right shalt thou follow, that thou mayest liue. Now if it be not permitted to carrie away grapes more than thou canst eat out of another mans vineyard, but forbidden by God: it is much lesse lawfull to take the vineyard it selfe from the owner, and giue it to another. Neither are the words of the Text (say they) such as doe warrant the Kings of Israel, or make it proper vnto them, to take at will anything from their vassalls. For it is not said that it shall be lawfull for the King, or the King may doe this or that: but it is written, that the King will take your sonnes: and againe, This shall be the manner of the King that shall reigne ouer you. God thereby fore-shewing what power seuered from pietie, (because it is accountable to God onely) will doe in the future. And hereof we finde the first example in Achab, who tooke from Naboth both his Vineyard and his life, contrary to the trust which God had put in him, of gouerning well his people. For God commanded, That his people should be iudged with righteous iudgement. Wherefore, though the King had offered vnto Naboth composition, as a Vineyard of better value, or the worth in money which he refused: yet because hee was falsely accused, and vniufully condemned (though by colour of law,) how grieuously Achab was punished by God, the Scriptures tell vs. Neither was it a plea sufficient for Achab against the all-righteous God, to say that it was done without his consent, and by the Elders of Israel. For God had not then left his people to the Elders, but to the King, who is called a liuing Law, euen as David testified of himselfe: Posuisti me in caput gentium: For this of S. Augustine is very true: Simulata innocentia, non est innocentia: simulata aequitas non est aequitas: sed duplicatur peccatum in quo est iniquitas & simulatio; Fained innocence, and fained equitie, are neither the one nor the other: but the fault or offence is there doubled, in which there is both iniquitie and dissimulation. Such in effect is their disputation, who thinke this place to containe the description of a Tyrant. But the arguments on the contrary side, as they are many and forcible, so are they well knowne to all; being excellently handled in that Princely discourse of The true Law of free Monarchies, which Treatise I may not presume to abridge, much lesse here to insert. Onely thus much I will say, that if practice doe shew the greatnesse of authoritie, euen the best Kings of Iuda and Israel were not so tied by any lawes, but that they did whatsoeuer they pleased in the the greatest things; and commanded some of their owne Princes, and of their owne brethren to be slaine without any triall of law, being sometime by Prophets reprehended, sometime not. For though Dauid confessed his offence for the death of Uriah, yet Saul killing his elder brother and others, the same was not imputed vnto him as any offence.

Gen. 49.
Gen. 15.
Gen. 17.

That the state of Israel should receiue this change of gouernment, it was not onelie fore-told by Moses in Deuteronomie, but perceived by Iacob in this Scripture: The Scepter shall not depart from Iuda, &c. It was also promised by God to Abraham for a blessing: For it was not only assured that his issues should in number equall the Starres in heauen, but that Kings should proceed of him: Which state seeing it is framed from the patterne to of his sole rule, who is Lord of the Vniuersall; and the excellencie thereof in respect of all other gouernments, hath bene by many iudicious men handled and proued, I shall not need to ouer-paint that which is garnished with better colouts already, than I can lay on.

In the time of the Iudges every man hath obserued what ciuill Warre Israel had: what outrageous slaughters they committed vpon each other: in what miserable seruitude they liued for many yeeres: and when it fared best with them, they did but defend their owne Territories, or recouer some parts thereof formerly lost. The Canaanites dwelt in the best vallies of the Countrey. The Ammonites held much of Gilead ouer Jordan; the Philistims the Sea-coasts; and the Iebusites Ierusalem it selfe, till Dauids time: all which that King did not onely conquer and establish, but hee mastered and subiected all the neighbour Nations, and Kings, and made them his tributaries and vassals. But whether it were for that the Israelites were moued by those reasons, which allure the most of all Nations to liue vnder a Monarch, or whether by this meanes they sought to bee dected from the sonnes of Samuel, they became deafe to all the perswasions and threats which Samuel vsed; insisting vpon this point, that they would haue a King, both to iudge them and defend them: whereunto when Samuel had warrant from God to consent, hee sent euery man to his owne Citie and abiding.

§. II. Of the election of Saul.

After that Samuel had dismissed the assembly at Mizpah, hee forbore the election of a King, till such time as he was therein directed by God: who fore-told him the day before, that he would present vnto him a man of the Land of Benjamin, whom he commanded Samuel to anoint. So Samuel went vnto Ramath Saphim, to make a feast for the entertainment of Saul (whom yet he knew not, but knew the truth of Gods promises) and Saul also hauing wandred diuers daies to seeke his fathers affes, at length by the aduice of his seruant travelled towards Ramath, to finde a Seer or Prophet, hoping from him to be told what way to take, to finde his beasts. In which journey it pleased God (who doth many times order the greatest things by the simplest passages, and persons) to elect Saul, who sought an Affe, and not a Kingdome: like as formerly it had pleased him to call Moses, while he fed the sheepe of Zethro; and after to make choyce of Dauid the yongest of eight sonnes, and by the Scriptures called a little one, who was then keeping of beasts, and changed his sheep-hooke into a Scepter, making him of all other the most victorious King of Iuda and Israel. So Iohn and Iacob were taken from casting their nets, to become fishers of men, and honoured with the titles of Apostles, a dignitie that died not in the graue, as all worldly Honours doe: but permanent and euertlasting in Gods euertlasting Kingdome.

1 Sam. 16.

When Samuel was entred into Ramath, he prepared a banquet for the King, whom hee expected, and stayed his arriual at the gate. Not long after came Saul, whom God shewed to Samuel, and made him know that it was the same whom hee had fore-told him of, that hee should rule the people of God. Saul finding Samuel in the gate, but knowing him not, though a Prophet and Iudge of Israel, much lesse knowing the Honour which attended him, asked Samuel in what part of the Citie the Seer dwelt. Samuel answered, that himselfe was the man hee sought, and prayed Saul to goe before him to the high place, where Samuel setting him according to his degree, about all that were inuited, conferred with him afterwards of the affaires of the Kingdome, and of Gods graces to bee bestowed on him, and the morning following annointed him King of Israel.

Gods

After this he told him all that should happen him in the way homeward, that two men should incounter him by Rabels Sepulcher, who should tell him that his Affes were found, and that his Fathers cares were changed from the feare of losing his beasts, to doubt the losse of his Sonne: that he should then meet three other men in the plaine of Tabor; then a company of Prophets: and that hee should be partaker of Gods spirit, and prophetic with them: and that thereby his condition and disposition should be changed from the vulgar, into that which became a King elected and fauoured by God.

But the Prophets here spoken of, men indued with spirituall gifts, were not of the first and most reuerenced number, who by diuine reuelation fore-told things to come, reprehended without feare the errors of their Kings, and wrought miracles; of which number were Moses, Iosua, Samuel, & after them Gad, Nathan, Ahiah, Elias, Eliseus, Isay, Jeremie, and the rest; for these Prophets, saith S. Chrysostome, Omnia tempora percurrunt, praterita, presentia, & futura: but they were of those of whom S. Paul speaketh of 1. Cor. 14. 14. who enriched with spirituall gifts, expounded the Scriptures and the Law.

Chrysost. Ps 43

At Mizpah Samuel assembled the people, that he might present Saul to them, who as yet knew nothing of his election: neither did Saul acquaint his owne Vncle therewith, when he asked him what had past betweene him and Samuel: for either hee thought his estate not yet assured, or else that it might be dangerous for him to reueale it, till he were confirmed by generall consent. When the Tribes were assembled at Mizpah, the generall opinion is, that he was chosen by lot. Chimbi thinks by the answer of * Vrim and

Thummim: that is, by the answer of the Priest, wearing that myserie vpon his brest when he asked counsaile of the Lord. But the casting of lots was not onely much vsed among the Iewes, but by many others, if not by all nations. The Land of promise was diuided by lot: God commanded lots to be cast on the two Goares, which should be sacrificed, and which turned off: a figure of Christs suffering, and our deliuerance, for whose garments the Iewes also cast lots. Cicero, Plautus, Pausanias, and others haue remembered diuers sorts of lots, vsed by the Romanes, Gracians, and other Nations: as in the diuision of grounds or honours; and in things to bee vnder-taken: the two first kindes were called diuiforie; the third, diuinatory; and vnto one of these three all may be reduced: all which kindes howsoeuer they may seeme chancefull, are yet ordered and directed by God: as in the Proverbs: The lot is cast into the Lap, But the whole disposition is of the Lord. And in like sort fell the Kingdome of Israel on Saul, not by chance, but by Gods ordinance, who gaue Samuel former knowledge of his election: from which election Saul with-drew himselfe in modestie, as both Iosephus confers it, and as it may bee gathered by his former answers to Samuel, when hee acknowledged himselfe the least of the least Tribe. But Samuel inlightened by God, found where Saul was hidden, and brought him among the people, and hee was taller then all the rest by the shoulders. And Samuel made them know that hee was the chosen King of Israel, whereupon all the multitude saluted him King, and prayed for him; yet some there were that enuied his glorie (as in all estates there are such) who did not acknowledge him by offering him presents, as the manner was: of whom Saul, to auoide sedition, tooke no notice.

* The Vrim & Thummim in the ornaments of the High-Priest were inserted within the pectorall, which therefore was duplicat, they were placed in the pectorall ouer against the hart of the High Priest. It is plain that they were not the precious stones nor any thing made by the Artificers. See Exod. 28. 30. Cic. de diuin. Paus. in Mes.

§. III. Of the establishing of Saul by his first victorie.

Sooner was Saul placed in the Kingdome, but that hee receiued knowledge that Nahas King of the Ammonites prepared to besiege Rabes Gilead: which Nation since the great ouerthrow giuen them by Iephtha, neuer durst attempt anie thing vpon the Israelites, till the beginning of Saul his rule. And although the Ammonites did alwaies attend vpon the aduantage of time, to recouer those Territories which first the Amorite, and then Israel dispossessed them of; which they made the ground of their inuasion in Iephtha's time; yet they neuer perfwaded themselves of more aduantage than at this present. For first they knew that there were many of the Israelites that did not willingly submit themselves to this new King: secondly, they were remembered that the Philistims had not long before slaine 34000. of their men of Warre: and besides had used great care and policie that they should haue no Smithes to make them swords or speares: neither was it long before, that of the Bethshemesites and places adioyning, there perished by the hand of God more then 50000. and therefore in these respects, euen occasion it selfe inuited them to enlarge their Dominions vpon their borderers: Iabes Gilead being one of the neerest. Besides, it may further be coniectured, that the Ammonites were emboldened against Iabes Gilead, in respect of their weakenesse: since the Israelites destroyed a great part of them, for not ioyning with them against the Beniamites: at which time they did not onely slaughter the men and male-children, but took from them their yong women, and gaue them to the Beniamites: and therefore they were not likelie to haue bene increased to any great numbers: and if they had recouered themselves of this great calamitie, yet the Ammonite might flatter himselfe with the opinion, that Israel hauing for long time bene disarmed by the Philistims, was not apt to succour those whom they had so deeply wounded and destroyed. But contrariwise, when the tidings came to Saul of their danger, and that the Ammonites would giue them no other condition to ransom themselves, but by pulling out their right eyes, by which they should be verily disabled for the Warre, as elsewhere hath bene spoken: Saul, both to value himselfe in his first yeeres reigne, and because perchance hee was descended of one of those 400. Maides taken from the Gileadites, and giuen to the Beniamites, gaue order to assemble the forces of Israel, hewing a yoke of Oxen into pieces, and sending them by messengers ouer all the coasts, protesting thus: That whosoever came not forth after Saul and after Samuel, should his Oxen be serued: threatening the people by their goods, and not by their liues at the first. Seuen dayes had Saul to assemble an Armie, by reason that the Gileadites had obtained the respite of these seuen daies to giue Nabas the Ammonite an answer: who, could they haue obtained any reasonable condition, were contented to haue leuied themselves from Israel, and to become Vassals and Tributaries to the Heathen. In the meane while Saul assembled the forces which repaired vnto him at Bezer, neere Jordan, that he might readily passe the Riuer; which done, he might in one day with a speedie march arrive at Iabes, vnder the Hills of Gilead.

The Armie by Saul led, consisting of three hundred and thirty thousand, hee returned an answer to those of Iabes, that they should assure themselves of succour by the next day at noone. For, as it seemeth, Saul marched away in the latter part of the day, and went on all night; for in the morning watch hee surprized the Armie of Nabas the Ammonite. And to the end that hee might set on them on all sides, hee diuided his forces into three parts, putting them to the sword vntill the heat of the day, and the wearinesse of Sauls troupe inforced them to giue ouer the pursuit. Now the Ammonites were become the more carelesse and secure, in that those of Iabes promised the next morning to render themselves and their Citie to their mercie. After this happie successe the people were so farre in loue with their new King, that they would haue slaine all those Israelites that murmured against his election, had not himselfe forbidden and resisted their resolutions. Such is the condition of worldly men, as they are violent louers of the prosperous, and base Vassals of the time that flourisheth: and as despightfull and cruell without cause against those, whom any misadventure, or other worldly accident hath throwne downe.

After the Armie remoued, Samuel summoned the people to meet at Gilgal, where Saul was now a third time acknowledged, and as some Commenters affirme, anointed King: and here Samuel vsed an exhortation to all the Assembly, containing precepts, and a rehearsal of his owne Iustice, during the beginning of his gouernment to that day. After Saul had now reigned one yeere before he was established in Gilgal, or Galgala, he strengthened himselfe with a good guard of 3000. chosen men, of which he assigned 1000. to attend on Jonathan his sonne at Gibeah, the Citie of his natiuitie: the rest hee kept about his owne person in Micmas, and in the Hill of Bethel.

§. IIII.

Of Sauls disobedience in his proceedings in the Warres with the Philistims and Amalekites, which caused his small reiection.

Jonathan with his small Armie or Regiment that attended him, taking a time of aduantage, surprized a Garrison of Philistims: the same, as some thinke, which Saul past by, when he came from Rama, where hee was first anointed by Samuel, which which they thinke to haue bene Cariath-earim: because a place where the Philistims had a Garrison, 1. Sam. 10. is called the Hill of God, which they vnderstand of Cariath-earim: but Tunius vnderstands this Garrison to haue bene at Gebah in Beniamin neere Gibba, where Jonathan abode with his thousand followers. Howsoeuer, by this it appeareth that the Philistims held some strong places, both in the times of Samuel, and of Saul, within the Territorie of Israel: and now being greatly intraged by this surprize, they assembled thirty thousand armed Chariots, and fixe thousand Horse, wherewith they invaded Iudea, and incamped at Machmas or Nichmas, a Citie of Beniamin, in the direct way from Samarita to Iherusalem, and in the midst of the Land betwene the Sea and Jordan. With this sudden inuasion the Israelites were stricken in so great a feare, as some of them hid themselves in the caues of the mountaines, other fledde ouer Jordan into Gad and Galgala: Saul himselfe with some 2000. men of ordinarie, and many other people, staid at Galgala in Beniamin, not farre from the passage of Iosua when he led Israel ouer Jordan. Heere Saul, by Samuels appointment was to attend the coming of Samuel seuen daies: but when the last day was in part spent, and that Saul perceiued his forces to diminish greatly, he presumed (as some expound the place 1. Sam. 13. 9.) to exercise the office which appertained not vnto him; and to offer a burnt offering and a peace offering vnto God, contrary to the Ecclesiasticall lawes of the Hebrewes, and Gods Commandements: others expound the word obolus, in this place; by obolus per Sacerdotem, and so make the sinne of Saul not to haue bene any intrusion into the Priests office, but first a disobedience to Gods Commandement, in not staying according to the appointment, 1. Sam. 10. 8. secondly a diffidence or mistrust in Gods helpe, and too great relying vpon the strength of the people, whose departing from him hee could not beare patiently; and lastly a Contempt of the holy Prophet Samuel, and of the helpe which the prayers of so godly a man might procure him. But whatsoeuer was his sinne, notwithstanding his excuses, hee was by Samuel reprehended most sharply, in termes visiting his estate, had not extraordinarie warrant bene giuen to Samuel so to doe, from God himselfe; at which time also Samuel feared not to let him know, that the Kingdome should be conferred to another (a man after Gods owne heart) both from Saul, and his posteritie.

After this Samuel and Saul returned to Gibeah, where Saul, when hee had taken view of his armie, found it to consist of 600. men: for the most were fled from him and scattered, yea and among those that staid, there was not any that had either sword or speare, but Saul and his sonne Jonathan onely. For the Philistims had not left them any Smyth in all Israel, that made weapons; besides, they that came to Saul came hastily, and left such weapons and armor as they had, behind them in their garrisons: for if they had had none at all, it might be much doubted how Saul should be able the yeere before, or in some part of this very yeere, to succour Iabes Gilead with 300. and thirty thousand men, if there had not now bene any yron weapon to defend themselves withall: saue onely in the hand of Saul and Jonathan his sonne. But howsoeuer, all the rest of the people were formerly disarmed by the Philistims, and all those craftsmen carried out of the land that made weapons: there being left vnto the Israelites only files to sharpen and amend such stiffe as serued for the Plough, and for nought else: yea that they had some kind of armes is manifest, or else they durst not haue attempted vpon the Philistims as they did. And it is not said in the Text that there was not any sword in all Israel; but onely that there was not any found among those 600. souldiers which stayed with Saul after Samuels departure: and it seemeth that when Samuel had sharply reprehended Saul, that his owne guards forooke him, hauing but 600. remaining of his 3000. ordinarie souldiers, and of all the rest that repaired vnto him, of which many were fledde from him before Samuel arrived.

With this small troupe he held himselfe to his owne Citie of Gibeah, as a place of more strength, and better assured vnto him, than Gilgal was. Neither is it obscure how it should come to passe that the Philistims should thus disarm the most part of the Israelites, howsoeuer in the time of Samuel much had bene done against them. For the victories of Samuel were not got by sword or speare, but by thunder from heauen: and when these craftsmen were once rooted out of the Cities of Israel, no maruell if they could not in a short peace vnder Samuel be replanted againe. For this tyrannie of the Philistims is to bee vnderstood, rather of the precedent times, than vnder Samuel: and yet vnder him it is to be thought that by their crafts they proceeded in the policie, not suffering their artificers to teach the Israelites, and so euen to the times of Saul kept them from hauing any store of armour. The same policie did Nabuchodonosor vse after his Conquest in Iudea: Dionysius in Sicilie; and many other Princes else-where in all ages. But these lost weapons in part the Israelites might repaire in Gilead, for ouer Iordan the Philistims had not inuaded. The rest of their defences were such as antiquitie vsed, and their present necessity ministred vnto them; to wit, clubs, bowes, and slings. For the Beniamites excelled in casting stones in slings; and that these were the naturall weapons, and the first of all nations, it is manifest; and so in the first of Chronicles the 12. Chapter, it is written of those that came to succour Dauid against Saul, while he lurked at Siklag. That they were armed with bowes, and could vse the right and the left hand with stones; and with a sling it was that Dauid himselfe slew the Gyant Goliath.

While the State of Israel stood in these hard termes, the Philistims hauing parted their armie into three troupes, that they might spoile and destroy many parts at once; Jonathan strengthened by God, and followed with his Elquire onely, scaled a mountaine, whereon a companie of Philistims were lodged: the rest of their armie (as may bee gathered by the successe) being incamped in the plaine adioyning. And though he were discovered before he came to the hill top, and in a kinde of derision called vp by his enemies: yet he so behaued himselfe, as with the assistance of God he slew 20. of the first Philistims that he encountered. Whereupon the next companies taking the alarme, and being ignorant of the cause, fled away amazed altogether. In which confusion, feare, and ielousie, they slaughtered one another in stead of enemies: whereupon those Hebrewes which became of their partie, because they feared to be spoyled by them, tooke the aduantage of their destruction, and slew of them in great numbers. And lastly, Saul himselfe taking knowledge of the rout and disorder, together with those Israelites that shrouded themselves in mount Ephraim, set vpon them and obtained (contrary to all hope and expectation) a most happie and glorious victory ouer them. Heere was that propheticie in Deuteronomie fulfilled by Jonathan, That one of those which feared God, should kill a thousand, and rouse of them ten thousand.

This done, the small armie of Israel made retrait from the pursuit. And although Saul had bound the people by an oath not to take food till the euening, yet his sonne Jonathan being infeebled with extreame labour and emptinesse, tasted a drop of hony in his passage: for which Saul his father would haue put him to death, had not the people deliuered him from his crueltie.

The late miraculous victorie of Saul and Jonathan, seemes to haue reduced vnto the Philistims remembrance their former ouerthrow likewise miraculous in the daies of Samuel; so that for some space of time they held themselves quiet. In the meane while Saul being now greatly encouraged, vnderooke by turnes all his bordering enemies; namely, the Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, and the Arabians of Zobah, against all which he preuailed. He then assembled all the forces he could make, to wit, 210000. men, and receiuing the commandement of God by Samuel, he inuaded Amalec, wasting and destroying all that part of Arabia Petraea, and the Desart belonging to the Amalekites, from Hanilah towards Tigris vnto Shur, which bordereth Egypt; in which warre he tooke Agag their King prisoner. But whereas he was instructed by Samuel to follow this Nation without compassion, because they first of all attempted Israel, when they left Egypt in Moses time: hee notwithstanding did not onely spare the life of Agag, but reserved the best of the beasts and spoyle of the Countrey, with pretence to offer them in sacrifice to the liuing God. Therefore did Samuel now a second time make him know that God would cast him from his royall estate to which he was raised, when he was of base condition, and as the Text hath it, little in his owne eyes. And though the offence was great in Saul for not obeying the voyce of God by Samuel, had there beene no former precept to that effect: yet seeing Saul could not bee ignorant how feuerly it pleased God to inioyne the Israelites to reuenge themselves vpon that Nation, he was in all vnicusculable. For God had commanded that the Israelites should put out the remembrance of Amalec from vnder heauen. For the cruelty which the predecessors of this Agag vsed against the Israelites, especially on those which were ouer-wearied, faint, sicke, and aged people, was now to be reuenged on him, and his Nation about 400. yeeres afterward; and now hee was to pay the debt of blood, which his forefathers borrowed from the the innocent: himselfe hauing also sinned in the same kinde, as these words of Samuel witness: As thy sword hath made other women childelesse, so shall thy mother be childelesse among other women; at which time Samuel himselfe (after he had beene by many bootlesse intreates perswaded to stay a while with Saul) did cut Agag in pieces before the Lord in Gilgal, and soone after he departed to Ramath, and came no more to see Saul, untill the day of his death.

§. V.

Of the occurrents betwene the reiection of Saul and his death.

Now while Samuel mourned for Saul, God commanded him to choose a King for Israel, among the sonnes of Israh: which Samuel (doubting the violent hand of Saul) feared in a sort to performe, till it pleased God to direct him, how hee might auoid both the suspition, and the danger. And if Samuel knew that it was no way derogating from the prouidence of God, that by his cautious care and wisdom, hee sought to auoid the inconuenience or dangers of this life; then doe these men mistake the nature of his diuine ordinance, who neglecting the reason that God hath giuen them, doe no otherwise auoid the perills and dangers thereof, than as men stupified in the opinion of fate or destinie, neglecting either to beg counsaile at Gods hands by prayer, or to exercise that wildome or foresight, where-with God hath enriched the mind of man, for his preferuation. Neither did the all-powerfull God (who inade and could destroy the world in an instant) disdaine here to instruct Samuel, to auoid the furie of Saul, by the accustomed cautious waies of the world.

Of the sonnes of Israh, Samuel by God directed, made choice of Dauid, the yongest, hauing refused Eliab, the first borne: who though he were a man of a comely person and great strength; yet vnto such outward appearance, the Lord had no respect. For as it is written, God seeth not as man seeth, &c. but the Lord beholdeth the heart. He also refusing the other six brethren, made choice of one whom his Father had altogether neglected, and left in the field to attend his flocke, for of him the Lord said to Samuel, Arise and anoint him, for this is he: which done, Samuel departed and went to Ramath. Neyther was it long after this that Saul began to seeke the life of Dauid: in which bloody minde he continued till he died, overcome in battell by the Philistims.

The Philistims hauing well considered (as it seemes) the increase of Saul his power through many victories by him obtained, whilst they had sitten still & forborne to giue impediment to his prosperous courses, thought it good to make new triall of their fortune, as iustly fearing that the wrongs which they had done to Israel, might be repayed with aduantage, if euer opportunity should serue their often inured neighbours against them, as lately it had done against Moab, Ammon, and the rest of their ancient enemies. Now for the qualitie of their Souldiers, and all warlike prouisions, the Philistims had reason to thinke themselves equall, if not superiours to Israel. The successe of their former wars had for the most part beene agreeable to their own wishes, as for late disasters, they might, according to humane wisdom, impute them to second causes, as to a tempest happening by chance, and to a mistaken alarme, wherby their Armie possessed with a needlesse feare had fallen to rout. Hauing therefore mustered their forces, and taken the field, encamping so neere to the Armie which King Saul drew forth against them; that they could not easily depart without the triall of a battell, each part kept their ground of aduantage for a while, not ioyning in grosse, but maintaining some skirmishes, as refusing both of them to passe the Valley that lay betwene their Camps. Iust causes of feare they had on both sides; especially the Philistims, whose late attempts had been founded by the angrie hand of God. Vpon this occasion perhaps it was, that they sought to decide the matter by single combat, as willing to try in one mans person, whether any stroke from heauen were to bee feared. Goliath of Gath a strong Giant, fearing neither God nor Man, vnderooke to defie the whole hoste of Israel, prouoking them with despightfull words, to appoint a Champion that might fight with him hand to hand; offering condition, that the partie vanquished in Champion, should hold it selfe as overcome in grosse, and become vassall to the other. This gaue occasion to young Dauid, whom Samuel by Gods appointment had annointed, to make a famous entrance into publike notice of the people. For no man durst expose himselfe to encounter the great strength of Goliath, vntill Dauid (sent by his father of an errand to the campe) accepted the combat, and obtained the victorie, without other armes offensive or defensive than a sling, wherewith he ouerthrew that haughtie Gyant, and after with his owne sword strooke off his head. Heereupon the Philistims, who should haue yeelded themselves as subiects to the Conquerour, according to the couenant on their owne side propounded, fled without stay; and were pursued and slaughtered euen to their ownegates. By this victorie the Philistims were not so broken, that eyther any of their townes were lost, or their people discouraged from infesting the Territories of Israel. But Dauid, by whom God had wrought this victorie, fell into the grieuous indignation of his Master Saul, through the honour purchased by his well-deferuing. For after such time as the spirit of God departed from Saul and came vpon Dauid, hee then became a cruell Tyrant, faithlesse, and irreligious. Because the high Priest Abimelech fedde Dauid in his necessitie with hallowed bread, and armed him with a sword of his owne conquest taken from Goliath; Saul not onely by his wicked Edomite Dag murdered this Abimelech and 85. Priests of Nob, but also hee destroyed the Citie, and smote with the edge of the sword both man and woman, both childe and suckling, both Oxe and Asse, and Sheepe. And hee that had compassion on Agag the Amalekite, who was an enemy to God and his people, and also spared and preserved the best of his Cattell, contrarie to the Commandement and ordinance of God, both by Moses and Samuel, had not now any mercie in store, for the innocent, for the Lords seruants the Priests of Israel. Yea hee would haue slaine his owne sonne Jonathan, for pitying and pleading Dauids innocencie, as also once before for tasting the hony, when his fainting for hunger made him forget his fathers vnreasonable commination. The companions of crueltie are breach of faith towards men, and impietie towards God. The former he shewed in denying Dauid his daughter, whom he had promised him: and againe in taking her away from him, to whom he had giuen her; also in that when as Dauid had twice spared his life in the Territorie of Ziph, and Saul twice sworne to do him no hurt, and confessed his errors, yet hee sought still to destroy him, by all the meanes he could. His impietie towards God he shewed, in that he sought counsell of the witch of Endor, which was the last preparatiue for his destruction. For whereas when he sought counsell from God he had bin alwaies victorious: from the Oracle of the Deuill this successe followed, that both himselfe, and his three sons, with his neereft and faithful seruants, were all slaughtered by the Philistims: his bodie with the bodies of his sons (as a spectacle of shame and dishonour) were hung ouer the walls of Bethsan: and there had remained till they had found buriell in the bowels of rauenuous birds, had not the gratefull Gileadites of Labestolne their carcases thence, and interred them. This was the end of Saul, after he had gouerned Israel, together with Samuel 40. yeres, and by himselfe after Samuel 20. yeres, according to Cedrenus, Theophilus, and Iosephus. But yet it seemeth to me, that after the death of Samuel, Saul did not rule very long. For in the beginning of the 25. chapter, it is written that Samuel died: and in the rest of the same chapter the passages are written of Dauid, Nabal, and Abigail, after which the death of Saul quickly ensued.

An exceeding valiant man he was, and gaue a faire entrance to all those victories which Dauid afterward obtained; for hee had beaten the Ammonites with their neighbouring Nations; crusht the Syrians, and their adherents; broken the strength of the Amalekites; and greatly wasted the power and pride of the Philistims.

§. VI.

Of such as liued with Samuel and Saul; of Hellen and Hercules, and of their issues: upon occasion of the Dotes, with the Heraclidae, entering Peloponnesus about this time.

IN the second yeere of Samuel, according to Eusebius, was Dauid borne: after Codman later, and in the ninth yeere: after Bunting in the tenth. For Dauid, which hee was borne in the tenth of the fortie yeeres, which are giuen to Samuel and Saul. About the 11. yeere of Samuel, Aeneas Silvius the sonne of Posthumus began his reigne ouer the Latines in Alba, who gouerned that State one and thirty yeeres. Thereafter who place before him Latinus Sylvius, as brother to Posthumus, calling him the fifth from from Aeneas, and fourth King of Alba, whercof I will not stand to dispute. In the eleventh of Samuel, Dercilus sat in the Throne of Assyria, being the one and thirtieth King; he ruled that Empire fortie yeeres. In this age of Samuel the Dores obtained Peloponnesus, and at once with the Heraclidae; who then led and commanded the Nation, possesse a great part thereof 328. yeeres before the first Olympiad, according to Diodorus and Eratosthenes. For all Greece was anciently possessed by three Tribes or Kindreds, viz. the Ionians, Dorians, and Aeolians: at length it was called Hellas, and the people Hellenes of Hellen, the sonne of Deucalion, Lord of the Countrie of Phiotis in Thessalie. But before the time of this Hellen, yea and long after, Greece had no name common to all the inhabitants, neither were the people called Hellenes, till such time as partly by trading in all parts of the Land; partly by the plantation of many Colonies, and sundrie great victories obtained, the issues of Hellen had reduced much of the Countrie vnder their obedience, calling themselves generally by one name, and yet every seuerall Nation after some one of the posteritie of Hellen, who had reigned ouer it. And because this is the furthest antiquitie of Greece, it will not be amisse to recount the Pedigree of her first planters.

Iapetus (as the Poets fable) was the sonne of Heauen and Earth, so accounted; eyther because the names of his Parents; had in the Greeke tongue such signification: or perhaps for his knowledge in Astronomie and Philosophie.

Iapetus begat Prometheus, and Epimetheus: of whom all men haue read that haue read Poets. Prometheus begat Dencalion: and Epimetheus, Pyrrha. Deucalion &c his wife Pyrrha reigned in Thessalie, which was then called Pyrrha (as Cretensis Rhianus affirmeth) of Pyrrha the Queene. In Deucalions time was that great flood, of which we haue spoken elsewhere. Dencalion begat Hellen: whose sonnes were Xuthus, Dorus, and Eolus: of Dorus and Eolus, the Dores and Aeolians had name. The Aeoles inhabited Beotia. The Dores hauing first inhabited sundrie parts of Thessalie, did afterward seate themselves about Parnassus, and finally became Lords of the Countries about Lacedaemon: Xuthus the eldest sonne of Hellen, being banished by his brethren, for hauing diuerred from them to his owne use some part of their Fathers goods, came to Athens: where marrying the Daughter of King Erichtheus, hee begat on her two sonnes, Achaeus and Ion. Of these two, Achaeus, for a slaughter by him committed, fledde into Peloponnesus: and seating himselfe in Laconia, gaue name to that region: from whence (as some write) hee afterwards departed; and leuying an Armie, recovered the Kingdome of his Grandfather in Thessalie.

Ion being Generall for the Athenians, when Eumolpus the Thracian invaded Attica, did obtaine a great victorie, and thereby such loue and honour of the people, that they committed the ordering of their State into his hands. Hee diuided the Citizens into Tribes, appointing euery one to some occupation, or good course of life. When the people multiplied, hee planted Colonies in Sycionia, then called Aegialos, or Aegialia: In which Countrie Solimus then reigning, thought it safer to giue his Daughter Helice in marriage to Ion, and make him his Heire, than to contend with him. So Ion married Helice, and built a Towne called by his Wifes name in Aegialia, where he and his posterity reigned long, and (though not obliterating the old name) gaue to that Land denomination. But in after-times the Dores assisting the Nephewes of Hercules, invaded Peloponnesus, and ouercomming the Acheans, possessed Laconia, and all those parts which the Achai had formerly occupied. Heereupon the Achai driuen to seeke a new seate, came vnto the Iones desiring to inhabit Aegialia with them, and allcading in vaine, that Ion and Achaeus had bene brethren. When this request could not be obtained, they fought by force to expell the Ionians, which they performed; but they lost their King Tisamenus, the sonne of 50 Orestes in that Warre.

Thus were the Iones driuen out of Peloponnesus, and compelled to remooue into Attica, from whence after a while they sailed into Asia, and peopled the Western coast thereof, on which they built twelue Cities, inhabited by them, euen to this day, at the least without any vniuersall or memorable transmigration. This expedition of the Iones into Asia hath bene mentioned of all which haue written of that Age, and is commonly placed 140. yeeres after the warre of Troy, and 60. yeeres after the descent of the Heraclidae into Peloponnesus. These Heraclidae were they of whom the Kings of Sparta issued; which race held that Kingdome about 700. yeeres. Of their Father

Hercules many strange things are deliuered vnto vs by the Poets, of which some are like to haue beene true, others perhaps must be allegorically vnderstood. But the most approved Writers thinke that there were many called Hercules, all whose exploits were by the Greekes ascribed to the sonne of Alcmena, who is said to haue performed these 12. great labours.

First, he slew the Nemean Lyon: secondly, he slew the Serpent Hydra, which had nine heads, whereof one being cut off, two grew in the place: The third was the ouer-taking a very swift Hare: The fourth was the taking of a wilde Bore alive, which haunted mount Erymanthus in Arcadie: The fifth was the cleansing of Augias his Oxe-stall in one day, which he performed by turning the Riuer Alpheus into it: The sixth was the chasing away of the Birds from the Lake Stymphalis: The seventh was the fetching a Bull from Crete: The eight was the taking of the Mares which Diomedes King of Thrace fed with humane flesh: The ninth was to fetch a Girdle of the Queen of the Amazons: The three last were, to fetch Geryons Beecies from Gades, the golden Apples of the Hesperides; and Cerberus from hell. The Mythologicall interpretation of these I purposely omit, as both ouer-long to be here set downe, and no lesse perplexed than the labours themselves. For some by Hercules vnderstand Fortitude, Prudence, and Constancie, interpreting the Monsters, Vices. Others make Hercules the Sonne, and his trauailes to bee the true signes of the Zodiac. There are others who apply his workes historically to their owne conceits; as well assured, that the exposition cannot haue more vnlikelihood, than the fables: That hee tooke Elys, Pylus, Oechalia, and other Townes, being assisted by such as cyther admired his vertues, or were beholding vnto him. Also that hee slew many Theeues, and Tyrants, I take to be truly written, without addition of Poeticall vanitie. His trauailes through most parts of the world are, or may seeme, borrowed from Hercules Libycus. But sure it is that many Cities of Greece were greatly bound to him: for that hee (bending all his inducours to the common good) deliuered the Land from much oppression. But after his death no Citie of Greece (Athens excepted) required the vertue and deserts of Hercules, with constant protection of his children, persecuted by the King Eurystheus. This Eurystheus was sonne of Sthenelus, and grand-childe of Perseus; hee reigned in Mycena, the mightiest Citie then in Greece: He it was that imposed those hard taskes vpon Hercules, who was bound to obey him (as Poets report) for expiation of that Murder, which in his madnes he had committed vpon his owne children; but as others say, because he was his Subiect and Seruant: wherefore there are who commend Eurystheus for imploying the strength of Hercules to so good a purpose. But it is so generally agreed by the best writers, that Hercules was also of the stocke of Perseus, and holden in great ialousie by Eurystheus because of his vertue, which appeared more and more in the dangerous seruices, wherein he was imployed, so that he grew great in reputation and power through all Greece; and had by many wiues and Concubines about threescore children. These children Eurystheus would faine haue got into his power, when Hercules was dead: but they fled vnto Cephalus King of Thracina, and from him (for he durst not withstand Eurystheus) to Athens. The Athenians not onely gaue them entertainment, but lent them ayde, wherewith they encountered Eurystheus Solons the brothers son of Hercules, who had assisted him in many of his trauels, was captaine of the Heracidae. It is said of him, that being dead, hee obtained leaue of Pluto to liue againe till hee might reuenge the iniuries done by Eurystheus: whom when he had slaine in battell, hee died againe. It seemes to mee, that whereas he had ledde Colonies into Sicilie, and abode there a long time forgotten: hee came againe into Greece to assist his cousins, and afterwards returned backe. When the Peloponnesians vnderstood that Eurystheus was slaine, they tooke Atrius the sonne of Pelops to their King: for hee was rich, mighty, and fauoured of the people. Against him the Heracidae marched vnder Hyllus the sonne of Hercules. But to auoid effusion of blood, it was agreed, that Hyllus should fight with Echeneus King of the Tegeate a people of Arcadie, who assisted Atrius, with condition, that if Hyllus were victor, he should peaceably enioy what hee challenged as his right: otherwise the Heracidae should not enter Peloponnesus in an hundred yeeres. In that combat Hyllus was slaine, and the Heracidae compelled to forebeare their Country, till the third generation: at which time they returned vnder Aristodemus (as the best authoritie doth shew, though some haue said, that they came vnder the conduct of his children) and brought with them the Dores, whom whom they planted in that countrey, as is before shewed, hauing expelled the Achai, ouer whom the issue of Pelops had reigned after the death of Eurystheus foure generations.

§. VII.

Of Homer and Hesiod, and many changes in the world, that happened about this age.

About this time that excellent learned Poet Homer liued, as many of the best Chronologers affirme. He was by race of the Macones, descended (as Functius imagineth) of Berosus his Anameton, who gaue name to that people. But this Functius imagineth Homer the Poet to haue beene long after these times, rashly framing his Era according to Archilochus in the tract, or rather fragment de temporibus; and makes seauen more of this name to haue flourished in diuers Cities in Greece. Whence, perhaps, sprang the diuersitie of opinions, both of the time and of the native Citie of Homer. According to this Archilochus, Functius finds Homer about the time of Manasse King of Iudaea, and Numa of Rome. He was called Mesepigenes from the place of his birth, and at length Homer, because blinde men follow a guide, which signification among others, is in the verbe homer: for this Homer in his latter time was blinde. Clemens Alexandrinus recites many different opinions touching the question of the time when Homer liued. So also Aulus Gellius, and Tatianus Affyrinus in his Oration ad gentes. Paterculus reckons that Homer flourished 950. yeeres before the Consulship of Marcus Vinicius: which Marcus calteth vp in the worlds yeere 3046. and after Troy taken, about 260 yeeres: and about 250. yeeres before the building of Rome; making him to haue flourished about the time of Iehosaphat King of Iuda. But Clemens Alexandrinus and Tatianus abouenamed, mention authors that make him much ancients. The difference of which authors in this point is not vnworthy the readers consideration, that by this one instance he may guesse of the difficultie, and so pardon the errors in the computations of ancient time: seeing in such diuersitie of opinions a man may hardly finde out what to follow. For Crates the Grammarians (as Clemens Alexandrinus reports) gaue being to Homer about 80. yeeres after Troy taken, neere the time that the Heracidae returned into Peloponnesus: and Erato Stenes after Troy 100. yeeres. Theopompus 500. yeeres after the armie of Greece failed into Phrygia for the warre of Troy. Euphorion makes him contemporarie with Gyges, who began to reigne in the 18. Olympiad (which was 45. yeeres after Rome was built) and Sosibius saith, that he was 90. yeeres before the first Olympiad, which hee seeks to proue by the times of Charillus and his sonne Nicander; Philochorus placeth him 180. after Troy: Aristarchus 140. in the time of the seating of the Colonies in Ionis. Apollodorus affirmes that he liued while Agefilaus gouerned Lacedaemon; and that Lycargus in his yong yeeres, about 100. yeeres after the Ionian plantations, came to visit him, neere 240. yeeres after Troy taken. Herodotus findes Homer flourishing 622. yeeres before Xerxes enterprise against the Gracians: which Beroaldus accounteth at 168. yeeres after the Troian warre. Eusebius seemes to make him to haue beene about the time of Ious King of Iuda, 124. yeeres before Rome built: though elsewhere in his Chronologie he notes, that some place him in the time of Samuel, and others in the end of Dauid, and others in other ages. In his Euangelicall Preparation, where out of Tatianus Affyrinus he citeth sundry opinions touching the time when Homer liued, he reckoneth many other Greece writers more ancient than Homer; as Linus, Phalammon, Epimenides, Pemius, Aristeus, Orpheus, Museus, Thamyraus, Amphion, and others.

Now whether Homer or Hesiodus were the elder, it is also much disputed. Aulus Gellius reports that Philochorus and Xenophanes affirme, that Homer preceded Hesiod: and on the contrary, that Luc. Accius the Poet, and Ephorus the Historian, make Hesiod of an elder time than Homer. Varro leaues it vncertaine which of these learned fablers was first borne: but he findes that they liued together some certaine yeeres, wherein he confirms himselfe by an Epigram, written vpon a Treuit, and left by Hesiod in Helicon.

Cornelius Nepos reports that they both liued 160. yeeres before Rome built: while the Siluij reigned in Alba, about 140. yeeres after the fall of Troy. Enthymentus findes them both 200. yeeres after Troy taken, in the time of Acistus the sonne of Pelias, King of

* As both Cle. Alex. and Tatian. Affyr. report his opinion on scruum Phil. 43. Ros. in disc. temporum. Phil. in comm. in Archilog. Her. in vita Ho.

Varro de inag. l. 1. Ne. in Chron. Cass. l. 1. ann. d. 2. This number Mrodror corrects, & reads 240. for it. b. Enthy in Chr. and Clem. Alex. Strom. 5. of of Theſſaly. For my ſelfe, I am not much troubled when this Poet liued; neither would I offend the Reader with theſe opinions, but onely to ſhew the vncertainty and diſagreement of Hiſtorians, as well in this particular, as in all other queſtions and diſpute of time. For the curioſitie of this manſage is no leſſe ridiculous, than the inquisition why he began his Iliades with the word Menin, as perhaps containing ſome great myſterie. In deſcription whereof Lucian ſaining himſelfe to haue beene in hell, and to haue ſpoken with Homer, there asked him the cauſe why he began his booke with that word: who answered, That he began in that ſort, becauſe it came in his head ſo to doe.

It ſeemeth that Senyes, or after Macrobius, Senemires, ruled Egypt at this time: for Tamopher ſobris was his ſucceſſour, who preceded Vaphres, father in law to Salomon.

Euſeb. Caſſ. in
Chron.

About the end of Sauls government, or in the beginning of Dauids time according to Cassiodorus, the Amazones with the Cymmerians inuaded Aſia, Latinus Syllius then ruling in Italie. And beſides the ouerthrow of that famous State of Troy (which fell 103 yeeres before Dauids time) there were many other changes in the middle part of the world, not onely by reaſon of thoſe Northerne Nations: but there ſprung vp ſomewhat neerely together, fixe Kingdomes into greameſſe not before erected. In Italie, that of the Luſines in the South part of Greece, thoſe of Lacedamon, Corinth, and the Achai. In Arabia, Syria, Staba, and Damaſcus, the Adads made themſelues Princes, of which there were ten Kings, which began and ended with the Kings of Iſrael in effect: and ſomewhat before theſe, the State of the Iſraelites hauing now altered the forme of Government, began to flouriſh vnder Kings, of which Dauid, in a few yeeres, became maſter of all thoſe neighbouring Nations who by interchange of times had ſubiected the Iudeans, corrupted their religion, and held them vnder in a moſt abiect and grieuous ſlauerie; to wit, the Edumians, Moabites, Ammonites, Midianites, Itureans, and the reſt of the Arabians, with the Philiftims, Iobnites, Gefhurites, Machathites; all which acknowledged Dauid for their Soueraigne Lord, and paid him tribute.

CHAP. XVII.

Of Dauid.

S. I.

Of Dauids eſtate in the time of Saul.

DE hazards which Dauid ran into while he was yet onely deſigned King, and liuing as a priuate man, expected the Empire, were very many. The firſt perſonall act of fame, was his killing of Goliath in the view of both armies, whereby he became knowne to Saul, and ſo highly affected of Jonathan the ſonne of Saul, that he loued him as his owne ſoule: In ſomuch as when Saul ſought to perſwade his ſon, that Dauid would assuredly be the ruine of his houſe, and eſtate, and offered him violence when he pleaded his cauſe, Jonathan could neuer be perſwaded, neuer forſt, nor euer wearied from the care of Dauids life, & well doing. It was not long after this ſignall act of Dauid, but that Saul became exceeding iealous of him, though he were becomeas his houſhold ſeruant, and his Eſquire, or armor-bearer. Saul being vexed with an euill ſpirit, was aduiſed to procure ſome cunning Muſician to play before him vpon the Harpe; whereby it was thought that he might finde eaſe; which came to paſſe accordingly. He entertained Dauid for this purpoſe, and began to fauour him, giuing him a place of Command among the men of warre. But the iealous tyrant ſoone waxed wearie of his good affection, and ſought to kill Dauid, being thereunto moued onely through enuie of his vertue. This paſſion firſt brake forth in the middeſt of his raving fit, at which time he threw a ſpeare at Dauid that was then playing on his Harpe to doe him eaſe.

Conſec. 12. c. 14.

Cenforinus remembreth one Aſclepius a Phyſician, who practiſed the curing of the Frenzie, by the like Muſicke: and tempered thereby thoſe diſeaſes which grew from paſſion. That Pythagoras did alſo the like by ſuch a kinde of harmonie, Seneca in his third booke of anger witneſſeth. But the madneſſe of Saul came from the cauſe of cauſes, and and was thereby incurable, howſoeuer it ſometimes left him, and yeelded vnto that Muſicke, which God had ordained to be a meane of more good to the Muſician than to the King.

Saul hauing failed in ſuch open attempts, gaue vnto Dauid the Command ouer 1000 ſouldiers, to confront the Philiftims withall. For hee durſt not truſt him as before, about his perſon, fearing his reuenge. Now the better to couer his hatred towards him, he promiſed him his daughter Merab to wife: but hauing married her to Adriel, he gaue to Dauid his yonger daughter Michol, but with a condition, to preſent him with an hundred foreskins of the Philiftims: hoping rather (in reſpect of the valour of that Nation) that the Philiftims would take Dauids head, than he their foreskins. This hope failing, when as now Dauids victories begat new feares and iealouſies in Saul, he practiſed with Jonathan, and afterwards with his owne hands attempted his life, but his purpoſes were ſtill fruſtrated. After all this he ſought to murder him in his owne houſe, but Michol his wife deliuered him. So Dauid ſought Samuel at Ramah, and being purſued by Saul, fled thence vnto Nob in Beniamin, to Abimelech, then to Achis the Philiftim, Prince of Geth: where to obſcure himſelfe, he was forc't to counterfeit both ſimplicitie and diſtraction. But being ill aſſured among the Philiftims, he couered himſelfe in the Caue of Adullam: and after conuoying ſuch of his kinſfolks as were not fit to follow him, into Moab, he hid himſelfe in the deſerts of Ziph, Maon and the hils of Engaddi, where he cut off the lap of Sauls garment, and ſpared his life: as he did a ſecond time in the deſart of Ziph, after his paſſage with Nabal and Abigail. After which he repaired to Achis of Geth the ſecond time, and was kindly entertained in regard of the hatred, with which his maſter Saul was knowne to proſecute him.

Of Achis Dauid obtained * Siklag in Simeon, pretending to inuade Iudea: but he bent his forces another way and ſtrooke the Amalekites, with other enemies of Iſrael, letting none liue to complaine vpon him. Achis ſuppoſing that Dauid had drawne bloud of his owne Nation, thought himſelfe aſſured of him: and therefore preparing to inuade Iſrael, ſummoned Dauid to aſſiſt him, who diſſembling his intent, ſeemeth very willing thereto. But the reſt of the Philiftim Princes knowing his valour, and doubting his diſpoſition, liked not his company, and therefore he withdrew himſelfe to Siklag. At his return he found the towne burnt, his two wiues with the wiues and children of his people taken by the Amalekites: Hereupon his fellowes mutined, but God gaue him comfort, and aſſurance to recouer all againe: which he did.

This armie of the Philiftims commanded by Achis, encountred Saul at Gilboa, in which he and his three ſonnes were ſlaine. The newes with Sauls Crowne and bracelets were brought to Dauid at Siklag, in his returne from being victorious ouer Amalech, by a man of the ſame Nation, who auowed (though falſly) that himſelfe at Sauls requeſt had ſlaine him. Dauid, becauſe he had accuſed himſelfe, made no ſcruple to cauſe him to be ſlaine at the inſtant: and the ſooner, becauſe the probabilities gaue ſtrong euidence withall. Otherwiſe it followeth not that euery man ought to be beleeued of himſelfe to his owne prejudice. For it is held in the law; Confessio reorum non habenda eſt pro explorato crimine, niſi approbatio alia inſtruit religionem cognoſcentis. The priſoners confeſſion muſt not be taken for an euidence of the crime, vntleſſe ſome other prooffe informe the conſcience of the Iudge. For a man may confeſſe thoſe things of himſelfe, that the Iudge by examination may know to be impoſſible. But becauſe it is otherwiſe determined in the title de cuſtodia reorum l. ſi confeſſus, & in cap. de pœnis l. qui ſententiam, therefore doth the Gloſſe reconcile theſe two places in this ſort: Si quis in iudicio ſpontē de ſeipſo confeſſetur, & poſtea maneat in confeſſione, id eſt ſatis. If any man in iudgement doe confeſſe of himſelfe, of his owne accord, and after doth perſeuer in his confeſſion, it is enough. That Dauid greatly bewailed Saul it is not improbable, for death cutteth aſunder all competition: and the lamentable end that befell him, being a King, with whom in effect the ſtrength of Iſrael alſo fell, could not but ſtirre vp ſorrow, and moue compaſſion in the heart of Dauid.

The victory which the Philiftims had gotten was ſo great, that ſome townes of the Iſraelites, euen beyond the riuer of Jordan, were abandoned by the inhabitants, and left vnto the enemy, who tooke poſſeſſion of them without any reſiſtance made. Wherefore it may ſeeme ſtrange, that a Nation ſo warlike and ambitious as were the Philiftims, did not follow their fortune with all diligence, and ſeek to make the Conqueſt entire.

Moſt

Most like it seemes, that the Ciuill warre immediatly breaking out betweene Dauid and the house of Saul, wherein Inda was diuided from the rest of Israel, gaue them hope of an easie victorie ouer both; and thereby caused them to attempt nothing at the present, left by so doing they should inforce their disagreeing enemies to a necessarie reconciliation; but rather to permit that the one part should consume the other, by which means, both the victors, and the vanquished, would become a prey to the violence of such as had beaten them, when their forces were vnited.

§. II.

Of the beginning of Dauids reigne, and the warre made by Abner for Isboseth.

After the death of Saul, Abner, who commanded for Saul in the warre, fought to aduance Isboseth (or Iebostus, according to Iosephus) though he had no right to the Kingdome of Israel: for Mephiboseth the first son of Ionathan liued. Against this Abner, and Isboseth, Dauid made a defensiu warre, till Abner past Jordan, and entred the border of Juda; at which time he sent Joab with such forces as he had, to resist Abner: Isboseth remaining in Gilead, and Dauid in Hebron. The armies encountered each other neere Gibeon, where it seemeth, that Abner made the offer to trie the quarrell by the hands of a few; like to that Combat betweene the Lacedaemonians, and the Argives, remembered by Herodotus, 300. being chosen of each Nation, of which number three persons were onely left vnslaine. The like triall by a farre lesse number was performed by the Horatii and Curiatii for the Romanes and Latines. The same challenge Goliath the Philistin made, whom Dauid slew: a custome very ancient. Edward the third offered the like triall in his own person to the French King; and Francis the French King to Charles the Emperour. There were twelue chosen of each part, in this warre of Dauid with the house of Saul, to wit, so many of Beniamin, and as many of Juda: whose force and valor was so equall, as there furnished not any one to challenge the victory. But the quarrell staide not heere: for the army of Juda prest Abner in grosse, and brake him. Three hundred and sixtie men of Abners companions were slaine, and but twenty of Juda: whereof Asabel the brother of Joab, was one: who when he would needes pursue Abner, and by Abners perswasions could not be moued to quit him, he was forced to turne vpon him, wounded him to death, with the stroke of his spear. For though Asabel were an excellent footman, and as it is written in the Text, as light as a wilde Roe, and as Iosephus reporteth, contended not onely with men, but with horses; and hoped to haue gotten great fame, if he could haue mastered Abner (who, as Asabel perswaded himselfe, had by being ouerthrowne and flying away lost his courage) yet here it fell out true, That the race is not to the swift.

That this ciuill warre lasted two yeeres, we finde it written in the second of Samuel, the second Chapter; though in the beginning of the third it is againe made probable, that this contention dured longer; and therefore the matter resteth still in dispute, and some of the Rabbines conceiue that Isboseth had then reigned two yeeres, when this was written, the warre as yet continuing a longer time. For Abner held for the partie of Isboseth after this, and till such time as there grew ialousie betweene him and Isboseth for Sauls concubine: neither did the death of Isboseth instantly follow; but how long after the murther of Abner it happened, the same doth not certainly appeare.

§. III.

Of the death of Abner slaine by Joab, and of Isboseth by Rechab and Baanah.

After, reconciled to Dauid, was anon by Joab murdered; for Joab could not endure a companion in Dauids fauour, and in the commandment of his forces, by which he was growne so powerfull, as Dauid forbore to call him to account; for thus much he confesseth of himselfe: I am this day weake, and these men of the house of Zeruiah be too hard for me. In this sort Dauid complained after Abners death; and to make it cleare that he hated this fact of Joab, he followed him with this publike imprecation; Let the blond fall on the head of Joab, and on all his fathers house: and let them be subject to ulcers, to the leprosie, to lameness, to the sword, and to pouertie, &c. For could anything haue withstood the ordinance of God, this murther committed by Joab might greatly haue indangered Dauids estate, Abner being the mouth and trust of all the rest of the Tribes, not yet reconciled. This mischance therefore Dauid openly bewailed, so that all Israel perceiued him to be innocent of that fact. The place which Abner held, being General of the men of warre, was of such importance, that the Kings themselves were faine to giue them great respect, as hath beene already shewed more at large. This office Joab held in the armie of Juda, and thought himselfe worthy to hold the place entire, if once his Lord might obtaine the whole Kingdome. For he was neere to Dauid in kinred, and had beene partaker of all his aduersitie; wherefore he did not thinke it meete, that an old enemy should in reward of new benefits, be made his partner. Indeede he was by nature so ialous of his dignitie and place, that he afterward slew Amasa his owne kinsman and the Kings, vpon the same quarrell, taking it in high disdain to see him ioyned with himselfe as captain of the hoste of Juda; much lesse could hee brooke a superiour, and such a one as had slaine his brother, and beene beaten himselfe in battell. But howsoeuer Joab did hate or despise Abner, Dauid esteemed highly of him as of a Prince, and a great man in Israel, excusing the oversight by which he might seeme to haue perished, by affirming that he died not like a foole, nor a man vanquished, But as a man full of wit, nor want of valour and vertue in him whom a stronger hand destroyed vnawares, or whom subtiltie in free trust bringeth to confusion. For all vnder the Sunne are subject to worldly miseries and misaduentures. Howsoeuer Isboseth meant to haue dealt with Abner, yet when he heard of his death, he despaired greatly of his estate, and with him all Israel were posselt with great feare: inasmuch as two of Isboseths owne Captaines, Rechab and Baanah, murdered Isboseth, and presenting his head to Dauid, receiued the same reward that the Amalekite lately did, for pretending to haue slaine Saul. Isboseth being dead, all the Elders of Israel repaired to Dauid at Hebron, where he was the third and last time annointed by generall consent.

§. IIII.

Of the flourishing time of Dauids Kingdome, the taking of Ierusalem, with two overthrowes giuen to the Philistines, and the conduction of the Arke to the Citie of Dauid.

When Dauid was now established in the Kingdome, his first enterprise was vpon the Iebusites, who in derision of his force, and confident in the strength of the place (as is thought) manned their wals with the blinde and lame of their Citie, which Dauid soone after entred: all their other forces notwithstanding. For hauing mastered the fort of Zion (which was afterward the Citie of Dauid) he became Lord of Ierusalem, without any great danger, expelling thence the Iebusites, who had held it from the foundation, to the times of Moses and Iosua, and after them almost 400. yeeres. There are who expound this place otherwise: Except thou take away the blinde and the lame, thou shalt not come in hither. For some thinke that it was meant by the idols of the Iebusites: others, that it had reference to the Covenant made long before with Isaac, and Iacob: the one blinde by nature and age, the other made lame by wrestling with the Angell, and that therefore till those (that is, till that Covenant) be broken, Dauid ought not to molest them. But for my selfe I take it with Iosephus; that they armed their wals with certaine impotent people at first, in scorn of Dauids attempt. For they that had held their Citie about 400. yeeres against all the children of Israel, Iosua, the Judges, and Saul, did not doubt but to defend it also against Dauid.

When he had now posselt himselfe of the very heart and Center of the Kingdome, and receiued congratulatory Embassadors and presents from Hiram King of Tyre: he entertained diuers other concubines and married more wiues, by whom he had ten sons in Ierusalem; and by his former wiues he had sixe in Hebron where he reigned 7. yeeres.

The Philistines hearing that Dauid was now annointed King, as wel of Juda as of Israel, they thought to try him in the beginning, before he was fully warme in his seat. And being encountered by Dauid at two severall times in the Valley of Rephaim, or of the Giantes, they were at both times ouerthrowne. After which he called the place Baalperazim.

Then Dauid assembled 30000. choice Israelites to conduct the Arke of God from the house house of Abinadab in Gibea, to the Citie of David, which businesse was interrupted by the death of Pazab the sonne of Abinadab, whom the Lord slew for presuming to touch the Arke, though it were with intent to stay it from taking harme, when it was shaken. But after three yeeres it was with great solemnity brought into the Citie with sacrifices, musike, dances, and all signes of ioyfulness, in which David himselfe gladly bare a part. Hereupon Michol derided him for dancing before the Arke, and afterward told him in scorne, That he was uncovered as a foole in the eyes of the maidens his seruants; namely that he forgot his regall dignity both in apparell and behaviour; and mixed himselfe among the base multitude, dancing as fooles doe in the ways and streetes: not that she disliked David's behaviour (as I take it) though she made it the colour of her derision, but rather the abundant griefe, which this spectacle stirred vp, beholding the glory of her husband to whom she was deliuered lastly by force, and remembering the miserable end of her father and brethren, out of whose ruines she conceived that the sonne of Ishai had built this his greatnesse: together with the many new wiues and concubines imbraced since his possession of Ierusalem, made her breake out in those despitefull teares, for which he remained barren to her death.

2 Chron. 29. 3.

This done, David consulted with the Prophet Nathan for the building of the Temple or house of God: but was forbidden it, because he was a man of warre, and had shed blood. So greatly doth the Lord and King of all detest homicide; hauing threatened, not in vaine, that he would require the blood of man, at the hand of man and beast. The wars which David had made were iust, and the blood therein shed was of the enemies of God, and his Church: yet for this cause it was not permitted that his hands should lay the foundation of that holy Temple. Hereby it appears how greatly those Princes deceiue themselves, who thinke by bloodshed and terror of their warres, to make themselves in greatnesse like to the Almighty, which is a damnable pride; not caring to imitate his mercie and goodnesse, or seeke the blessednesse promised by our Saviour vnto the peacemakers.

Now although it was not pleasing to the Lord to accept a Temple of David's founding, yet was his religious intent so well accepted, that hereupon he receiued both a confirmation of the Kingdome to him and his heires, and that happie promise of the eternall lasting throne, that should be established in his seede.

§. V.

The overthrow of the Philistims and Moabites.

Some after this David ouerthrew the Philistims, which made them altogether powerlessse, and vnable to make any inuasion vpon Israel in haste. For it is written, Acceptis frenum Amgaris de manu Philisthaorum; which place our English Geneua conuerts in these words, And David tooke the bridle of bondage out of the hand of the Philistims. The Latine of Iunius giueth another and a better sense; for by that bridle of Amgar was meant the strong Citie of Gath, or Geth, and so the Geneua hath it in the marginall note. This Citie of Gath was the same which was afterward Dio-Casru, set on the frontier of Palesina at the entrance into Iudea and Ephraim. From thence they made their incursions, and therein to their reitrait in all their inuasions; which being taken by David and demolished, there was left no such frontier towne of equall strength to the Philistims on that part. The hill whereon Geth or Gath stood, the Hebrews call Amme, whereof and of the word Gar is made Amgar, of which Plinie in his first booke, and Chap. 13. This exposition is made plaine and confirmed in the first of Chro. the 18.

Plinie in 8. c. of the second of Gar.

There was no nation bordering the Iewes that so greatly afflicted them as the Philistims: did, who before the time of Saul, (to the end they might not sharpen any weapon against them) did not leaue one Smith in all their Cities and villages of that kinde, but inforst them to come downe into their territorie, for all iron worke whatsoever they needed; so as the Israelites till this time of David were seldome free from paying tribute to the Philistims.

After this he gaue them foure other overthrowes: but the war of the Moabites and Arabians came betwene. In the first of which he was indangered by Ishbi-benob, the head of whose speare weighed 300. sheekles of brasse, which make nine pound three quarters of our poizes: at which time Abisai succoured David and slew the Philistim, whereupon the the Counsellors and Captaines of David (lest the light of Israel might by his losse be quenched) vowed that he should not thenceforth hazard himselfe in any battaile. The second and third incounter and ouerthrow of the Philistims was at Gob a place neere Geth, and the last at Gath or Geth. And being now better assured of the Philistims by the taking of Geth, he inuaded Moab, from whom notwithstanding in his aduersitie he sought succour and left his parents with him in trust. But whether it were the same King or no it is not knowne.

The Rabbines saie that Moab slew those kinsfolkes of David, which liued vnder his protection in Saul's time; but questionlesse David well knew how that Nation had bin alwayes enemies to Israel, and tooke all the occasions to vex them that were offered. And he also remembered that in the 23. of Deut. God commanded Israel not to seeke the peace or prosperity of the Moabites, which David well obserued, for he destroyed two parts of the people, leauing a third to till the ground. This victory obtained, he led his army by the border of Ammon towards Syria Zobah, the region of Adadezer the sonne of Rehob King thereof. The place is set downe in the description of the holy Land: to which I referre the Reader.

§. VI.

The warre which David made vpon the Syrians.

It is written in the Text: David snote also Hadadezer, &c. as he went to recouer his border at the riuer Euphrates. Now whether the words (as he went to recouer his border) be referred to David or Hadadezer, it is not agreed vpon. Iunius thinke that the article (bee) hath relation to David, who finding Tohu oppressed by Hadadezer, ouerthrew the one, and succoured the other. But the ancient and most receiued opinion, that this recouery hath reference to the Syrian, is more probable. For if David had intended any such enterprize towards Euphrates, he was in farre better case to haue proceeded after his victory than before: seeing that (Adadezer being taken) he had now left no enemy on his backe, either to pursue him, to take victuals and supplies from him, or to stop the passages of the mountaines vpon him at his returne.

Againe, seeing David was either to passe through a part of Arabia the desert, or by the plaines of Palmyrena, his army consisting of footmen, for the most, if not all: He had now both horse and chariots good store to carry his prouisions through those vncultiuated places, by which he was to haue marched before he could haue reached Euphrates or any part thereof. But we finde that David returned to Ierusalem, after he had twice ouerthrowne the Syrian army, not bending his course towards the riuer Euphrates, but seeking to establish his purchases already made. Whereby it may appeare, that it was the Syrian, and not King David, that was going to enlarge his border, as afore is said.

The king of Syria Damascena, and of Damascus, whereof that region is so called, hearing that Adadezer was ouerthrowne by the Israelites, fearing his owne estate, and the losse of his owne country which adioyned to Syria Zoba of Hadadezer, sent for an army of Aramites or Syrians to his succour: but these, as it appeareth, came too late for Adadezer, and too soone for themselves: for there perished of those supplies 22000. This king of Damascus, Iosephus (out of Nicholaus an ancient Historian) calleth Adad, who was also of the same name and family as all those other Adads were: which now began to grow vp in greatnesse, and so continued for ten descents, till they were extinguished by the Affrians, as is shewed heretofore. David hauing now reduced Damascus vnder his obedience, left a garrison therein, as he did in Edom: hauing also sackt the adioyning cities of Betab and Berathi, belonging to Adadezer, of which Cities Ptolomie calleth Betab, Taubas, and Berathi he nameth Barathena. Tohu or Thoi whose country of Hamath ioyned to Adadezer (as in the description of the Holy Land the reader may perceiue) sent his sonne Ioram to congratulate this successe of David: partly because he had warre with Adadezer, and partly because he feared David now victorious. He also presented David with vessels of gold, silver, and brasse; all which together with the golden shields of the Aramites, and the

the best of all the spoiles of other Nations, David dedicated vnto God at his returne. Iunius translated the words (clypeos aureos) by umbones, as if all the parts of the targets were not of gold but the bosses only. The Septuagint call them bracelets: Aquila, golden chains. But because Roboam made shields of brasse in place of these of Adadazer, at such time as Shicab the Egyptian sackt the Temple of Hierusalem, it may be gathered thereby that those of Adadazer were golden shields.

<sup>2 Sam. 11.</sup> This done, David sent Embassadours to Hanum King of the Ammonites to congratulate his establishment in his fathers Kingdom: for David in the time of his affliction vnder Saul, had bene relieved by Nahab, the father of Hanum. But this Ammonite being ill aduised, and ouer-iculous of his estate, vsed Dauids messengers to so barbarously, and contemptuously (by curtailing their beardes, and their garments) as hee thereby drew a warre vpon himselfe, which neither his owne strength, nor all the aydes purchased could put off, or sustaine. For notwithstanding that hee had waged three and thirtie thousand Souldiers of the Amalekites, and their confederates; to wit, of the vassalles of Adadazer twentie thousand, and of Maachab and Israhel thirteene thousand (for which hee disbursed a thousand talents of filuer) yet all these great armies together with the strength of the Ammonites, were by Ioab and his brother Abishai easily broken and put to ruine: and that without any great losse or slaughter at that time. And it is writtē, that when the Arames fled, the Ammonites also reitreated into their Cities, the one holding themselves within the walles, the other in their desarts adioyning, till Ioab was returned to Hierusalem.

<sup>2 Sam. 10.</sup> Adadazer hearing that Ioab had dismissed his armie, assembled his forces againe, and sent all the companies that he could leuie out of Mesopotamia, who vnder the command of Shobach passed Euphrates, and incamped at Helam, on the South side thereof. David hearing of this new preparation, assembled all the ablest men of Israel, and marched towards the Syrian armie in Palmyrena, not yet entred into Arabia; to wit, at Helam, a place no lesse distant from Damascus, towards the North-east, than Hierusalem was towards the Southwest. Now David (speaking humanely) might with the more confidence goe on towards Euphrates (which was the farthest off journey that euer hee had) because hee was now Lord of Damascus, which lay in the midway. Hee also posselt himselfe of Thadmor or Palmyrena, which Salomon afterward strongly fortified, and this Citie was but one dayes journey from Helam, and the riuier Euphrates. So had heretofore reitreated, the one to Thadmor, and the next from thence to Damascus. In this encounter betweene David and the Syrians, they lost 40000. horsemen, and 700. chariots, together with Shobach Generall of their armie. The Chronicles call these 40000. Souldiers footmen, and so Iunius conuerts it, and so is it very probable. For the armie of Israel consisting of foote men, could hardly haue slaughtered 40000. horsemen, except they quitted their horse and fought on foote. So are the chariots taken in this battell, numbered at 7000. in the first of Chronicles the ninth; in which number, as I conceiue, all the Souldiers that serued in them with the conductors are included: so as there dyed of the Syrians in this warre against David, before hee forc't them to tribute, 100000. foote men, besides all their horsemen and waggoners, and besides all those that Ioab slew, when they fled at the first encounter together with the Ammonites before Rabbah. Notwithstanding all which, the Adads in following ages gathered strength againe, and assisted the Kings of Iuda often: but the Kings of Israel they impouerished euent to the last end of that State.

<sup>2 Sam. 17.</sup> David hauing now beaten the Arabians and Mesopotamians, from the partie and confederacie of Ammon: He sent out Ioab the Lieutenant of his armies to forrage and destroy their territorie, and to besiege Rabbah, afterward Philadelpia, which after a while the Israelites mastered and posselt. The Kings crowne which weighed a talent of gold, garnished with precious stones, David set on his owne head, and carried away with him the rest of the riches and spoile of the Citie. And though David stayed at Hierusalem, following the warre of Vriah his wife, till such time as the Citie was brought to extremitie, and ready to be entred: yet Ioab in honour of David forbore the last assault, and entrance thereof, till his masters arriual. To the people he vsed extreame rigour (if we may so call it being exercised against heathen Idolaters,) for some of them he tare with har-

rowes, some he sawed asunder, others he cast into burning kilns, in which he baked tile and bricke.

§. VII.

Of Dauids troubles in his reigne, and of his forces.

<sup>2 Sam. 11. 15.</sup> BUT victory begetteth security, and our present worldly felicity a forgetfulness of our former miseries, and many times of God himselfe the giuer of all goodnesse: so did these changes, in the fortune and state of this good King, change also the zealous care which formerly he had to please God in the precise obseruation of his Lawes and Commandements. For hauing now no dangerous apparant enemie (against whom he was wont to aske counsaile from the Lord) he began to be aduised by his owne humane affections and vaine desires. For hee was not onely satisfied to take Vriah wife from him, and to vse her by stealth: but he imbrodered his adultery with Vriahs slaughter, giuing order to his trustie seruant Ioab to march him in the front or point of those Israelites, which gaue an assault vpon the Suburbs of Rabbah, when there was not as yet any possibility of preuailling. And, that which could no lesse displease God than the rest, hee was content that many others of his best seruants and Souldiers should perish together with Vriah, hoping thereby to couer his particular ill intent against him. After which he began by degrees to fall from the highest of happinesse; and his dayes then to come were filled with ioyes and woes interchangeable, his trodden-downe sorrowes began againe to spring; and those perils which he had pulled vp by the rootes (as hee hoped) gaue him an after-haruest of many cares and discontentments. And if it had pleased God to take the witness of Dauids owne mouth against him, as David himselfe did against the Amalekite, which pretended to haue slaine Saul, he had then appeared as worthy of reprehension as the other was of the death he suffered. For when Nathan the Prophet propounded vnto him his owne error, in the person of another, to wit, of him that tooke the poore mans sheepe that had none else, the befeauer being Lord of many: Hee then vowed it to the liuing Lord, that such a one should die the death. And hereof, although it pleased God to pardon David, for his life, which remission the Prophet Nathan pronounced: yet he deliuered him Gods iustice together with his mercy in the tenour following; Now therefore the sword shall neuer depart from thy house, &c. Because thou hast taken his wife to be thy wife, and hast slaine Vriah with the sword of the children of Ammon. Soone after this David lost the childe of adultery which he begot on Bersheba. Secondly, his owne sonne Amnon being in loue with his halfe sister Tamar, by the aduise of his Cousin-german the sonne of Shimeah, Dauids brother, posselt her by force: which when he had performed, he thrust her from him in a carelesse and despiightfull manner. Two years after which foule and incestuous act, Abisalom caused him to be murdered; at the feast of his sheepe-shearing; not perchance in reuenge of Tamars rauishment alone: but hauing it in his heart to vsterpe the Kingdom; in which, because he could not in any sort be assured of Amnon, he thought his affaire greedily aduanced by his destruction. So the one brother hauing rauished his owne sister, and then despiied her, the other after a long dissembled malice, first made his owne brother drunken, and then slaughtered him; which done he fled away, and liued vnder the sauegard of Talmay King of Gassur, neere Damascus, who was his grandfather by the mother, but a heathen King. Thirdly, when Abisalom by the inuention of Joab (but chiefly because of the great affection of David towards his sonne) was brought againe: first to the Kings fauour, and then to his presence: Hee began instantly to practise against David, his father, seeking by the pretence of common iustice, and by lowly and familiar manner to all men, and by detracting from his fathers equitie, to win vnto himselfe a popular reputation. Here began the great affliction, threatened by the Lord as a punishment of Dauids sinne.

The company which Abisalom gathered at the first were but 200. men: which he carried with him from Hierusalem to Hebron, pretending, though impudently, the performance of Q q 2 of a vow to God. There when Achitophel repaired vnto him, and many troopes of people from all places, he proclaimed himselfe King, and was by the people (whose hearts God had turned from their lawfull Prince) accepted so readily, that Dauid doubting to be set vpon the suddaine, durst not trust himselfe in his owne Citie of Hierusalem, nor in any other walled towne for feare of surpris: but incamped in the fields and deserts with some 600. of his gards, and few else. The priests he left in Hierusalem with the Arke of God, from whom he desired to be aduertised of those things that chanced; to whom he directed Hushai his trustie friend, and seruant, praying him to make himselfe in all his outward actions and counsels of Abisalom's party and confederacy, thereby the better to discouer vnto him the purposes of Achitophel, a reuolting Counsaillor, whose practices he greatly doubted. And now when treason was in fashion, Ziba also sought to betray his master Mephiboseth the sonne of Jonathan: And Shimei of the house of Saul (the fire of whose hatred Dauid's prosperity had smothered, but his aduertyly lightened) holding himselfe vpon the aduantage of a mountaine side, cast stones at Dauid, and most despihtfully cursed him to his face: but Dauid attending no priuate reuenges, forbade Abisbai to pursue him for the present, yet left him among others in the rolle of his reuenge, to his sonne Salomon. Abisalom being now posselt of Hierusalem, was aduised by Achitophel to vse his fathers concubines in some such publique place, as all Israel might assure themselves, that he was irreconcilable to his father: whereof being perswaded, they would then resolutely adhere to Abisalom and his cause; without feare of being giuen vp vpon a reconciliation betweene them. This saluage and impious (though crafty counsaile) Achitophel indeede vrge for his owne respect, as feareng that this rebellion might take end to his destruction; who most of all other inflamed Abisalom against his father. And now was it fulfilled that Nathan had directly foretold Dauid: I will raise vp euill against thee out of thine owne house, and will take thy wives before thine eyes, and giue them vnto thy neighbour, and he shall be with thy wives in the sight of the Sunne: for thou diddest it secretly, but I will doe this thing before all Israel, and before the Sunne. He also gaue aduice to Abisalom, that himselfe with an armie of 12000. men might be employed at the instant for the surprizing of Dauid; which had willingly been embraced by Abisalom, had not Hushai Dauid's faithfull seruant giuen counter aduice, and swayed it: perswading Abisalom, that it was fitter and more safe for him with all the strength of Israel, to pursue his father, than by such a troope, which Dauid's valour and those of his attendants might either indanger or resist. This delay in Abisalom, and aduantage of time gained by Dauid, was indeede, after God; the losse of the one, and deliuey of the other. Whereupon Achitophel rightly feareng (by the occasion fore-shewed) the successe which followed, disposed of his owne estate, and then forooke both the party and the care of Abisalom, and of his owne life.

Dauid being aduertised of this enterprize against him, marched away all night, and past Jordan, possessing himselfe of Mahanaim in the tribe of Gad: the same wherein Abisalom himselfe in the warre against Dauid after Saul's death seated himselfe. To which place there repaired vnto him Shobi, the sonne of Nabash the Ammonite, whom Dauid loued, the same which Iosephus calleth Shiphar. And though it be greatly disputed, what this Shobi was, yet the most generall and probable opinion makes him a second brother to Hanun, whom Dauid for his fathers sake established in the Kingdome, after Hanuns ouerthrow. In thankfulness whereof he relieued Dauid in this his extremity. There came also to Dauid's assistance Machir of Lodabar, Guardian in former times to Mephiboseth, and among others Barzillai the Gileadite, who willingly fed Dauid and all his companie.

In the meantime both the King and Abisalom prepared to fight; Abisalom made Amasa Commander of the armie of Israel, the same place which Joab held with Dauid: an office next the King himselfe, like vnto that of the Maiors of the Palace auiently in France. Dauid, perswaded by his companie, stayed in Mahanaim, and disposed the forces he had to Joab, Abisbai, and Istai, giuing them charge in the hearing of all that issued out of the port of Mahanaim, that they should spare the life of Abisalom. But Joab, besides that he was very cruell by nature, remembered that Abisalom had lately disposed of his gouernment to Amasa, and therefore the victory being obtained, and newes brought him that Abisalom hung by the haire of his head on a tree, when he could not perswade the messenger to returne and kill him, he himselfe with his owne seruants dispatcht him.

It appeared also by the sequell that Joab affected Adonijah whom he afterward acknowledged, Dauid yet liuing; and feareng the disposition of Abisalom, he embraced the present aduantage offered.

Hereof, together with newes of the victorie, when knowledge was brought to Dauid, he mourned and sorrowed, not onely as a man that had lost a sonne, but as one that had outliued all his worldly ioyes, and seene euery delight of life interred. For he so hid himselfe from his people, as those which hoped for honour and reward after so great a victory, couered themselves also in the Citie, as if they had committed the greatest offences, and had rather deserved death than recompence. Whereupon Joab presenting himselfe before Dauid, perswaded him to dissemble his sorrow for the present; and to shew himselfe to the Armie. For first, he told him that he had discounteranced his faithfull seruants, who had that day preferred his life; inferring that nothing could be more dangerous to a King, than not onely not to acknowledge so great a loue and constancie in his people, who being but few in number, did yet resolutely expose themselves to great perils for his sake: but on the contrary, grieue and lament at their good successe. For, no doubt, they might all haue bought their peace of Abisalom at an easie rate. Secondly, he vrge that it was generally beleueed, that he loued his enemies and hated his friends, and that he witnessed by this his mourning, that he had not any respect of his Princes, and others his faithfull seruants, but would more haue ioyed if they had all perished, and Abisalom liued, than in the victory by their faithfulness and approved valour gotten.

Lastly, he vsed this preualent argument, that if the King came not out and shewed himselfe publickly to his men of warre, that they would all that very night abandon him, and returne: concluding with this fearefull threatening: And that will be worse vnto thee, than all the euill that fell on thee from thy youth hitherto. By these ouer-bold and arrogant speeches (though perchance vttered with a good intent) Joab raised Dauid from his bed of sorrow, and brought him to the gates of the Citie among the people, whom he assured of his loue and affection, especially Amasa, who commanded the Armie of Abisalom, to whom he promised the office of Lieutenantship; the same which Abisalom had giuen him, and which Joab now enioyed. For Dauid doubted, that if Amasa were not satisfied, he might draw from him a great part of the strength of Israel, now vnder his commandement.

This done, the King marched towards Jordan homeward, where in his passage he pardoned Shimei, who had lately reuiled him to his face; but this remission was but exterrall; as appeared afterward. He also accepted of Mephiboseth's his excuse, whom Ziba had formerly falsely accused and betrayed. He also intreated Barzillai the Gileadite, his late liberall Oast, to follow him to Ierusalem, that he might reward his seruice done him; who excusing himselfe by his age, appointed his sonne Chimham to attend the King.

At Gilgal on this side Jordan, all the Tribes assembled, and after some contention which of them ought to haue most interest in Dauid, the Armie brake, and Dauid returned to Ierusalem. But Sheba the sonne of Bichri, a Beniamite, of the faction of the house of Saul, finding some discontent among the Israelites, withdrew them from Dauid, as from a stranger in whom they had no interest, and it seemeth that many of the people of the out Tribes, and in effect of all but Juda, bare still a good affection to the issues of their first King. Dauid employed his reconciled Captaine Amasa, to giue him contentment, and to witness his trust, as also because he conceiued that Amasa had interest in those reuolts of Israel more than Joab had. He reueiued commandement from Dauid to assemble the Armie within three dayes, which he foreslowed: but being onward on his way, Abisbai, Joab's brother, was sent after him, with Dauid's guard and best Souldiers, whom also Joab accompanied: and ouertaking Amasa neere Gibeon, pretending to embrace him, gaue him a wound, whereof he fell dead, being no lesse zealous of Amasa than he was of Abner, whom he murdered in the same manner, and out of the same impatient ambition. This done, he pursued Sheba, and finding him inclosed in Abel, assaulted the Citie with that furie, that the Citizens by the persuasions of a wife woman there inhabiting, cut off Sheba's his head, and flung it to Joab over the wals: which done, he retrained his Armie to Ierusalem, and commanded, as before, all the hoste of Israel.

The next act of Dauids, was the deliuerie of Sauls sons or kinsmen to the Gibeonites, whom those Citizens hung vp in reuenge of their fathers cruelty. Dauid had knowledge from the Oracle of God, that a famine which had continued on the land three yeeres, came by reason of Saul and his house, to wit, for the slaughter of the Gibeonites: and therefore he willingly yeelded to giue them this satisfaction, both because he had warrant from God himselfe, as also if we may iudge humanely, to rid himselfe of Sauls line, by whom he and his might, as well in the present as in the future, be greatly molested and indangered; onely he spared Mephibosheth the sonne of Jonathan, both for the loue he bare to his father, as for his oath and vow to God.

Now where it is written in the Text; The King tooke the two sonnes of Rispah, whom he bare vnto Saul, and the five sonnes of Michol the daughter of Saul, whom she bare to Adriel, and deliuered them to the Gibeonites:

Iunius calls this Michol the sister of her that was Dauids wife, she whom Saul married to Phaltiel; but Michol here named had Adriel to her husband: the same which is named Merab in the first of Samuel the eighteenth, who was first promised to Dauid, when he slew Goliath in the valley of Raphaim: and because it is written that Michol loved Dauid, which perchance Merab did not, whether Dauid had any humane respect in the deliuerie of her children, it is onely knowne to God.

Now whereas the Geneua nameth Michol for Merab the wife of Adriel: the better translation were out of the Hebrew word here vsed, hauing an eclipsis or defect; and signifieth, as I am informed, one of the same kindred, as in the 19. verse of the same 21. Chapter it is said of Goliath whose speare was weightie as a weauers beame, when as by the same Eclipsis it must be vnderstood by the brother of Goliath: Goliath himselfe being formerly slaine.

As by the death of Sauls children God secured the house of Dauid, leauing no head vnto rebellion; so did he strengthen both the King and Nation against forreine enemies, by the valour of many braue Commanders, the like of whom, for number and quality, that people of Israel is not knowne to haue had at any time before or after. Thine Capitaines of thousands there were, all men of marke, and great reputation in warre. Ouer these were fixe Coronels, whose valour was so extraordinary, that it might be well held as miraculous. These Coronels had some difference of place and honour, which seemeth to haue beene giuen vpon meere consideration of their vertue. For Abishai the brother of Joab, who in the warre against the Ammonites and Aramites was Lieutenant, and commanded halfe the army, could not attaine to the honour of the first rank, but was faine to rest contented with being principall of the three Coronels of the second order, notwithstanding his neerenesse of blood vnto the King, the flourishing estate of his owne house, and his well approued seruices. All these Coronels and Capitaines, with the Companies belonging to them, may seeme to haue beene such as were continually retained, or at the least kept in readinesse for any occasion, considering that the numbers which were mustered and drawne out, if neede required, into the field, very farre exceeded thirty thousand, yea, or thirty times as many. They were most of them such as had followed the King in Sauls time, and beene hardened with his aduersities. Others there were very many, and principall men in their severall Tribes, that repaired vnto him after the death of Saul; but these Capitaines and Coronels, (who with Joab, that was Generall of all the Kings forces, make vp the number of 37.) were the especiall men of warre, and reckoned as Dauids Worthies. The long reigne of Dauid, as it is knowne to haue consumed many of these excellent men of warre, so may it probably be guessed to haue wasted the most of those whose deaths we find nowhere mentioned. For the sonnes of Zerua, who had beene too hard for Dauid, were worne away, and onely Joab left in the beginning of Salomon, who wanted his brother Abishai to stand by his side in his last extremities.

By the actions forepassed in the time of Dauid, it is gathered that he had reigned now 33. yeeres, or thereabout; when the posterity of Saul was rooted out, so that he enioyed about seauen yeeres of entire quiet and security, wherein it pleased God to remove all impediments that might haue troubled the succession of Salomon in his Fathers throne. In this time also Dauid hauing established all things in Juda and Israel, and the borders thereof, he againe displeased God by numbring the people, as in ostentation of his power: in which he employed Joab, with other Capitaines of his armie, who after nine moneths and twentie dayes trauell, returned with the account and register of all the people, able and fit to beare Armes, and they amounted to the number of thirteene hundred thousand, besides Leui and Bensamin, whereof in Juda and the Cities thereof five hundred thousand, and in Israel eight hundred thousand.

For this, when by the Prophet God he was offered from God the choice of three punishments, whereof he might submit himselfe to which he pleased; to wit, seauen yeeres famine; three moneths warre, wherein hee should be vnprosperous in all attempts; and be chased by his enemies; or a generall pestilence to last three dayes: Dauid made choice to bow himselfe vnder the hand of God onely, and left himselfe subiect to that cruell disease, which hath no compassion or respect of persons, of which there perished 70. thousand. And heereby hee hath taught all that liue, that it is better to fall into the hands of God than of men; whereof he giueth vs this diuine reason; For his mercies are great.

§. VIII.

Of the last acts of Dauid; Adonijahs faction; the reuenge vpon Joab and Shimei.

Asly, when he grew weake and feeble, and past the acts and knowledge of women, hee was yet aduised to lie in the armes of a young and well complexioned maiden, to keepe him warme. In this his weake estate of bodie, when hee was in a manner bed-ridden, Adonijah his eldest sonne (Amnon and Abshalom being now dead) hauing drawne vnto his partie that inuincible, renowned and feared Joab, with Abiathar the Priest, began manifestly to prepare for his establishment in the Kingdome after his father. For being the eldest now liuing of Dauids sonnes, and a man of goodly personage, Salomon yet young; and borne of a mother formerly attainted with adultery, for which her name was omitted by S. Matthew (as Beda, Hugo, Thomas and others suppose) he presumed to carry the matter without resistance. Hereof when Dauid had knowledge by Bathsabe the mother of Salomon, who did put him in minde of his faithfull promise, that Salomon her sonne should reigne after him; (Nathan the Prophet affirming the same thing vnto the King, and seconding her report of Adonijahs his presumption) the King calling vnto him Zadoc the Priest, Nathan the Prophet, and Benaiah the Capitaine of his guard, gaue charge and commission to annoint Salomon, and to set him on the Mule wherupon himselfe vsed to ride in his greatest state; which done, Salomon attended, and strongly guarded by the ordinarie and choyce men of warre, the Cherethites and Pelethites, shewed himselfe to the people. Those tidings being reported to Adonijah, hee presently abandoned his assistants, and for the safety of his life he held by the hornes of the Altar, whom for the present Salomon pardoned. After this, Dauid had remaining two especiall cares, whereof he was desirous to discharge his thoughts; the one concerning the peace of the land, which might be disturbed by some rebellion against Salomon, the other concerning the building of the Temple, which he sought by all meanes to aduance, and make the businesse publique. To bring these intentions to good effect, hee summoned a Parliament, consisting of all the Princes of Israel, the Princes of the seuerall Tribes, all the Capitaines and Officers, with all the mighty; and men of power; who did repair vnto Ierusalem.

In this assembly the King stood vp, and signified his purpose of building the Temple, shewing how the Lord had approued the motion. Heerein he tooke occasion to lay open his owne title to the Crowne, shewing that the Kingdome was by Gods ordinance due to the Tribe of Juda (as Iacob in his blessing prophetically bequeathed it) and that God himselfe was pleased to make choyce of him among all his Fathers sonnes. In like manner hee said that God himselfe had appointed Salomon by name to be his successor: whereupon he earnestly charged both the people and his sonne, to conformance themselves vnto all that God had commanded, and particularly to goe forward in this worke of the Lords house, which Salomon was chosen to build. Then produced he the pattern of the worke according to the forme which God himselfe had appointed; and so laying open his owne preparations, hee exhorted all others to a voluntary contribution.

The Kings proposition was so well approued by the Princes and people, that where as hee himselfe had giuen three thousand talents of gold, and seuen thousand of silver, they added vnto it seuen thousand of gold, and ten thousand of silver, besides brasse, iron, and and jewels, heartily reioicing in the aduancement of so religious a worke. This businesse being so well dispatched, a solemne feast with great sacrifice was made, at which time Salomon was againe appointed King, and receiued fealtie of all the Princes and people of the Land, and of all the Princes his brethren, the sonnes of King Dauid. Salomon being thus established King, his Father Dauid finding himselfe euē in the hands of death, first exhorted his sonne to exercise the same courage and strength of minde, which himselfe had done in all his attempts: and to the end that a happy end might follow the beginning of all his enterprizes, he vttered these mighty words; Take heede to the charge of the Lord thy God, to walke in his wayes, and keepe his statutes and his commandements, and his indgements, and his testimonies, as it is written in the Law of Moyses, &c. to the performance of 10 which, GOD fastened the succession, and prosperitie of his issues. For this done (saith GOD himselfe) Thou shalt not want one of thy posteritie to sit vpon the Throne of Israel.

Secondly, he aduised him concerning Iob, who out of doubt had serued Dauid from the first assault of Ierusalem to the last of his warres, with incomparable valour and fidelitie, sauing that he fastened himselfe to Adonijah (his master yet liuing) and thereby vexed him in his feeble age. But as God hath neuer left cruelty vnreueged, so was it his will that Iob should drinke of the same cup, whereof he had enforced other men to taste and suffer the same violence which himselfe had vnjustly strooken others withall. Qui gladio percussit, gladio peribit: for he had bereaued Abner and Amasa of their liues, hauing against 20 the one the pretence onely of his brothers slaughter, whom Abner had slaine in the time of warre, and could not auoyd him: against the other but a meere calouise of his growing great in the fauour of Dauid. And though Iob assured himselfe that Abner & Amasa being dead, there was none left eyther to equall him or supplant him, yet God (deriding the policies of wicked men) raised vp Benhaiab the sonne of Iehoiadab, to pull him from the Sanctuary, and to cut him in peeces. For Dauid giueth this cause to Salomon against Iob, that he slue the Captaine of the hoste of Israel, and shed blood of battell in peace; and to this apparant and iust cause, it is not improbable but that Dauid remembered the ill affection of Iob towards Salomon, which Iob made manifest by the vntimely setting vp of Adonijah, Dauid yet liuing. Some other offence Iob had committed against Dauid, of 30 which in these words he put his sonne Salomon in minde; Thou knowest also what Iob the sonne of Seruiab did to me, &c. Now whether this were meant by the killing of Abalom, contrary to the Kings desire, or by the proud words vsed to him when hee mourned in Muhannim for Abalom; or whether it were the publishing of Dauids letter vnto him for the killing of Uriah, thereby to disgrace Salomon as descended of such a mother, the Scriptures are silent. True it is, that these great men of warre doe oftentimes behaue themselves exceeding insolently towards their Princes, both in respect of their seruice done, as also because they flatter themselves with an opinion, that eyther their masters cannot misse them, or that they dare not offend them. But this kinde of pride hath ouerthrowne many worthy men otherwise deserving great honour and respect.

He also gaue order to Salomon, to ridde himselfe of Shimei, who not long before had cast stones at Dauid, and cursed him to his face. And albeit by reason of his oath and promise Dauid spared Shimei all the time himselfe liued, yet being dust and in the graue, hee slue him by the hand of Salomon his Sonne. Hence it seemeth that King Henry the seventh of England had his patterne, when hee gaue order to Henrie the eight to execute Pool as soone as himselfe was buried, hauing made promise to the King of Spaine when he deliuered Pool vnto him, that while he liued he would neuer put him to death, nor suffer violent hands to be laid vpon him.

And yet did not the execution of Iob yeeld vnto Salomon any such great profit or assurance as he hoped for. For he found a yong Adad of Idumea, and Resin of Damascus to 50 vex him: who, as the Scriptures witnesse, were emboldened to enterprize vpon Salomon, hearing that Dauid slept with his fathers, and that Iob the Captaine of the host was dead. Now when Dauid had reigned in all forrie yceres, to wit, in Hebron 7. yceres, and in Ierusalem three and thirtie, he died.

For his person, he was of small stature, but exceeding strong. For his internall gifts and graces hee so farre exceeded all other men, as putting his humane frailtie apart, he was said by God himselfe to be a man according to his owne heart. The Psalms which hee wrote witnesse his pietie, and his excellent learning: of whom Psalms:

Psalms: Dauid Simonides noſter, Pindarus. & Alcaeus, Flaccus, quoque Carullus, & Serenus, Christum lyra personat, & in decachordo Pſalterio ab inferis ſuſcitauit reſurgentem; Dauid (saith he) our Simonides, Pindarus, Alcaeus, Horace, Catullus and Serenus, hee playeth Christ on his harpe, and on a ten stringed Pſalter he raiſeth him up riſing from the dead. And being both a King and a Prophet, he foretelleth Christ more lightſomely and liuely than all the reſt.

The booke of the Pſalmes, saith Glycas, was diuided, ordered and distinguished by Ezekias: but whether all the Pſalmes were written by Dauid, it is diuerſly diſputed. For Achanasius, Cyprian, Lyranus, and others conceiue diuers Authors answering the titles 10 of the ſeueral Pſalmes, as Moſes, Salomon, and the reſt hereafter named, and that onely 73. Pſalmes were compoſed by Dauid himſelfe, namely, thoſe which are intituled ipſius Dauid. For the 50. and the 72. with the ten that follow, are beſtowed on Aſaph the ſon of Barachia, eleuen other on the ſonnes of Korath; and eleuen are aſcribed to Moſes, to wit, the 89. and the ten following, and ſo they are intituled in the olde Hebrew Copies, though the vulgar and Septuagint (three excepted) ſtile them otherwiſe. The ſuppoſed nine Authors of theſe Pſalmes which Dauid wrote not, Sixt: Senenſis nameth as followeth, Salomon, Moſes, (whom Aben Ezra, contrarieto Hierome, maketh one of Dauid ſingers) Aſaph, Ethan-Eziachi, Eman-Eziakra, Idithum, and the three ſonnes of Chore. But S. Chryſoſtome makes Dauid the ſole Author of all the Pſalmes, and ſo doth S. Auguſtine, 20 reaſoning in this manner: Although (saith he) ſomewhere are that aſcribe thoſe Pſalmes onely to Dauid, which are ouer-written ipſius Dauid, and the reſt intituled ipſi Dauid, to others, this opinion (ſaith he) Voce Euangelica Saluatoris ipſius reſutatur, vbi ait quod ipſe Dauid in ſpiritu Chriſtum dixerit eſſe ſuum Dominum, quoniam Pſalmus 109. ſic incipit, Dicit Dominus Dominio meo, Sede à dextris meis, &c. The voyce of the Goſpell refuſes this opinion, where it ſaith, that Dauid himſelfe in the ſpirit called Chriſt his Lord, becauſe the 109. Pſalme begins thus: The Lord ſaid vnto my Lord, Sit thou at my right hand, &c. Laſtly, his teſtimonies are vſed both by Chriſt and the Apoſtles, and hee was as a patterne to all the Kings and Princes that ſucceeded him.

His Storye and all his particular actions, were written by the Prophets, Samuel, Nathan and Gad, as it is in the firſt of Chron. 29. verſ. 19. For the ſeueral parts of the books of Samuel which intreate chiefly of Dauid, were as it ſeemes written by theſe three holy men.

Conſtantine Manaſſes hath an opinion; that the Troians during the time of the ſiege, 30 fought for ſuccour from Dauid, and that hee ſtayed neuer in that warre. But it ſeemeth that Manaſſes did miſcaſt the time twixt Dauid and the Troian warre. For it is generally receiued that Troy fell betwene the times of Abdon and Samſon Iudges of Israel, about the worlds yeere 2848. and Dauid died in the yeere 2991.

Of the treaſures of Dauid and Salomon.

Is treaſures were exceeding great. For it is written in the 22. of the firſt of Chro. 22. 14. Dauid left Salomon for the building of the Temple a hundred thouſand talents of Gold, and a thouſand thouſand talents of ſiluer, and of braſſe and yron paſſing all weight, which is more than any King of the world poſſeſt beſides himſelfe, and his ſonne to whom he left it. For it amounteth to three thouſand three hundred thirty & three cartload, and a third of a cartload of ſiluer, allowing two thouſand weight of ſiluer or ſix thouſand pound ſterling to every cartload, beſides threeſcore and ſeuenteene millions of French Crownes, or of our money twenty three millions and a thouſand pound: a matter, but for the teſtimony of the Scriptures, exceeding all beleeſe. For that any riches were left him it doth not appeare, ſeeing that the Iudges had not any treaſure, nor any ſoueraigne power to make leuies: but when they went to the warres, they were followed by ſuch voluntaries as the ſeueral tribes by turnes gaue them: ſeeing alſo that Saul who was of a meane Parentage, and perpetually vexed and inuaded by the Philiftines, could not in all likelihood gather great riches (if any at all) his Territories being exceeding narrow, and thereof the better part poſſeſt by his enemies.

Therefore it were not amiſſe to conſider how Dauid within the ſpace of not very many yeeres, might amaffe vp ſuch mighty treaſures. For though pariſimonie be it ſelfe a great great reuenue, yet needs there must haue been some other great meanes. It seemes that he made the vermost profit of all that he had, that was profitable. Eusebius in his ninth booke and last Chapter de preparatione Euangelica, citeth the words of Eupolemus, who reporteth that Dauid, among other preparations for the Temple, built a nauie in Melanis (or as Vallapandus corrects it, Achanis) a Citie of Arabia, and from thence sent men to digge for gold in the Iland Yrphe, which Ortelius thinke, was Ophir, though Eupolemus in this place of Eusebius (erring perhaps in this circumstance) saith that this Iland is in the red Sea; from whence, saith this Eupolemus, they brought gold into Tury. Pineda, lib. 4. de rebus Salamonicis, c. 1. thinke that Dauid did this way also enrich himselfe, and citeth this testimony of Eupolemus: and yet certainly Dauid had many other waies to gather riches. Much land doubtlesse he gained by conquest, from the Canaanites and Philistines, besides those fruitfull valleys neere Jordan in Trachonitis and Basan, and the best of Syria, and other Countreies bordering the Israelites. These demaines belike he kept in his owne hands, and with his infinite number of captiues, which hee tooke in his warres, which were not able to redeeme themselves, husbanded those grounds for his greatest advantage. For it is written, 1. Chron. 17. that Iehonathan was ouer his treasures in the field, in the villages, in the Cities, in the townes; that Ezer was ouer the labourers that tilled his ground, Simei ouer the vineyards; and Sabbi ouer the store of the wine; Baal Hanan ouer the Oliue trees, and Iosb ouer the store of the oyle: also that hee had herd-men that had charge ouer his cattell, both in the high Lands, and in the plaines, ouer his 20 Sheepe, Camels, and Asses. And this custome of enriching themselves by husbandrie and Cattell, the ancient Kings euery where held, both before and after Dauid's time. For wee reade of Pharao, that he spake to Ioseph to appoint some of his brethren or of their seruants, to bee Rulers ouer his cattell. Wee reade of Vezia, that hee loued 2 Chron. 26. husbandrie, had much cattell, and plough-men, and dressers of Vines: likewise we reade it in all Greeke Poets, that the wealth of the ancient Kings did specially consist in their Herds and flocks, whereof it were needlesse to cite Augeas and Admetus or any other for examples, the rule holding true in all. Now concerning Dauid it is not vnlikely, but that those captiues which were not employed in husbandrie, were many of them vsed by him in all sorts of gainfull professions, as the ancient Romans in like manner vsed their slaues.

To these profits (besides the tributes and impositions which doubtlesse were great, and besides the innumerable presents which yeerely were brought him, or extraordinarylie sent him, by Tobu and others) wee may adde the great spoyle which hee found in the Cities and Countreies which hee conquered: also the head money which was gathered per legem capitacionis; by the law of capitation or head money; euery man rich or poore paying halfe a sickle of the Sanctuary, which is about as much as foureteen pence, and so in all it amounted to a wondrous summe in that Kingdome: wherein one thousand thousand five hundred and seuentie thousand fighting men were numbred by Iosb. Now although this Law of capitation bee thought by some very learned not to haue bene perpetuall (which opinion of theirs neuertheless they confesse is against the Hebrew expositions) yet Dauid vpon this occasion is not vnlikely to haue put it in practice. And by these meanes might he be able to leaue those huge treasures to Salomon. Yet it may seeme that this great masse of gold and siluer left by Dauid, the least part was his owne in priuate, and so will it appeare the lesse wonderfull that hee left so much. Of his owne liberalitie we finde, that hee gaue to the building of the Temple three thousand talents of gold, and seuen thousand talents of siluer, a great summe: but holding a very small proportion to the other. Wherefore wee are to consider, that the treasures of the sanctuary it selfe were exceeding great, as needs they must haue bene hauing receiued continuall encrease, without any losse or diminution ever since the time of Moses and Iosuah. The reuenues of the Sanctuary (besides all manner of tithes and oblations, which defraied the daily expences, and maintained the Priests and Leuites) were partly raised out of the head money before mentioned; partly out of the spoyle gotten in warre. For all the bootie was diuided into two parts; whereof the Souldiers had one, and the people which remained at home, had the other halfe; whereby all the Countreie receiued benefit of the victorie, yet so, that the Souldiers had a farre greater proportion than the rest, as being fewer, and therefore receiuing more for euerie single share.

Out

Out of this purchase was deducted the Lords tribute, which was one in fiftie, of that which the people receiued, and one in fife hundred, of that which was giuen to the Souldiers; namely one hundred and one thousand part of the whole bootie. So in the spoyle of Midian, thirty two thousand women being taken, the armie had sixtene thousand of them for slaues, and the Congregation had other sixtene thousand; but out of the sixtene thousand giuen to the Armie, were exempted two & thirtie for the Lords tribute. Out of the peoples number were taken three hundred and twenty. By this meanes, the lesse that the Armie was which had exposed it selfe to danger, the greater profit had euery Souldier, but when it consisted of many hands, they who remaining at home were 10 faine to vndergoe more than ordinarie trauaile in domestick affaires, did receiue by so much the greater portion. But the Lords tribute was alwaies certaine, yea many times it was increased, either by some especiall commandement, as when all the gold, and siluer, and other mettalls found in Iericho, were consecrated vnto God; or by thankfulnessse of 10f. 6. 12. the Rulers and People, as when after the victorie obtained against the Midianites without the losse of one man, all Iewells, Bracelets, Eare-rings, and the like, were offered vp, Num. 31. 50. as voluntarie presents.

Now howsoeuer the Israelites were many times oppressed, and troden down by other Nations, yet were not these treasures robbed or spoyle; for the enemies neuer gat possession of the Tabernacle that was in Shilo. Wherefore it cannot otherwise be, than that 20 the wealth of the Sanctuary must haue bene exceeding great; as containing aboue one hundred part of all the money and other goods found by the Israelites in the whole Land of Canaan; and of all that was purchased by so many victories, as they obtained against the bordering Nations. For that this treasure was not defrauded of the due portion, it is euident; seeing that before the time of Dauid and his Lieutenant Iosb, it is recorded that Saul and Abner, and before them Samuel, had vsed to dedicate of the spoyle obtained in warre, to maintaine the house of the Lord: the like whereof may be well presumed of the former Iudges and Captaines of other Ages. Certaine it is, that the Conquest of Dauid brought into the Land farre greater abundance of riches, than any former victories had purchased, those of Iosua perhaps excepted: but these vast summes of 30 hundred thousand Talents of siluer, may seeme rather to haue bene made vp, by the addition of his winnings and liberalitie, to the treasures laid vp in many former Ages, than to haue bene the mere fruits of his owne industrie.

Now concerning the riches of Salomon, it is more manifest how he gathered them; for he receiued of yeerely reuenues with his tributes 666. Talents of gold, besides the Cu- A Talent of stons of Spices. He had also fixe rich Returnes from the East India, which greatly in- gold is 770. creased his store. For his ships performed that voyage euery three yeeres, and he began french crowns that trade in the two and twentieth yeere of his reigne, and ruled fortie yeeres. Besides 1. King. 10. 14. this, all Iudea and Israel were now mastered to his hands; all the Arabians his borders, the Syrians of Zobah, of Damascena, of Palmyrena, of Ituraa; all of Idumea, Mo- 1. King c. 9. 26. ab, and Ammon, paid him tribute; as likewise did the Hittites, who with the Periz- 20. 15. 16. 17. ites, Heuites, Iebusites, and other races of the Canaanites, were not as yet dextinguished, though subjected.

Into this flourishing estate was the Kingdom of Israel reduced by Dauid, who after 40 yeeres raigne, and 70. yeeres of life, dyed in a good age, full of dayes, riches, and honour, and was buried in the Citie of Dauid. It is written by Iosephus that there was hid in Dauid's Tombe a marauilous quantitie of treasures, in so much as Hyrcaanus (who first of the Chusmanai, or race of Maccabees, called himselfe King) one thousand and three hundred yeeres after, drew thence three thousand Talents, to rid himselfe of Antiochus then besieging Ierusalem; and afterward Herod opening another Cell, had also an exceeding masse 30 of gold and siluer therein. And it was an ancient custome to burie treasure with the dead. So the Peruvians and other Americans did the like, which being discovered by the Spaniards, they enriched themselves by nothing so much in their first Conquest. That Salomon did burie so much treasure in his fathers graue, it would hardly be beleued, in regard of the great exactions with which hee was faine to burthen the people, notwithstanding all the riches which hee got otherwise, or which were left vnto him: were it not withall considered that his want of monie grew from such magnificent employments. Particularly of the Sepulcher of Dauid the Scriptures haue no mention, but onely the Sepulchers of the Kings of Iuda, as of an honourable place of buryall. Yet the Monuments

30. yeeres before Salomon; vnlesse more credit should be giuen to those Tyrian records which are cited by Iosephus, than to the plaine words of Scripture contradicting them. For that it was the same Hiram which liued both with Dauid and with Salomon, the Scriptures make it plainly manifest.

CHAP. XVIII.

OF SALOMON.

§. I.

Of the establishing of Salomon: of birthright, and the cause of Adonijahs death, and of Salomons wisdom.

SALOMON, who was brought vp vnder the Prophet Nathan, began to reigne ouer Iuda and Israel, in the yeere of the World 2991. He was called Salomon by the appointment of God: hee was also called Iediddia, or Theophilus, by Nathan, because the Lord loued him.

Hiram King of Tyre, after Salomons anointing, dispatched Embassadors toward him, congratulating his establishment: a custome betweene Princes very ancient. Whence wee read that Dauid did in like sort salute Hannum King of the Ammonites, after his obtaining the Kingdom.

The beginning of Salomon was in bloud, though his reigne were peaceable. For soone after Dauids death, hee caused his brother Adonijah to be slaine by Benaiah the sonne of Ichoiada, taking occasion from Adonijah his desiring by Bersheba, that the young maide Abisbag (which lay in Dauids bosome in his latter dayes, to keepe him warme) might be giuen to him. Whatsoeuer hee pretended, it was enough that Adonijah was his elder brother, and sought the kingdom contrary to the will of Dauid, whom God inclined to wards Salomon. And yet it is said that a word is enough to the wise, and hee that sees but the claw, may know whether it be a Lyon or no: so it may seem that to the quick-sighted wisdom of Salomon, this motion of Adonijahs, was a demonstration of a new treason. For they which had bene concubines to a King, might not after be touched but by a King: whence Achitophel wished Absalon to take his Fathers Concubines as a part of the Royaltie. And Dauid after that wrong, determining to touch them no more, did not giue them to any other, but shut them vp, and they remained widowed vntill their death. And this it seemes was the depth of Isobeths quarrell against Abner, for hauing his Fathers Concubine. And some signification of this custome may seeme too in the words of God by Nathan to Dauid: I haue giuen thee thy masters house, and thy masters wives. And in the words of Saul vpbraiding Jonathan, that he had chosen Dauid to the shame of the nakednesse of his Mother. Hereunto perhaps was some reference to this purpose of Adonijah, to marrie with her that was alwaies present with Dauid in his latter daies, and who belike knew all that was past, for the conueying of the Kingdom to Salomon. There might be diuers further occasions, as either that hee would learne such things by her as might be for the aduantage of his ambition, or that hee would perswade her to forge some strange tale about Dauids last Testament, or any thing else that might preiudice the title of Salomon.

As for the right of an elder brother which Adonijah pretended, though generally it agreed both with the law of Nations, & with the customes of the Iewes: yet the Kings of the Iewes were so absolute, as they did therein, and in all else what they pleased. Some examples also they had (though not of Kings) which taught them to vse this paternall authoritie in transferring the birthright to a younger sonne: namely, of Jacobs disheriting Reuben, and giuing the birthright (which was twice as much as any portion of the other brethren) to Ioseph: of whom hee made two tribes. And that it was generally acknowledged that this power was in Dauid, it appeareth by the words of Bersheba and Nathan to Dauid, and of Jonathan to Adonijah. For as for popular election, that it was necessarie to confirme, or that the refusal of the people had authoritie to frustrate the elder brothers right to the Kingdom, it now here appeares in the stories of the Iewes. It is said indeed that the people made Saul King at Gilgal: that is, they acknowledged and established him. For that he was King long before, no man can doubt. In like manner elsewhere the phrase of chusing or making their King, is to be expounded: as where in the prohibition, that they should not make themselves a King, it is said, Thou shalt make him King whom the Lord shall chuse.

But to proceed with the acts of Salomon: at the same time that hee put Adonijah to death, hee rid himselfe also of Joab, and three yeeres after of Shimei, as Dauid had aduised him: hee displaced also the Priest Abiathar, who tooke part with Adonijah against him: but in respect of his office, and that he followed Dauid in all his afflictions, and because hee had borne the Arke of God before his Father, hee spared his life. And thus being established in his Kingdom, hee tooke the daughter of Pharaoh King of Egypt to Wife: for so Eusebius out of Eusepius calls him. He offered a thousand Sacrifices at Gibeon, where God appearing vnto him in a dreame, bade him aske what he would at his hands, Salomon chooseth wisdom, which pleased God. And God said vnto him, Because thou hast asked this thing, and hast not asked for thy selfe long life, neither hast thou asked riches for thy selfe, nor hast asked the life of thine enemies, behold, I haue done according to thy words: by which wee may informe our selues what desires are most pleasing to God, and what not. For the coueting after long life in respect of our selues, cannot but proceed of selfe-loue, which is the roote of all impietie: the desire of priuate riches is an affection of couetousnesse which God abhorreth; to affect reuenge, is as much as to take the sword out of Gods hand, and to distrust his Iustice. And in that it pleased God to make Salomon know that it liked him, that he had not asked the life of his enemies, it could not but put him in minde of his brothers slaughter, for which he had not any warrant eyther from Dauid, or from the Law of God. But because Salomon desired wisdom onely, which taught him both to obey God, and to rule men, it pleased God to giue him withall that which he desired not. And I haue also giuen thee (saith God) that which thou hast not asked, both riches and honour. This gift of wisdom our Commentators stretch to almost all kindes of learning: but that it comprehended the knowledge of the nature of plants and liuing creatures the Scripture testifieth, though no doubt the chiefe excellencie of Salomons wisdom, was in the knowledge of gouerning his kingdom: whence, as it were for an example of his wisdom, the Scripture telleth how soone hee iudged the controuersie betweene the two harlots.

§. II.

Of Salomons building and glorie.

HE then entred into league with Hiram King of Tyre, from whom hee had much of his materials, for the Kings Palace and the Temple of God: for the building whereof he had receiued a double charge, one from his father Dauid, and another from God. For like as it is writtē of Dauid, that Hee called Solomon his sonne, and charged him to build a house for the Lord God of Israel: so doth Tostatus giue the force of a diuine precept to these words, Behold, a sonne is borne vnto thee, &c. Hee shall build an house for my Name.

He began the worke of the Temple, in the beginning of the fourth yeere of his reigne, at which time also hee prepared his fleet at Esiongeber to trade for gold in the East Indies, that nothing might be wanting to supply the charge of so great a worke. For that the Temple was in building, while his fleets were passing to and fro it is manifest. For the pillars of the Temple were made of the Almagint trees brought from Ophir. Of this most glorious building, of all the particulars (whereof the forme and example was giuen by God himselfe) many learned men haue written, as Salmeron, Montanus, Ribere, Barradas, Avarius, Villalpandus, Pineda, and others, to whom I referre the Reader.

For the cutting and squaring of the Cedars which serued that building, Salomon employed 30. thousand Carpenters, 10. thousand euery moneth by course: he also vsed 80. thousand Masons in the mountaine, and 70. thousand labourers that bare burdens, which it is conceiued, hee selected out of the Proselites; besides three thousand three hundred masters of his worke, so as hee paid and employed in all one hundred eightie three thousand and three hundred men, in which number the Sidonians which were farre more skilfull skillfull in hewing timber than the Israelites, may (as I thinke) bee included. For Hiram caused his seruants to bring downe the Cedars and Firres from Libanon to the sea, and thence sent them in raffis to Ioppe, or the next port to Iherusalem. For in the second of Chronicles the second Chapter, it is plaine, that all but the thirtie thousand Carpenters, and the ouer-seers, were strangers, and as it seemeth, the vassalls of Hiram, and of Vaphres King of Egypt. In recompence of all this timber and stone, Salomon gaue Hiram twentie thousand measures of wheate, and twentie measures of pure oyle yeerely. Eusebius out of Eupolemus in the ninth booke of his preparation, the last Chapter, hath left vs a Copie of Salomons Letter to Suron (which was the same as Hiram and Hiram) King of Tyre in these words:

Rex Salomon Suroni, Tyri, Sydonis, atque Phœnicia regi, Amico paterno salutem. Scias me à Deo magno David patris mei regnum accepisse, cumq; mihi pater precepit templum Deo, qui terram creauit, condere, ut etiam ad te scriberem precepit: Scribo igitur, & peio à te ut artifices atque fabros ad edificandum Templum Dei mittere velis.

King Salomon to King Suron, of Tyre, Sydon, and Phœnicia King, and my fathers friend, I sendeth greeting; You may understand that I haue receiued of the great God of my father David, the Kingdome: and when my father commanded mee to build a Temple to God which created heauen and earth, hee commanded also that I should write to you. I write therefore to you, and beseech you, that you would be pleased to send me Artificers and Carpenters to build the Temple of God.

To which the King Suron made this answer.

Suron, Tyri, Sydonis, & Phœnicia rex, Salomoni regi salutem. Lætis literis gratias ego Deo, qui tibi regnum patris tradidit: & quoniam scribis fabros ministrorumq; ad condendam Templum esse tibi mittendos, nisi ad te milia hominum octoginta, & Architectum Tyrium hominem ex matre Iudæa, virum in rebus architectura mirabilem. Curabis igitur ut necessarii non egeant, & Templo Dei condito ad nos redeant.

Suron of Tyre, Sidon and Phœnicia King, to King Salomon greeting: when I read your letters, I gaue God thanks, who hath installed you in your fathers Kingdome. And because you write, that Carpenters and Workemen may be sent to build Gods Temple, I haue sent you fourescore thousand men, and a Master-builder a Tyrian, borne of a Iewish woman, a man admirable in building. You will be carefull that all necessities be provided for them, and when the Temple of God is built, that they come home to vs.

The Copies of these letters were extant in Iosephus time, as himselfe affirmeth, and to be seene, saith he, Tam in nostris quàm in Tyriorum annalibus, as well in our owne, as in the Tyrian annals. But he deliuereth them somewhat in different tearmes, as the Reader may finde in his Antiquities. But werethis intercourse betweene Salomon and Hiram either by message or by writing, it is somewhat otherwise deliuered in the Scriptures, than either Eupolemus or Iosephus set it downe, but so, that in substance there is little difference betweene the one and the other.

The like letter in effect Salomon is said to haue written to Vaphres King of Egypt, and was answered as from Hiram.

But whereas some Commentors vpon Salomon finde that Hiram King of Tyre, and Vaphres King of Egypt, gaue Salomon the title of Rex magnus, and cite Eupolemus in Eusebius, I doe not finde any such addition of magnus in Eusebius in the last chapter of that ninth booke; neither is it in Iosephus in the eight booke and second chapter of the Iewes Antiquities: it being a vaine title vsed by some of the Affyrian and Persian Kings, and vsed likewise by the Parthians, and many other after them, in so much as in latter times it grew common, and was vsurped by meane persons in respect of the great Hermes the first, which was honoured by that name for his noble qualities, as much or more than for his mightinesse.

After the finishing and dedication of the Temple and house of the Lord, Salomon fortified Ierusalem with a treble wall, and repaired Hazor which had bene the auncient Metropolis of the Canaanites, before Iosuahs time: so did he Gaza of the Philistines: hee built Berethon, Gerar, and the Millo or munition of Ierusalem. For Pharaoh (as it seemeth in in fauour of Salomon, came vp into the edge of Ephraim, and tooke Gerar, which place the Canaanites yet held, and put them to the sword, and burnt their Citie. The place and territorie hee gaue Salomons wife for a dowrie. And it is probable that because Salomon was then busied in his magnificent buildings, and could not attend the warre, that hee treated his father in law to rid him of these neighbours, which Pharaoh performed. But hee thereby taught the Egyptians to visit those parts againe before they were sent for; and in his sonne Rehoboams time Shebact this mans successor did sacke Ierusalem it selfe.

Salomon also built Megiddo in Manasse, on this side Iordan, and Balah in Dan: also Thadmor, which may be either Ptolomies Thamor in the desert of Iuda, or (as Iosephus thinks) Iof. l. 8. ant. c. 22. Palmyra in the desert of Syria, which Palmyra because it stood on the vntmost border of Salomons dominion to the northeast of Libanus, and was of Dauids conquest when hee wan Damasus; it may seeme that Salomon therefore bestowed thereon the most cost, and fortified it with the best Art that that age had. Iosephus calls this place Thadamora, by which name (saith hee) giuen by Salomon, the Syrians as yet call it. Hierom in his booke of Hebrew places, calls it Thermeth. In aftertimes, when it was rebuilt by Adrian the Emperour, it was honoured with his name, and called Adrianopolis. In respect of this great charge of building Salomon raised tribute through all his Dominions, besides an hundred and twentie talents of gold receiued from Hirams seruants; Salomon offered Hiram twenty townes in or neere the vpper Galilee, but because they stood in an vnfruitfull and marish ground, Hiram refused them, and therefore was the territorie called Chabul.

These townes, as it is supposed, lay in Galilee of the Gentiles. Non quod gentes ibi habitarent: sed quia sub ditione regis gentilis erat, Not that it was possesed by the Gentiles (saith Niuderus) but because it was vnder the rule of a King that was a Gentile. Howsoeuer it were, it is true that Salomon in the 21. yeere fortified those places, which Hiram refused. Further, hee made a iourney into Syria Zobah, and established his tributes, the first and last warre (if in that expedition hee were driuen to fight) that he made in person in all his life. He then visited the border of all his Dominions, passing from Thadmor to the North of Palmyra, and so to the Desarts of Idumea, from whence hee visited Eziongeber and Eloth, the vntmost place of the South of all his territories, bordering to the red sea: which Citie I haue described in the Storie of Moses.

§. III.

Of Salomons sending to Ophir, and of some seeming contradictions about Salomons riches, and of Pinedas conceit of two strange passages about Africke.

Ere Salomon prepared his Fleet of Ships for India, with whom Hiram ioynded in that voyage, and furnished him with Mariners and Pilots, the Tyrians being of all other the most expert sea-men. From this part of Arabia, which at this time belonged to Edom, and was conquered by Dauid, did the Fleet passe to the East India, which was not farre off, namely to Ophir, one of the Islands of the Moluccas, a place exceeding rich in gold: witnesse the Spaniards, who notwithstanding all the abundance which they gather in Peru, doe yet plant in those Islands of the East at Manilia, and recouer a great quantitie from thence, and with lesse labour than they doe in any one part of Peru, or new Spaine.

The returne which was made by these Ships amounted to foure hundred and twentie talents, but in the second of Chronicles the eight, it is written 450. talents: whereof 30. talents went in expence for the charge of the fleet, and wages of men, and 420. talents, which makes five and twenty hundred and twenty thousand Crownes, came cleere. And thus must those two places bee reconciled. As for the place 1. Reg. 10. 14. which speaketh of fixe hundred sixty and fixe talents of gold, that summe, as I take it, is of other receipts of Salomons which were yeerely, and which came to him besides these profits from Ophir.

My opinion of the land of Ophir, that it is not Peru in America (as diuers haue thought) but a Country in the East Indies; with some reason why at those times they could not make more speedie returne to Ierusalem from the East Indies then in three yeeres; and that Tharshis in Scripture is diuers times taken for the Ocean, hath bene already declared in the first booke.

C. 8. §. 9. 10. 11.
Lib. 4. de rebus
v. 15.

Onely it remaineth that I should speake somewhat of Pineda his strange conceits, who being a Spaniard of Baticea, would faine haue Gades or Calis-malis, in olde times called Tartessus, which is the South-west corner of that Prouince, to be the Tharsis from whence Salomon fetcht his gold; for no other reason, as it seemes, but for loue of his own countrey, and because of some affinitie of sound betwene Tharsis and Tartessus. For whereas it may seeme strange that it should be three yeeres ere they that tooke ship in the red sea, should returne from the East Indies to Ierusalem, this hath bene in part answered already. And further, the intelligent may conceiue of sundry lets, in the digging and refining of the metall, and in their other trafficke, and in their land-carriages betwene Ierusalem and the red sea, and perhaps also elsewhere: so that wee haue no need to make Salomons men to goe many thousand miles out of their way to Gades, round about all Africk, that so they might be long a coming home.

For the direct way to Gades (which if Salomon and the Israelites knew not, the Tyrians which went with them, could not haue bene ignorant of) was along the Mediterransea, and so (besides many wonderfull inconueniencies, and terrible nauigation in rounding Africa) they should haue escaped the troublesome land-carriage betwene Ierusalem and the red sea through drie, desert, and theeuish Countries: and within 30. mile of Ierusalem at Ioppe, or some other haue in Salomons owne Countrey, haue laden and vnladen their ships.

But this direct course they could not hold (saith Pineda) because the huge Island of Atlantis in largenesse greater than all Africk and Asia, being swallowed vp in the Atlantick Ocean hindered Salomons ships from passing through the straits of Gibraltar: for this he alledgeth Plato in Timeo. But that this calamitie happened about Salomons time, or that thereby the Straights of Gades were filled with mud and made vnpassable, that there could be no coming to Gades by the Mediterran sea: or that this indraught where the sea runneth most violently, and most easily scowreth his channell, should be filled with mud, and not also the great Ocean in like manner, where this huge Island is supposed to haue stood: or that Salomons ships being in the red sea, should neglect the golden mines of the East Indies (which were infinitely better and neerer to the red sea, than any in Spain) to seeke gold at Cadyz by the way of compassing Africa, it is most ridiculous to imagine. For the Spaniard himselfe that hath also the rich Peru in the West, fortifieth in the East Indies, and inhabites some part thereof, as in Mamila, finding in those parts no lesse quantitie of gold (the small territorie which hee there possesseth considered) than in Peru.

The same Pineda hath another strange passage round about all Africa, which elsewhere he dreames of: supposing whereas Ionas sailing to Tharsis the Citie of Cilicia, was cast out in the Mediterran sea, and taken vp there by a Whale, that this Whale in three dayes swimming about twelue thousand English miles, along the Mediterran seas, and so through the streights of Gades, and along all the huge seas round about Africa, cast vp Ionas vpon the shore of the red sea, that so hee might haue perhaps some fixe miles the shorter (though much the worse) way to Niniue. This conceit he grounds onely vpon the ambiguitye of the word Soph, which oftentimes is an Epitheton of the red sea (as if we should call it mare algosum, the sea full of weeds) for the red sea. But in Ionas 2. 5. it is generally taken in the proper signification for weeds, and not as Pineda would haue it, who in this place against his owne rule (which elsewhere he giueth vs) supposeth strange miracles without any need. For this long voyage of the Whale finished in three dayes, is a greater miracle, than the very preservation of Ionas in the bellie of the Whale: and therefore seeing there is no necessitie of this miracle, we send it backe vnto him, keeping his owne rule which in this place he forgets, Miracula non sunt multiplicanda. And againe, Non sunt miracula gratis danda, nec pro arbitrio noua fingenda, Miracles are not to be multiplied without necessitie, nor deliuered without cause, nor fained at pleasure. Therefore we leaue this man in his dreames, which (were he not otherwise very learned and iudicious) might bee thought vnworthy the mentioning. But to proceed with our storie of Salomon.

The Queene of Sabaes coming from farre to Salomon, (as it seemes, from Arabia felix, and not, as some thinke, from Ethiopia) and her rich presents, and Salomons reciprocal magnificence, and his resolving of her difficult questions, those are set downe at large in the text. But herein Iosephus is greatly mistaken, who calls this Queene of Saba Nicaules,

Nicanter, the successeur (saith he out of Herodotus) of those thirty and eight Egyptian Kings which succeeded Mineus the founder of Memphis; adding, that after this Egyptian, and the father in Law of Salomon, the name of Pharaoh was left off in Egypt. For as it is elsewhere proued that the Queene was of Arabia, not of Egypt and Ethiopia; so were there other Pharaohs after the father in Law of Salomon. Yea, about three hundred yeeres after Salomon, Pharaoh Necho slew Iofias King of Iud.

It is also written of Salomon, that he kept in garrisons foureteene thousand Chariots, and twelue thousand horsemen; that he spent in Court euery day thirtie measures of fine flower, threescore measures of wheat, one hundred sheepe, besides stags and fallow deere, bugles and fowle; foure thousand stables of horses he had for his chariots and other vses, and for the twelue thousand horsemen of his guard. For, the ten thousand stals in the first of Kings the fourth, are to be taken but for so many horses, whence in the second of Chronicles the ninth, it is written but foure thousand stals or teemes, and in euery teemeten horses, as Iunius and the Genuea vnderstand it. He was said to be wiser than any man, yea than were Ethan the Ezrahite, than Heman, Chalcal, or than Darda, to which Iunius addeth a list, to wit, Ezrak. For the Genuea maketh Ethan an Ezrahite by Nation. Iosephus writes them Athan, Aman, Chalceus and Donan the sonnes of Hemon. He spake three thousand Prouerbes, and his songs were one thousand and siue, whereof either the most part perished in the Captiuitie of Babylon, or else because many acts of Salomons were written and kept among the publique Records of Ciuill causes and not Ecclesiasticall, therefore they were not thought necessary to be inserted into Gods booke.

§. IIII.

Of the fall of Salomon, and how long he liued.

Now as he had plentie of all other things, so had he no scarcitie of women. For besides his seuen hundred Wiues, he kept three hundred Concubines, and (forgetting that God had commanded that none of his people should accompanie the daughters of Idolators) he tooke Wiues out of Egypt, Edom, Moab, Ammon, Zidon and Heb: and when hee fell a doting, his Wiues turned his heart after other Gods, as Asteroth of the Zidonians, Milcom or Molech of the Ammonites, and Chemosh of Moab.

These things God punished by Adad of Idumaea, Rezin of Damascus, and by Ieroboam his owne seruant, and one of the masters of his workes, who by the ordinance of God tare from his sonne Roboam, ten of the twelue parts of all the territorie he had. Deus diem in peccatores animaduertit, aliorum peccatis vititur, quae ipse non fecit. God in punishing sinners, vseth the finnes of others, which he himselfe wrought not.

In the reigne of Salomon (as in times of long peace) were few memorable actions by him performed, excepting his buildings with other workes of magnificence, and that great Indian voyage already mentioned. Fortie yeeres he reigned: how many he liued, it is not written, and must therefore be found onely by coniecture. The most likely way to guesse at the truth in this case, is by considering the actions of Dauid before and after Salomons birth, whereby we may best make estimation of the yeeres which they consumed, and consequently learne the true, or most likely yeere of his natiuitie. Seauen yeeres Dauid reigned in Hebron: in his eighth yeere he tooke Ierusalem, and warred with the Philistims, who also troubled him the yeere following. The bringing home of the Arke seemes to haue bene in the tenth yeere of Dauid, and his intention to build the Temple in the yeere ensuing, at which time he had sufficient leisure, liuing in rest. After this he had warres with the Philistims, Moabites, Aramites and Edomites, which must needs haue held him siue yeeres, considered that the Aramites of Damasco raised warre against him, after such time as he had beaten Hadadezer; and that in euery of these warres he had the entire victory. Neither is it likely that these seruices occupied any longertime, because in those dayes and places there were no wintering camps in vse, but at conuenient seasons of the yeere Kings went forth to warre, dispatching all with violence, rather than with temporizing; as maintaining their armies, partly vpon the spoyle of the enemies countrey, partly vpon the priuate prouision which euery soldier made for himselfe. The 17. yeere of Dauid, in which he tooke Azoph the sonne of Nicanter,

of Ionathan into his Court, appeareth to haue passed away in quiet; and the yeere following to haue begun the warre with Ammon; but somewhat late in the end of Summer perhaps, it came to triall of a battaile (for Ioab after the victorie, returned immediately to Ierusalem) the causes and preparations for that warre taking vp all the Summer. Dauids personall expedition against the Arimites wherein he brought all the tributaries of Hadadezer vnder his owne allegiance, appeares manifestly to haue bene the next yeeres worke, wherein he did cut off all meanes of succour from the Ammonites; all Syria, Moab and Idumea being now at his owne deuotion. By this reckoning it must haue bene the 20. yeere of Dauids reigne, and about the fiftieth of his life, in which he sent forth Ioab to besiege Rabba, and finished the warre of Ammon: to wherein also fell out the matter of Vriahs wife. So one halfe of Dauids reigne was very prosperous: in the other halfe he felt great sorrow by the expectation, execution, and sad remembrance of that heauie iudgement laid vpon him by God for his soule and bloody offence.

Now very manifest it is, that in the yeere after the death of that childe which was begotten in adulterie, Salomon was borne, who must needs therefore haue bene nineteene yeeres old or thereabout, when he began to reigne at the decesse of his father, as being begotten in the 21. yeere of his fathers reigne, who reigned in all fortie.

This account hath also good coherence with the following times of Dauid, as may be collected out of ensuing actions: for two yeeres passed ere Abshalon slew his brother Ammon; three yeeres ere his father pardoned him; and two yeeres more ere he came into the Kings presence. After this he prepared horses and men, and laid the foundation of his rebellion, which seemes to haue bene one yeeres work. So the rebellion it selfe with all that happened thereupon, as the Commotion made by Sheba, the death of Amasa and the rest, may well seeme to haue bene in the 30. yeere of Dauids reigne.

Whether the three yeeres of famine should be reckoned apart from the last yeeres of warre with the Philistims, or confounded with them, it were more hard than needfull to coniecture. Plaine enough it is, that in the ten remaining yeeres of Dauid there wastime sufficient, and to spare, both for the three yeeres of famine, for foure yeeres of warre, and for numbring the people, with the pestilence ensuing; as also for his owne last infirmities, and disposing of the Kingdome. Yet indeede it seemes that the warre with the Philistims, was but one yeeres worke, and ended in three or foure fights, of which the two or three former were at Gob or Nob neere vnto Gezer, and the last at Gath. This war the Philistims vnderooke, as it seemeth, vpon confidence gathered out of the tumults in Israel, and perhaps emboldened by Dauids olde age: for hee fainted now in the battaile, and was afterwards hindered by his men from exposing himselfe vnto danger any more. So Dauid had fixe or seauen yeeres of rest, in which time it is likely, that many of his great men of Warre died (being of his owne age) whereby the stirring spirit of Adonijah found little succour in the broken partie of Ioab the sonne of Zeruia.

At this time it might both truely be said by Dauid to Salomon, Thou art a wise man, and by Salomon to God, I am but a yong childe; for nineteene yeeres of age might well agree with either of these two speeches.

Neuerthelesse there are some that gather out of Salomons professing himselfe a child, that he was but eleuen yeeres old when hee began to reigne. Of these Rabbi Salomon seemes the first Author, whom other of great learning and iudgement haue herein followed: grounding themselves perhaps vpon that which is said of Abshalons rebellion, that it was after fortie yeeres, which they vnderstood as yeeres of Dauids reigne. But whereas Echoboram the sonne of Salomon was 41. yeeres old when he began to reigne, it would follow hereby that his Father had begotten him, being himselfe but a child of nine or ten yeeres old; the difference betweene their ages being no greater, if Salomon (who reigned fortie yeeres) were but eleuen yeeres old when his reigne began. To auoide this inconuenience, Iosephus allowes 80. yeeres of reigne to Salomon; a report so disagreeing with the Scriptures, that it needes no confutation. Some indeede haue in fauour of this opinion contrived the words of Iosephus, as if they included all the yeeres of Salomons life. But by such reckoning he should haue bene 40. yeeres old at his Fathers death; and consequently should haue bene borne long before his Father had wonne Ierusalem; which is a manifest vntruth. Wherefore the 40. yeeres remembered in Abshalons rebellion, may either seeme to haue reference to the space betweene Dauids first anointment, and the trouble which God brought vpon him for his wickednesse, or perhaps be read (according to Iosephus, Theodor, and the Latine translation) foure yeeres; which passed betweene the returne of Abshalon to Ierusalem, and his breaking out.

§. V.

Of Salomons writings.

Here remaine of Salomons workes, the Prouerbs, the Preacher, and the Song of Solomon. In the first he teacheth good life, and correcteth manners; in the second, the vanity of humane nature; in the third he singeth as it were the Epithalamion of Christ and his Church. For the Booke intituled, The wisdom of Salomon, (which some giue vnto Salomon, and some make the elder Philo the Author thereof) Hierome and many others of the best learned make vs thinke it was not Salomon that wrote it. Stylus libri sapientie (saith Hierome) qui Salomonis inscribitur, Græcam recit ad Cro- dolet eloquentiam; The stile of the booke of wisdom, which is ascribed to Salomon, sauou*reth of the Græcian eloquence*; and of the same opinion was S. Augustine, and yet he con-fesseth in the nineteenth Booke and twentieth Chapter of the Cite of God, that the Author of that Booke hath a direct foretelling of the Passion of Christ in these words:

20 Circumueniamus iustum quoniam infirmus est nobis, &c. Let vs circumuent the righteous, &c. 1. p. 22.
for he is vnpleasing to vs, he is contrary to our doings, he checketh vs for offending against the Law, he makes his boast to haue the knowledge of God, and he calleth himselfe the sonne of the Lord, &c. and so doth the course of all the following words point directly at Christ. The Bookes of Ecclesiastes, Prouerbs, and Cantica Cantorum, Rabbi Moses Kimchi, ascribeth to Isay the Prophet. Suidas and Cedrenus report that Salomon wrote of the remedies of all diseases, and graued the same on the sides of the Porch of the Temple, which they say Ezechias pulled downe, because the people neglecting helpe from God by prayer, repaired thither for their recoveries. Reuoc. in Vul. Hist.

Of Salomons books of Inuocations and Inchantments to cure diseases, and expell euill spirits, Iosephus hath written at large, though as I conceiue, rather out of his owne inuen-tion, or from some vncertaine report, than truely.

He also speaketh of one Eliazarus, who by the roote in Salomons ring dispossest diuers persons, of euill spirits in the presence of Vespasian, and many others, which I will not stand to examine.

Certainely so strange an example of humane frailty hath neuer bene read of as this King: who hauing receiued wisdom from God himselfe, in honour of whom, and for his onely seruice, he built the first and most glorious Temple of the world: he that was made King of Israel and Iudea, not by the law of Nature, but by the loue of God, and became the wisest, richest, and happiest of all Kings, did in the end, by the perswasion of a few weake and wretched Idolatrous Women, forget and forsake the Lord of all the world, and the giuer of all goodnesse, of which he was more liberall to this King, than to any that euer the world had. Of whom Siracides writeth in this manner: Salomon reigned in a peaceable time and was glorious, for God made all quiet round about, that hee might build a house to his name, and prepare the Sanctuary for euer; How wise wast thou in thy youth, and wast filled with vnderstanding, as with a floud? Thy minde couered the whole earth, and hath filled it with graue and darke sentences. Thy name went abroad in the Iles, and for thy peace thou wast beloued, &c. but thus he concludeth: Thou didst bow thy loynes to Women, and wast ouercome by thy body, thou didst staine thine honour, and hast defiled thy posteritie, and hast brought wrath vpon thy children, and felt sorrow for thy folly. cap. 27.

§. VI.

Of the Contemporaries of Salomon.

Here the beginning of Salomons reigne, Agessilaus the third of the Heraclides in Corinth, Labotes in Lacedæmon; and soonie after Sylusius Alba the fourth of the Sylus, Iwayed those Kingdomes: Laosphenes then gouerning Assyria: Agastus and Archippus the second and third Princes after Codrus, ruling the Athenians.

In the fixe and twentieth of Salomons reigne Hiram of Tyre died, to whom Baliam succeeded, and reigned seuentecne yeeres, after Mercators account, who reckons the time of his rule by the age of his sonnes. Iosephus giues him fewer yeeres. Theophilus Antiochenus against Autolicus finds Bozorius the next after Hiram, if there be not some Kings omitted betweene the death of Hiram, and the reigne of Bozorius.

Vaphres being dead, about the twentieth of Salomon, Sesac or Shisak (as our Englishe Genena termes him) began to gouerne in Egypt, being the same with him whom Diodorus calleth Sofachis, Iosephus, Susac, Cedrenus, Suscesinus, Eusebius in the column of the Egyptian Kings, Smendes, and in that of the Hebrewes, Susac. Iosephus in the eight of his Antiquities reproveth it as an error in Herodotus, that he ascribeth the acts of Susac to Sesostrius, which perchance Herodotus might haue done by comparison, accounting Sesac another Sesostrius, for the great things he did.

Of the great acts and vertues of King Sesostrius I haue spoken already in the story of the Egyptian Princes: onely in this he was reproveth, that he caused foure of his captiue Kings to draw his Caroch, when he was disposed to be scene, and to ride in triumph: one of which foure, saith Entropius, at such times as Sesostrius was carried out to take the aire, cast his head continually backe vpon the two fore-moost wheeles next him; which Sesostrius perceiuing, asked him what he found worthy the admiration in that motion? to whom the captiue King answered, that in those he beheld the instabillity of all worldly things; for that both the lowest part of the wheele was suddainly carried about, and became the highest, and the vpmoost part was as suddainly turned downe-ward and vnder all: which when Sesostrius had iudiciously weighed, he dismissed those Princes, and all other from the like seruitude in the future. Of this Sesostrius, and that he could not be taken for Sesac, I haue spoken at large in that part of the Egyptian Kings preceding.

CHAP. XIX.

Of Salomons Successors vntill the end of Iehosaphat.

S. I.

Of Rehoboam his beginnings: the defection of the ten Tribes, and Ieroboams Idolatry.

Rehoboam the Sonne of Salomon by Nahama an Ammonitess, now forty yeeres old, succeeded his Father Salomon, and was anointed at Sichem, where the ten Tribes of Israel were assembled: who attended a while the returne of Ieroboam as yet in Egypt, since he fled thither fearing Salomon. After his arrival the people presented a Petition to Rehoboam, to be eased of those great Tributes laid on them by his Father. Sic enim firmus est fore imperium, si amare mallet quam metui. So should his Empire (saith Iosephus) be more assured, if he desired rather to be beloved.

Ant. l. 3. c. 31

ed than feared: whereof he tooke three dayes to deliberate before his answer, of whom therefore it could not be said as of Dauid, that he was wiser than all his Teachers. For as of himselfe he knew not how to resolute, so had he not the iudgement to discern of counsels, which is the very test of wisdom in Princes, and in all men else. But notwithstanding that he had consulted with those graue and aduised men, that serued his Father, who perswaded him by all meanes to satisfie the multitude: he was transported by his familiars and fauourites, not onely to continue on the backs of his subjects those burdens which greatly crusht them; but (vaunting falsely of greatnesse exceeding his Fathers) he threatened in sharpe, or rather in terrible tearmes, to lay yet heavier, and more vsupportable loades on them. But as it appeared by the successe, those yonger aduersers greatly misooke the nature of feuerity, which without the temper of clemency is no other than cruelty: it selfe: they also were ignorant that it ought to be used for the helpe, and not for the harme of subjects. For what is the strength of a King left by his people? and what cords or fetters haue euer lasted long, but those which haue bene

twisted and forged by loue onely? His witlesse parasites could well iudge of the Kings disposition: and being well learned therein, though ignorant in all things else, it sufficed and inabled them sufficiently for the places they held. But this answer of Rehoboam did not a little aduance Ieroboams designs. For being fore-told by the Prophet Achias of his future aduancement, these the Kings threats (changing the peoples loue into fure) confirmed and gaue courage to his hopes. For he was no looner arriueth, than elected King of Israel: the people cryed out, What portion haue we in Dauid? we haue no inheritance in the Sonne of Issai. Now though themselves, euen all the Tribes of Israel, had consented to Dauids anointing at Hebron the second time, acknowledging that they were his bones and his flesh: yet now after the manner of rebels, they forgot both the bands of nature, and their dutie to God, and as all alienated resolute hearts doe, they serued themselves for the present with impudent excuses. And now ouer-late, and after time, Rehoboam sent Adoram, one of the Taxers of the people, a man most hatefull to all his Subiects, to pacifie them: whom they instantly beat to death with stones. Whereupon the King affrighted, got him from Sichem with all speed, and recovered Ierusalem, where preparing to inuade Israel, with an hundred and foure-score thousand chosen men, Shemai in the person of God commanding to the contrary, as was stayed for the present. In the meane time Ieroboam the new King fortified Sechem on this side, and Penuel on the other side of Jordan; and fearing that the Vnion and ex-cite of one Religion would also ioyne the peoples hearts againe to the House of Dauid; and hauing in all likelihood also promised the Egyptians to follow their Idolatry: he set vp two Calues of gold for the Children of Israel to worship, impiously perswading them that those were the Gods, or at least by these he represented those Gods, which deliuered them out of Egypt: and refusing the seruice of the Lewites, he made Priests fit for such gods. It must needs be that by banishing the Lewites which serued Dauid and Salomon through all Israel, Ieroboam greatly enriched himselfe: as taking into his hands all those Cities which were giuen them by Moses and Iosua, for as it is written, The Lewites left their suburbs, and their possession, and came to Iuda, &c. This irreligious policie of Ieroboam (which was the foundation of an Idolatry that neuer could be rooted out, vntill Israel for it was rooted out of the Land) was by prophecie and miracles impugned sufficiently when it first began; but the affections maintaining it, were so strong, that neither Prophecie nor Miracle could makethem yeelde. Ieroboam could not be moued now by the authority of Abia, who from the Lord had first promised vnto him the Kingdome; nor by the withering of his owne hand as he stretched it ouer the Altar, which also claue a-funder, according to the signe, which the man of God had giuen him by the commandement of God, who againe recovered and cured him of that defect; yet he continued as obstinate an Idolater as before, for he held it the safest course in policie to proceede as he had begun. This impious inuention of Ieroboam, who forsooke God, and the Religion of his forefathers, by God and his Ministers taught them, was by a moderne Historian compared with the policies of late Ages; obseruing well the practice of his Nation, being an Italian borne. Sic qui hodie (saith he) politici vocantur, & propria commoda, presentisq; utilitates sibi tanquam vltimum finem constituent, causam quam vocant statum in capite omnium ponunt: pro ipsa tuenda, promouenda, conseruanda, amplianda, nihil non faciendum putant. Si iniuria proximo irroganda, si iniuria honestatq; leges subuertenda, si religio ipsa pessumdanda, si deniq; omnia iura diuina, & humana violanda, nihil intentatum, nil per fas nefasq; relinquentium consent; cuncta ruunt, omnia pereant, nihil ad ipsos, modo id, quod e re sua esse sibi persuadent, obtineant, ac si nullus sit qui talia curet, castigareue possit Deus; So they who are now called Politicians, propounding to themselves, as their vnmortall end and scope, their owne commoditie and present profit, are wont to allege the case of state forsooth, as the principall point to be regarded: for the good of the state, for aduancing, preserving, or encreasing of the state, they thinke that they may doe any thing. If they meane to oppress their neighbour, to overturne all Lawes of iustice and honesty, if religion it selfe must goe to wracke, yea if all rights of God and Man must be violated, they will try all courses, be it right, be it wrong, they will doe any thing; let all goe to ruine, what care they, so long as they may haue what they would, as who should say, there were no God: that would offer to meddle in such matters, or had power to correct them.

Indeede this allegation of raggione del stato, did serue as well to vp-hold, as at the first first it had done to bring in this vile Idolatry of the ten Tribes. Vpon this ground Amaziah the Priest of Bethel, counsaile the Prophet Amos, not to prophetic at Bethel; For (saith he) it is the Kings Court. Vpon this ground euen Iehu that had massacred the Priests of Baal, in zeale for the Lord, yet would not in any wise depart from that politique sinne of Ieroboam the sonne of Nebat, which made Israel to sinne. It was reason of state that perswaded the last famous French King Henrie the fourth to change his Religion, yet the Protestants whom he forsooke, obeyed him, but some of the Papists whom he followed, murdered him. So strongly doth the painted vizzor of wise proceeding delude euen those that know the foule face of impietie lurking vnder it, and behold the wretched ends that haue euer followed it; whereof Iehu and all the Kings of Israel had to and were themselves very great examples.

§. II.

Of Rehoboam his impietie; for which he was punished by Sesac: of his end and Contemporaries.

WHile Ieroboam was occupied in setting vp his new Religion, Rehoboam on the other side, hauing now little hope to recover the Prouinces lost, strengthened the principall places remaining, with all endeavour: for he fortified and victualled fifteene Cities of Iudah and Beniamin: not that he feared Ieroboam alone, but the Egyptians, to whom Ieroboam had not onely fastned himselfe, but withall inuited them to inuade Iudea: laying perchance before them the incountable riches of Dauid and Solomon, which might now be easily had, seeing ten of the twelue Tribes were reuolted, and become enemies to the Iudeans. So as by those two wayes (of late yeeres often troden) to wit, change of Religion, and inuitation of forraigne force, Ieroboam hoped to settle himselfe in the seate of Israel, whom yet the powerfull God for his Idolatry in a few yeeres after rooted out, with all his. Rehoboam also, hauing as he thought, by fortifying diuers places, assured his estate, forsooke the Law of the liuing God, and made high places, and Images, and Groues on euery high Hill, and vnder euery greene Tree.

And therefore in the fifth yeere of his reigne, Sesac or Shishac before spoken of, being now King of Egypt, and with whom as well Adad of Idumaea, as Ieroboam, were familiar, and his instruments; entred Iudea with twelue thousand Chariots, and threescore thousand Horse, besides foot-men, which Iosephus numbers at foure hundred thousand. This Armie was compounded of foure Nations: Egyptians, Lubeans, Succians, and Cusites. The Lubeans were Lybeans, the next bordering Region to Egypt, on the West-side. The Cusites were of Petrea, and of the Desert Arabia, which afterward followed Zerah against Asa King of Iuda. The Succians according to Iunius his opinion, were of Succoth, which signifieth Tents: he doth suppose that they were the Troglodites, mentioned often in Plinie, Ptolomie, and other Authors. The Troglodites inhabited not farre from the banks of the red Sea, in 22. degrees from the line Northward, about fixe hundred Englisb miles from the best and Maritimate part of Egypt: and therefore I doe not think that the Succians, or Succai were those Troglodites, but rather those Arabians which Ptolomie calls Arabes Egyptij, or, Ichthyophagi, which possesse that part of Egypt betweene the mountaines called Alabastrini, and the red Sea, farre neerer Egypt, and readier to be leuied then those remoued Sauages of the Troglodytae.

With this great and powerfull Army, Sesac inuaded Iudea, and (besides many other strong Cities) wan Ierusalem it selfe; of which, and of the Temple, and Kings house, he took the spoile, carrying away (besides other treasures) the golden shields which Salomon had made, in imitation of those which Dauid recouered from Adad in the Syrian war: these Rehoboam supplied with Targets of brasse, which were fit enough to guard a King of his quality: whom Syracides calleth, The foolishnesse of the people.

From this time forward the Kings of Egypt claimed the soueraigntie of Iudea, and held the Iewes as their Tributaries: Sesac, as it seemes, rendring vp to Rehoboam his places on that condition. So much may be gathered out of the word of God, where premising the deliuerance of Iuda after their humiliation, he doth notwithstanding leaue them vnder the yoke of Egypt, in these words: Neuertheless, they (to wit, the Iudeans) shall be his seruants; that is, the seruants of Sesac.

After

After this ouerthrow and dishonour, Rehoboam reigned twelue yeeres, and his losses receiued by Sesac, notwithstanding, he continued the warre against Ieroboam all his life time. After his death Ieroboam governed Israel toure yeeres.

Rehoboam liued 58. yeeres, and reigned 17. his storie was written at large by Shemciah and Hidai the Prophets, but the same perished with that of Nathan, and the rest.

With Rehoboam, Archippus, and Terhippus, the third and fourth Archontes or Gouernors for life after Codrus, gouerned in Athens. Abdastartus, or Abstrartus, in Tyre. Doris the first of the Heraclidae in Sparta, according to Eusebius (others make him the first) and Primas the fourth in Corinth. Ouer the Latines reigned Sylvius Alba, and Sylvius Arys, the fourth and fifth of the Syluij.

About the 12. of Rehoboam, Abdastartus King of Tyre was murdered by his Nurses sons, or foster brethren, the elder of which vsurped the Kingdome twelue yeeres.

Towards his latter times Periciades, or Pyrrhiades, began to gouerne Assyria, the 34. King thereof: and not long after Astartus, the sonne of Baleastartus, recouered the Kingdome of Tyre from the vsurpers.

§. III.

Of the great battaile betweene Ieroboam and Abia, with a Corollarie of the examples of Gods iudgements.

ABijah the sonne of Rehoboam, inherited his Fathers Kingdome, and his vices. He raised an Armie of foure hundred thousand, with which he inuaded Ieroboam, who encountered him with a double number of eight hundred thousand: Both Armies ioyned neere to the Mount Ephraim, where Ieroboam was vtterly ouerthrowne, and the strength of Israel broken; for there fell of that side fixe hundred thousand, the greatest ouerthrow that euer was giuen or receiued of those Nations. Abijah being now master of the field, recouered Bethel, Ieshanah, and Ephron, soone after which discomfiture, Ieroboam died: who reigned in all 22. yeeres. Abijah, the better to strengthen himselfe, entred into league with Hefson, the third of the Adads of Syria, as may be gathered out of the second of Chronicles: he reigned but three yeeres, and then died: the particulars of his acts were written by Ido the Prophet, as some part of his Fathers were.

Here wee see how it pleased God to punish the sinnes of Salomon in his Sonne Rehoboam: first, by an Idolator and Traitor: and then by the successor of that Egyptian, whose daughter Salomon had married, thereby the better to assure his estate, which while he seruued God, was by God assured against all and the greatest neighbouring Kings; and when he forsooke him, it was torne asunder by his meanest Vassals: Nor that the Father wanted strength to defend him from the Egyptian Sesac. For the sonne Abijah was able to leuie foure hundred thousand men, and with the same number he ouerthrew eight hundred thousand Israelites, and slew of them fixe hundred thousand; God giuing spirit, courage, and inuention, when, and where it pleaseth him. And as in those times the causes were exprest, why it pleased God to punish both Kings and their People: the same being both before, and at the instant deliuered by Prophets; so the same iust God, who liueth and gouerneth all things for euer, doeth in these our times giue victory, courage, and discouragement, raise, and throw downe Kings, Estates, Cities, and Nations, for the same offences which were committed of old, and are committed in the present: for which reason, in these and other the afflictions of Israel, alwayes the causes are set downe, that they might be as precedents to succeeding ages. They were punished with famine in Dauids time for three yeeres, For Saul and his bloody house, &c. And David towards his latter end suffered all sorts of afflictions, and sorrowes in effect, for Vriah. Salomon had ten Tribes of twelue torne from his sonne for his Idolatry. Rehoboam was spoyled of his riches and honour by Sesac of Egypt, because the people of Iuda made images, high places, and groues, &c. And because they suffered Sodomites in the Land. Ieroboam was punished in himselfe and his posteritie, for the golden Calues that he erected. Ioram had all his sonnes slaine by the Philistims, and his very bowels torne out of his body by an excoiating flaxe, for murdering his brethren. Ahab and Iezabel were slaine, the blood of the one, the body of the other eaten with dogges: for the false accusing and killing of Naboth. So also hath God punished the same and the like finnes in all after-times, and in these our dayes by the same famine, plagues, warre, losse, vexation, death, sicknesse, and calamities, howsoever the wise men of the world raise these effects no higher than to second causes, and such other accidents; which, as being next their eyes and eares, seeme to them to worke euery alteration that happeneth.

§. IIII.
Of Asa and his Contemporaries.

ASa succeeded Asa, who enioyed peace for his first ten yeeres, in which time he established the Church of God, breaking downe the altars dedicated to strange gods, with their images, cutting downe their groues, and taking away their high places. He also spared not his owne mother, who was an Idolatreffe, but deposing her from her regencie, brake her Idoll, stamp it, and burnt it. Hee also fortified many Cities, and other places, prouiding (as prouident Kings doe) for the troubles of war in the leasure of peace. For not long after he was invaded by Zerah, who then commanded all the Arabians bordering Iudea, and with such a multitude entred the territorie of Asa, as (for any thing that I haue read) were neuer assembled of that Nation, either before or since. For it is written, that there came against the Iudeans, Zerah of Aethiopia, with an hoste of ten hundred thousand, and three hundred Chariots, which Asa encountered with an Armie of five hundred and fourescore thousand, leuiued out of those two Tribes of Iuda and Beniamin, which obeyed him, and with which hee ouerthrew this fearefull multitude, and had the spoyle both of their Cities and Campes.

That this Zerah was not an Aethiopian, I haue * proued already, and were it but the length betweene Aethiopia and Iudea, and the strong flourishing Regions of Egypt interiacent (who would not suffer a million of strangers to passe through them) it were sufficient to make it appeare how foolish the opinion is, that these inuaders were Aethiopians. But in that the Scriptures acknowledge that Zerah was belonging to Zerah, and the Cities thereabouts were spoiled by the Iudeans, in following their victory, as places belonging to Zerah, and that all men know that Zerah standeth vpon the torrent of Besor, which Dauid past ouer when he surprized the Amalekites or Arabians; this proueth sufficiently, that Zerah was leader of the Arabians, and that Zerah was a frontier towne, standing on the vtermoost South-border of all Iudea, from all parts of Aethiopia sixe hundred miles. Also the spoyle which Asa tooke, as the cattell, Camels, and sheepe, whereof he sacrificed fuet hundred, shew them to be Arabians adioyning, and not farre off, and not vnknowne Aethiopians. And if it be objected that these desert countries can hardly yeelde a million of men fit for the wars, I answer, that it is as like that Arabia Petraea, and the Desert which compasseth two parts of the holy Land, should yeeld ten hundred thousand, as that two Tribes of the twelue, should arme five hundred and fourescore thousand. Besides, it answereth to the promise of God to Abraham, that these Nations should exceede in number; for God spake it of Ismael, that hee would make him fruitful, and multiply him exceedingly, that hee should beget twelue Princes, &c.

Baasha a King of Israel began to reigne in the third of Asa, and fearing the greatnes of Asa after his great victory, entertained Benhadad King of Syria, of the race of Adadazer, to ioyne with him against Asa; and to the end to blocke him vp, he fortified Rama, which lieth in the way from Ierusalem towards Samaria.

This warre began according to the letter of the Scriptures in the 36. yeere of Asa his reigne: but because in the first of Kings the 16. it is said that Baasha died in the 26. yeere of Asa; therefore could not Baasha begin this war in the 35. of Asa his reigne, but in the 35. yeere of the diuision of Iuda and Israel, for so many yeeres it was from the first of Rehoboam, who reigned 17. yeeres, to the 16. of Asa. It may seeme strange, that Asa being able to bring into the field an Armie of five hundred and fourescore thousand good Souldiers, did not easily driue away Baasha, and defeat him of his purposes; the victories of Abia against Ieroboam, and of Asa himselfe against Zerah, being yet fresh in minde, which might well haue emboldened the men of Iuda, and almost disheartened the enemies. Questionlesse there were some important Circumstances, omitted in the Text, which caused caused Asa to fight at this time with money. It may be that the employment of so many hundred thousands of hands, in the late seruice against Zerah, had caused many mens priuate businesse to lye vndispatched, whereby the people being now intentiue to the culture of their lands and other trades, might be vnwilling to stir against the Israelites, choosing rather to winke at apparant inconuenience, which the building of Rama would bring vpon them in after-times. Such backwardnesse of the people might haue deterred Asa from aduenturing himselfe with the least part of his forces, and committing the successe into the hands of Gods. Howsoever it were, he took the treasures remaining in the Temple, with which he waged Benhadad the Syrian against Baasha, whose employments Benhadad readily accepted, and brake off confederacy with Baasha. For the Israelites were his borderers, and next neighbours, whom neither himselfe (after his inuasion) nor his successors after him euer gaue ouer, till they had made themselves masters of that Kingdom. So Benhadad being now entred into Nephtalim, without resistance, he spoiled diuers principall Cities thereof, and enforced Baasha to quit Rama, and to leaue the same to Asa, with all the materials which he had brought thither, to fortifie the same: which done Benhadad, who loued neither party, being laden with the spoiles of Israel, and the treasures of Iuda, returned to Damascus. After this, when Hanani the Prophet reprehended Asa, in that he now relied on the strength of Syria, and did not rest himselfe on the fauour and assistance of God, he not onely caused Hanani to be imprisoned, but he began to burden and oppress his people, and was therefore strooken with the grievous paines of the gout in his feete, wherewith after he had beene two yeeres continually tormented, he gaue vp the ghost when he had reigned 41. yeeres.

There liued with Asa, Agasilus the sixt of the Heraclidae, and Bacis the fift King of the same race in Corinth, of whom his successors were afterward called Bacidae. Astarius, and Astarius were Kings in Tyre. Astarius tooke reuenge on his brother Phelctes, for the murder of Ithabalus Priest of the goddesse Astarta, whom Salomon in dorage worshipped. Arys and Carys ruled the Latines: Pirithiades and Ophrateus the Assyrians: Tersippus and Phorbas the Athenians: Chemmis reigned in Egypt; who dying in the 36. yeere of Asa, left Cheops his successour, that reigned fiftie sixe yeeres, euen to the 16. of Joas.

§. V.

Of the great alteration falling out in the ten Tribes during the reigne of Asa.

IN the reigne of Asa the Kingdom of Israel felt great and violent commotions, which might haue reduced the ten Tribes vnto their former allegiance to the house of Dauid, if the wisdome of God had not otherwise determined. The wickednesse of Ieroboam had in his latter dayes, the sentence of heavy vengeance laid vpon it, by the mouth of Abia, the same Prophet which had foretold the diuision of Israel, for the sinne of Salomon, and his reigne ouer the ten Tribes. One sonne Ieroboam had among others, in whom onely God found so much pietie, as (though it sufficed not to withhold his wrath from that Family) it procured vnto him a peaceable end; an honourable testimony of the peoples loue, by their generall mourning and lamentation at his death, and (wherein he was most happy) the fauourable approbation of God himselfe.

After the losse of this good sonne, the vngodly father was soone taken away: a miserable creature, so conscious of his vile vnthankfulnesse to God, that he durst not suffer his owne name to be vsed in consulting with an holy Prophet, assured of the ruine hanging ouer him and his, yea of Gods extreame hatred; yet forbearing to destroy those so accursed Idols, that wrought his confusion. So loath he was to forsake his worldly wisdom, when the world was ready to forsake him, and all belonging to him, his hatefull memory excepted.

Nadab the sonne of Ieroboam, reigned in the second and third yeeres of Asa, which are reckoned as two yeeres, though indeede his fathers last yeere of two and twenty did run along (how farre is vncertaine) with the second of Asa, whose third yeere was the first of Baasha, so that perhaps this Nadab enioyed not his Kingdom one whole yeere. He did not alter his fathers courses, neither did God alter his sentence. It seemes that hee little feared the iudgements denounced against his fathers house: for as a Prince that was secure of his owne estate, he armed all Israel against the Philistims, and besieged one of their Townes. There (whether it were so, that the people were offended with his ill successe, and recalled to minde their grievous losse of five hundred thousand vnder Ieroboam, counting it an vnluckie family to the Nation; or whether by some particular indiscretion, he exasperated them) slaine he was by Baasha, whom the Army did willingly accept for King in his stead, Baasha was no sooner proclaimed King, than he began to take order with the house of Ieroboam, that none of them might molest him, putting all of them, without mercy, to the sword. That he did this for priuate respects, and not in regard of Gods will to haue it so, it is euident by his continuing in the same forme of Idolatry which Ieroboam had begun. Wherefore he receiued the same sentence from God that had bene laid vpon Ieroboam; which was executed vpon him also in the same sort. He began to infect Asa, by fortifying Ramath; but was diuerted from thence by the Syrian Benhadad, who did waste his Countrey, destroying all the Land of Nephthaim. Four and twenty yeeres he reigned: and then dying, left the Crowne to Ela his sonne; who enioyed it, as Nadab the sonne of Ieroboam had done, two yeeres currant, perhaps not one compleat.

Ela was as much an idolater as his father: and withall a riotous person. Hee sent an Armie against Gibbethon, the same Towne of the Philistims, before which Nadab the son of Ieroboam perished; but he sat at home the whilest, feasting and drinking with his Minions, whereby he gaue such aduantage against himselfe, as was not neglected. Zimri, an ambitious man, remaining with the King at Tirza, finding his Master so dissolute, and his behauiour so contemptible, conceiued hope of the like fortune as Baasha had found, by doing as Baasha had done. Wherefore he did set vpon Ela in his drunkenesse, and slue him. Presently vpon which fact, he stiled himselfe King of Israel: and began his reigne with massacring all the house of Baasha, extending his cruelty not onely to his children, and kinsfolke, but vnto all his friends in Tirza. These newes were quickly blowne to the Campe at Gibbethon, where they were not welcommed according to Zimri his expectation. For the Souldiers instead of proclaiming him King, proclaimed him Traitor: and being led by Omri, whom they saluted King, they (quited the siege of Gibbethon) presented themselves before Tirza; which in short space they may seeme to haue forced. Zimri wanting strength to defend the Citie, not courage to keepe himselfe from falling aliue into his enemies hands, did set fire on the Palace, consuming it and himselfe together to ashes. Scauen dayes he is said to haue reigned: accounting (as is most likely) to the time that Omri was proclaimed in the Campe. For Zimri was also an idolater, walking in the way of Ieroboam; and therefore is likely to haue had more time wherein to declare himselfe, than the reigne of scauen dayes, and those consumed partly in murdering the friends of Baasha, partly in seeking to haue defended his owne life. After the death of Ela, there arose another King to oppose the faction of Omri; whereby it may seeme, that Zimri had made his party strong, as being able to set vp a new head, who doubtlesse would neuer haue appeared, if there had not bene ready to his hand, some strength, not vnlikely to resist and vanquish the Army which maintained Omri. How long this Tibni, the new Competitor of Omri, held out, I doe not finde; onely it appears that his side was decayed, and so he died, leauing no other Successor than his concurrent.

§. VI.

A coniecture of the causes hindering the reuision of Israel with Iuda, which might haue bene effected by these troubles.

Any man that shall consider the state of Israel in those times, may iustly wonder how it came to passe, that either the whole Nation, wearied with the calamities already suffered vnder these vnfortunate Princes, and with the present ciuill warres, did not returne to their ancient Kings, and reunite themselves with the mighty Tribes of Iuda and Beniamin; or that Zimri and Tibni, with their oppressed factions, did not call in Asa, but rather chose the one to endure a desperate necessity of yeelding, or burning himselfe, the other to languish away, a man forsaken: than to haue recourse vnto a remedy, so sure, so ready, and so honourable. To say that God was pleased to haue it so, were a true, but an idle answer (For his secret will is the

the cause of all things) vnlesse it could be proued, that he had forbidden Asa to deale in that businesse, as he forbade Ieroboam to force the rebellious people to obedience. That the restraint laid by God vpon Ieroboam, did onely binde his hands from attempting the suppression of that present insurrection, it appears by the Warre continued betwene Israel and Iuda, so many yeeres following: wherein Asa so farre preuailed, that he won a great battaile, and recovered some Townes belonging to the other Tribes, which he annexed to his owne Dominion. Wherefore we may boldly looke into the second causes, mouing the People and Leaders of the ten Tribes, to suffer any thing vnder new vpstarts, rather than to cast their eyes vpon that Royall house of David, from which the succession of five Kings in lineall descent, had taken away all imputation, that might formerly haue bene laid vpon the meane beginnings thereof. To thinke that Omri had preuented his Competitors, in making peace with Asa, were a coniecture more bold than probable. For Omri was not onely an Idolater, but did worse than all that were before him; which as it might serue alone to proue, that Asa, being a godly King, would not adhere to him, so the course which he professed to take at the very first, of reuenging the massacre committed vpon the family and friends of Baasha, (Asa his mortall enemy) giues manifest reason, why Zimri, who had wrought that great execution, should more iustly than he haue expected the friendship of Iuda in that quarrell. Wherefore, in searching out the reason of this backwardnesse in the ten Tribes (which was such that they may seeme to haue neuer thought vpon the matter) to submit themselves to their true Princes; it were not amiss to examine the causes, mouing the people to reuenge the death of Ela, an idle drunkard, rather than of Nadab the son of Ieroboam, who followed the wars in person, as a man of spirit and courage. Surely it is apparant, that the very first defection of the ten Tribes, was (if we looke vpon humane reason) occasioned by desire of breaking that heauie yoke of bondage wherewith Salomon had galled their neckes. Their desire was to haue a King that should not oppress them; not to haue no King at all. And therefore when the arrogant folly of Ieroboam had caused them to renounce him, they did immediately chosse Ieroboam in his stead, as a man likely to afford that liberty vnto them, for which he had contended in their behalfe. Neither were they (as it seemes) herein altogether deceiued. For his affectation of popularity appears in his building of decayed Townes, and in the institution of his new deuised idolatry; where he told the people, that it was too much for them, to trauaile so farre as to Ierusalem. But whether it were so, that his moderation, being voluntary, began to cease, towards the latter end of his reigne, and in the reigne of his sonne, when long time of possession had confirmed his title, which at the first was onely good by courtesy of the people: or whether the people (as often happens in such cases) were more offended by some prerogatives of a King that he still retained in his owne hands, than pleased with his remission of other burdens: it is cleerely apparant, that the whole armie of all Israel ioyned with Baasha, taking in good part the death of Nadab, and eradication of Ieroboams house.

Now the reigne of Baasha himselfe, was (for ought that remaineth in writing of it) euery way vnfortunate; his labour and cost at Rama was cast away; the other side of his Kingdome harried by the Syrians; neither did he win that one towne of Gibbethon from the Philistims, but left that businesse to his sonne, who likewise appears an vnprofitable sluggard. Wherefore it must needs be, that the fauour of the people toward the house of Baasha grew from his good forme of Ciuill gouernment, which happily he reduced to a more temperate method than Ieroboam euer meant to doe. And surely he that shall take pains to looke into those examples, which are extant of the different courses, held by the Kings of Israel and Iuda, in administration of iustice, will finde it most probable, that vpon this ground it was that the ten Tribes continued so auerfe from the line of David; as to thinke all aduersity more tolerable, than the weightie Scepter of that house. For the death of Ioab and Shimei was indeede by them deserued; yet in that they suffered it without forme of iudgement, they suffered like vnto men innocent. The death of Adonijah was both without iudgement, and without any crime objected, other than the Kings ielousie: out of which by the same rule of arbitrary iustice (vnder which it may be supposed that many were cast away) hee would haue slaine Ieroboam (if hee could haue caught him) before he had yet committed any offence, as appears by his confident returne out of Egypt, like one that was knowne to haue endured wrong, hauing not offered any.

The like and much more barbarous execution, to wit, without law, Iehoram did vpon his brethren, and vpon fundry of his greatest men; as also Iosab did so put to death Zachariah, the sonne of Iehoiada, who had made him King, even in the court of the house of the Lord: and Manasses did shed innocent blood exceeding much, till he replenished Ierusalem from corner to corner: and this was imputed to him as another fault; besides his sinne, wherewith he made Iuda to sinne. Contrariwise, among the kings of Israel we finde no monument of such arbitrary proceeding, vnlesse perhaps the words of Iehoram the sonne of Ahab (which were but words) may be taken for an instance, when he said, God doe so to me, and more also, if the head of Elisba the sonne of Shaphat shall stand on him this day: wherby it is not plaine whether he meant to kill him without more adoe, or to haue him condemned as a false Prophet, that had made them hold out against the Ammonites, till they were faine to eate their owne children; which he thought a sufficient argument to proue, that it was not Gods purpose to deliuer them. The death of Naboth sheweth rather the liberty which the Israelites enioyed, than any peremptory execution of the Kings will. For Naboth did not feare to stand vpon his owne right, though Ahab were euen sicke for anger; neither was he for that cause put to death, as vpon commandement, but made away by conspiracie, the matter being handled after a iudiciall forme, which might giue satisfaction to the people, ignorant of the deuice, though to God it could not.

The murder of the Prophet is continually ascribed to Iezabel, an impudent woman, and not vnto the King her husband. Neither is it certaine, that there was no Law made wherby their liues were taken from them; but certaine it is, that the people, being idolaters, were both pleased with their death, and laboured in the execution. So that the doings of the Kings of Iuda (such as are registred) proue them to vse a more absolute manner of command, than the Kings of the ten Tribes. Neither doe their sufferings witness the contrary. For of those which reigned ouer Iuda, from the diuision of the Kingdome, to the captivity of the ten Tribes, three were slaine by the people, and two were denied a buriall amongst their ancestors. Yea, the death of Ahaziah and his brethren, slaine by Iehu, with the destruction of all the Royall seede of Athalia, did not (for ought that we can read) stirre vp in the people any such thirst of reuenge, as might by the suddenesse and vniformity testifie the affection to be generall, and proceeding from a louing remembrance of their Princes; vnlesse we should thinke that the death of Athalia, after seauen yeeres reigne, were occasioned rather by the memory of her ill purchasing, than by the present sense of her tyrannicall abusing the gouernment, whereon she had seized. On the other side, such of the Kings of Israel as perished by treason (which were seauen of the twenty) were all slaine by conspiracie of the great men, who aspired by treason to the Crowne: the people being so farre from embruuing their hands in the blood of their Soueraignes, that (after Nadab) they did neuer forbear to reuenge the death of their Kings, when it lay in their power; nor approue the good successe of treason, vnlesse feare compelled them. So that the death of two Kings, being thoroughly reuenged vpon other two, namely the death of Ela and Zacharia, vpon Zimri and Shallum, who treasonously got and vsurped, for a little while, their places; onely three of the seauen remaine, whose ends how the people tooke, it may be doubtfull. Though indeede it is precisely said of the slaughter, committed on Ahabs children by Iehu, that the people durst not fight with him that did it, because they were exceedingly afraid: and the same feare might be in them at the death of Peka, whose history (as others of that time) is cursorily passed ouer. The like may be pronounced, and more absolutely, of the Kings of England, that neuer any of them perished by fury of the people, but by treason of such as did succeed them; neither was there any motiue vrging so forcibly the death of King Edward and King Richard when they were in prison, as feare lest the people should stirre in their quarrell. And certainly (howsoever all that the Law calls treason, be interpreted, as tending finally to the Kings destruction) in those treasonable insurrections of the vulgar, which haue here most preuailed, the furie of the multitude hath quenched it selfe with the blood of some great Officers; no such rebellions, howsoever wicked and barbarous otherwise, thirsting after the ruine of their naturall Soueraigne; but rather forbearing the aduantages gotten vpon his Royall person: which if any man impute vnto grosse ignorance, another may more charitably, and I thinke, more truly, ascribe to a reuerent affection. Wherefore that fable of Briar, who, who, being loosened by Pallas, did with his hundred hands giue assistance to Iupiter, when all the rest of the gods conspired against him, is very fitly expounded by Sir Francis Bacon, as signifying, that Monarches need not to feare any courbing of their absolutenes by mightie subiects, as long as by wisdom they keepe the hearts of the people, who will be fure to come in on their side. Though indeede the Storie might very well haue borne the same interpretation, as it is rehearsed by Homer, who tells vs that Pallas was one of the conspiracie, and that Thetis alone did marre all their practice, by loosening Briareus. For a good forme of gouernment sufficeth by it selfe to retaine the people, onely without assistance of a laborious Wit, but euen against all deuices of the greatest and shrewdest politicians: euery Sherife and Constable, being sooner able to arme the multitude, in the Kings behalfe, than any ouer-weening Rebell how mightie soeuer, can against him.

This declaration of the peoples loue, being seldome found in Iuda, makes it very likely, that the rule it selfe of gouernment there was such, as neither gaue occasion of contentment vnto the subiects, nor of confidence in their good affection to the Kings. Vpon which reasons it may seeme that the multitude was kept vsually disarmed. For otherwise it would haue beene almost impossible, that Athalia the sister of Ahab, a stranger to the royall blood of Iuda, should by the onely authoritie of a Queene mother haue destroyed all the seede of Dauid, and vsurped the Kingdome very neere 7. yeeres, without finding any resistance. Yea when Iehoiada the high Priest had agreed with the Captains and principall men of the Land to set vp Iosab their lawfull King, whereunto the whole nation were generally well affected; hee was faine to giue to these Captaines and their men, the speares and the shields that were King Dauids, and were in the house of the Lord. But we need not enter into such particulars. Questionlesse, the Tribes which thought obedience to their Princes to be a part of their dutie toward God, would endure much more with patience, than they which had Kings of their owne choice or admission, holding the Crowne by a more vncertaine tenure.

And this, in my opinion, was the reason, why the ten Tribes did neuer seek to returne to their ancient Lords: but after the destruction of their fixe first Kings, which died in the reigne of Asa, admitted a seuenth of a new familie, rather than they would confubiect themselves, with those of Iuda and Beniamin, vnder a more honourable, but more heauie yoke.

So Asa hauing seene the death of 7. kings of Israel, died himselfe after one and fortie yeeres reigne, leauing Iehosaphat his sonne to deale with Ahab the sonne of Omri, who was the eight King ouer the tenne Tribes.

§. VII.

Of Iehosaphat and his contemporaries.

Iehosaphat, who succeeded Asa, was a Prince religious and happie; he destroyed all the Groues, Altars, and high places dedicated to idolatrie, and sent teachers to all places and people wanting instruction; he recovered the tribute due vnto him by the Arabians and Philistims: from the one hee had siluer, from the other sheepe and goates to the number of fiftene thousand and foure hundred. The numbers of men of warre were more then admirable: for it is written that Adnah had the command of three hundred thousand, Iehohanan of two hundred and fourescore thousand, and Amasia of two hundred thousand; also that hee had, besides these, in Beniamin of those that bare shields, which wee call Targetiers, and of Archers vnder Eliada, two hundred thousand, and vnder the commandement of Iehozabad a hundred and fourescore thousand: so which numbred together, make eleuen hundred and fixtie thousand, all which are said to haue waited vpon the King, besides his garrisons.

That Iuda and Beniamin, a territorie not much exceeding the Countie of Kent, should muster eleuen hundred and fixtie thousand fighting men, is very strange, and the number farre greater than it was found vpon any other view. Iosab in Dauids time found five hundred thousand: Rehoboam found but an hundred and fourescore thousand: Abia foure hundred and eight thousand: Asa five hundred and fourescore thousand: Amaziah inrolled all that could beare armes, and they amounted to three hundred thousand. Surely, whereas it is written that when newes was brought to Iehosaphat that Mosh & Ammon were were entred his territorie to the West of Jordan, and that their numbers were many, hee feared (to wit) the multitude, it is not likely that he would have feared even the armie of Xerxes, if hee could have brought into the field 11. hundred and 60. thousand fighting men, leaving all his strong Cities manned. I am therefore of opinion (referring myselfe to better iudgement) that these numbers specified in the second of Chronicles the 17. distributed to severall Leaders, were not all at one time, but that the 300. thousand vnder Adnah, and the 200. and foure-score thousand vnder Iehobanani, were afterward commanded and mustered by Amasiah, Eliada, and Iehosaphat: for the grosse and totall is not in that place set downe, as it was vnder the other Kings formerly named. Again, as the aydes which Iehosaphat brought to Ahab did not shew that hee was a Prince of extraordinarie power, so the Moabites and Ammonites which hee feared, could neuer make the one halfe of those numbers, which he that commanded least among Iehosaphats Leaders had vnder him.

This mightie Prince notwithstanding his greatnesse, yet he ioynd in friendship with Ahab King of Israel, who had married that wicked woman Jezebel. Him Iosaphat visited at Samaria, and caused his sonne Ioram to marry Athalia, this Achabs daughter.

Ahab perswaded Iosaphat to assist him in the Warre against the Syrians, who held the Citie of Ramoth Gilead from him, and called together foure hundred of his Prophets, or Baalites to foretell the successe: who promised him victorie. But Iehosaphat beleueed nothing at all in those diuines, but resolved first of all to conferre with some one Prophet of the Lord God of Israel. Heereupon Ahab made answere that he had one called Mitchaiab, but he hated that Prophet, because hee alwaies foretold of euill, and neuer of any good towards him: Yet Mitchaiab was sent for to the King, but by the way the messenger prayed him to consent with the rest of the Prophets: and to promise victory vnto them as they did. But Mitchaiab spake the truth, and repeated his vision to both the Kings, which was, that God asked who shall perswade Ahab, that hee may goe up and fall at Ramoth Gilead? to whom a spirit that stood before the Lord answered, that hee would enter into his Prophets, and be in them a false spirit to delude. For as it is said by Christ: Non enim vos estis qui loquimini, sed spiritus patris vestri loquitur in vobis: It is not you that speake, but the Spirit of your Father speakes in you: so in a contrary kinde did the deuill in the Prophets of Baal, or Satan, incourage Ahab to his destruction. And as P. Martyr vpon this place well obserueth, these euill spirits are ministers of Gods vengeance, and are vsed as the hangmen and tormentors, which Princes sometime employ. For as it pleaseth God by his good Angels, to saue and deliuer from destruction, of which the Scriptures haue many examples: so on the contrarie, it is by the euill that hee punisheth and destroyeth, both which are said to performe the will of their Creator, licet non eodem animo. Ecclesiasticus remembreth a second sort of malignant natures, but they are euerie-where visible. There are spirits, saith he, created for vengeance, which in their rigour lay on sure strokes. In the time of destruction they shew forth their power, and accomplish the wrath of him that made them.

Now Mitchaias hauing by this his reuelation greatly displeased the King, and the Prophets whose spirit he discouered, was strooken by Zidkiah one of Baals Prophets, and by Ahab himselfe committed to prison: where he appointed him to be refused and fedde with bread of affliction till he returned in peace. But Mitchaiab, not fearing to reply, answered, If thou returne in peace, the Lord hath not spoken by mee. Neuertheless Ahab went on in that warre, and was wounded to death. Iehosaphat returned to Ierusalem, where he was reprehended by Iehu the Prophet for assisting an idolatrous Prince, and one that hated God.

After this the Aramites or Damascens, ioynd with the Moabites, Ammonites and Idumeans to invade Iudaea: who passe Jordan and encampe at Engaddi, and when Iehosaphat gathered his armie, the Prophet Iahaziel foretold him of the victorie, which should be obtained without any blood-shed of his part: and so when Iehosaphat approached, this assembly of Nations, the Ammonites and Moabites, disagreeing with the Idumeans, and quarrelling for some causes among themselves, those of Ammon and Moab set vpon the Idumeans, and brake them vterly: which done, they also inuaded each other; in which broile Iehosaphat arriuing tooke the spoyle of them all without any losse of his part, as it was foretold and promised by God. Notwithstanding this victorie, Iehosaphat arriuing, tooke the spoyle of them all, without any losse of his part, as it was foretold and promised mified by God. Notwithstanding this victory, Iehosaphat forgetting that he was formerly reprehended for assisting an Idolatrous King, did notwithstanding ioyne with Ochazias, the sonne of Ahab, in preparing a Fleet to send to Ophir, hoping of the like return which Salomon had: but as Eliezer the Prophet foretold him, his ships perished, and were broken in the port of Ezion Guber, and so that enterprize was ouerthrowne.

2. Chron. 20.

Yet hee taketh part with Iehoram the brother of Ochazias, against the Moabites, with which Kings of Juda and Israel the Edomites ioyne their forces, notwithstanding, it seemes, that the Moabites assisted by the Ammonites, had not long before destroyed their armie.

The Moabites, subiects to Dauid & Salomon, forsaking the Kings of Juda, gaue themselves for vassals to Ieroboam, and so they continued to his successors till the death of Achab: but Iehosaphat, notwithstanding the Idolatry of his Colleague, yet as it seemeth, he was drawne into this warre both to be auenged of the Moabites for their defection from Juda to Israel, as also because they had lately ioynd themselves with the Syrians against Iosaphat, & thirdly, to punish their double rebellion who first forsooke Juda & now Israel.

Both Kings resolved to passe by the way of Idumea, thereby the better to assure that Nation, for we finde that both Moab, Ammon and Edom were all in the field together at Engaddi against Iehosaphat: But whether they had then declared themselves against Iehosaphat, it is not certaine, for in the 2. of Chronicles. 11. vers. 8. it is written that in the time of Iehoram, the sonne of Iehosaphat, Edom rebelled, and therefore it seemeth to mee that the Edomites, when they were slaine by Moab and Ammon, not finding themselves satisfied in such conditions as they required, offered to turne from them, and to ioyne themselves with the armie of Juda. For that they were numbred among the enemies of Iosaphat, it is plaine in the 2. of Chron. the 20. and as plaine c. 2. v. 8. that they were not declared, nor had made them a King, till Iehosaphats death. Now in the passage of these Kings towards Moab, whether it were by the extraordinary heat of the yere, or whether the Idumeans hauing a purpose to rebell, missed the armie of Juda and Israel, with intent to infeeble them for want of water; true it is, that they suffered the same, if not a greater thirst than the armies of Crassus and M. Antonius did in their Parthian expeditions; and had, in all likelihood vterly perished, had not Elisha taught them to cut trenches where-into the water sprang, by which not onely Iehosaphat and his armie, but Iehoram King of Israel an Idolator was relieved: the great mercy and goodnesse of God hauing euer bin prone to saue the euill for the good, whereas he neuer destroyed the good for the euill.

The miserable issue of this warre, and how Moab burnt his sonne, or the sonne of the King of Edom, for sacrifice on the rampire of his owne Citie, I haue already written in the life of Iehoram among the Kings of Israel. Iehosaphat reigned 25. yeeres and died, he was buried in the valley of Iehosaphat, and a part of the Pyramis set ouer his graue is yet to be seene, saith Brochard. His acts are written at large by Iehu the sonne of Hanani.

CHAP. XX.

Of Iehoram the sonne of Iehosaphat and Ahazia.

§. I.

That Iehoram was made King sundry times.

Iehoram the sonne of Iehosaphat King of Juda began to raigne at thirtie two yeeres of age, and liued vntill he was fortie yeeres old, being eight yeeres a King: but of these eight yeeres, which Iehoram is said to haue reigned, four are to be reckoned in the life of his father, who going to the Syrian warre with Ahab, left this Iehoram King in his stead, as Ahab did his sonne Ahazia. This appears by the severall beginnings, which are giuen in Scripture to the two Iehoram Kings of Israel and Iuda, and to Ahazia the eldest sonne of Ahab. For Ahazia is said saide to haue begun his reigne, in the seuenteenth yeere of Iehosaphat. Iehoram the brother of Ahaziah succeeded him in the second yeere of Iehoram the sonne of Iehosaphat King of Iuda, that is, in the next yeere after that Iehoram of Iuda was designed King by his father; it being (as we finde elsewhere) the eighteenth yeere of Iehosaphat himselfe, who went with the Israelite against Moab. Heereby it appeares that the full power and execution of the royall office was retained still by Iehosaphat, who gouerned absolutely by himselfe, not communicating the rule with his sonne. But in the fift yeere of Iehoram King of Israel, which was the two and twentieth of Iehosaphat, the olde King tooke vnto him, as partner in the Gouernment, this his eldest sonne, who was at that time 32. yeeres old, his Father being 57. Now forasmuch as Iehosaphat reigned 25. yeeres, it is euident that his sonne did not reigne alone till the eight of Ioram King of Israel. The like regard is to bee had in accounting the times of other Kings of Iuda & Israel, who did not alwaies reigne precisely so long as the bare letter of the text may seeme at first to affirme: but their yeeres were sometimes compleat, sometimes onely current, sometimes confounded with the yeeres of their successors or foregoers, and must therefore be found by comparing their times with the yeeres of those others, with whom they did begin and end.

2. King. 22. v. 51

It were perhaps a thing lesse needfull than curious, to enquire into the reasons mouing Iehosaphat either to asume vnto him his sonne as partner in the Kingdome, whilst hee was able himselfe to command both in peace and in warre, the like hauing neuer bene done by any of his progenitors, or hauing once (in the 17. of his reigne) vouchsafed vnto him that honour, to resume it vnto himselfe, or at leastwise to deferre the confirmation of it, vntill foure or fife yeeres were passed. Yet forasmuch as to enter into the examination of these passages, may be a meane to find some light, whereby we may more clearely discover the causes of much extraordinary businesse ensuing, I hold it not amisse to make such coniecture, as the circumstances of the Story briefly handled in the Scriptures may seeme to approue.

We are therefore to consider, that this King Iehosaphat was the first of Rehoboams issue that euer entred into any streight league with the Kings of the ten Tribes. All that reigned in Iuda before him, had with much labour and long warre, tired themselves in vaine, making small profit of the greatest aduantages that could be wished. Wherefore Iehosaphat thought it the wisest way, to make a league offensive and defensive betweene Israel and Iuda, whereby each might enioy their owne in quiet.

This confederacie made by a religious King, with one that did hate the Lord, could not long prosper, as not issuing from the true roote and fountaine of all wisdom: yet as a piece of sound policie, doubtlesse it wanted not faire pretences of much common good thereby likely to arise, with mutuall fortification of both those kingdomes, against the vncircumcised nations their ancient enemies. This apparant benefit, being so inestimable a iewel, that it might not easily be lost, but continue as hereditarie from father to sonne, it was thought a very good course to haue it confirmed by some sure bond of affinitie, and thereupon was Athalia the daughter of Omri, and sister of Ahab King of Israel, giuen in marriage to Iehoram, who was sonne and heire apparent to the King of Iuda. This Lady was of a masculine spirit, and had learned so much of Queene Iezabel her brothers wife, that she durst vndertake, and could thoroughly performe a great deale more in Ierusalem, than the other knew how to compass in Samaria. Shee was indeed a fire-brand, ordained by God to consume a great part of the noblest houses in Iuda, and perhaps of those men or their children, whose worldly wisdom, regardless of Gods pleasure, had brought her in.

The first fruits of this great league, was the Syrian warre at Ramoth Gilead, wherein Iuda and Israel did aduenture equally, but the profit of the victorie should haue redounded wholly to Ahab: as godly Princes very seldome thriue by marching with Idolators, but so rather serue the turnes of those false friends, who being ill affected to God himselfe, cannot be well affected to his seruants. Before their setting forth Ahab designed, as King, his sonne Ahaziah; not so much perhaps in regard of the vncertaine euents of warre (for none of his predecessors had euer done the like vpon the like occasions) nor as fearing the threatnings of the Prophet Micaiah (for hee despised them) as inuiting Iehosaphat by his owne example, to take the same course, wherein hee preuailed.

§. II. Pro-

§. II.

Probable coniectures of the motives inducing the old King Iehosaphat to change his purpose of ten, in making his sonne Iehoram King.

Any arguments doe very strongly proue Iehoram to haue been wholly ouer-ruled by his wife; especially for his forsaking the religion of his godly Ancestors, and following the abominable superstitions of the house of Ahab.

That she was a woman of intollerable pride, and abhorring to liue a priuate life, the whole course of her actions witneseth at large. Much vaine matter she was able to produce, whereby to make her husband thinke that his brethren and kindred were but meane and vnworthy persons in comparisn of him, and of his children, which were begotten vpon the daughter and sister of two great Kings, not vpon base women & meere subiects. The Court of Ahab, and his famous victories obtained against the Syrian Benhadad, were matter sufficient to make an insolent man thinke highly of himselfe, as being allied so honourably; who could otherwise haue found in his heart well enough, to despise all his brethren, as being the eldest, and heire apparant to the Crowne, whereof alreadie he had, in a manner, the possession.

How soone his vices brake out, or how long he dissembled them and his idolatrous religion, it cannot certainly be knowne. Like enough it is, that some smoke, out of the hidden fire, did very soone make his fathers eyes to water; who thereupon caused the young man to know himselfe better, by making him fall backe into ranke among his younger brethren. And surely the doings of Iehosaphat about the same time, argue no small distemper of the whole country, through the misgouernment of his vngodly son. For the good King was faine to make his progresse round about the Land, reclaiming the people vnto the seruice of God, and appointing Iudges throughout all the strong Cities of Iuda City by City. This had bene a needlesse labour, if the religion taught and strongly maintained by Asa, and by himselfe, had not suffered alteration, and the course of Iustice bene peruerter, by the power of such as had borne authoritie. But the necessitie that then was of reformation, appeares by the charge which the King did giue to the Iudges; and by his commission giuen to one of the Priests in spirituall causes, and to the steward of his house in temporall matters, to be generall ouerseers.

This was not till after the death of Ahaziah the sonne of Ahab; but how long after it is vncertaine. For Iehoram the brother of Ahaziah began his reigne (as hath bene alreadie noted) in the eighteenth of Iehosaphat, which was then accounted the second of Iehoram, Iehosaphats sonne, though afterward this Iehoram of Iuda had another first and second yeere, euen in his fathers time, before hee reigned alone, as the best Chronologers and expositors of the holy text agree. So hee continued in priuate estate, vntill the two and twentieth of his fathers reigne, at which time, though the occasions inducing his restitution to former dignitie are not set downe, yet we may not thinke, that motives thereto, appearing substantiall, were wanting. Iehoram of Israel held the same correspondencie with Iehosaphat that his father had done, and made vse of it. He drew the Iudaean into the warre of Moab, at which time it might well be, that the young Prince of Iuda was againe ordained King by his father, as in the Syrian expedition he had bene. Or if wee ought rather to thinke, that the preparations for the enterprize against Moab did not occupie so much time, as from the eighteenth of Iehosaphat, in which yeere that Nation rebelled against Israel, vnto his two and twentieth; yet the daily negotiations betweene the two Kings of Iuda and Israel, and the affinitie betweene them contracted in the person of Iehoram, might offer some good occasions thereunto. Neither is it certaine how the behaviour of the younger sonnes, in their elder brothers disgrace, might cause their Father to put him in possession for feare of tumult after his death; or the deepe dissimulation of Iehoram himselfe might winne the good opinion both of his Father and Brethren: it being a thing visuall in mischieuous fell natures, to be as abiect and seruile in time of aduersitie, as insolent and bloody vpon aduantage. This is manifest, that being repossessed of his former estate, he demeaned himselfe in such wise toward his brethren, as caused their Father to enable them, not onely with store of silver and gold, and of precious things, (which kind of liberallitie other Kings doubtlesse had vsed vnto their younger sons) but with the custodie of strong Cities in Iuda, to assure them, if it might haue bene, by vnwonted meanes, against vnwonted perils.

§. III. The

§. III.

The doings of Iehoram when he reigned alone; and the rebellion of Edom and Libna.

BVt all this providence availed nothing; for an higher providence had otherwise determined of the sequele. When once the good old man, their Father, was dead, the yonger sonnes of Iehosaphat found strong Cities, a weake defence, against the power of him vnto whom the Citizens were obedient. If they came in vpon the summons of a King their brother, then had he them without any more ado; if they stood vpon their guard, then were they Traitors, and so vnable to hold out against him, who besides his owne power, was able to bring the forces of the Israelitish Kingdome against them; so that the apparent likelihood of their finall ouerthrow, sufficed to make all forsake them in the very beginning. Howsoeuer it was, they were all taken and flaine, and with them for company many great men of the Land; such belike, as eyther had taken their part, when the Tyrant fought their liues, or had bene appointed Rulers of the Countrie, when Iehoram was deposed from his Government; in which Office they, without forbearing to doe iustice, could hardly auoyd the doing of many things, derogatorie to their yong Master; which if he would now call treason, saying that hee was then King, who durst say the contrary?

After this Iehoram tooke vpon him, as being now Lord alone, to make innouations in Religion: wherein he was not contented as other Idolatrous Princes, to giue way and safe conduct vnto Superstition and Idolatry, nor to prouoke and encourage the people to that sinne, whereto it is wonderfull that they were so much addicted, hauing such knowledge of God, and of his detesting that about all other finnes; but hee vsed compulsion, and was (if not the very first) the first that is registred, to haue set vp Irreligion by force.

Whilest he was thus busied at home, in doing what he listed, the Edomites his Tributaries rebelled against him abroad; and hauing hitherto, since Dauids time, bene gouerned by a Viceroy, did now make vnto themselves a King. Against these Iehoram in person made an expedition, taking along with him his Princes, and all his Chariots, with which he obtained victory in the field, compelling the rebels to flie into their places of aduantage, whereof he forced no one, but went away contented with the honour that he had gotten in beating and killing some of those whom hee should haue subdued, and kept his seruants. Now began the propheticie of Isaac to take effect, wherein he foretold, that Esau in proceesse of time should breake the yoke of Jacob. For after this the Edomites could neuer be reclaimed by any of the Kings of Juda, but held their owne so well, that when, after many ciuill and forraine warres, the Iewes by sundry Nations had bene brought low; Antipater the Edomite, with Herod his Son, and others of that race following them, became Lords of the Iewes, in the decrepit age of Israel, and reigned as Kings, euen in Ierusalem it selfe.

The freedome of the Edomites, though purchased somewhat dearely, encouraged Libna, a great Citie within Juda, which in the time of Iosua had a peculiar King, to rebell against Iehoram, and set it selfe at libertie. Libna stood in the confines of Beniamin and of Dan, farre from the assistance of any bordering enemies to Juda, and therefore so vnlike it was to haue maintained it selfe in libertie, that it may seeme strange how it could escape from vtter destruction, or at the least from some terrible vengeance, most likely to haue bene taken, by their powerfull, cruell, and thoroughly incensed Lord. The Israelites held such good intelligence at that time with Juda, that hee would not haue accepted the Towne, had it offered it selfe vnto him: neither doe wee reade that it fought how to cast it selfe into a new subiection, but continued a free estate. The rebellion of it against Iehoram, was, because he had forsaken the Lord God of his Fathers; which I take to haue not onely bene the first and remote cause, but euen the next and immediate reason, mouing the inhabitants to doe as they did: for it was a Towne of the Leuites: who must needs be driuen into great extremities, when a religion contrarie to Gods Law, had not onely some allowance to countenance it by the King, but compulsion authoritic to force vnto it all that were vnwilling. As for the vse of the Temple at Ierusalem (which, being deuout men, they might feare to lose by this rebellion) it was neuer denied to those of the ten reuoked Tribes by any of the Religious Kings, who rather inuited the Israelites thither, and gaue them kinde entertainment: vnder Idolaters they must haue bene without it, whether they liued free or in subiection. Yet it seemes that priuate reasons were not wanting, which might moue them rather to doe than suffer that which was vnwarrantable. For in the generall visitation before remembred, wherein Iehosaphat reformed his Kingdome, the good olde King appointing new Gouernours, and giuing them especiall charge to doe iustice without respect of persons, vsed these words, The Leuites shall be Officers before you; Be of good courage, and doe it, and the Lord shall be with the good. By these phrases, it seemes, that he encouraged them against the more powerfull, than iust proceedings of his son; whom if the Leuites did (according to the trust reposed in them) neglect in discharging their duties, likely it is that he meant to be euen with them; and make them now to feele, as many Princes of the Land had done, his heauy indignation. How it happened that Libna was not heereupon destroyed, yea, that it was not (for ought that we can read) so much as besieged or molested, may iustly seeme very strange. And the more strange it is in regard of the mighty Armies which Iehosaphat was able to raise, being sufficient to haue ouerwhelmed any one Towne; and buried it vnder the earth, which they might well in one month haue cast into it with shouels, by ordinary approaches.

But it seemes that of those great numbers which his Father could haue leuiued; there were not many whom Iehoram could well trust; and therefore perhaps hee thought it an easier losse, to let one Towne goe, than to put weapons into their hands, who were more likely to follow the example of Libna, than to punish it. So desperate is the condition of Tyrants, who thinking it a greater happinesse to be feared, than to be loued; are faine themselves to stand in feare of those, by whom they might haue bene dreadfull vnto others.

§. IIII.

Of the miseries falling vpon Iehoram, and of his death.

Here afflictions not sufficing to make any impression of Gods displeasure in the minde of the wicked Prince; a Prophecie in writing was deliuered vnto him, which threatened both his people, his children, his wiues, and his owne bodie. Hereby likewise it appears that he was a cruell Persecutor of Gods seruants; in as much as the Prophets durst not reprove him to his face, as they had done many of his predecessors, both good and euill Kings; but were faine to denounce Gods iudgements against him by letters, keeping themselves close and farre from him. This Epistle is saide to haue bene sent vnto him from Elias the Prophet. But Elias was translated, and Elizeus prophesied in his stead before this time, euen in the dayes of Iehosaphat. Wherefore it may bee that Elias left this propheticie in writing behinde him, or that (as some conjecture) the error of one letter in writing, was the occasion that wee reade Elias for Elizeus. Indeed anything may rather be beleueed than the Tradition held by some of the Iewish Rabbins, that Elias from heauen did send this Epistle; a tale somewhat like to the fable of our Ladies letters, deuised by Erasmus, or of the Verse that was sent from heauen to S. Giles.

But whosoever was the Author of this threatening Epistle, the accomplishment of the propheticie was as terrible, as the sentence. For the Philistims and Arabians brake into Juda, and tooke the Kings house, wherein they found all, or many of his children, and wiues; all which they slew, or carried away, with great part of his goods. These Philistims had not presumed since the time of Dauid, to make any offensive warre till now; for they were by him almost consumed, and had lost the best of their Townes, maintaining themselves in the rest of their small Territories, by defensue armes, to which they were constrained at Gibbethon by the Israelites. The Arabians were likely to haue bene then as they are now, a naked people, all horsemen, and ill appointed; their Countrie affording no other furniture, than such as might make them fitter to rob and spoile in the open fields, than to offend strong Cities such as were thicke set in Juda. True it is that in ages long after following, they conquered all the South parts of the world then knowne, in a very short space of time, destroying some, and building other some very strong Cities. But it must be considered; that this was when they had learned of the Romanes the Art of Warre; and that the Prouisions which they found, together with the Arts which they learned, in one subdued Prouince, did make them able and skillfull in pursuing their conquest, and going on into Regions farre remooued from them. At this day hauing lost in effect all that they had gotten, such of them as liue in Arabia it selfe are good horsemen, but ill appointed; very dangerous passengers; but vnable to deale with good Souldiers, as riding starke naked, and rather trusting in the swiftnesse of their horses, than in any other meanes of resistance, where they are well opposed. And such, or litle better, may they seeme to haue beene, that spoyled Judaa in the time of Iehoram. For their Countrie was alwaies barren and desert, wanting manuell Arts whereby to supply the naturalls with furniture: neither are these bands named as chiefe in that action, but rather adherents of the Philistims. Out of this we may inferre, that one halfe, yea or one quarter of the numbers found in the least muster of Juda and Beniamin vnder Iehosaphat (wherein were inrolled three hundred and eightrie thousand fighting men) had been enough to haue driuen away far greater forces than these enemies are likely to haue brought into the field, had not the people beene vnable to deale with them, for lacke of weapons, which were now kept from them by their Princes ieaousie, as in Sauls time by the policie of the Philistims.

It may seeme that the house of the King which these inuaders tooke, was not his Palace in Ierusalem, but rather some other house of his abroad in the Countrie, where his wiues and children at that time lay for their recreation: because we read not that they did sacke the Citie, or spoyle the Temple, which would haue inuited them as a more commodious bootie, had they got possession thereof. Yet perhaps they tooke Ierusalem it selfe by surprize, the people being disarmed, and the Kings guards too weak to keepe them out; yet had not the courage to hold it, because it was so large and populous; and therefore hauing done what spoyle they could, with-drew themselves with such purchase as they were able safely to conueigh away.

The slaughter committed by Iehu on the two and fortie brethren of Ahazias, or (as they are called elsewhere) so many of his brothers sonnes, and the cruell massacre where in all the Royall seede perished (onely Ioas excepted) vnder the tyrannie of Athalia, following within two yeeres after this inuasion of the Philistims, and Arabians, make it seeme probable, that the sonnes of Iehoram were not all slaine at once, but that rather the first murder beganne in his owne time, and was seconded by many other heauie blowes, wherewith his house was incessantly stricken, vntill it was in a manner quite hewed downe.

After these calamities, the hand of God was extended against the bodie of this wicked King, smiting him with a grieuous disease in his bowels, which left him not vntill his guts fell out, and his wretched soule departed from his miserable carcasse. The people of the Land, as they had small cause of comfort in his life, so had they not the good manners to pretend sorrow for his death; wherefore hee was denied a place of buriall among his Ancestors the Kings of Juda, though his owne sonne succeeded him in the Kingdome, who was guided by the same spirits that had beene his Fathers euill Angels. Athalia had other matters to trouble her head, than the pompous entrecing of a dead husband. Shee was thinking how to prouide for the future, to maintaine her owne greatnesse, to retaine her fauourites in their authoritie, and to place about her Sonne such Counsellours of the house of Ahab, as were fittest for her turne. Wherefore shee thought it vnreasonable to make much a-doe about a thing of nothing, and offend the peoples eyes, with a stately funerall of a man by them detested: but rather chose to let the blame of things passed be layd vpon the dead, than to procure an ill opinion of her selfe and hers, which it now did concerne her to auoid. Such is the qualitie of wicked Instigators, hauing made greedie vse of bad employments, to charge, not only so with his owne vices, but with their faults also, the man whose euill inclinations their sinister counsailes haue made worse, when once he is gone, and can profit them no longer. The death of Iehoram fel out indeed in a buisie time; when his friend and cousin the Israelite, who had the same name, was entangled in a difficult warre against the Aramites; and therefore could haue had no better leysure to help Athalia, in setting of things according to her owne minde, than hee had (perhaps through the same hinderance) to helpe her husband, when hee was distressed by the Philistims. Yea rather hee needed and craved the assistance of the men of Juda, for the taking in of Ramoth Gilead, where they had not not sped so well the last time, that they should willingly runne thither againe, vnlesse they were very fairly intreated.

The acts of this wicked man I haue thought good to handle the more particularly (pursuing the examination of all occurrences, as farre as the circumstances remembred in holy Scripture, would guide mee by their directions) to the end that it might more plainly appeare, how the corrupted affections of men, impugning the reuealed will of God, accomplish neuertheless his hidden purpose, and without miraculous meanes, confound themselves in the seeming-wise deuices of their owne folly: as likewise to the end that all men might learne, to submit their iudgements to the ordinance of God, rather than to thinke, that they may safely dispense with his commandements, and follow the prudent conceits which worldly wisdom distateth vnto them. For in such kinde of vnhappy subtilties, it is manifest that Athalia was able to furnish both her Husband and her Sonne; but the issue of them partly hath appeared already, and partly will appeare, in that which immediately followeth.

§. V.

Of the reigne of Ahazias, and his businesse with the King of Israel.

20 Ahazias, or Ahazias, the sonne of Iehoram and Athalia, beganne his reigne ouer Juda in the twelfth yeere of Iehoram the sonne of Ahab King of Israel, and reigned but one yeere. Touching his age, it is a point of much more difficultie than importance to know it; yet hath it bredde much disputation, whereof I see no more probable conclusion, than that of Torniellus, alleaging the Edition of the Sepuagint at Rome, Anno Domini 1588. which saith that hee was twentie yeeres olde in the beginning of his Kingdome; and the Annotations thereupon, which cite other Copies, that doe giue him two yeeres more. Like enough he is to haue beene young: for hee was gouerned by his Mother, and her Ministers, who gaue him counsaile by which hee perished. In matter of Religion hee altered none of his Fathers courses. In matter of state, hee likewise vp-held the league made with the house of Ahab. He was much busied in doing litle, and that with ill successe. He accompanied his Cousin the Israelite against Ramoth Gilead, which they wan, but not without blowes: for the Aramites fought so well, that the King of Israel was faine to aduenture his owne person, which escaped not vnwounded.

The Towne being won was manned strongly, in expectation of some attempt likely to be made by Hazael king of Aram: which done, Iehoram King of Israel with-drew himselfe to the Citie of Izreel, where with more quiet he might attend the curing of his wounds; and Ahazias returned to Ierusalem. It seemes that he was but newly come home (for he reigned in all scanty one yeere, whereof the former expedition, with the preparations for it, had taken vp a great part,) when he did make a new iourney, as it were for good manners sake, to visit the King of Israel, who lay sore of his wounds. Belike Athalia was brewing some new plots, which his presence would haue hindered, and therefore sought euery occasion to thrust him abroad: for otherwise it was but a vaine picce of worke so to leaue his kingdome, hauing no other businesse than by way of complement to goe see one whom he had seene yesterday. Certaine it is that the Lord had resolued at this time to put in execution that heauie iudgement, which he had laid by the mouth of Elias the Prophet vpon the house of Ahab. And hereunto at this time had he disposed not onely the concurrence of all other things, which in mans eyes might seeme to haue beene accidentall; but the very thoughts and affections of such persons, as intended nothing lesse than the fulfilling of his high pleasure. Of these Athalia doubtlesse was one; whose mischieuous purposes it will shortly be needefull for explanation of some difficulties arising, that we diligently consider and examine.

§. VI.

How Ahazia perished with the house of Ahab: and how that Familie was destroyed by Iehu.

HHe whole Armie of Israel, with all the principall Captaines lying in Ramoth Gilead, a Disciple of Elizeus the Prophet came in among the Captaines that were sitting together; who calling out among them Iehu, a principall man, took him apart, and anointed him King ouer Israel, rehearsing vnto him the Prophecies of Elias against the house of Ahab, and letting him vnderstand that it was the pleasure of God to make him executioner of that sentence. The fashion of the Messenger was such as bredde in the Captaines a desire to know the errand, which Iehu thought meet to let them know, as doubting whether they had ouer-heard all the talke or no. When hee had acquainted them with the whole matter, they made no delay, but forth-with proclaimed him King. For the Prophecies of Elias was well knowne among them, neither durst any one oppose himselfe against him, that was by God ordained to performe it.

Iehu, who had vpon the sudden this great honour throwne vpon him, was not slow to put himselfe in possession of it, but vsed the first heat of their affections who ioyned with him, in setting on foot the businesse which neerely concerned him, and was not to be fore-slowed, being no more his owne than Gods.

The first care taken was that no newes of the reuolt might be carried th Israel, whereby the King might haue had warning either to fight or flee: this being foreseene, he marched swiftly away, to take the Court while it was yet secure. King Iehoram was now so well recouered of his wounds, that he could endure to ride abroad, for which cause it seemed that there was much feasting, and ioy made, especially by Queene Iezabel, who kept her state so well, that the brethren of Ahazia comming thither at this time, did make it as well their errand to salute the Queene, as to visit the King.

Certaine it is, that since the rebellion of Moab against Israel, the house of Ahab did neuer so much flourish as at this time. Seuentie Princes of the bloud Royall there were<sup>30</sup> that liued in Samaris: Iehoram the sonne of Queene Iezabel had wonne Ramoth Gilead, which his Father had attempted in vaine, with losse of his life; and hee wonne it by valiant fight, wherein he receiued wounds, of which the danger was now past, but the honour likely to continue. The amitie was so great between Israel and Juda, that it might suffice to daunt all their common enemies, leauing no hope of successe, to any rebellious enterprizer: so that now the prophecies of Elias, might be forgotten, or no otherwise remembered, than as an vnlikely tale by them that beheld the maiestical face of the Court, wherein so great a friend as the King of Juda was entertained, and fortie Princes of his bloud expected.

In the midst of this securitie, whilst these great Estates were (perhaps) either consulting about prosecution of their intents, first against the Aramites, and then against Moab, Edom, and other rebells & enemies: or else were triumphing in ioy of that which was already archieued, and the Queene Mother dressing her selfe in the brauest manner to come downe amongst them; tidings were brought in, that the watchman had from a Tower discovered a company comming. These newes were not very troublesome: for the Armie that lay in Ramoth Gilead, to be readie against all attempts of the Aramites, was likely enough to be discharged vpon some notice taken that the enemy would not, or could not stirre. Onely the King sent out an Horse-man to know what the matter was, and to bring him word. The messenger comming to Iehu, and asking whether all were well, was retained by him, who intended to giue the King as little warning as<sup>40</sup> might bee. The seeming negligence of this fellow in not returning with an answer, might argue the matter to be of small importance: yet the King to be satisfied, sent out another that should bring him word how all went; and hee was likewise detained by Iehu. These dumbe shewes bred some suspicion in Iehoram, whom the watchman certified of all that happened. And now the company drew so neere, that they might, though not perfectly, bee discerned, and notice taken of Iehu himselfe by the furious manner of his marching. Wherefore the King that was loth to discover any weakenesse, caused his Chariot to bee made ready, and issued forth with Ahazia King of Juda in his<sup>50</sup> company, company, whose presence added maiestie to his traine, when strength to resist, or expedition to flee had beene more needfull. This could not be done so lustily, but that Iehu was come euen to the Townes end, and there they met each other in the field of Naboth. Iehoram began to salute Iehu with termes of peace; but receiuing a bitter answer, his heart failed him, so that crying out vpon the treason to his fellow King, hee turned away to haue fled. But Iehu soone ouertooke him with an arrow, where-with he strooke him dead, and threw his carcase into that field, which, purchased with the bloud of the rightfull owner, was to be watered with the bloud of the vniust possessor. Neyther did Ahazia escape so well, but that he was arrested by a wound, which held him till death did seize vpon him.

The Kings Palace was ioyned to the wall, by the gate of the Citie, where Iezabel might soone be aduertised of this calamitie, if she did not with her owne eyes behold it. Now it was high time for her to call to God for mercie, whose iudgement, pronounced against her long before, had ouer-taken her, when she least expected it. But shee, full of indignation and proud thoughts, made her selfe ready in all haste, and painted her face, hoping with her stately and imperious lookes to daunt the Traitor, or at least to vtter some Apophthegme, that should expresse her braue spirit, and brand him with such a reproach as might make him odious for euer. Little did she thinke vpon the hungry dogs that were ordained to deuoure her, whose paunches she stibium, with which she besmeared her eyes, would more offend, than the scolding language wherewith she armed her tongue, could trouble the eares of him that had her in his power. As Iehu drew neere, she opened her window, and looking out vpon him, began to put him in mind of Zimri, that had not long enioyed the fruits of his treason, and murthier of the King his Master. This was in meere humane valuation stoutly spoken, but was indeed a part of miserable folly; as are all things, howsoeuer laudable, if they haue an ill relation to God the Lord of all. Her owne Eunuchs that stood by and heard her, were not affected so much as with any compassion of her fortune; much lesse was her enemy daunted with her proud spirit. When Iehu saw that shee did vse the little remainder of her life in seeking to vex him, hee made her presently to vnderstand her owne estate, by deeds and<sup>30</sup> not by words. He onely called to her seruants to know which of them would be on his side, and soone found them readie to offer their seruice, before the very face of their proud Ladie. Heereupon hee commanded them to cast her downe head-long: which immediately they performed without all regard of her greatnesse and estate, wherein she had a few houres before shined so gloriously in the eyes of men; of men that considered not the iudgements of God that had beene denounced against her.

So perished this accursed woman by the rude hands of her owne seruants, at the commandment of her greatest enemy, that was yesterday her subiect, but now her Lord: and shee perished miserably struggling in vaine with base groomes, who contumeliously did hale and thrust her, whilst her insulting enemy late on Horse-backe, adding<sup>40</sup> indignitie to her greife by scornfull beholding the shamefull manner of her fall, and trampling her bodie vnder foote. Her dead carcase that was left without the walls was deuoured by dogges, and her very memorie was odious. Thus the vengeance of God rewarded her Idolatrie, murthier, and oppression, with slow, but sure painment, and full interest.

Ahazia King of Juda fleeing a-pace from Iehu, was ouer-taken by the way where hee lurked; and receiuing his deadly wound in the Kingdome of Samaris, was suffeted to get him gone (which he did in all haste) and seeke his buriall in his owne kingdome: and this fauour he obtained for his grand-fathers sake, not for his fathers, nor his owne. He died at Megiddo, and was thence carried to Ierusalem, where hee was enterred with his Ance-<sup>50</sup>stors, hauing reigned about one yeere.

CHAP. XXI.

Of Athalia, and whose Sonne he was that succeeded her.

§. I.

Of Athalia her usurping the Kingdome, and what pretences she might forge.

After the death of Ahaziah, it is said that his house was not able to retain the Kingdome: which note, and the proceedings of Athalia vpon the death of her Sonne, haue giuen occasion to diuers opinions concerning the Pedigree of Iosab, who reigned shortly after. For Athalia being thus dispoyle of her Sonne, vnder whose name shee had ruled at her pleasure, did forth-with lay hold vpon all the Princes of the bloud, and slew them, that so she might occupie the Royall Throne her selfe, & reigne as Queene, rather than liue a Subiect. Shee had before-hand put into great place, and made Countailours vnto her sonne, such as were fittest for her purpose, and ready at all times to execute her will: that shee kept a strong guard about her it is very likely; and as likely it is, that the great execution done by Iehoram, vpon the Princes, and many of the Nobilitie, had made the people tame, and fearefull to stirre, whatsoever they saw or heard.

Yet ambition, how violent soeuer it be, is seldome or neuer so shamelesse as to refuse the commoditie of goodly pretences offering themselves; but rather scrapes together all that will any way serue to colour her proceedings. Wherefore it were not absurd for vs to thinke, that Athalia, when she saw the Princes of the Royall bloud, all of them in a manner, slaine by her husband, and afterwards his owne children destroyed by the Philistines, began euen then to play her owne game, reducing by artificiall practice, into faire likelihoods, those possibilities where-with her husbands bad fortune had presented her. Not without great show of reason, either by her owne mouth, or by some trustie creature of hers, might she giue him to vnderstand, how needfull it were to take the best order whilst as yet he might, for feare of the worst that might happen. If the issue of Dauid, which now remained onely in his Familie, should by any accident faile (as wofull experience had already shewed what might after come to passe) the people of Iuda were not vnlikely to chooseth a King of some new stocke, a popular seditious man peraduenture, one that countenance his owne vnworthinesse, would not care what aspersions hee laid vpon that Royall house, which was fallen downe. And who could assure him, that some ambitious spirit, fore-seeing what might be gotten thereby, did not already contriue the destruction of him, and all his seed? Wherefore it were the wisest way to designe by his authoritie, not onely his Successour, but also the reuerfioner, and so to prouide, that the Crowne might neuer bee subiect to any riseling, but remaine in the disposition of them that loued him best, if the worst that might be feared comming to passe, his owne posteritie could not retaine it.

Such perswasions being vrged, and earnestly followed, by the importunate sollicitation of her that gouerned his affections, were able to make the ialous Tyrant thinke, that thoonely way to frustrate all deuices of such as gaped after a change, was to make her Heire the last and yongest of his house, whom it most concerned, as being the Queene-Mother, to vp-hold the first and eldest.

If Athalia tooke no such course as this in her husbands times, yet might she do it in her Sonnes. For Ahaziah (besides that he was wholly ruled by his Mother) was not likely to take much care for the securitie of his halfe-brethren, or their children; as accounting his Fathers other wiues, in respect of his owne borne-Mother, little better then Concubines, and their children basely begotten. But if this mischieuous woman forgot her selfe so farre in her wicked policie, that shee lost all opportunitie which the weaknesse of her husband and sonne did afford, of procuring vnto her selfe some seeming Title: yet could shee afterwards faile some such matter, as boldly shee might: being sure that none would aske to see her euidence, for feare of being sent to learne the certaintie of her sonne or husband in another World. But I rather thinke that she tooke order der for her affaires before-hand. For though shee had no reason to suspect or feare the suddaine death of her sonne, yet it was the wisest way to prouide betimes against all that might happen, whilst her husbands issue by other women was yong and vnable to resist. We plainly finde that the Brethren or Nephewes of Ahaziah, to the number of two and fortie, were sent to the Court of Israel, onely to salute the children of the King, and the children of the Queene. The slender occasion of which long journey, considered together with the qualitie of these persons (being in effect all the stocke of Iehoram that could be growne to any strength) makes it very suspicious that their entertainment in Iezabels house would onely haue beene more formall, but little differing in substance, from that which they found at the hand of Iehu. He that looks into the courses held both before and after by these two Queenes, will finde cause enough to thinke no lesse. Of such as haue aspired vnto Lordships not belonging to them, and thrust out the right Heires by pretence of Testaments, that had no other validitie than the sword of such as claimed by them could giue, Histories of late, yea of many Ages, afford plentiful examples: and the rule of Salomon is true: Is there any thing whereof one may say, Behold, this is new? It hath beene already in the old time that was before vs. That a King might shed his brothers blood, was proued by Salomon vpon Adonia; that he might alienate the Crown from his naturall Heires, Dauid had giuen prooffe; but these had good ground of their doings. They which follow examples that please them, will neglect the reasons of those examples, if they please them not, and rest contented with the practice, as more willingly shewing what they may doe, than acknowledging why Salomon slew his brother that had begun one rebellion, and was entering into another. Iehoram slew all his brethren, which were better than he: Dauid purchased the Kingdome, and might the more freely dispose of it, yet he disposed of it as the Lord appointed; if Iehoram, who had lost much and gotten nothing, thought that he might alienate the remainder at his pleasure, or if Ahaziah sought to cut off the succession of his brethren, or of their issue: either of these was to be answered with the words which Iehozabab the Priest vsed afterwards, in declaring the title of Iosab: Behold, the Kings sonne must reigne; as the Lord hath said of the sonnes of Dauid. Wherefore though I hold it very probable, that Athalia did pretend some title, whatsoever it might be, to the Crowne of Iuda; yet is it most certaine that she had thereunto no right at all, but onely got it by treachery, murder, and open violence; and so she held it fixe whole yeeres, and a part of the seauenth, in good seeming securitie.

§. II.

How Iehu spent his time in Israel, so that he could not molest Athalia.

All this time Iehu did neuer goe about to disturbe her; which in reason he was likely to desire, being an enemy to her whole House. But hee was occupied at the first in establishing himselfe, rooting out the posterity of Ahab, and reforming somewhat in Religion: afterwards in warres against the Aramite, wherein he was so farre ouercharged, that hardly he could retaine his owne, much lesse attempt vpon others. Of the line of Ahab there were fewentie liuing in Samaria, out of which number Iehu by letter aduised the Citizens to set vp some one as King, and to prepare themselves to fight in his defence. Hereby might they gather how confident he was, which they well vnderstood to proceede from greater power about him, than they could gather to resist him. Wherefore they tooke example by the two Kings whom hee had slaine, and being exceedingly afraid of him, they offered him their seruice, wherein they so readily shewed themselves obedient, that in lesse than one dayes warning, they sent him the heads of all those Princes, as they were inioyned by a second letter from him. After this he surprized all the Priests of Baal by a subtiltie, faining a great sacrifice to their god, by which meanes he drew them altogether into one Temple, where hee slew them: and in the same zeale to God vtterly demolished all the monuments of that impietie.

Concerning the Idolatric deuised by Ieroboam, no King of Israel had euer greater reason than Iehu to destroy it. For he needed not to feare lest the people should be assured vnto the house of Dauid; it was (in appearance) quite rooted vp, and the Crowne of Iuda in the possession of a cruell Tyrannesse: he had receiued his kingdome by the unexpected grace grace of God; and further, in regard of his zeale expressed in destroying Baal out of Israel, he was promised, notwithstanding his following the sinne of Ieroboam, that the Kingdome should remaine in his Familie, to the fourth Generation. But all this would not serue; he would needs helpe to piece out Gods prouidence with his owne circumspection; doing therein like a foolish greedie gamester, who by stealing a needlesse Card to assure himselfe of winning a stake, forfeits his whole test. Hee had questionlesse displeased many, by that which he did against Baal; and many more he should offend by taking from them the vse of a superstition, so long practized as was that Idolatrie of Ieroboam. Yet all these, how many soeuer they were, had neuer once thought vpon making him King, if God, whom, (to retaine them,) hee now forsooke, had not giuen him to the Crowne, when more difficulties appeared in the way of getting it, than could at any time after be found in the meanes of holding it.

This ingratitude of Iehu drew terrible vengeance of God vpon Israel, whereof Hazael King of Damascus was the Executioner. The cruelty of this barbarous Prince we may finde in the prophecie of Elizeus, who fore-told it, saying: Their strong Cities shalt thou set on fire, and their yong men shalt thou slay with the sword, and shalt dash their Infants against the stones, and rent in pieces their women with child. So did not onely the wickednesse of Ahab cause the ruine of his whole house, but the obstinate Idolatry of the people bring a lamentable misery vpon all the Land. For the furie of Hazael's victorie was not quenched with the destruction of a few Townes, nor wearied with one inuasion; but he smote them in all the coasts of Israel, and wasted all the Countrey beyond the River of Jordan. Notwithstanding all these calamities, it seemes that the people repented not of their Idolatrie; (For in those dayes the Lord began to loathe Israel), but rather it is likely, that they bemoaned the noble House of Ahab, vnder which they had beaten those enemies to whom they were now a prey, and had brauely fought for the conquest of Syria, where they had enlarged their border, by winning Ramoth Gilead, and compelled Benhadad to restore the Cities which his Father had won: whereas now they were faine to make wofull shifts, living vnder a Lord that had better fortune and courage in murdering his Master that had put him in trust, than in defending his people from their cruell enemies. Thus it commonly fals out, that they who can finde all manner of difficulties in seruing him, to whom nothing is difficult, are, in stead of the ease and pleasure to themselves propounded by contrary courses, ouerwhelmed with the troubles which they sought to auoide, and therein by God whom they first forsooke, forsaken, and left vnto the wretched labours of their owne blinde wisdom, wherein they had reposed all their confidence.

§. III.

Of Athaliahs Government.

These calamities falling vpon Israel, kept Athalia safe on that side, giuing her leisure to looke to things at home; as hauing little to doe abroad, vnlesse it were so that she held some correspondencie with Hazael, pretending therein to imitate her husbands grand-father King Ase, who had done the like. And some probability that she did so, may be gathered out of that which is recorded of her doings. For wee finde, that this wicked Athalia and her children brake up the house of God, and all things that were dedicate for the house of the Lord did they bestow vpon Baalim. Such a sacrifice, though it proceeded from a desire to set out her owne Idolatry, with such pompe as might make it the more glorious in the peoples eyes, was not likely to want some faire pretext of necessity of the State so requiring: in which case others before her had made bold with that holy place, and her next successeur was faine to doe the like, being thereunto forced by Hazael, who perhaps was delighted with the taste of that which was formerly thence extracted for his sake.

Vnder this impious government of Athalia, the deuotion of the Priests and Leuites was very notable, and serued (no doubt) very much to retaine the people in the religion taught by God himselfe, howsoeuer the Queenes proceedings advanced the contrary. For the poverty of that sacred Tribe of Leui must needs haue bene exceeding great at this time, all their lands and possessions in the ten Tribes being vtterly lost, the oblations and other perquisites, by which they liued, being now very few, and small; and the store laid vp in better times vnder godly Kings, being all taken away by shamefull roberie. Yet they vp-held in all this misery the seruice of God, and the daily sacrifice, keeping daily their courses, and performing obedience to the high Priest, no lesse than in those dayes wherein their entertainment was farre better.

§. IIII.

Of the preservation of Ioas.

Ehoiada then occupied the high Priesthood, an honourable, wise, and religious man. To his carefulnesse it may be ascribed, that the state of the Church was in some slender sort vp-held in those vnhappy times. His wife was Iehosbabeth, who was daughter of King Iehoram, and sister to Ahazia, a godly Lady and veruious, whose piety makes it seeme that Athalia was not her Mother, though her access to the Court argue the contrary: but her discreet carriage might more easily procure her welcome to her owne Fathers house, than the education vnder such a Mother could haue permitted herto be such as she was. By her care Ioas the yong Prince that reigned soone after, was conueighed out of the nourfery, when Athalia destroyed all the Kings children, and was carried secretly into the Temple, where as secretly he was brought vp. How it came to passe that this yong childe was not hunted out, when his body was missing, nor any great reckoning (for ought that we finde) made of his escape, I will not stand to examine: for it was not good in policie, that the people should heare say, that one of the children had auoied that cruell blow; it might haue made them hearken after innovations, and so be the lesse conformable to the present government. So Ioas was deliuered out of that slaughter, he and his Nurse being gone no man could tell whither, and might be thought peradventure to be cast away, as hauing no other guard than a poore woman that gaue him sucke, who foolishly doubting that she her selfe should haue bene slaine, was fled away with him into some desolate place, where it was like enough that she and he should perish. In such cases flatterers, or men desirous of reward, easily coine such tales, and rather sweare them to be true in their owne knowledge, than they will lose the thanks due to their ioyfull tidings.

§. V.

whose Sonne Ioas was.

†. I.

Whether Ioas may be thought likely to haue bene the Sonne of Ahazia.

Now concerning this Ioas, whose sonne he was, it is a thing of much difficulty to affirme, and hath caused much controuersie among writers. The places of Scripture, which call him the sonne of Ahazia, seeme plaine enough. How any figure of the Hebrew language might giue title of Sonne vnto him, in regard that he was his Successor, I neither by my selfe can finde, nor can by any helpe of Authors learne how to answere the difficulties appearing in the contrary opinions of them, that thinke him to haue bene, or not, the naturall Sonne of Ahazia. For whereas it is said, that the house of Ahazia was not able to retaine the Kingdome; some doe inferre that this Ioas was not properly called his Sonne, but was the next of his kindred, and therefore succeeded him, as a sonne in the inheritance of his Father. And hereunto the murder committed by Athalia, doth very well agree. For she perceiving that the Kingdome was to fall into their hands, in whom she had no interest, might easily finde cause to feare, that the tyranny exercised by her husband at her instigation vpon so many noble Houses, would now be reuenged vpon her selfe. The ruine of her Idolatrous religion might in this case terrifie both her and her Minions; the sentence of the Law rewarding that offence with death; and the Tragedy of Iezabel teaching her what might happen to a mother Queene. All this had little concerned her, if her owne grand-child had bene heire to the Crowne; for she that had power enough to make her selfe Queene, could with more ease, and lesse enuie, haue taken vpon her the office of a Protector, by which authoritie she might haue done her pleasure, and bene the more both obeyed by others, and and secure of her owne estate, as not wanting an Heire. Wherefore it was not needefull, that she should be so vnnatural, as to destroy the child of her owne sonne, of whose life she might haue made greater vse, than she could of his death: whereas indeede, the loue of grand-mothers to their Nephewes, is little lesse than that of Mothers to their children.

This argument is very strong. For it may seeme incredible, that all naturall affection should be cast a-side, when as neither necessity vrgeth, nor any commoditie thereby gotten requireth it, yea when all humane policy doth teach one the same, which nature without reason would haue perswaded.

†. II.

That Ioas did not descend from Nathan.

BVt (as it is more easie to finde a difficulty in that which is related, than to shew how it might haue otherwise bene) the pedegree of this Ioas is, by them which thinke him not the sonne of Ahazia, set downe in such sort that it may very iustly be suspected. They say that he descended from the sonne of Dauid, and not from Salomon, to which purpose they bring a Historie (I know not whence) of two families of the race of Dauid, saying that the line of Salomon held the kingdome with this condition, that if at any time it failed, the familie of Nathan should succede it. Concerning this Nathan the sonne of Dauid there are that would haue him to be Nathan the Prophet, who, as they thinke, was by Dauid adopted. And of this opinion was Origen, as also S. Augustine sometime was, but afterward he reuoked it, as was meete; for this Nathan is reckoned among the sonnes of Dauid, by Bathsua the daughter of Amnes, and therefore could not be the Prophet. Gregory Nazianzen (as I finde him cited by Peter Martyr) and after him, Erasmus, and Faber Stapulensis, haue likewise held the same of Ioas, deriuing him from Nathan. But Nathan and those other brethren of Salomon by the same mother, are thought, vpon good likelihoods, to haue bene the children of Vria the Hittite: and so are they accounted by sundry of the fathers, and by Lyra, and Abulenfis, who follow the Hebrew expositors of that place in the first of Chronicles. The words of Salomon calling himselfe the onely begotten of his mother, doe approue this exposition: for we reade of no more than two sonnes which Bathsua or Bathsbeba did beare vnto Dauid, whereof the one begotten in adultery, died an infant, and Salomon onely of her children by the King did liue. So that the rest must needs haue bene the children of Vria, and are thought to haue bene Dauids onely by adoption. Wherefore, if Ioas had not bene the sonne of Ahazia, then must that pedegree haue bene false, wherein S. Matthew deriue him lineally from Salomon; yea, then had not our blessed Sauour issued from the loynes of Dauid, according to the flesh, but had onely bene of his line by courtesie of the Nation, and forme of Law, as any other might haue bene. As for the authority of Philo, which hath drawne many late writers into the opinion that Ioas was not of the posterity of Salomon, it is enough to say, that this was Frier Annius his Philo: for no other edition of Philo hath any such matter; but Annius can make Authors to speake what he list.

†. III.

That Ioas may probably be thought to haue bene the sonne of Iehoram.

IN so doubtfull a case, if it seeme lawfull to hold an opinion that no man hath yet thought vpon, me thinks it were not amisse to lay open at once, and peruse together two places of Scripture, whereof the one telling the wickednesse of Iehoram the sonne of Iehoshaphat King of Juda, for which he and his children perished, rehearseth it as one of Gods mercies towards the house of Dauid, that according to his promise hee would giue him a light, and to his children for ever: the other doth say, that for the offences of the same Iehoram, there was not a sonne left him, save Iehoahaz the youngest of his sonnes. Now, if it were in regard of Gods promise to Dauid, that after those massacres of Iehoram vpon all his brethren, and of the Philistims and Arabians vpon the children of Iehoram, one of the seede of Dauid escaped; why may it not be thought that he was said to haue escaped, in whom the line of Dauid was preserved? for had all the race of Salomon mon beene rooted vp in these wofull Tragedies, and the progenie of Nathan succeeded in place thereof; like enough it is that some remembrance more particular would haue bene extant, of an euent so memorable. That the race of Nathan was not extinguished, it is indeede apparent by the Genealogie of our Lord, as it is recounted by S. Luke: but the preservation of the house of Dauid, mentioned in the books of Kings and Chronicles, was performed in the person of Iehoahaz, in whom the Royall branch of Salomon, the naturall, and not onely legall issue remaining of Dauid, was kept aliue. Wherefore it may be thought that this Ioas, who followed Athalia in the Kingdome, was the youngest sonne of Iehoram, whose life Athalia as a stepdame, was not likely to pursue. For it were not easily understood, why the preservation of Dauids line, by Gods especiall mercy, in regard of his promise made, should pertaine rather to that time, when besides Ahazia himselfe, there were two and fortie of his brethren, or (as in another place they are called) sonnes of his brethren remaining aliue, which afterwards were all slaine by Iehu; than haue reference to the lamentable destruction and little lesse than extirpation of that progeny, wherein one onely did escape. Certainly that inhumane murder which Iehoram committed vpon his brethren, if it were (as appeareth in the History) reuenged vpon his owne children; then was not this vengeance of God accomplished by the Philistims and Arabians, but being onely begun by them, was afterwards prosecuted by Iehu, and finally tooke effect by the hands of that same wicked woman, at whose instigation he had committed such barbarous outrage. And from this execution of Gods heauie iudgement laid vpon Iehoram and all his children, onely Iehoahaz his youngest son was exempted, whom therefore if I should affirme to be the same with Ioas, which is called the sonne of Ahazia, I should not want good probability. Some further appearance of necessity theris, which doth argue that it could no otherwise haue bene. For it was the youngest sonne of Iehoram in whom the race was preserved; which could not in any likelihood be Ahazia, seeing that he was twenty yeeres old at the least (as is already noted) when he began to reigne, and consequently, was borne in the eighteenth or twentieth yeere of his Fathers age. Now I know not whether of the two is more valikely, either that Iehoram should haue begotten many children before he was eighteen yeeres old, or that hauing (as he had) many wiues and children, hee should vpon the sodaine, at his eighteenth yeere, become vnfruitfull, and beget no more in twenty yeeres following: each of which must haue bene true, if this were true that Ahazia was the same Iehoahaz, which was his youngest sonne. But this inconuenience is taken away, and those other doubts arising from the causelesse crueltie of Athalia, in seeking the life of Ioas, are easily cleared, if Ioas and Iehoahaz were one. Neither doth his age withstand this opinion. For he was seuen yeeres old when he began to reigne; which if we vnderstand of yeeres compleat, he might haue bene a yeere old at the death of Iehoram, being begotten somewhat after the beginning of his sicknesse. Neither is it more absurd to say that he was the naturall sonne of Iehoram, though called the son of Ahazia, than it were to say, as great Authors haue done, this difficultie notwithstanding, that he was of the posteritie of Nathan. One thing indeed I know not how to answere; which, had it concurred with the rest, might haue serued as the foundation of this opinion. The name of Iehoahaz, that soundeth much more neere to Ioas, than to Ahazia, in an English eare, doth in the Hebrew (as I am informed by some, skilfull in that language) through the diuersitie of certaine letters, differ much from that which it most resemblith in our Westerne manner of writing, and little from the other. Now, although it be so that Ahazia himselfe bee also called Azaria, and must haue had three names, if hee were the same with Iehoahaz; in which manner Ioas might also haue had seuerall names; yet, because I finde no other warrant heereof than a bare possibilitie, I will not presume to build an opinion vpon the weak foundation of mine owne coniecture, but leaue all to the consideration of such as haue more abilitie to iudge, and leisure to consider of this point.

†. IIII.

Vpon what reasons Athalia might seeke to destroy Ioas, if he were her owne grandchilde.

If therefore we shall follow that which is commonly receiued, and interpret the text according to the letter, it may be said, that Athalia was not onely blinded by the passions ons of ambition and zeale to her idolatrous worship of Baalim, but pursued the accomplishment of some vnnaturall desires, in seeking the destruction of her grand-childe, and the rest of the bloud Royall. For whether it were so that Athalia (as proud and cruell women are not alwayes chaste) had imitated the liberty of Izzabel her sister in law, whose whoredomes were vpbraided by Iehu to her sonne; or whether she had children by some former husband, before she was married vnto Iehoram (which is not vnlkely in regard of her age, who was daughter of Omri, and sister to Ahab) certaine it is that she had sonnes of her owne, and those old enough to be employed, as they were, in robbing of the Temple. So it is not greatly to be wondred at, that to settle the Crowne vpon her owne children, she did seeke to cut off, by wicked policie, all other claimes. As for Iosias, if she were his grand-mother, yet she might mistrust the interest which his mother would haue in him, lest when he came to yeeres, it might draw him from her deuotion. And hereof (besides that women doe commonly better loue their daughters husbands, than their sonnes wiues) there is some appearance in the reigne of her sonne: for she made him spend all his time in idle iourneys, to no other apparant end, than that she might rule at home; and he liuing abroad be estranged from his wife, and entertaine some new fauities, wherein Iezabel had cunning enough to be his tutore. But when the sword of Iehu had rudely cut in funder all these fine deuices, then was Athalia faine to goe roundly to worke, and doe as she did, whereby she thought to make all sure. Otherwise, if (as I could rather thinke) she were onely stepdame to Iosias, we neede not seeke into thereasons, mouing her to take away his life; her owne hatred was cause enough to dispatch him among the first.

§ V.I.

THUS much concerning the person of Iosias, from whom, as from a new rpute, the tree of Dauid was propagated into many branches. In handling of which matter, the more I consider the nature of this Historie, and the diuersitie betwene it and others, the lesse me thinkes I neede to suspect mine owne presumption, as deserving blame, for curiosity in matter of doubt, or boldnesse in liberty of coniecture. For all Historians doe giue vs information of humane counsailes and euents, as farre forth as the knowledge and faith of the writers can afford; but of Gods will, by which all things are ordered, they speake onely at randome, and many times falsly. This we often finde in prophane writers, who ascribe the ill successe of great vndertakings to the neglect of some impious Rites, whereof indeede God abhorred the performance as velt-me tly, as they thought him to be highly offended with the omission. Hereat we may the lesse wonder, if we consider the answer made by the Iewes in Egypt vnto Sermit the Prophet reprehending their idolatry. For, howsoeuer the written Law of God was knowne vnto the people, and his punishments laid vpon them for contempt thereof, were very terrible, and euen then but newly executed; yet were they so obstinately bent vnto their wils, that they would not by any meanes be drawne to acknowledge the true cause of their affliction. But they told the Prophet roundly, that they would worship the Queene of Heauen, as they and their Fathers, their Kings and their Princes had vsed to doe. For then (said they) had we plenty of victuals, and were well, and felt no euill: adding that all manner of miseries were befallen them, since they left off that seruice of the Queene of Heauen. So blinde is the wisdom of man, in looking into the counsaile of God, which to finde out there is no better nor other guide than his owne written will not perterbed by vaine additions.

But this Historie of the Kings of Israel and Juda hath herein a singular prerogative above all that haue beene written by the most sufficient of meere humane authors: it setteth downe expressly the true, and first causes of all that happened; not in imputing the death of Ahab to his ouer-forwardnesse in battaile; the ruine of his familie, to the securitie of Iehoram in Izrael; nor the victories of Hazael, to the great commotions raised in Israel, by the comming of Iehu; but referring all vnto the will of God, I meane, to his reuealed will: from which that his hidden purposes doe not varie, this storie, by many great examples, giues most notable prooffe. True it is, that the concurrence of second causes with their effects, is in these bookes nothing largely described; nor perhaps exactly in any of those Histories that are in these points most copious. For it was well noted by that worthy Gentleman, Sir Philip Sidney, that Historians doe borrow s. Phil. Sid. i. li. Apol. for Poet. 1 of Poets, not onely much of their ornament, but some what of their substance. Informations are often false, records not alwayes true, and notorious actions commonly insufficient to discouer the passions which did set them first on foote. Wherefore they are faine (I speake of the best, and in that which is allowed; for to take out of Liuie euery one circumstance of Claudius his iourney against Asdrubal in Italie, fitting all to another businesse, or any practice of that kinde, is neither Historically, nor Poetically) to search into the particular humour of Princes, and of those which haue gouerned their affections, or the instruments by which they wrought, from whence they doe collect the most likely motiues, or impediments of euery business; and so figuring as neere to the life as they can imagine, the matter in hand, they iudiciously consider the defects in counsaile, or ob-liquity in proceeding.

Yet all this, for the most part, is not enough to giue assurance, howsoeuer it may giue satisfaction. For the heart of man is vnsearchable: and Princes, howsoeuer their intents be seldom hidden from some of those many eyes which pierce both into them, and into such as liue about them; yet sometimes either by their owne close temper, or by some subtil miste, they conceale the truth from all reports. Yea, many times the affections themselves lye dead, and buried in obliuion, when the preparations which they begat, are conuered to another vse. The industrie of an Historian, hauing so many things to wearie it, may well be excused, when finding apparant cause enough of things done, it forbearth to make further search; though it often fall out, where sundry occasions worke to the same end, that one small matter in a weake minde is more effectually, than many that seeme farre greater. So comes it many times to passe, that great fires, which consume whole houses or Townes, beginne with a few straws, that are wasted or not seene; when the flame is discouered, hauing fastned vpon some wood-pile, that catcheth all about it. Questionlesse it is, that the warre commenced by Darius, and pursued by Xerxes against the Greekes, proceeded from desire of the Persians to enlarge their Empire: howsoeuer the enterprize of the Athenians vpon Sardes, was noised abroad as the ground of that quarrell: yet Herodotus telleth vs, that the wanton desire of Queen Atoffa, to haue the Grecian dames her bondwomen, did first moue Darius to prepare for this warre before he had recei-ued any iniury; and when he did not yet so much desire to get more, as to enioy what was already gotten.

I will not here stand to argue whether Herodotus be more iustly reprehended by some, or defended by others, for allcading the vaine appetite, and secret speech of the Queene in bed with her husband, as the cause of those great euils following; this I may boldly affirme, (hauing I thinke, in euery estate some sufficient witnesse) that matters of much consequence, founded in all seeming vpon substantiall reasons, haue issued indeede from such pettie trifles, as no Historian would either thinke vpon, or could well search out.

Therefore it was a good answer that Sixtus Quintus the Pope made to a certaine Frier, comming to visit him in his Popedom, as hauing long before in his meaner estate, bene his familiar friend. This poore Friar, being emboldened by the Pope to vse his old liberty of speech, adu ventured to tell him, that he very much wondred how it was possible for his Holinesse, whom he rather tooke for a direct honest man, than any cunning politician, to attaine vnto the Papacie; in compassing of which, all the subtiltie (said he) of the most crafty braines, finde worke enough: and therefore the more I thinke vpon the Art of the Conclau, and your vnaptnesse thereto, the more I needes must wonder.
Pope Sixtus to satisfie the plaine dealing Friar, dealt with him againe as plainly, saying, Hadst thou liued abroad as I haue done, and seene by what foily this world is gouerned, thou wouldest wonder at nothing.

Surely, if this be referred vnto those exorbitant engines, by which the course of affaires is moued, the Pope said true. For the wildest of men are not without their vanities, which requiring and finding mutuall toleration; worke more closely, and earnestly, than right reason either needes or can. But if we lift vp our thoughts to that supreme Gouernour, of whose Empire all that is true, which by the Poet was said of Iupiter:

*Quiterram inericm, qui mare temperat
Vntosum, & vrbes, regnag, tristia
Diuosq, mortalesq, turmas, Imperio regit vnus equo.*

Who rules the duller earth, the winde-swolne streames,
The ciuill Cities, and the th' infernall realmes,
Whorh' host of heauen, and the mortall band,
Alone doth gouerne by his iust command:

Then shall we finde the quite contrary. In him there is no vncertainty nor change; he foreseeth all things, and all things disposeth to his owne honour; He neither deceiueh nor can be deceiued, but continuing one and the same for euer, doth constantly gouerne all creatures by that Law, which he hath prescribed and will neuer alter. The vanities of men beguile their vaine contriuers, and the prosperity of the wicked, is the way leading to their destruction: yea, this broad and head-long passage to hell, is not so delightfull as it seemes at the first entrance, but hath growing in it, besides the paysons which infect the soule, many cruell thornes deeply wounding the body, all which, if any few escape, they haue onely this miserable aduantage of others, that their descent was the more swift and expedite. But the seruice of God is the path guiding vs to perfect happiness, & hath in it a true, though not compleat felicity, yielding such abundance of ioy to the conscience, as doth easily counteruaile all afflictions whatsoeuer; though indeede those brambles that sometimes teare the skinn of such as walke in this blessed way, doe commonly lay hold vpon them at such time as they sit down to take their ease, and make them with themselves at their iournies end, in the presence of their Lord whom they faithfully serue, in whose presence is the fulnesse of ioy, and at whose right hand are pleasures for euermore.

Wherefore it being the end and scope of all History, to teach by example of times past, such wisdom as may guide our desires and actions, we should not maruaile though the Chronicles of the Kings of Iuda and Israel, being written by men inspired with the Spirit of God, instruct vs chiefly, in that which is most requisite for vs to know, as the meanes to attaine vnto true felicitie, both here, and hereafter, propounding examples which illustrate this infallible rule; The feare of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom. Had the expedition of Xerxes (as it was foretold by Daniel) bene written by some Prophet after the captiuitie: we may well beleue that the counsaile of God therein, and the executioners of his righteous will, should haue occupied either the whole or the principall roome in that narration. Yet had not the purpose of Darius, the desire of his Wife, and the businesse at Sardes, with other occurrents, bene the lesse true, though they might haue bene omitted, as the lesse materiall: but these things it had bene lawfull for any man to gather out of prophane Histories, or out of circumstances otherwise appearing, wherein he should not haue done iniurie to the Sacred Writings, as long as he had forborne to derogate from the first causes, by ascribing to the second more than was due.

Such, or litle different, is the businesse that I haue now in hand: wherein I cannot beleeue that any man of iudgement will taxe me, as either fabulous or presumptuous. For he doth not faine, that rehearseth probabilities as bare coniectures; neither doth he depraue the Text, that seeketh to illustrate and make good in humane reason, those things, which authority alone, without further circumstance, ought to haue confirmed in euery mans beliefe. And this may suffice in defence of the liberty, which I haue vsed in coniectures, and may hereafter vse when occasion shall require, as neither vnlawfull, nor misbecoming an Historian.

Hen Athalia had now fixe yeeres and longer worne the Crowne of Iuda, and had found neither any forreine enemy, nor domestically aduersarie to disturbe her possession, suddenly the period of her glory, and reward of her wickednesse wickednesse meeting together, tooke her away without any warnings, by a violent and shamefull death. For the growth of the yong Prince began to be such, as permitted him no longer to be concealed, and it had bene very vnfitting that his education should be simple, to make him seeme the child of some poore man (as for his safety it was requisite), when his capacitie required to haue bene inducted with the stomacke and qualities meete for a King. All this Iehoiada the Priest considered, and withall, the great increase of impietie, which taking deepe root in the Court, was likely to spread it selfe ouer all the Countrey, if care were not used to weede it vey speedily. Wherefore he associated vnto himselfe five of the Captaines, in whose fidelity he had best assurance, and hauing taken an oath of them, and shewed them the Kings sonne; he made a Covenant with them, to aduance him to the Kingdome. These drew in others of the principall men, to countenance the action, procuring at the first onely that they should repaire to Ierusalem, where they were further acquainted with the whole matter. There needed not many persuasions to win them to the businesse: the promise of the Lord vnto the house of Dauid, was enough to assure them, that the action was both lawfull, and likely to succede as they desired.

But in compassing their intent some difficulties appeared: For it was not to be hoped, that with open force they should bring their purpose to good issue; neither were the Captaines, and other associates of Iehoiada able by close working, to draw together so many trusty and seruiceable hands as would suffice to manage the businesse. To helpe in this case, the Priest gaue order to such of the Leuites, as had finished their courses in waiting on the Diuine seruice at the Temple, and were now relieved by others that succeeded in their turnes, that they should not depart vntill they knew his further pleasure. So by admitting the new commers, and not discharging the old, he had, without any noise, made vp such a number, as would be able to deale with the Queenes ordinary Guard, and that was enough; for if the Tyrannesse did not preuaile against them at the first brunt, the fauour of the People was like to shew it selfe on their side, who made head against her. These Leuites were placed in the inner Court of the Temple, about the person of the King, who as yet was kept close; the followers of the Captaines, and other adherents, were bestowed in the vnder Courts: As for weapons, the Temple it selfe had store enough. King Dauid had left an Armory to the place, which was now employed to defence of his issue.

All things being in a readinesse, and the day come, wherein this high designe was to be put in execution; Iehoiada deliuered vnto the Captaines, Armour for them and their adherents; appointed a guard vnto the Kings person, produced him openly, and gaue vnto him the Crowne; vsing all ceremonies accustomed in such solemnities, with great applause of the people. Of these doings, the Queene was the last that heard any word; which is not so strange as it may seeme: for insolent natures, by dealing outrageously with such as bring them ill tidings, doe commonly lose the benefit of hearing what is to be feared, whilest yet it may be preuented, and haue no information of danger, till their owne eyes, amazed with the suddennesse, behold it in the shape of ineuitable mischiefe.

All Ierusalem was full of the rumour, and entertained it with very good liking. Some carried home the newes, others ran forth to see, and the common ioy was so great, that without apprehension of perill, vnder the windowes of the Court, were the people running and praising the King. Athalia hearing and beholding the extraordinary concourse, and noise of folkes in the streetes, making towards the Temple, with much vnusuall passion in their looks, did presently conceiue, that somewhat worthy of her care was happened; though, what it might be, she did not apprehend. Howsoeuer it were, she meant so to vie her owne wisdom in looking into the matter, and ordering all as the occasion might happen to require. It may be, that she thought it some especiall solemnity vsed in the Diuine seruice, which caused this much adoe; and hereof the vnaccustomed number of Leuites, and of other deuout men, about the towne, might giue some presumption.

Many things argue that she little thought vpon her owne Tragedie, although Iosephus would make it seeme otherwise. For we finde in the Text, She came to the people into the house of the Lord (which was neere to her Palace) and that when she looked and saw the King stand by his pillar, as the manner was with the Princes, or great men of the Land

Land by him, and the Trumpeters proclaiming him, she rent her clothes, and cryed, Treason, Treason. Hereby it appeares that she was quietly going, without any mistrust or feare, to take her place; which when she found occupied by another, then she began to afflict her selfe, as one cast away, and cryed out in vaine vpon the Treason, whereby she saw that she must perish. But that she came with a guard of armed men to the Temple, (as Iosephus reporteth) and that her company being beaten backe, she entred alone, and commanded the people to kill the yong Tyrant, I finde no where in Scripture, neither doe I hold it credible. For had she truly knowne how things went, she would surely haue gathered her friends about her, and vsed those forces in defence of her Crowne, by which she gat it, and hitherto had held it. Certainly, if it were granted, that she, like to a new Semiramis, did march in the head of her troupe, yet it had beene mere madnesse in her, to enter the place alone; when her assistants were kept out; but if she perceived that neither her authority, nor their owne weapons, could preuaile to let in her guard, would neuertheless take vpon her to command the death of the new King, calling a childe of seauen yeeres old a Conspirator, and bidding them to kill him, whom she saw to be armed in his defence, may we not thinke that she was mad in the most extreame degree? Certaine it is that the counsaile of God would haue taken effect, in her destruction, had she vsed the most likely meanes to disappoint it: yet we neede not so cut her throat with any morall impossibilities. It is enough to say, that the godly zeale of Iehoiada found more easie successe, through her indiscretion, than otherwise could haue beene expected; so that at his appointment, she was without more ado, carried out of the Temple and slaine, yea so, that no blood, save her owne, was shed in that quarrell; her small traine that she brought along with her, not daring to stand in her defence.

§. VIII.

Most like it is, that Athalia had many times, with great indignation, bewailed the rashnesse of her Nephew Iehoram the Israelite, who did foolishly cast himselfe into the very throat of danger, gaping vpon him, onely through his eager desire of quickly knowing what the matter meant: yet, she her selfe, by the like bait, was taken in the like trap, and hauing liued such a life as Iezabel had done, was rewarded with a futable death. These two Queenes were in many points much alike, each of them was Daughter, Wife, and Mother to a King; each of them ruled her husband; was an Idolatresse, and a Murtheresse. The onely difference appearing in their conditions, is, that Iezabel is more noted as incontinent of body, Athalia as ambitious: So that each of them suruiuing her husband about eight yeeres, did spend their time in satisfying her owne affections; the one vsing tyrannie, as the exercise of her haughty minde; the other painting her face, for the ornament of her vnchaste body. In the manner of their death little difference there was, or in those things which may seeme in this world to pertaine vnto the dead when they are gone. Each of them was taken on the suddaine by Conspirators, and each of them exclayming vpon the Treason, receiued sentence from the mouth of one that had liued vnder her subiection; in execution whereof, Iezabel was trampled vnder the feet of her enemies horses; Athalia slaine at her owne horse-gate; the death of Athalia hauing (though not much) the more leisure to vex her proud heart; that of Iezabel, the more indignity, and shame of body. Touching their buriall, Iezabel was deuoured by Dogges, as the Lord had threatened by the Prophet Elias; what became of Athalia we doe not finde. Like enough it is, that she was buried, as hauing not persecuted and slaine the Lords Prophets, but suffered the Priests to exercise their function; yet of her buriall there is no monument, for she was a Church-robber. The seruice of Baal erected by these two Queenes, was destroyed as soone as they were gone, and their Chaplaines, the Priests of that Religion, slaine. Herein also it came to passe, alike, as touching them both when they were dead; the Kings who sue them, were afterwards afflicted, both of them by the same hand of Hazael the Syrian; in which point Athalia had the greater honour, if the Syrian (who seemes to haue beene her good friend) pretended her reuenge, as any part of his quarrell to Iuda. Concerning children, all belonging to Iezabel perished in few few dayes after her: whether Athalia left any behinde her, it is vncertaine; she had sons liuing after she was Queene, of whom, or of any other, that they were slaine with her, we doe not finde.

This is a matter not vnworthy of consideration, in regard of much that may depend vpon it, For if the children of Athalia had beene in Ierusalem when their Mother fell, their death would surely haue followed hers as necerly, and beene registred, as well as the death of Mattan the Priest of Baal. That Law by which God forbade that the children should die for the fathers, could not haue saved these vngracious Imps, whom the clause following would haue cut off, which commands, that every man should die for his owne sinne. Seeing therefore that they had beene professors and aduancers of that vile and Idolatrous worship of Baal, yea had robbed the Temple of the Lord, and enriched the house of Baal with the spoyle of it; likely it is, that they should not haue escaped with life, if Iehoiada the Priest could haue gotten them into his hands. As there was lawfull cause enough requiring their death, so the securitie of the King and his friends, that is, of all the Land, craued as much, and that very earnestly. For these had beene esteemed as heires of their mothers Crowne, and being reckoned as her assistants in that particular businesse of robbing the Temple, may be thought to haue carried a great sway in other matters, as Princes, and fellowes with their Mother in the Kingdome. Therefore it is euident, that either they were now dead, or (perhaps following Hazael in his warres against Iehu) absent from Ierusalem; whereby Iehoiada might, with the more confidence, aduention to take Armes against their Mother, that was desolate.

§. I.

Of Ioas his doings, whilest Iehoiada the Priest liued.

By the death of Athalia, the whole Countrey of Iuda was filled with great ioy and quietnesse; wherein Ioas a childe of seauen yeeres old of there-about; began his reigne, which continued almost fortie yeeres. During his minority, hee liued vnder the protection of that honourable man Iehoiada the Priest, who did as faithfully gouerne the Kingdome, as he had before carefully preserued the Kings life, and restored him vnto the Throne of his ancestors. When he came to mans estate, he tooke by appointment of Iehoiada two wiues, and begat Sonnes and Daughters, repairing the family of Dauid, which was almost worne out. The first Act that hee tooke in hand, when he began to rule without a Protector, was the reparation of the Temple. It was a needefull piece of worke, in regard of the decay wherein that holy place was fallen, through the wickednesse of vngodly Tyrants; and requisite it was that he should vp-hold the Temple, whom the Temple had vp-held. This businesse he followed with so earnest a zeale, that not onely the Leuites were more slacke than he, but euen Iehoiada was faine to be quickened by his admonition. Money was gathered for the charges of the worke, partly out of the taxe imposed by Moses, partly out of the liberalitie of the people: who gaue so freely, that the Temple, besides all reparations, was enriched with vessels of gold and siluer, and with all other Vntensiles. The sacrifices likewise were offered, as vnder godly Kings they had beene, and the seruice of God was magnificently celebrated.

§. II. The

§ II.

The death of Iehoiada, and Apostasie of Ioas.

BVt this endured no longer than the life of Iehoiada the Priest: who having lived an hundred and thirtie yeeres, dyed before his Countrey could haue spared him. He was buried among the Kings of Iuda, as he well deserved, having preserved the race of them, and restored the true Religion, which the late Princes of that house, by attempting to eradicate, failed but a little, of rooting vp themselves; and all their issue. Yet his honorable Funerall seemes to haue bene giuen to him, at the motion of the people; it being said, They buried him in the Citie of David. As for the King himselfe, who did owe to him no lesse than his Crowne and life, he is not likely to haue bene Author of it, seeing that he was as easily comforted after his death, as if he had thereby beend discharged of some heauie debt.

For after the death of Iehoiada, when the Princes of Iuda began to flatter their King, he soone forgot, not onely the benefits, receiued by this worthie man his old Counsellour, but also the good precepts which he had receiued from him, yea and God himselfe, the Author of all goodnesse. These Princes drew him to the worship of Idols, where, with Iehoram and Athalia had so infected the Countrey, in fiftene or sixtene yeeres; that thirty yeeres, or there-about, of the reigne of Ioas, wherein the true Religion was exercised, were not able to cleere it from that mischief. The King himselfe, when once he was entred into these courses, ran on head-long, as one that thought it a token of his libertie, to despise the seruice of God; and a manifest prooffe of his being now King in dedde, that he regarded no longer the fowre admonitions of deuout Priests. Hereby it appears, that his former zeale was onely counterfained, wherein like an Actor vpon the stage, he had striuen to expresse much more liuely affection, than they could shew, that were indeede religious.

§. III.

The causes and times of the Syrians inuading Iuda in the dayes of Ioas.

BVt God, from whom he was broken loose; gaue him ouer into the hands of men, that would not easily be shaken off. Hazael King of Aram, having taken Gath, a Towne of the Philistins, addressed himselfe towards Ierusalem, whither the little distance of way, and great hope of a rich bootie, did inuite him. He had an Armie heartned by many victories, to hope for more; and for ground of the warre (if his ambition cared for pretences) it was enough, that the Kings of Iuda had assisted the Israelites, in their enterprises vpon Aram, at Ramoth Gilead. Yet I thinke he did not want some further instigation. For if the Kingdome of Iuda had molested the Aramites, in the time of his predecessour, this was throughly recompensed, by forbearing to succour Israel, and leauing the ten Tribes in their extreame misery, to the fury of Hazael himselfe. Neither is it likely, that Hazael should haue gone about to awake a sleeping Dogge, and stirre vp against himselfe a powerfull enemy, before he had assured the conquest of Israel, that lay betweene Ierusalem and his owne Kingdome, if some opportunity had not performed such easie and good successe, as might rather aduance, than any way disturbe his future proceedings against the ten Tribes. Wherefore I hold it probable, that the sonnes of Athalia, mentioned before, were with him in this action, promising (as men expelled their Countreies vsually doe) to draw many partakers of their owne to his side; and not to remaine, as Ioas did, a neutrall in the warre betweene him and Israel, but to ioyne all their forces with his, as they had cause, for the rooting out of Iehu his posteritie, who, like a bloudy Traytor, had vtterly destroyed all the kindred of the Queenes, their mother, euen the whole house of Ahab, to which he was a subiect. If this were so, Hazael had the more apparant reason to inuade the Kingdome of Iuda. Howsoever it were, we finde it plainly, that Ioas was afraid of him, and therefore tooke all the hallowed things, and all the gold that was found in the treasures of the house of the Lord, or in his owne house, with which present he redeemed his peace: the Syrians (questionlesse) thinking it a better bargaine, to get so much readily paid into his hand for nothing, than to hazard the assurance of this, for the possibilitie of not much more. So Hazael departed with a rich bootie of vnhappy creature, which, belonging to the liuing God, remained a small while in the possession of this mighty, yet corruptible man, but sent him quickly to the graue. For in the thirtie seuenth yeere of Ioas, which was the fiftieth of Iehoahaz, hee made this purchase; but in the same or very next yeere hee died, leauing all that he had vnto his Sonne Benhadad, with whom these treasures prospered none otherwise, than ill-gotten goods are wont.

This enterprise of Hazael is, by some, confounded with that warre of the Aramites vpon Iuda, mentioned in the second Booke of Chronicles. But the reasons alleged by them that hold the contrarie opinion, doe forcibly prooue, that it was not all one warre. For the former was compounded without blood-shed or fight; in the later, Ioas tryed the fortune of a battaile, wherein being put to the worst, he lost all his Princes, and hardly escaped with life: In the one, Hazael himselfe was present; in the other, hee was not named: but contrariwise, the King of Aram then reigning (who may seeme to haue then bene the Sonne of Hazael) is said to haue bene at Damascus. The first Armie came to conquer, and was so great, that it terrified the King of Iuda; The second was a small company of men, which did animate Ioas (in vaine, for God was against him) to deale with them, as hauing a very great Armie.

Now, concerning the time of this former inuasion, I cannot perceiue that God forooke him, till hee had first forsaken God. There are indeed some, very learned, who thinke that this expedition of Hazael was in the time of Iehoiada the Priest, because that storie is ioyned vnto the restauration of the Temple. This had bene improbable, if the death of Iehoiada had bene afterwards mentioned in that place of the second Booke of Kings; or if the Apostasie of Ioas, or any other matter implying so much, had followed in the relation. For it is not indeed to be doubted, that the Lord of all may dispose of all things, according to his owne will and pleasure, neither was hee more vnjust in the afflictions of Iob that righteous man, or the death of Iosias that godly King, than in the plagues which he laid vpon Pharaoh, or his iudgements vpon the house of Ahab. But it appears plainly, that the rich furniture of the Temple, and the magnificent seruice of God therein, which are ioyned together, were vsed in the house of the Lord continually, all the dayes of Iehoiada; soone after whose death, if not immediately vpon it, that is (as some very learnedly collect) in the fixe, or thirty seuenth yeere of this Ioas his reigne, the King falling away from the God of his Fathers, became a foule Idolater.

And indeed we commonly obserue, that the crosses which it hath pleased God sometimes to lay vpon his seruants, without any cause notorious in the eyes of men, haue alwaies tended vnto the bettering of their good. In which respect, euen the sufferings of the blessed Martyrs (the death of his Saints being precious in the sight of the Lord) are to their great aduantage. But with euill and rebellious men, God keepeth a more euen & strict account; permitting vsually their faults to get the start of their punishment, and either delaying his vengeance (as with the Amorites) till their wickednesse be full: or not working their amendment by his correction, but suffering them to runne on in their wicked courses, to their greater miserie. So hath he dealt with many; and so it appears that hee dealt with Ioas. For this unhappie man did not onely continue an obstinate Idolater, but grew so forgetfull of God and all goodnesse, as if hee had strouen to exceed the wickednesse of all that went before him, and to leaue such a villainous patterne vnto others, as few or none of the most barbarous Tyrants should endure to imitate.

§. IIII.

How Zacharia was murdered by Ioas.

SVndry Prophets hauing laboured in vaine to reclaim the people from their superstition, Zacharia the sonne of Iehoiada the Priest, was stirred vp at length by the Spirit of God, to admonish them of their wickednesse, and make them vnderstand the punishment due vnto it, whereof they stood in danger. This Zacharia was a man so much honoured, and some to a man so exceedingly beloued in his lifetime, and reuerenced, that if Ioas had reputed him (as Ahab did Elias) his open enemy, yet ought he in common honesty, to haue cloaked his ill affection, and haue vsed at least some part of the respect that was due to such a person : On the other side, the singular affection which he and his father had borne vnto the King, and the vnrecountable benefits, which they had done vnto him, from his first infancie, were such, as should haue placed Zacharia in the most hearty and assured loue of Ioas, yea though he had been otherwise a man of very small marke, and not very good condition. The truth is, that the message of a Prophet sent from God, should be heard with reuerence, how simple soeuer he appeares that brings it. But this King Ioas, hauing already scorned the admonitions and protestations of such Prophets as first were sent, did now deale with Zacharia, like as the wicked husbandmen in that parable of our Sauour, dealt with the heyre of the Vineyard; who said, This is the Begre, come let vs kill him that the inheritance may be ours. By killing Zacharia he thought to become an absolute Commander, supposing belike that he was no free Prince, as long as one durst tell him the plaine truth, how great soeuer that mans deserting were, that did so, yea though Gods commandement required it. So they conspired against this holy Prophet, and stoned him to death at the Kings appointment; but whether by any forme of open Law, as was practised vpon Naboth, or whether surprising him by any close treacherie, I doe neyther reade, nor can coniecture. The dignitie of his person, considered together with their treacherous conspiracie, makes it probable, that they durst not call him into publique iudgement, though that the manner of his death, being such as was commonly, and by order of Law, inflicted vpon malefactors, may argue the contrarie. Most likely it is, that the Kings<sup>20</sup> commandement, by which hee suffered, tooke place in stead of Law : which exercise of meere power (as hath bene already noted) was nothing strange amongst the Kings of Iuda.

Luke 20. 13.

§. V.

How Ioas was shamefully beaten by the Aramites, and of his death.

THis odious murther, committed by an vnthankfull snake vpon the man in whose bosome he had bene fostered, as of it selfe alone it sufficed, to make the wretched Tyrant hatefull to men of his owne time, and his memorie detested<sup>30</sup> in all ages, so had it the well-described curse of the blessed Martyr, to accompany it vnto the throne of God, and to call for vengeance from thence, which fell downe swiftly, and heavily vpon the head of that vngratefull monster. It was the last yeere of his reigne; the end of his time comming then vpon him, when hee thought himselfe beginning to liue how he list without controulement. When that yeere was expired, the Aramites came into the Countrie, rather as may seeme to get pillage, than to performe any great action; for they came with a small companie of men : but God had intended to doe more by them, than they themselves did hope for.

2. Chron. 24. 24.

That Ioas naturally was a coward, his bloudie malice against his best friend, is, in my iudgement proofe sufficient : though otherwise his base composition with Hazael, when<sup>40</sup> he might haue leauied (as his sonne after him did muster) three hundred thousand chosen men for the warre, doth well enough shew his temper. Yet now he would needs be valiant, and make his people know, how stout of disposition their King was, when hee might haue his owne will. But his timorous heart was not well cloaked. For to encounter with a few bands of Routers, hee tooke a verie great Armie, so that wise men might well perceiue, that he knew what he did, making shew as if he would fight for his Countrie, and expose himselfe to danger of warre, when as indeed all was mere ostentation, and no perill to be feared; hee going forth so stronglie appointed, against so weake enemies. Thus might wise men thinke, and laugh at him in secret; considering what adoe he made about that, which in all apparent reason was (as they say) a thing of nothing.<sup>50</sup> But God, before whom the wisdome of this world is foolishnesse, did laugh not onely at this vaine-glorious King, but at them that thought their King secure, by reason of the multitude that he drew along with him.

When the Aramites and King Ioas met, whether it were by some folly of the Leaders, or by some amazement happening among the Souldiers, or by whatsoever means it pleased God to worke, so it was, that that great Army of Iuda receiued a notable overthrow, and all the Princes were destroyed : the Princes of Iuda, at whose perswasion the King had become a Rebelle to the King of Kings. As for Ioas himselfe (as Abulenfis and others expound the storie) he was sorely beaten and hurt by them, being (as they thinke) taken and shamefully tormented, to wring out of him an excessive ransom.

And surely, all circumstances doe greatly strengthen this conjecture. For the text (in the old translation) saith, they exercised vpon Ioas ignominious iudgements; and that departing from him, they dismissed him in great languor. All which argues, that they had him in their hands, and handled him ill-fauouredly. Now at that time Ioas the sonne of Iehobabaz reigned ouer Israel, and Benbadad the sonne of Hazael ouer the Syrians in Damascus; the one a valiant vnder-taking Prince, raised vp by God to restore the State of his miserable Countrie; the other inferiour euery way to his father, of whose purchases hee lost a great part, for want of skill to keepe it. The difference in condition found betweene these two Princes, promising no other euent than such as afterward followed, might haue giuen to the King of Iuda good cause to be bold, and plucke vp his spirits, which Hazael had beaten downe, if God had not bene against him. But his fearefull heart becing likely to take vpon any apprehension of danger, was able to put the Syrian King in hope; that by terrifying him with some shew of Warre at his doores, it were easie to make him craue any tolerable conditions of peace. The vnexpected good successe hereof, already related, and the (perhaps as unexpected) ill successe, which the Aramites found in their following Warres against the King of Israel, sheweth plainly the weaknesse of all earthly might, resisting the power of the Almighty.<sup>20</sup> For by his Ordinance, both the Kingdome of Iuda, after more then fortie yeeres time of gathering strength, was vnable to driue out a small companie of Enemies; and the Kingdome of Israel, hauing so been trodden downe by Hazael, that onely fifty Horsemen, tenne Chariots, and tennethousand Foot-men were left; preuailed against his Sonne, and recovered all from the victorious Aramites. But examples heereof are euenie where found, and therefore I will not insist vpon this; though indeed wee should not, if wee be Gods children, thinke it more tedious to heare long and frequent reports of our heavenly Fathers honour, than of the noble actes performed by our fore-father vpon earth.

When the Aramites had what they listed, & saw that they were not able, being so few, to take any possession of the Countrie, they departed out of Iuda laden with spoyle, which they sent to Damascus, themselves belike falling vpon the ten Tribes, where it is to be thought that they sped not halfe so well. The King of Iuda being in ill case, was killed on his bed when he came home, by the sonnes of an Ammonitess, and of a Moabitess, whom some (because onely their Mothers names, being strangers, are expressed) thinke to haue bene bond-men. Whether it were contempt of his fortune, or feare, lest (as Tyrants vse) he should reuenge his disaster vpon them, imputing it to their fault, or whatsoever else it were that animated them to murder their King; the Scripture tels vs plainly, that, For the blood of the children of Iehoiada, this befell him. And the same appeares to haue bene vsed as the pretence of their conspiracie, in excuse of the fact when it was done. For Amazias, the sonne and successor of Ioas, durst not punish them, till his Kingdome was established : but contrariwise, his bodie was judged vnworthie of buriall in the Sepulchers of the Kings : whereby it appeares, that the death of Zacharia caused the treason, wrought against the King, to find more approbation, than was requisite, among the people, though afterwards it was recompensed by his Sonne, vpon the Traytors, with well-deserued death.

§. VI.

Of the Princes lining in the time of Ioas : of the time when Carthage was built; and of Dido.

Here liued with Ioas, Mezades and Diognetus in Athens; Eudemus and Aristodemus in Corinth; about which time Agrippa Syluius, and after him Syluius Alaudius, were Kings of the Albans in Isalie. Ocraxapes, commonly called Amacyn, the thirtieth King succeeding vnto Ophratanes, began his reigne ouer the Assyrians, about the eighteenth yeere of Ioas, which lasted fortie two yeeres. In the sixteenth of Ioas, Cephrenes, the fourth from Sesac, succeeded vnto Cheops in the Kingdome of Egypt, and held it fiftie yeeres.

In this time of Ioas, was likewise the reigne of Pigmalion in Tyre, and the foundation of

of Carthage by Dido; the building of which Citie is, by diuers Authors, placed in diuers ages, some reporting it to be 70. yeeres yonger than Rome, others about 400. yeeres elder, few or none of them giuing any reason of their assertions, but leauing vs vncertaine whom to follow: Iosephus, who had read the Annals of Tyre; counting one hundred fortie and three yeeres and eight moneths from the building of Salomons Temple, in the twelfth yeere of Hiram King of Tyre, to the founding of Carthage by Dido, in the seventh of Pigmalion. The particulars of this accompt (which is not rare in Iosephus) are very perplexed, and serue not very well to make cleere the totall summe. But whether it were so that Iosephus did omit, or else that he did mis-write some number of the yeeres, which he reckoneth in Fractions, as they were diuided among the Kings of Tyre, from Hiram to Pigmalion, we may well enough beleue, that the Tyrian writers, out of whose bookes hee giues vs the whole summe, had good meanes to know the truth, and could rightlie reckon the difference of time, betwene two workes no longer following one the other, than the memorie of three or foure generations might easily reach. This hundred fortie and foure yeeres current, after the building of Salomons Temple, being the eleventh yeere of Dauid, was a hundred fortie and three yeeres before the birth of Rome, and after the destruction of Troy, two hundred eighty and nine: a time so long after the death of Aeneas, that wee might truly conclude all to be fabulous which Virgil hath written of Dido, as Ausonius noteth, who doth honour her Statua with this Epigram:

Ant. Ep. 117.

*Illa ego sum Dido vulu quam conspicis hospes, Asimulata modis pulchraq; mirificis.
Talis eram, sed non Maro quam mihi finxit, erat mens;
Vita nec incestus. Lata cupidinibus, (Namq; nec Aeneas vidit me Troius unquam
Nec Lybiam aduenit, classibus Iliacis.
Sed furias fugiens, atq; arma procacis Iarbae,
Seruauit, fateor, morte pudicitiam;
Pectore transfixo, castos quod pertulit enses)
Non furor, aut laeso crudus amore dolor:
Sic cecidisse iunat: vixi sine vulnere fama,
Vlta virum, postis manibus oppeti.
Inuida cur in me stimulaſti Musa Maronem,
Fingeret ut noſtra damna pudicitie?
Vos magis Historicis lectores credite de me
Quam qui furta Deum concubitusq; canunt.
Falsidici vates: temerant qui carmine verum,
Humanisq; deos asimulant vitijs.*

Which in effect is this,

I Am that Dido which thou heere do'st see,
Cunningly framed in beauteous Imag'rie.
Like this I was, but had not such a foule,
As Maro fained, incestuous and foule.
Aeneas neuer with his Trojan hoast
Beheld my face, or landed on this coast.
But flying proud Iarbas villanie,
Not mou'd by furious loue or iealousie;
I did with weapon chaste, to saue my fame,
Make way for death vntimely, ere it came.
This was my end; but first I built a Towne, Reueng'd my husbands death, liv'd with renowne.
Why did'st thou stirre vp Virgil, enuious Muse,
Falsely my name and honour to abuse?
Readers beleue Historians; not those Which to the world Ioues thefts and vice expose.
Poets are lyers, and for verses sake
Will make the gods of humane crimes partake.

From

From the time of Dido vnto the first Punick warre, that Carthage grew and flourished in wealth and conquests, we finde in many histories: but in particular wee finde little of the Carthaginian affaires before that warre, excepting those few things that are recorded of their attempts of the Isle of Sicil. Wee will therefore deferre the relation of matters concerning that mightie Citie, vntill such time as they shall encounter with the State of Rome, by which it was finally destroyed; and prosecute in the meane while the Historie that is now in hand.

§. VII.

The beginning of Amazia his reigne. Of Ioas King of Israel, and Elifha the Prophet.

AMAZIA, the sonne of Ioas, being twenty five yeeres old when his Father died, tooke possession of the Kingdome of Iuda, wherein he laboured so to demeane himselfe, as his new beginning reigne might be least offensiue. The Law of Moses he professed to obserue; which howsoever it had beene secretly despised since the time of Iehoram, by many great persons of the Land, yet had it by prouision of good Princes, yea and of bad ones (in their best times) imitating the good, but especially by the care of holy Priests, taken such deepe root in the peoples hearts, that no King might hope to be very plausible, who did not conforme himselfe vnto it. And at that present time, the slaughter, which the Aramites had made of all the Princes, who had withdrawn the late King from the seruice of God, being seconded by the death of the King himselfe, even whilst that execrable murder, committed by the King vpon Zecharia, was yet fresh in memorie, did serue as a notable example of Gods iustice against Idolaters, both to animate the better sort of the people in holding the Religion of their fathers, and to discourage Amazia from following the way, which led to such an euill end. He therefore, hauing learned of his father the arte of dissimulation, did not onely forbear to punish the Traytors that had slaine King Ioas, but gaue way to the time, and suffered the dead body to be interred, as that of Iehoram formerly had beene, in the City of Dauid, yet not among the Sepulchers of the Kings of Iuda. Neuertheless, after this, when (belike) the noyse of the people hauing wearied it selfe into silence, it was found that the Conspirators (howsoever their deed done, was applauded as the handie worke of God) had neither any mighty partakers in their fact, nor strong maintainers of their persons, but rested secure, as hauing done well, seeing it was not ill taken: the King, who perceiued his gouernment well established, called them into question, at such a time, as the heate of mens affections being well allayed, it was easie to distinguish between their treasons and Gods judgements, which, by their treasons had taken plausible effect. So they were put to death without any tumult, and their children (as the Law did require) were suffered to liue; which could not but giue contentment to the people, seeing that their King did the office of a iust Prince, rather than of a reuenging sonne. This being done, and his owne life better secured, by such exemplary iustice, against the like attempts; Amazia carried himselfe outwardly as a Prince well affected to Religion, and so continued in rest, about twelue or thirteene yeeres.

As Amazia gathered strength in Iuda by the commoditie of a long peace, so Ioas the Israelite grew as fast in power, by following the warre hotly against the Aramites. Hee was a valiant and fortunate Prince, yet an Idolater, as his Predecessors had beene, worshipping the Calues of Ieroboam. For this sinne had God so plagued the house of Iehu, that the tenne Tribes wanted little of being vtterly consumed, by Hazael and Benhadad, in the time of Iehu and his sonne Iehoahaz. But as Gods benefite to Iehu, sufficed not to with-draw him from this politique Idolatrie; so were the miseries, rewarding that impie, vnable to reclaim Iehoahaz from the same impious course: yet the mercy of God beholding the trouble of Israel, did condescend vnto the prayers of this vngodlie Prince, euen then when hee and his miserable subiects, were obstinate in following their owne abominable waies. Therefore in temporall matters the tenne Tribes recovered apce, but the fauour of God, which had beene infinitely more worth, I doe not finde, nor beleue, that they sought; that they had it not, I finde in the words of the Prophet, saying plainely to Amazia, The Lord is not with Israel, neither with all the house of Ephraim.

2 Chron. 25. 7.

Whether

Whether it were so, that the great Prophet Elisba, who liued in those times, did foretell the prosperitie of the Israelites vnder the Reigne of Ioas; or whether Iehoabaz, wearied and broken with long aduersitie, thought it the wisest way, to discharge himselfe in part of the heauie cares attending those vnhappy Syrian Warres, by laying the burthen vpon his hopefull sonne; wee findethat in the thirtieth-seuenth yeere of Ioas, King of Iuda, Ioas the sonne of Ichoahaz began to reigne ouer Israel in Samaria, which was in the 15. yeere of his fathers reigne, and some two or three yeeres before his death.

It appeares that this young Prince, euen from the beginning of his Rule, did so well husband that poore stocke that he receiued from his Father, of ten Chariots, fiftie Horsemen, and ten thousand Foot, that he might seeme likely to proue a thrifier. Amongst other circumstances, the words which he spake to Elisba the Prophet, argue no lesse. For Ioas visiting the Prophet, who lay sicke, spake vnto him thus; O my father, my father, the Chariot of Israel, and the horse-men of the same: by which manner of speecch he did acknowledge, that the prayers of this holy man had stood his Kingdome in more stead, than all the Horses and Chariots could doe.

This Prophet who succeeded vnto Elisba, about the first yeere of Ioas the sonne of Ahab King of Israel, died (as some haue probably collected) about the third or fourth yeere of this Ioas, the Nephew of Iehu. To shew how the spirit of Elisba was doubled, or did rest vpon him; it exceedeth my facultie. This is recorded of him, that hee did not onely raise a dead childe vnto life, as Elisba had done, but when hee himselfe was dead, it pleased God that his dead bones should restore life vnto a carcase, which touched them in the graue. In fine, hee bestowed, as a legacie, three victories vpon King Ioas, who thereby did set Israel in a faire way of recovering all that the Aramites had usurped, and weakening the Kings of Damasco in such sort, that they were neuer after terrible to Samaria.

§. VIII.

Of Amazia his warre against Edom; His Apostasie; and overthrow by Ioas.

Hee happie successe which Ioas had found in his warre against the Aramites, was so such as might kindle in Amazia a desire of vndertaking some expedition, wherein himselfe might purchase the like honour. His kingdome could furnish three hundred thousand seruiceable men for the Warres; and his treasures were sufficient for the payment of these, and the hire of many more. Cause of warre hee had very iust against the Edomites, who hauing rebelled in the time of his grand-father Iehoram, had about fifty yeeres beene vnreclaimed, partly by reason of the troubles happening in Iuda, partly through the sloth and timoroufnesse of his father Ioas. Yet, forasmuch as the men of Iuda had in many yeeres beene without all exercise of Warre (excepting that vnhappy fight wherein they were beaten by a few bands of the Aramites) hee held it a point of wisdom to increase his forces, with souldiers waged out of Israel, whence hee hired for an hundred talents of siluer, an hundred thousand valiant men, as the Scripture telleth vs, though Iosephus diminish the number, saying that they were but twentie thousand.

This great Armie, which with so much cost Amazia had hired out of Israel, hee was faine to dismisse, before hee had employed it, being threatened by a Prophet with ill successe, if hee strengthened himselfe with the helpe of those men, whom God (though in mercy hee gaue them victorie against the cruell Aramites) did not loue, because they were Idolaters. The Israelites therefore departed in great anger, taking in ill part this dismission, as an high disgrace; which to reuenge, they fell vpon a piece of Iuda in their returne, and shewed their malice in the slaughter of three thousand men; and some spoyle, which they carried away. But Amazia with his owne forces, knowing that God would bee assistant to their journey, entered courageously into the Edomites Countrie; over whom obtaining victorie, hee slew ten thousand, and tooke other ten thousand prisoners, all which hee threw from an high rocke; holding them, it seemes, rather as Traytors, than as iust enemies. This victorie did not seeme to reduce Edom vnder the subjection of the Crowne of Iuda, which might bee the cause of that seueritie, which was vsed to the prisoners; the Edomites that had escaped, refusing to buy the liues of their friends and kinsmen at so deare a rate, as the losse of their owne libertie. Some townes in mount

Sir, Amazia tooke, as appeares by his carrying away the Idols thence; but it is like they were the places most indetensible, in that hee left no garrisons there, whereby hee might another yeere the better haue pursued the conquest of the whole Countrie. Howsoever it were, hee got both honour by the iourney, and gaires enough, had hee not lost himselfe.

Among other spoyles of the Edomites, were carried away their gods, which being vanquished and taken prisoners, did deserue well to be led in triumph. But they contrariwise know not by what strange witchcraft, so besotted this vnworthy King Amazia, that hee set them up to be his gods, and worshipped them, and burned incense vnto them.

For this when hee was rebuked by a Prophet sent from God, hee gaue a charlish and threatening answer; asking the Prophet, Who made him a Counsellor, and bidding him hold his peace for feare of the worst. If either the costly stuffe, whereof these Idols were made, or the curious workmanship and beautie, with which they were adorned by Artificers, had rauished the Kings fancie, hee should haue rather turned them to matter of profit, or kept them as house-hold ornaments and things of pleasure, than thereby haue suffered himselfe to be blinded, with such vnreasonable deuotion towards them. If the superstitious account wherein the Edomites had held them, were able to worke much vpon his imagination; much more should the bad seruice which they had doneto their old Clients, haue moued him thereupon to laugh, both at the Edomites; and them. Wherefore it seemes to me, that the same affections carried him from God;

vnto the seruice of Idols, which afterwards moued him to talke so roughly to the Prophet reprehending him. Hee had already obeyed the warning of God by a Prophet, and sent away such auxiliarie forces as hee had gathered out of Israel; which done, it is said, that hee was encouraged, and led forth his people, thinking belike, that God would now rather assist him by miracle, than let him faile of obtaining all his hearts desire. But with better reason hee should haue limited his desires by the will of God, whose pleasure it was, that Esaui hauing broken the yoke of Jacob from his necke, accordingly as Isaac had foretold, should no more become his seruant. If therefore Amazia did hope to reconquer all the Countrie of Edom, hee failed of his expectation; yet so, that hee brought home both profit and honour, which might haue well contented him.

But there is a foolish and a wretched pride, wherewith men being transported, can ill endure to ascribe vnto God the honour of those actions, in which it hath pleased him to vse their owne industrie, courage, or fore-sight. Therefore it is commonly scene, that they, who entering into battaile, are carefull to pray for aide from heauen, with due acknowledgement of his power, who is the giuer of victorie; when the field is wonne, doe vaunt of their owne exploits: one telling how hee got such a ground of aduantage; another, how hee gaue checke to such a battalion; a third, how hee seized on the enemies Cannon; every one struing to magnifie himselfe, whilst all forget God, as one that had not bene present in the action. To ascribe to fortune the effects of another mans vertue, is, I confesse, an argument of malice. Yet this is true, that as hee which findeth better success, than hee did, or in reason might expect, is deeply bound to acknowledge God the Author of his happinesse; so he whose meere wisdom and labour hath brought things to a prosperous issue, is doubly bound to shew himselfe thankfull, both for the victory, and for those vertues by which the victorie was gotten. And indeed so farre from weaknesse is the nature of such thanksgiuing, that it may well be called the height of magnanimity; no vertue being so truly heroically, as that by which the spirit of man aduanceth itselfe with confidence of acceptation, vnto the loue of God. In which sense it is a braue speech that Euannder in Virgil, vseth to Aeneas, none but a Christian being capable of the admonition:

Aude hospes contemnere opes, & te quoque dignum Finge Deo.

With this Philosophie Amazia (as appeares by his carriage) troubled not his head: hee had shewed himselfe a better man of warre than any King of Iuda, since the time of Iehosaphat, and could be well contented, that his people should thinke him little inferior to Dauid: of which honour hee saw no reason why the Prophets should rob him, who had made him lose an hundred talents, and done him no pleasure; hee hauing preuailed by plaine force and good conduct, without any miracle at all. That hee was distempered with such vaine thoughts as these (besides the witness of his impietie following) Iosephus doth testifie;

testifie, saying, That he despised God, and that being putt vp with his good successe, of which neuertheless he would not acknowledge God to be the Author, he commanded Ioas King of Israel to become his subject, and to let the tenne Tribes acknowledge him their Soueraigne, as they had done his Ancestors King Dauid and Salomon. Some thinke that his quarrell to Ioas was rather grounded vpon the iniurie done to him by the Israelites, whom hee dismissed in the journey against Mount Seir. And likely it is, that the sense of a late wrong had more power to stirre him vp, than the remembrance of an olde tittle, forgotten long since, and by himselfe neglected thirteene or fouretee yeeeres. Neuertheless it might so be, that when he was thus prouoked, hee thought it not enough to requite new wrongs, but would also call old matters into question; that so the Kings of Israel might, at the least, learne to keepe their subjects from offending Juda, for feare of endangering their owne Crownes. Had Amazias desired onely recompence for the iniurie done to him, it is not improbable that hee should haue had some reasonable answer from Ioas, who was not desirous to fight with him. But the answer which Ioas returned, likening himselfe to a Cedar, and Amazias in respect of him to no better than a thistle, shewes that the challenge was made in insolent termes, stuffed perhaps with such proud comparison of Nobilitie, as might bee made (according to that which Iosephus had written) betweene a King of ancient race, and one of lesse nobilitie than vertue.

It is by Sophocles reported of Ajax, that when going to the warre of Troy, his father did bid him to be valiant, and get victorie by Gods assistance, he made answer, That by Gods assistance, a coward could get victorie, but hee would get it alone without such helpe: after which proud speech, though he did many valiant acts, he had small thanks, and finally killing himselfe in a madnesse, whereinto hee fell vpon disgrace received, was hardly allowed the honour of buriall. That Amazias did utter such words, I doe not finde: but hauing once entertained the thoughts, which are parents of such words, hee was rewarded with successe according. The verie first counsaile wherein this warre was concluded, serues to proue that hee was a wise Prince indeed at Jerusalem, among his Parasites; but a foole when he had to deale with his equals abroad. For it was not all one, to fight with the Edomites, a weake people, trusting more in the site of their Country, than the valour of their Souldiers; and to encounter with Ioas, who from so poore beginnings had rayled himselfe to such strength, that hee was able to lead his friend a hundred thousand men, and had all his Nation exercised, and trained vp, in a long victorious warre. But as Amazias discovered much want of iudgement, in vnder-taking such a match; so in prosecuting the businesse, when it was set on foot, hee behaued himselfe as a man of little experience, who hauing once onely tried his fortune, and found it to bee good, thought that in Warre there was nothing else to doe, than send a defiance, fight, and winne. Ioas on the contrarie side, hauing beene accustomed to deale with a stronger enemy than the King of Juda, vsed that celeritie, which peradventure had often stood him in good stead against the Aramite. Hee did not sit waiting till the enemies brake in and wasted his Country, but presented himselfe with an Armie in Juda, readie to bid battaile to Amazias, and saue him the labour of a long iourne. This could not but greatly discourage those of Juda; who (besides the impression of feare which an inuasion beates into people, not inured to the like) hauing deuoured, in their greedie hopes, the spoyle of Israel, fully perswading themselves to get as much, and at as easie rate as in the iourne of Edom; were so farre disappointed of their expectation, that well they might suspect all new assurance of good lucke, when the olde had thus beguiled them. All this notwithstanding, their King that had stomack enough to challenge the Patrimoine of Salomon, thought like another Dauid to winne it by the sword. The issue of which foole-hardinesse might easily haue beene foreseene in humane reason; comparing together, either the two Kings, or the qualitie of their Armies, or the first and ominous beginning of the Warre. But mere humane wisdom, howsoever it might foresee much, could not haue prognosticated all the mischief that fell vpon Amazias. For as soone as the two Armies came in sight, God, whose helpe this wretched man had so despised, did (as Iosephus reports it) strike such terror and amazement into the men of Juda, that without one blow giuen, they fled all away, leaving their King to shift for himselfe, which hee did so ill, that his enemy had soone caught him, and made him change his glorious humour into most abiect basenesse. That the Armie which fled fled, sustained any other losse than of honour, I neither finde in the Scriptures nor in Iosephus; it being likely that the soone beginning of their flight, which made it the more shamefull, made it also the more safe. But of the mischief that followed this ouerthrow, it was Gods will that Amazias himselfe should sustaine the whole disgrace. For Ioas carried him directly to Jerusalem, where he had him procure that the gates might be opened to let him in and his Armie; threatening him otherwise with present death. So much amazed was the miserable caytiue, with these dreadfull words, that he durst do no other, than perswade the Citizens, to yeeld themselves to the mercie of the Conqueror. The Towne, which afterwards being in weaker state, held out two yeeeres, against Nebuchad-nessar, was vnterly dismayed, when the King, that should haue giuen his life to saue it, vsed all his force of command and intreaty to betray it. So the gates of Jerusalem were opened to Ioas, with which honour (greater than any King of Israel had euer obtained) he could not rect contented, but, the more to despise Amazias and his people, hee cause 400 cubits of the wall to be throwne down, and entered the Citie in his Chariot through that breach, carrying the King before him, as in triumph. This done, he sackt the Temple, and the Kings Palace, and so, taking hostages of Amazias, he dismissed the poore creature that was glad of his life, and returned to Samaria.

A discourse of the reasons hindering Ioas from uniting Juda to the Crowne of Israel, when he had wonne Jerusalem, and held Amazias prisoner. The end of Ioas his Reigne.

WE may iustly maruell how it came to passe, that Ioas, being thus in possession of Jerusalem, hauing the King in his hands, his enemies forces broken, & his owne entire, could be so content to depart quietly, with a little spoyle, when he might haue seized vpon the whole Kingdome. The reigne of Athalia had giuen him cause to hope, that the issue of Dauid might be dispossessed of that crowne; his owne Nobilitie, being the sonne and grand-childe of Kings, together with the famous acts that hee had done, were enough to make the people of Juda thinke highly of him; who might also haue preferred his forme of gouernment, before that of their owne Kings, especially at such a time, when a long succession of wicked Princes had smothered the thanks, which were due to the memorie of a few good ones. The commodity that would haue ensued, vpon the vnion of all the twelue Tribes, vnder one Prince, is so apparant, that I need not to insist on it. That any message from God forbade the Israelite (as afterwards in the victorie which Peka the sonne of Romelia got vpon Abaz) to turne his present aduantage, to the best vse, wee doe not reade. All this makes it the more difficult to resolue the question, why a Prince so well exercised, as Ioas had beene, in recouering his owne, and winning from his enemy, should forsake the possession of Jerusalem, and wilfully neglect the possibilities, or rather cast away the full assurance of so faire a conquest, as the kingdome of Juda.

But concerning that point, which, of all others, had beene most materiall, I meane the desire of the vanquished people to accept the Israelite for their King, it is plainly seene, that entering Jerusalem in triumphant manner, Ioas was vnable to concoct his owne perpetuall. For the opening of the gates had beene enough to haue let him not onely into the Citie, but into the Royall Throne, and the peoples hearts, whom by faire intreatie (especially hauing sure means of compulsion) he might haue made his owne, when they saw themselves betrayed, and basely giuen away by him whose they had beene before. The faire mark which this opportunity presented, hee did not ayme at, because his ambition was otherwise and more meanelly busied, in louelling at the glory of a triumphant entrie through a breach. Yet this error might afterwards haue been corrected well enough, if entering as an enemy, and shewing what he could doe, by spending his anger vpon the walls, he had within the Citie done offices of a friend, and laboured to shew good will to the inhabitants. But when his pride had done, his courtlinesse beganne, and sought to please it selfe, with that which is commonly most readie to the spoyler, yet should be most forborne. The Treasure wherewith Sesic, Hazael, and the Philistims, men ignorant of the true God and his Religion, had quenched their greedy thirst, ought not to haue tempted the appetite of Ioas, who though an Idolatour, yet acknowledged also and worshipped the eternall God, whose Temple was at Ierusalem. Therefore when the people saw him take his way directly to seise that holy place, and lay his rauinous hands vpon the consecrated vessels, calling the family of Obed Edom (whose children had hereditarie charge of the treasure) to a strict account, as if they had bene Officers of his owne Exchequer; they considered him rather as an execrable Church-robber, than as a Noble Prince, an Israelite and their brother, though of another Tribe. Thus following that course, which the most vertuous King of our age (taxing it with the same phrase) hath wisely auoyded; by stealing a few Apples, he lost the inheritance of the whole Orchard. The people detested him, and after the respite of a few dayes, might by comparing themselves one to one, perceiue his Souldiers to be no better than men of their owne mould, and inferiour in number to the inhabitants of so great a Citie. It is not so easie to hold by force a mighty towne entered by capitulation, as to enter the gates opened by vnadvised feare. For when the Citizens, notwithstanding disarmed, recouer their spirits, and begin to vnderstand their first error; they will thinke vpon euery aduantage, of place, of prouisions; of multitude, yea of women armed with tile-stones; and rather chooseth by desperate resolution, to correct the evils growne out of their former cowardice, than suffer those mischiefs to poison the body, which in such halfe-conquests, are easily tasted in the mouth. A more lively example hereof cannot be desired, than the Citie of Florence, which through the weaknesse of Peter de Medices, governing therein as a Prince, was reduced into such hard termes, that it opened the gates vnto the French King Charles the Eighth, who not plainly professing himselfe either friend or foe to the Estate, entred the Towne, with his Armie, in triumphant manner, himselfe and his horse armed, with his lance vpon his thigh. Many insolencies were therein committed by the French, and much argument of quarrell ministred, betwene them and the Townes-men: so farre forth that the Florentines, to preserve their liberty, were driuen to prepare for fight. To conclude the matter, Charles propounds intollerable conditions, demanding huge summes of ready money, and the absolute Signorie of the State, as conquered by him, who entred the Citie in Armes. But Peter Caponi, a principall Citizen, catching these Articles from the Kings Secretarie, and tearing them before his face, bad him sound his Trumpets, and they would ring their Bells: which peremptorie words made the French be-thinke themselves, and come readily to this agreement, that for fortie thousand pounds, and not halfe of that money to be paid in hand, Charles should not onely depart in peace, but restore whatsoever he had of their Dominion, and continue their assured friend. So dangerous a matter did it seeme for that braue Armie, which in few months after wanne the Kingdome of Naples, to fight in the streets, against the armed multitude of that populous Citie. It is true, that Charles had other businesse (and so perhaps had Ioas, as shall anon be shewed) that called him away: but it was the apprehension of imminent danger that made him come to reason. In such cases the firing of houses, vsually drawes euery Citizen to saue his owne, leauing victory to the Souldier: yet where the people are prepared and resolute, women can quench, as fast as the enemy, hauing other things to looke vnto, can set on fire. And indeede that Commander is more giuen to anger than regardfull of profit, who vpon the vncertaine hope of destroying a Towne, forsakes the assurance of a good composition. Diuersity of circumstance may alter the case: it is enough to say, that it might be in Ierusalem, as we know it was in Florence.

How strongly soeuer Ioas might hold himselfe within Ierusalem, he could not easily depart from thence, with his booty safe, if the Army of Iuda, which had bene more terrified than weakened in the late encounter, should re-enforce it selfe, and giue him a check vpon the way. Wherefore it was wisely done of him, to take hostages for his better security, his Army being vpon returne, and better laden than when it came forth; for which causes it was the more vnapt to fight.

Besides these impediments, within the Citie and without, seruing to coole the ambition of Ioas, and keepe it downe from aspiring to the Crowne of Iuda; it appears that somewhat was newly fallen out, which had reference to the anger of Elisba the Prophet, who when this Ioas had smitten the ground with his arrowes thrice, told him that he should no other smite the Aramites. The three victories which Israel had against Aram, are by some, and with great probability, referred vnto the fifth, sixth and seauenth yeeres yeeres of Ioas: after which time, if any losses ensuing had blemished the former good success, ill might the King of Israel haue likened himselfe to a stately Cedar, and worse could he haue either lent the Iudean one hundred thousand men, or meet him in battell, who was able to bring into the field three hundred thousand of his owne. Seeing therefore it is made plaine by the words of Elisba, that after three victories, Ioas should finde some change of fortune, and suffer losse; we must needs conclude, That the Aramite prevailed vpon him this yeere, it being the last of his Reigne. That this was so, and that the Syrians, taking aduantage of Ioas's absence, gaue such a blow to Israel, as the King at his returne was not able to remedie, but rather fell himselfe into new misfortunes, which increased the calamitie, wee may evidently perceiue in that which is spoken of Ieroboam his sonne. For it is said, That the Lord saw the exceeding bitter afflictions of Israel, and that hauing not decreed to put out the name of Israel from vnder the heauen, he preserved them by the hand of Ieroboam the sonne of Ioas. This is enough to prooue, that the victorious Reigne of Ioas was concluded with a sad catastrophe; the riches of the Temple hastning his miserie and death, as they had done with Sefac, Athalia, and Hazael, and as afterwards they wrought with Antiochus, Crassus, and other sacrilegious Potentates.

Thus eyther through indignation conceiued against him, by the people of Ierusalem, and courage which they tooke to set vpon him within the Walls: or though preparation of the Armie that lay abroad in the Countrey, to bid him battell in open field, and to recover by a new charge the honour which was lost at the former encounter; or through the miseries daily brought vpon his owne Countrey, by the Syrian in his absence, if not by all of these, Ioas was driuen to lay aside all thought of winning the Kingdome of Iuda; and taking hostages for his quiet passage, made all haste homewards, where he found a sad wel-come, and being vtterly forsaken of his wonted prosperitie, forsooke also his life in few moneths after, leauing his Kingdome to Ieroboam the second, his fortunate and valiant sonne.

§. X.

The end of Amazia his Reigne and Life.

Nyman is able to ghesse how Amazia looked; when the enemy had left him. Hee that had vaunted so much of his owne great prowess and skill in Armes, threatening to worke wonders, and set vp a new the glorious Empire of Dauid, was now vncafed of his Lyons hide, and appeared nothing so terrible a beast as hee had bene painted. Much argument of scoffing at him he had ministred vnto such, as held him in dislike, which at this time, doubtlesse, were very many: for the shame that falls vpon an insolent man, seldome failes of meeting with abundance of reproach. As for Amazia (besides that the multitude are alwaies prone to lay the blame vpon their Gouernours, even of those calamities which happened by their owne default) there was no child in all Ierusalem, but knew him to be the root of all this mischiefe. He had not onely challenged a good man of Warre, being himselfe a Dastard; but when he was beaten and taken by him, had basely pleaded for the common enemy, to haue him let into the Citie, that with his owne eyes he might see what spoyle there was, and not make a bad bargain by heare-say. The father of this Amazia, was a beastly man; yet when the Aramites tooke him and tormented him, he did not offer to buy his owne life at so deare a rate, as the Citie and Temple of Ierusalem. Had he offered, should they haue made his promise good: surely the hast which they had made in condescending to this hard match, was very vnfortunate: for by keeping out the Israelite (which was easie enough) any while, they should soone haue bene rid of him, seeing that the Aramites would haue made him runne home, with greater speed than he came forth. Then also, when hauing trusted vp his baggage, he was ready to be gone, a little courage would haue serued to perswade him to leaue his load behind; had not their good King deliuered vp hostages, to secure his returne, as loath to defraud him of the recompence due to his paines taken. Such exprobrations could not but vex the heart of this vnhappie King: it had bene well for him, if they had made him acknowledge his fault vnto God, that had punished him by all this dishonour. But wee finde no mention of his amendment. Rather it appears, that hee continued an Idolator to the very last. For it is said of him, that after his turning away from the Lord, they wrought treason against him in Ierusalem; a manifest prooffe that hee was not reclaimed, vnto his liues end. And certainly, they which tell a man in his aduersitie of his faults passed, shall sooner be thought to vpbraid him with his fortune, than to seeke his reformation. Wherefore it is no maruell, that Priests and Prophets were lesse welcome to him, than euer they had beene. On the other side, flatterers, and such as were desirous to put a heart into him, whereof themselves might alwayes be masters, wanted not plausible matter to reuiue him. For hee was not first, nor second, of the Kings of Iuda, that had beene overcome in battell. Danid himselfe had abandoned the Citie, leauing it, before the Enemie was in sight, vnto Abisalom his rebellious sonne. Many besides him had receiued losses, wherein the Temple bare a part. If *Ioa*s might so easily haue beene kept out, why did their Ancestors let Sesac in? Asa was reputed a vertuous Prince, yet with his owne hands he emptied the Temple, and was not blamed, but held excusable by necessity of the State. Belike these traducers would commend no actions but of dead Princes: if so, hee should rather liue to punish them, than to dye to please them. Though wherein had hee giuen them any cause of displeasure? It was hee indeed that commanded to set open the gates to *Ioa*s; but it was the people that did it. Good seruants ought not to haue obeyed their Masters Commandements, to his disadvantage, when they saw him not master of his owne Person. As his captiuitie did acquire him from blame, of all things that hee did or suffered in that condition; so was that misfortune it selfe, in true estimation, as highly to his honour, as deeply to his losse. For had hee beene as hally to flye, as others were; hee might haue escaped, as well as others did. But seeking to reach the base Multitude courage, by his Royall example, hee was shamefully betrayed by those in whom he trusted. Vnworthy creatures that could readily obey him, when speaking another mans words, being prisoner; hee commanded them to yeeld, hauing neglected his charge, when leading them in the field, he bade them stand to it and fight like men. The best was that they must needs acknowledge his mischance, as the occasion whereby many thousand liues were saved; the Enemie hauing wisely preferred the surprize of a Lion that was Captaine, before the chase and slaughter of an Army of Stags that followed him.

The e or the like words comforting Amazias, were able to perswade him, that it was euent to indeed. And such excuses might haue serued well enough to please the people, if the King had first studied how to please God. But hee that was vnwilling to ascribe vnto God the good successe foretold by a Prophet; could easily finde how to impute this late disaster, vnto fortune, and the fault of others. Now concerning fortune, it seemes that hee meant to keepe himselfe safe from her, by sitting still; for in fifteene yeeres following (so long hee out-liued his honour) we finde not that he stirred. As for his subiects, though nothing henceforth be recorded of his gouernment, yet wee may see by his end, that the middle time was ill spent among them, increasing their hatred, to his owne ruine. He that suspecteth his owne worth, or other mens opinions, thinking the lesse regard is had of his person, than he beleeueth to be due to his place, will commonly spend all the force of his authoritie, in purchasing the name of a seuerer man. For the affected fowrenesse of a vaine fellow, doth many times resemble the grauitie of one that is wise: and the feare wherein they liue, which are subiect vnto oppression, carries a shew of reuerence, to him that does the wrong; at least it serues to dazle the eyes of vnderlings, keeping them from prying into the weaknesse of such as haue iurisdiction ouer them. Thus the time, wherein, by well vsing it, men might attaine to be such as they ought, they do vsually mis-spence, in seeking to appeare such as they are not. This is a vaine & deceiueable course; procuring in stead of the respect that was hoped for, more indignation than was feared. Which is a thing of dangerous consequence, especially when an vnable spirit, being ouer-perted with so high authoritie, is too passionate in the execution of such an Office, as cannot be checked but by violence. If therefore Amazias thought by extreame rigour to hold vp his reputation, what did hee else than striue to make the people thinke he hated them, when of themselves they were apt enough to beleue that he did not loue them? The best was that he had, by reuenging his fathers death provided well enough for his owne securitie: but who should take vengeance (or vpon whom?) of such a murder, wherein euery one had a part? Surely God himselfe, who had not giuen commandement or leaue vnto the people, to take his office out of his hand, in shedding the blood of his Anointed. Yet as Amazias, careless of God, was carried headlong by his owne affections; so his subiects, following the same ill example, without requiring what belonged vnto their duties, rose vp against him, with such headlong furie, that being vnable to defend himselfe in Ierusalem, he was driven to forsake the Citie, and flye to Lachis, for safegard of his life. But so extreame was the hatred conceived against him, and so generally, that neither his absence could allay the rage of it in the Capitall Citie, nor his presence in the Countrey abroad procure friends, to defend his life. Questionlesse, he chose the Towne of Lachis for his refuge, as a place of all other best affected to him; yet found he there none other fauour, than that the people did not kill him with their owne hands: for when the Conspirators (who troubled not themselves about raising an Armie for the matter) sent pursuers after him, he was abandoned to death. Lachis was the vtmost Citie of his Dominion Westward, standing somewhat without the border of Iuda; so that he might haue made an easie escape (if he durst aduenture) into the Territorie of the Philistims, or the Kingdome of Israel. Therefore it may seeme that he was detained there, where certaine it is that he found no kinde of fauour: for had not the people of this Towne, added their owne treason to the generall insurrection; the murderers could not at so good leisure as they did, haue carried away his body to Ierusalem, where they gaue him buriall with his fathers.

§. XI.

of the Interregnum, or vacancie, that was in the Kingdome of Iuda, after the death of Amazias.

IThath already beene shewed, that the reignes of the Kings of Iuda and Israel were sometimes to be measured by compleat yeeres, otherwhiles, by yeeres current: and that the time of one King is now and then confounded with the last yeeres of his fathers Reigne, or the foremost of his sonnes. But we are now arrived at a meere vacation, wherein the Crowne of Iuda lay void eleauen whole yeeres: a thing not plainly set downe in Scriptures, nor yet remembered by Iosephus, and therefore hard to be beleued, were it not proved by necessary consequence.

Twice we finde it written, that Amazias, King of Iuda, liued after the death of *Ioa*s King of Israel fifteene yeeres; whereupon it followes, that the death of Amazias, was about the end of fifteene yeeres compleate, which Ieroboam the second (who in the fifteenth yeere of Amazias was made King ouer Israel) had reigned in Samaria. But the succession of Azarias, who is also called Azarias, vnto his father in the Kingdome of Iuda, was eleauen yeeres later than the sixteenth of Ieroboam: for it is expresse, that Azarias began to reigne in the seauen and twentieth yeere of Ieroboam; the sixteenth yeere of his life, being ioynd with the first of two and fiftie that he reigned. So the Interregnum of eleauen yeeres cannot be diuided, without some hard meanes vsed, of interpreting the Text otherwise than the letter sounds.

Yet some coniectures there are made, which tend to keepe all euene, without acknowledging any void time. For it is thought that in the place last of all cited, by the seauen and twentieth yeere of Ieroboam, we should perhaps vnderstand the seauen and twentieth yeere of his life; or else (because the like words are no where else interpreted in the like sense) that Azarias was eleauen yeeres vnder age, that is, five yeeres old, when his father died, and so his sixteenth yeere might concur with the seauen and twentieth of Ieroboam; or that the Text it selfe may haue suffered some wrong, by miswriting twenty seauen for seauenteene yeeres; and so, by making the seauenteenth yeere of Ieroboam to be newly begun, all may be salued. These are the coniectures of so that worthy man Gerard Mercator: concerning the first of which, it may suffice, that the Author himselfe doth easily let it passe, as improbable; the last is followed by none that I know, neither is it fit, that vpon euery doubt, we should call the text in question, which could not be satisfied in all coppies, if perhaps it were in one: as for the second, it may be held with some qualification, that Azarias began his Reigne being five yeeres old; but then must we adde those eleauen yeeres which passed in his minority, to the two and fiftie that followed his sixteenth yeere, which is all one, in a manner, with allowing an Interregnum.

But why should we be so carefull to auoide an Interregnum in Iuda, seeing that the like necessary necessity hath inforced all good Writers, to acknowledge the like vacancy, twice happening within few yeeres, in the Kingdome of Israel? The space of time betwene Ieroboams death, and the beginning of Zachariahs Reigne, and such another gap found between the death of Peka, and the beginning of Hosea, haue made it easily to be admitted into Samaria, which the consideration of things as they stood in Iuda, when Amazias was slaine, doth make more probable to haue happened there, yet although the necessity of computation were not so apparant.

For the publike furie, hauing so farre extended it selfe, as vnto the destruction of the Kings owne person, was not like to be appeased without order taken for obtaining some redresse of those matters, which had caused it at the first to breake forth into such extremity. We neede not therefore wonder how it came to passe, that they which already had throwne themselves into such an horrible treason, should afterwards dare to withhold the Crowne from a Prince of that age, which being inuested in all ornaments of Regality, is neuertheless exposed to many iniuries, proceeding from head-strong and forgetfull subiects.

As for their coniecture, who make Azaria to haue beene King but one and forty yeeres, after he came out of his non-age; I dare not allow it, because it agrees too harshly with the Text. The best opinion were that, which giues vnto Ieroboam cleauen yeeres of Reigne with his Father, before he began to reigne single in the fiftieth of Amazias; did it not swallow vp almost the whole Reigne of Iosias, and extending the yeeres of those which reigned in Israel (by making such of them compleat, as were onely current) and take at the shortest the Reignes of Princes ruling in other Nations. But I will not stand to dispute further of this: euery man may follow his owne opinion, and see mine more plainly in the Chronologicall Table, drawne for these purposes.

§. XII.

Of Princes Contemporarie with Amazias, and more particularly of Sardanapalus.

THE Princes liuing with Amazias, and in the cleauen yeeres that followed his death, were Iosias and Ieroboam in Israel; Cephrenes and Mycerinus in Egypt; Syluius Alladius, and Syluius Auentinus in Alba; Agamemnon in Corinth; Diogenetus Pheredus, and Ariphron in Athens; in Lacedaemon Theleclus, in whose time the Spartans wan from the Achaians, Gerauthe, Amycle, and some other Townes.

But more notable than all these, was Assyrian Sardanapalus, who in the one and twentieth yeere of Amazias, succeeding his father Ocrasapes or Anacynadaraxes, reigned twenty yeeres, and was slaine the last of the cleuen void yeeres which fore-went the Reigne of Azaria. In him ended (as most agree) the line of Ninus, which had held that Empire one thousand, two hundred and fortie yeeres. A most luxurious and effeminate Palliard he was, passing away his time among strumpets, whom he imitated both in apparel and behaviour.

In these voluptuous courses he liued an unhappy life, knowing himselfe to be so vile, that he durst not let any man haue a sight of him; yet seene he was at length, and the sight of him was so odious, that it procured his ruine. For Arbaces, who gouerned Media vnder him, finding meanes to behold the person of his King, was so incensed with that beastly spectacle, of a man disguised in womans attire, and struiuing to counterfeit an harlot, that he thought it a great shame to liue vnder the command of so vnworthy a creature. Purposing therefore to free himselfe and others from so base subiection, he was much encouraged by the prediction of Belesus or Belosus a Chaldean, who told him plainly, that the Kingdome of Sardanapalus should fall into his hands. Arbaces well pleased with the propheticie, did promise vnto Belesus himselfe the gouernment of Babylon; and so concluding how to handle the business, one of them stirred vp the Medes, and allured the Persians into the quarrell, the other perswaded the Babylonians and Arabians to venture themselves in the same cause. These foure Nations armed fortie thousand men against Sardanapalus, who in this danger was not wanting to himselfe, but gathering such forces as he could, out of other Nations, encountred the rebels, as one that would by deedes refute the tales that they had told of him. Neither did his carriage in the beginning of that warre, answere to the manner of his retirednesse. For in three battles he carried away the better, driving Arbaces and his followers into such fearefull rearmes, that had not Belesus promised them constantly some vnexpected succours, they would forth with haue broken vp their Campe. About the same time, an Armie out of Bactria was coming to assist the King; but Arbaces encountering it vpon the way, perswaded so strongly by promise of liberty, that those forces ioyned themselves with his. The sodaine departure of the enemy seeming to be a flight, caused Sardanapalus to feast his Armie, triumphing before victory. But the Rebels being strengthened with this new supply, came vpon him by night, and forced his Campe, which through ouer-great security was vnprepared for resistance.

This ouerthrow did so weaken the Kings heart, that leaving his wiues brother Salamenus to keepe the field, he withdrew himselfe into the Citie of Ninive; which, till new aidest that he sent for should come, he thought easily to defend; it hauing beene propheticd, that Ninive should neuer be taken, till the Riuer were enemy to the Towne. Of the greatnesse and strength of Ninive, enough hath beene spoken in our discourse of Ninus. It was so well victualled, that Arbaces (hauing in two battles ouerthrowne the Kings Armie, and slaine Salamenus) was faine to lye two whole yeeres before it, in hope to winne it by famine; whereof yet he saw no appearance. It seemes that he wanted Engines and skill to force those wals, which were a hundred foote high, and thicke enough for three Charriots in front to passe vpon the rampire. But that which he could not doe in two yeeres, the Riuer of Tygris did in the third: for being high swolne with raines, it not onely drowned a part of the Citie through which it ran, but threw downe twentie furlongs of the wall, and made a faire breach for Arbaces to enter.

Sardanapalus, either terrified with the accomplishment of the old Oracle, or seeing no meanes of resistance left, shutting vp himselfe into his Palace, with his wiues, Eunuchs and all his treasures, did set the house on fire, wherewith he and they were together consumed. Strabo speaks of a monument of his, that was in Anchiale a Citie of Cilicia, whereon was found an inscription, shewing that he built that Citie and Tharsus vpon one day: but the addition hereto, bidding men eate and drinke, and make merry, encouraging others, with verses well knowne, to a voluptuous life, by his owne example, testified that his nature was more prone to sensuality, than to any vertue becoming a Prince.

There are some that faintly report otherwise of his end; saying that Arbaces, when he first found him among his Concubines, was so enraged, that suddenly he slew him with a dagger. But the more generall consent of Writers agrees with this relation of Diodorus Siculus, who citeth Ctesias a Greeke Writer, that liued in the Court of Persia, where the truth might best be knowne.

Concerning the Princes which reigned in Assyria; from the time of Semiramis, vnto Sardanapalus, though I beleue that they were sometimes (yet not, as Orosius hath it, incessantly) busied, in offensive or else defensive armes; yet for the most part of them I doe better trust Diodorus Siculus, who saith that their names were ouerpasse by Ctesias, because they did nothing worthy of memory. Whatsoeuer they did; that which Theophilus Antiochenus hath said of them is very true; Silence and obliuion hath oppressed them.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of Vzzia.

§. I.

The prosperitie of Vzzia, and of Ieroboam the second, who reigned with him in Israel. Of the Anarchie that was in the ten Tribes after the death of Ieroboam. Of Zacharia, Salum, Menahem and Pekahia.

Vzzia, who is also called Azaria, the sonne of Iotham, was made King of Iuda, when he was sixteen yeeres old, in the seauen and twentieth yeere of Ieroboam the sonne of Iosias King of Israel. He serued the God of his father David, and had therefore good successe in all his enterprises. He built Eloth, a Towne that stood nere to the Red Sea, and restored it to Iuda. He ouercame the Philistims, of whose Townes he dismanted some, and built others in sundry parts of their Territories. Also he got the masteire ouer some parts of Arabia, and brought the Ammonites to pay him tribute. Such were the fruits of his prosperous warres, wherein (as Iosephus rehearseth his acts) he began with the Philistims, and then proceeded vnto the Arabians and Ammonites. His Armie consisted of three hundred and seauen thousand men of warre, ouer which were appointed two thousand and sixe hundred Captaines. For all this multitude the King prepared shields, and speares, and helmets, and other Armes requisite; following therein happily a course quite opposite vnto that which some of his late predeceffours had held, who thought it better policie to vse the seruice of the Nobilitie, than of the multitude, carrying forth to warre the Princes and all the Charriots.

As the victories of Vzzia were farre more important, than the achievements of all that had reigned in Iuda, since the time of David, so were his riches and magnificent workes, equall, if not superiour to any of theirs that had bene Kings betwene him and Salomon. For besides that great conquests are wont to repay the charges of Warre with triple interest, he had the skill to vse, as well as the happinesse to get. He turned his Lands to the best vse, keeping Ploughmen and Dreffers of Vines, in grounds conuenient for such husbandry. In other places he had Cattell feeding, whereof he might well keepe great store, hauing won so much from the Ammonites and Arabians, that had abondance of waste ground seruing for pasturage. For defence of his Cattell and Heardsmen, he built Towres in the wilderness. He also digged many Cisternes or Ponds. Iosephus calls them Water-courses, but in such dry grounds, it was enough that he found water, by digging in the most likely places. If by these Towres he so commanded the water, that none could without his consent, releue themselves therewith, questionlesse he tooke the onely course, by which he might securely hold the Lordship ouer all the Wilderness, it being hardly passable, by reason of the extreame drought, when the few Springs therein found, are left free to the vse of Trauailers.

Besides all this cost, and the building both of Eloth by the Red Sea, and of sundry Townes among the Philistims; he repaired the wall of Ierusalem, which Iosias had broken downe, and fortified it with Towres, whereof some were an hundred and fifty Cubits high.

The State of Israel did neuer so flourish, as at this time, since the diuision of the twelve Tribes into two Kingdomes. For as Vzzia preuailed in the South, so (if not more) Ieroboam the sonne of Iosias, King of the ten Tribes, enlarged his border on the North, where obtaining many victories against the Syrians, he wan the Royall Citie of Damascus, and he wan Hamath, with all the Countie thereabout from the entring of Hamath, vnto the Sea of the Wilderness, that is, (as the most expound it) vnto the vast deserts of Arabia, the end whereof was vndiscovered. So the bounds of Israel in those parts, were in time of this Ieroboam, the same (or not much narrower) which they had bene in the Reigne of David.

But

But it was not for the pietie of Ieroboam, that he thrived so well, for he was an Idolater: it was onely the compassion which the Lord had on Israel, seeing the exceeding bitter affliction, whereinto the Aramites had brought his people, which caused him to alter the successe of warre, and to throw the victorious Aramites vnder the feete of those whom they had so cruelly oppressed. The line of Iehu, to which God had promised the Kingdome of Israel vnto the fourth generation, was now not farre from the end; and now againe it was inuited vnto repentance, by new benefites, as it had bene at the beginning. But the sinne of Ieroboam the sonne of Nebat, was held so precious, that neither the Kingdome it selfe, giuen to him by God, was able to draw Iehu from that politike Idolatry; nor the misery falling vpon him and his posteritie, to bring them to a better course of Religion; nor yet, at the last, this great prosperity of Ieroboam the sonne of Iosias, to make him render the honour that was due, to the onely giuer of victorie. Wherefore the promise of God, made vnto Iehu, that his sons, vnto the fourth generation, should sit on the throne of Israel, was not enlarged; but, being almost expired, gaue warning of the approaching end, by an accident (so strange, that we, who finde no particulars recorded, can hardly ghesse at the occasions) foregoing the last accomplishment.

When Ieroboam the Sonne of Iosias, after a victorious reigne of one and forty yeeres, had ended his life, it seemes in all reason that Zacharia his sonne, should forthwith haue bene admitted, to reigne in his stead; the Nobilitie of that race hauing gotten such a lustre, by the immediate succession of foure Kings, that any Competitor, had the crowne passed by election, must needs haue appeared base; and the vertue of the last King, hauing bene so great, as might well serue to lay the foundation of a new house, much more to establish the already confirmed right of a family so rooted in possession. All this notwithstanding, two or three and twentie yeeres did passe, before Zacharia the sonne of Ieroboam was, by vni forme consent, receiued as King. The true originall causes hereof were to be found at Dan and Bethel, where the golden Calues did stand: yet second instruments of this disturbance, are likely not to haue bene wanting, vpon which, the wilddome of man was ready to cast an eye. Probable it is, that the Captaines of the Army (who afterwards slew one another, so fast, that in foureteen yeeres there reigned fise Kings) did now by head-strong violence, rent the Kingdome asunder, holding each what he could, and either despising or hating some qualities in Zacharia, vntill after many yeeres, wearied with dissention, and the principall of them perhaps, being taken out of the way by death, for want of any other eminent man, they consented to yeelde all quietly to the son of Ieroboam. That this Anarchie lasted almost three and twenty yeeres, we finde by the difference of time, betwene the fiftenth yeere of Vzzia, which was the last of Ieroboam his one and fortieth (his seauen and twentieth concurring with the first of Vzzia) and the eight and thirtieth of the same Vzzia, in the last sixe moneths whereof Zacharia reigned in Samaria. There are some indeede that by supposing Ieroboam to haue reigned with his father eleauen yeeres, doe cut off the interregnum in Iuda (before mentioned) and by the same reason, abridge this Anarchie, that was before the Reigne of Zacharia in Israel. Yet they leaue it twelue yeeres long: which is time sufficient to proue, that the Kingdome of the ten Tribes was no lesse distempered, than as is already noted. But I chooſe rather to follow the more common opinion, as concurring more exactly with the times of other Princes reigning abroad in the Word, than this doubtfull coniecture, that giues to Ieroboam two and fiftie yeeres, by adding three quarters of his fathers Reigne vnto his owne, which was it selfe indeede so long, that he may well seeme to haue begun it very yong: for I doe not thinke, that God blessed this Idolater, both with a longer reigne, and with a longer life, than he did his seruant David.

Thus much being spoken of the time, wherein the throne of Israel was void, before the reigne of Zacharia, little may suffice to be said of his Reigne it selfe, which lasted but a little while. Sixe moneths onely was he King, in which time he declared himselfe a worshipper of the golden Calues; which was enough to iustifie the iudgement of God, whereby he was slaine. He was the last of Iehu's house; being (inclusiue) the first of that line, which may haue bene some cause of the troubles impeaching his orderly succession: the prophetic hauing determined that race in the fourth generation. But (besides that Gods promise was extended vnto the utmost) there was no warrant giuen to Sallum or to any other, for the death of Zacharia, as had bene giuen to Iehu, for the slaughter of Iehoram, and for the eradication of Ahabs house.

Zacharia

Zacharia hauing bene sixe moneths a King, was then slaine by Sallum, who reigned after him, the space of a moneth in Samaria. What this Sallum was, I doe not finde; save onely that he was a Traytour, and the sonne of one Iabezh, whereby his father got no honour. It seemes that he was one of those, who in time of faction had laboured for himselfe; and now, when all other Competitors were sitten downe, thought easily to preuaile against that King, in whose person the race of Jehu was to faile. Manifest it is, that Sallum had a strong party: for Tiphshah or Thapsa, and the coast thereof euen from Tirzah, where Menahem, his enemy and supplanter then lay, refused to admit, as King in his stead, the man that murdered him. Yet at the end of one moneth, Sallum received the reward of his treason, and was slaine by Menahem who reigned in his place.

Menahem the sonne of Gadi, reigned after Sallum ten yeeres. In opposition to Sallum, his hatred was deadly, and inhumane: for he not onely destroyed Tiphshah, and all that were therein, or therabouts, but heript vp all their women with childe, because they did not open their gates and let him in. Had this cruelty bene vsed in reuenge of Zacharia's death, it is like that he would haue bene as earnest, in procuring vnto him his Fathers Crowne when it was first due. But in performing that office, there was vsed such long deliberation, that we may plainly discouer Ambition, Disdaine, and other priuate passions, to haue bene the causes of this beastly outrage.

In the time of Menahem, and (as it seemes) in the beginning of his Reigne, Pul, King of Affria, came against the Land of Israel; whom this new King appealed, with a thousand talents of siluer, leauied vpon all the substantiall men in his Countrey. With this money the Israelite purchased, not onely the peace of his Kingdome, but his owne establishment therein: some factious man (belike) hauing either inuited Pul thither, or (if he came vncalled) sought to vie his helpe, in deposing this ill beloued King. Iosephus reports of this Menahem, that his Reigne was no milder than his entrance. But after tenne yeeres, his tyrannie ended with his life: and Pekahia, his Sonne, occupied his roome.

Of this Pekahia the storie is short: for he reigned onely two yeeres; at the end whereof, he was slaine by Peka, the Sonne of Remaliah, whose treason was rewarded with the Crowne of Israel, as, in time comming, another mans Treason against himselfe shall be. There needs no more to be said of Menahem, and his Sonne, saue that they were, both of them, Idolaters; and the Sonne (as we finde in Iosephus) like to his Father in cruelty. Concerning Pul the Affrian King, who first opened vnto those Northerne Nations the way into Palestina; it will shortly follow in order of the Storie, to deliuer our opinion: whether he were that Belosus (called also Belesus), and by some, Phul Belochus who ioyned with Arbaces the Median, against Sardanapalus, or whether he were some other man. At the present it is more fit that we relate the end of Vzzia's life, who out-liued the happinesse wherein we left him.

§. II.

The end of Vzzia his Reigne and life.

AS the zeale of Iehoiada, that godly Priest, was the meane, to preferue the lineage of Dauid, in the person of Ioas; so it appeares, that the care of holy men was not wanting to Vzzia, to bring him vp, and aduance him to the Crowne of Ida, when the hatred borne to his Father Amaziah, had endangered his succession. For it is said of Vzzia, That he sought God in the dayes of Zecharia (which vnderstood the visions of God) and when as he sought the Lord, God made him prosper.

2 Chron. 26. 5.

Verf. 16.

But, when he was strong, his heart was lifted up to his destruction: for he transgressed against the Lord his God, and went into the Temple of the Lord to burne incense, vpon the Altar of incense. Thus he thought to enlarge his owne authority, by meddling in the Priests office, whose power had in euery extremity bene so helpfull to the Kings of Juda, that meere gratitude, and ciuill policie, should haue held backe Vzzia from incroaching thereupon; yea, though the Law of God had bene silent in this case, and not forbidding it. Howsoeuer the King forgot his dutie, the Priests remembered theirs, and God forgot not to assist them. Azaria the high Priest interrupted the Kings purpose, and gaue him to vnderstand, how little to his honour it would proue, that he tooke vpon him the office of the sonnes of Aaron. There were with Azaria fourescore other Priests, valiant men, but their their valour was shewed onely in assisting the high Priest, when (according to his dutie) he reprehended the Kings presumption. This was enough, the rest God himselfe performed. We finde in Iosephus, that the King had apparelled himselfe in Priestly habit, and that he threatened Azarias and his Companions, to punish them with death, vntill they would be quiet. Iosephus, indeede, enlargeth the Storie, by inserting a great Earthquake, which did teare downe halfe an Hill, that rowled foure furlongs, till it rested against another Hill, stopping vp the high wayes, and spoyling the Kings Garden in the passage. With this Earth-quake, he saith, that the roofof the Temple did cleaue, and that a Sunne-beame did light vpon the Kings face, which was presently infected with leprosie. All this may haue bene true; and some there are who thinke that this Earth-quake is the same, which is mentioned by the Prophet Amos; wherein they doe much misse-reckon the times. For the Earth-quake spoken of by Amos, was in the dayes of Ieroboam King of Israel, who dyed seauen and thirtie yeeres before Vzzia; so that Iotham the Sonne of Vzzia, which supplied his Fathers place in gouernment of the Land, should, by this accompt, haue bene then vnborne: for he was but siue and twenty yeeres old, when he began to reigne as King. Therefore, thus farre onely we haue assurance; that while Vzzia was with the Priests, the leprosie rose up in his forehead, before the Priests. Hereupon he was caused, in all haste, to depart the place, and to liue in a house by himselfe, vntill he dyed; the rule ouer the Kings house, and ouer all the Land, being committed to Iotham, his Sonne, and Successor. Iotham tooke not vpon himselfe the stile of a King, till his Father was dead; whom they buried in the same field wherein his Ancestors lay interred, yet in a Monument a-part from the rest, because he was a Leper.

§. III.

Of the Prophets which liued in the time of Vzzia; and of Princes then ruling in Egypt, and in some other Countries.

IN the time of Vzzia were the first of the lesser Prophets, Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, and Ionas. It is not indeede set downe, when Joel, or Obadiah, did prophesie: but if the Prophets, whose times are not expresse, ought to be ranged (according to Saint Hieromes rule) with the next before them; then must these two be iudged contemporarie with Hosea and Amos, who liued vnder King Vzzia. To enquire which of these siue was the most ancient, it may perhaps be thought, at least a superfluous labour; yet if the age wherein Homer liued, hath so painefully bene sought, without reprehension; how can he be taxed, which offers to search out the antiquitie of these holy Prophets? It seemes to me, that the first of these, in order of time, was the Prophet Ionas; who foretold the great victories of Ieroboam King of Israel; and therefore is like to haue prophesied in the dayes of Ioas, whilest the affliction of Israel was exceeding bitter; the Text it selfe intimating no lesse: by which consequence, he was elder than the other Prophets, whose workes are now extant. But his prophecies that concerned the Kingdome of Israel, are now lost. That which remaineth of him, seemes, not without reason, vnto some very learned, to haue belonged vnto the time of Sardanapalus, in whose dayes Nimue was first of all destroyed. This Prophet rather taught Christ by his sufferings, than by his writings now extant: in all the rest are found expresse promises of the Messias.

In the reigne of Vzzia likewise it was, that Esaie, the first of the foure great Prophets, began to see his visions. This difference of great and lesser Prophets, is taken from the Volumes which they haue left written (as S. Augustine giues reason of the distinction) because the greater haue written larger Bookes. The Prophet Esaie was great indeede, not onely in regard of his much writing, or of his Nobility, (for their opinion is reiected, who thinke him to haue bene the sonne of Amos the Prophet) and the high account wherein he liued, but for the excellency, both of his stile and argument, wherein he so plainly foretelleth the Birth, Miracles, Passion, and whole Historie of our Sauour, with the calling of the Gentiles, that he might as well be called an Euangelist, as a Prophet; hauing written in such wise, That (as Hierome saith) one would thinke he did not foretell of things so come, but compile an Historie of matters already past.

Bocchoris was King of Egypt, and the ninth yeere of his Reigne, by our computation whereof in due place we will giue reason) was current, when Vzzia tooke possession of the Kingdome of Iuda.

After the death of Bocchoris, Asychis followed in the Kingdome of Egypt, vnto him succeeded Amphis; and these two occupied that Crowne fixe yeeres. Then Sabacus, an Ethiopian, became King of Egypt, and held it fiftie yeeres, whereof theren first ran along with the last of Vzzia his Kcigne and life. Of these and other Egyptian Kings, more shall be spoken, when their affaires shall come to be intermedled with the businesse of Iuda.

In Athens, the two last yeeres of Ariphron his twenty, the seauen and twentieth of The speius, the twentieth of Agamnestor, and threeth the first of Eschylus his three and twenty, made euen with the two and fiftie of Vzzia: as likewise did in Alba the last seauen of Siluius Anentinus his seauen and thirty, together with the three and twenty of Siluius Pracus, and two and twenty the first of Siluius Amulius. In Media Arbaces began his new Kingdome, in the first of Vzzia, wherein, after eight and twenty yeeres, his Sonne Sofarnus succeeded him, and reigned thirty yeeres. Of this Arbaces, and the diuision of the Assyrian Empire, betweene him and others, when they had oppressed Sardanapalus, I hold it conuenient to vse more particular discourse, that we may not wander in too great vncertainty in the Story of the Assyrian Kings, who haue already found the way into Palestina, and are not likely to forget it.

§. IIII.

Of the Assyrian Kings, descending from Phul: and whether Phul and Belofus were one person, or heads of sundry Families, that reigned a-part in Ninieue and Babylon.

BY that which hath formerly beene shewed of Sardanapalus his death, it is apparent, that the chiefe therein was Arbaces the Median; to whom the rest of the Confederates did not onely submit themselves in that Warre, but were contented afterwards to be iudged by him; receiuing by his authority sentence of death, or pardon of their forfeited liues. The first example of this his power, was showne vpon Belofus the Babylonian, by whose especiall aduice and helpe, Arbaces himselfe was become so great. Yet was not this power of Arbaces exercised in so tyrannicall a manner, as might giue offence in that great alteration of things, either to the Princes that had assisted him, or to the generality of the people. For in the condemnation of Belofus, he vsed the counsaile of his other Captaines, and then pardoned him of his owne grace; allowing him to hold, not onely the Citie and Prouince of Babylon, but also those treasures, for embezeling whereof his life had beene endangered.

In like manner, he gaue rewards to the rest of his partakers, and made them Rulers of Prouinces; retaining (as it appeares) onely the Soueraigntie to himselfe, which to vse immoderately he did naturally abhorre. He is said, indeede, to haue excited the Medes against Sardanapalus, by propounding vnto them hope of transferring the Empire to their Nation. And to make good this his promise, he destroyed the Citie of Ninieue, permitting the Citizens neuerthelesse to take and carry away euery one his owne goods. The other Nations that ioyned with him, as the Persians and Bactrians, he drew to his side, by the allurements of liberty; which he himselfe so greatly loued, that by slackning too much the reines of his owne Soueraigntie, he did more harme to the generall estate of Media, than the pleasure of the freedome, which it enjoyed, could recompence. For both the Territory of that Countrey was pared narrower by Salmansassar (or perhaps by some of his Progenitors) whom we finde, in the Scriptures, to haue held some Townes of the Medes; and the ciuill administration was so disorderly, that the people themselves were glad to see that reformation, which Deioces, the fift of Arbaces his Line, did make in that gouernement, by reducing them into stricter teames of obedience.

How the force of the Assyrians grew to be such, as might in fourescore yeeres, if not sooner, both extend it selfe vnto the conquest of Israel, & teare away some part of Media, it is a question hardly to be answered, not only in regard of the destruction of Ninieue, and subuersion of the Assyrian Kingdome, whereof the Medes, vnder Arbaces, had the honor, who may seeme at that time to haue kept the Assyrians vnder their subiection, when the rest of the Prouinces were set at liberty; but in consideration of the Kings themselves, who who reigning afterwards in Babylon and Ninieue, are confounded by some, and distinguished by others; whereby their Historie is made vncertaine.

I will first therefore deliuer the opinion generally receiued, and the grounds whereupon it stands: then, producing the obiections made against it; I will compare together the determination of that worthy man Ioseph Scaliger, with those learned that subscribe thereunto, and the iudgement of others that were more ancient Writers, or haue followed the Ancients in this doubtfull case. Neither shall it be needfull to set downe a-part the severall authorities and arguments of sundry men adding somewhat of weight or of clearnesse one to another: it will be enough to relate the whole substance of each discourse: to which I will doe as briefly as I can, and without feare to be taxed of partiality, as being no more addicted to the one opinion than to the other, by any fancy of mine owne, but meereley led by those reasons which vpon examination of each part, seemed to me most forceable, though to others they may perhaps appeare weak.

That which, vntill of late, hath passed as currant, is this; That Belofus was the same King, who, first of the Assyrians, entred Palestina with an Armie; being called Pul, or Phul, in the Scriptures, and by Annius his Authors with such as follow them, Phul Belochus. Of this man it is said, that he was a skilfull Astrologer, subtile, and ambitious; that he got Babylon by composition made with Arbaces; and that not therewith content, he got into his hand part of Assyria: finally, that he reigned eight and forty yeeres, and then dying, left the Kingdome to Teglat-phalsar his Sonne, in whose Posterity it continued some few descents, till the house of Merodach preuailed. The truth of this, if Annius his Metasthenes were sufficient prooffe, could not be gainesaid: for that Author (such as he is) is peremptorie herein. But, howe soeuer Annius his Authors deserue to be suspected, it stands with no reason, that we should conclude all to be false which they affirme. They, who maintaine this Tradition, iustifie it by diuers good Allegations, as a matter confirmed by circumstances found in all Authors, and repugnant vnto no Historie at all. For it is manifest by the relation of Diodorus (which is indeede the foundation whereupon all haue built) that Arbaces and Belofus were Partners in the action against Sardanapalus; and that the Bactrians, who ioyned with them, were thought well rewarded with libertie, as likewise other Captaines were with gouernements: but that any third Person was so eminent, as to haue Assyria it selfe, the chiefe Countrey of the Empire, bestowed vpon him, it is a thing whereof not the least appearance is found in any History. And certainly it stood with little reason, that the Assyrians should be committed vnto a peculiar King, at such time as it was not thought meete to trust them in their owne wals and houses. Rather it is apparent, that the destruction of Ninieue by Arbaces, and the transplantation of the Citizens, was held a needfull policie because thereby the people of that Nation might be kept downe from aspiring to recover the Soueraigntie, which else they would haue thought to belong, as of right, vnto the Seat of the Empire.

Vpon such considerations did the Romanes, in ages long after following, destroy Carthage, and dissolve the Corporation, or Body politike, of the Citizens of Capua; because those two Townes were capable of the Empire: a matter esteemed ouerdangerous even to Rome it selfe, that was Mistresse of them both. This being so, how can it be thought that the Assyrians in three or foure yeeres had erected their Kingdome a-new, vnder one Pul: or what must this Pul haue beene (of whose deseruings, or entremedling, or indeed of whose very name, we finde no mention in the Warre against Sardanapalus) to whom the principall parts of the Empire fell, either by generall consent in diuision of the Prouinces, or by his owne power and purchase very soone after? Surely he was none other than Belofus, whose neere Neighbourhood gaue him opportunity (as he was wise enough to play his owne game) both to get Assyria to himselfe, and to empeach any other man, that should haue attempted to seize vpon it. The Prouince of Babylon, which Belofus held, being (as Herodotus reports) in riches, and power, as good as the third part of the Persian Empire, was able to furnish him with all that was requisite for such a businesse: if that were not enough, he had gotten into his owne hands all the gold and siluer that had been in the Palace of Ninieue. And questionlesse to restore such a Citie as Ninieue, was an enterprise fit for none to take in hand, except he had such means as Belofus had; which Pul, if he were not Belofus, is likely to haue wanted.

Besides all this, had Pul been a distinct person from Belofus, and Lord of Assyria, which lay beyond the Countries of Babylon and Mesopotamia, it would not have beene an easie matter for him, to passe quite through another mans Kingdome with an Armie, seeking bootie as farre off in Israel: the onely action by which the name of Phul is knowne. But if we grant, that he, whom the Scriptures call Pul or Phul, was the same whom prophane writers have called Belosus, Beleses, and Belesis, (in like manner as Josephus acknowledgeth, that he, whom the Scriptures called neuer otherwise than Darius the Mede, was the sonne of Astyages, and called of the Greekes by another name, that is, Cyaxares) then is this scruple vtterly removed. For Babylon and Mesopotamia did border vpon Syria and Palestina: so that Belosus, hauing ferled his affaires in Assyria towards the East and North, might with good leasure encroach vpon the Countries that lay on the other side of his Kingdome, to the South and West. He that lookes into all particulars, may finde every one circumstance concurring, to proue that Phul who inuaded Israel, was none other than Belosus. For the Prince of the Arabians, who ioyned with Arbaces, and brought no small part of the forces wherewith Sardanapalus was ouerthrowne, did enter into that action, meerey for the loue of Belosus. The friendship of these Arabians was a thing of maine importance, to those that wereto passe ouer Euphrates with an Armie into Syria. Wherefore Belosus, that held good correspondence with them; and whose most fruitfull Prouince, adioyning to their barraine quarters, might yeerely doe them inestimable pleasures, was not onely likely to haue quiet passage through their borders, but their vtmost assistance: yea, it stands with good reason, that they, who loued not Israel, should for their owne behoofe haue given him intelligence, of the destruction and ciuill broyles among the ten Tribes; whereby, as this Pul got a thousand talents, so it seemes that the Syrians and Arabians, that had felt an heauie neighbour of Tereboam, recovered their owne, setting vp a new King in Damasco, and clearing the coast of Arabia, (from the Sea of the Wilderness to Hamaish) of the Hebrew Garrisons. Neither was it any new acquaintance, that made the Nations diuided by Euphrates hold together in so good teames of friendship: it was ancient consanguinity; the memorie whereof was auailable to the Syrians, in the time of Dauid, when the Aramites beyond the Riuer came ouer willingly, to the succour of Hadadzer, and the Aramites about Damasco. So Belosus had good reason to looke into those parts; what a King reigning so farre off as Ninive, should haue to doe in Syria, if the other end of his Kingdome had not reached to Euphrates, it were hard to thew.

But concerning this last argument of the businesse which might allure the Chaldeans into Palestina, it may be doubted, lest it should seeme to haue ill coherence with that which hath beene said of the long Anarchie that was in the ten Tribes. For if the Crowne of Israel were worne by no man in three and twenty yeeres, then is it likely that Belosus was either vnwilling to stirre, or vnable to take the aduantage when it was fairest, and first discouered. This might haue compelled those, who alone were not strong enough, to seeke after helpe from some Prince that lay further off; and so the opinion of those that distinguish Phul from Belosus, would be somewhat confirmed. On the other side, if we say, that Belosus did passe the Riuer of Euphrates, as soone as he found likelihood of making a prosperous iourney, then may it seeme that the inter-regnum in Israel was not so long as we haue made it: for three and twenty yeeres leasure would haue afforded better opportunity, which ought not to haue beene lost.

For answer hereunto, we are to consider, what Orosius and Eusebius haue written concerning the Chaldees: the one, that after the departure of Arbaces into Media, they laid hold on a part of the Empire: the other, that they preuailed and grew mighty, betwene the times of Arbaces and Deioces the Medes. Now, though it be held an error of Orosius, where he supposeth that the occupying of Babylonia by the Chaldeans, was in manner of a rebellion from the Medes; yet herein he and Eusebius doe concur, that the authority of Arbaces did restrain the ambition, which by his absence grew bold, and by his death, regardfull onely of it selfe. Now, though some haue coniectured that all Assyria was giuen to Belosus (as an ouerplus, besides the Prouince of Babylon which was his by plaine bargain made aforehand) in regard of his high desertings; yet the opinion more commonly receiued, is, that he did onely encroach vpon that Prouince by little and little, whilest Arbaces liued, and afterwards dealing more openly, got it all himselfe. Seeing therefore, that there passed but twelue yeeres betwene the death of Arbaces, and the beginning of Menahem his Reigne; manifest it is, that the conquest of of Assyria, and settling of that Country, was worke enough to hold Belosus occupied, besides the restauration of Ninive, which alone was able to take vp all the time remaining of his Reigne, if perhaps he liued to see it finished in his owne dayes. So that this argument may rather serue to proue that Phul and Belosus were one person, forasmuch as the iourney of Phul against Israel was not made vntill Belosus could finde leasure; and the time of aduantage which Belosus did let slip, argued his businesse in some other quarter, namely in that Prouince of which Phul is called King. Briefely, it may be said, that he who conquered Assyria, and performed somewhat vpon a Country so farre distant as Palestina, was likely to haue beene, at least, named in some Historie, or, if not himselfe, yet his Country to haue beene spoken of for those victories: but we neither heare of Phul, in any prophane Author, neither doth any Writer, sacred or prophane, once mention the victories or acts whatsoever of the Assyrians, done in those times; whereas of Belosus, and the power of the Chaldeans, we finde good Record.

Surely, that great slaughter of so many thousand Assyrians, in the quarrell of Sardanapalus, together with other calamities of that long and vnfortunate warre, which ouerwhelmed the whole Countrey, not ending but with the ruine and vtter desolation of Ninive, must needs haue so weakened the state of Assyria, that it could not in thirty yeeres space be able to inuade Palestina, which the ancient Kings, reigning in Ninive, had, in all their greatesse, forborne to attempt. Yet these afflictions, disabling that Countrey, did helpe to enable Belosus to subdue it; who hauing once extended his Dominion to the borders of Media, and being (especially if he had compounded with the Medes) by the interposition of that Country, secure of the Scythians, and other war-like Nations on that side, might very well turne Southward, and try his fortune in those Kingdomes, whereinto ciuill dissention of the inhabitants, and the bordering enuie of the Arabians and Aramites about Damasco, friends and Cousins to the Chaldeans and Mesopotamians, did inuite him. For these, and the other before alleadged reasons, it may be concluded, That what is said of Pul in the Scriptures, ought to be vnderstood of Belosus; euen as by the names of Nebuchadnezzar, Darius the Mede, Artaxerxes, and Abasuerus, with the like, are thought, or knowne, to be meant the same, whom prophane Historians, by names better knowne in their owne Countries, haue called Nabopolassar, Cyaxares, and Artaxerxes: especially considering, that hereby we shall neither contradict any thing that hath beene written of old, nor neede to trouble our selues and others with framing new coniectures. This in effect is that, which they alleadge in maintenance of the opinion commonly receiued.

Now this being once granted; other things, of more importance, will of themselves easily follow. For it is a matter of no great consequence to know the truth of this point (considering it apart from that which depends thereon) Whether Pul were Belosus, or some other man: the whole race of these Assyrian and Babylonian Kings, wherein are found those famous Princes, Nabonassar, Mardocempadus, and Nabopolassar (famous for the Astronomicall obseruations recorded from their times) is the maine ground of this contention. If therefore Belosus or Belesis were that Phul which inuaded Israel; if he and his posterity reigned both in Ninive and in Babylon; if he were father of Teglat-Phul-Asar, from whom Salmanassar, Senacherib, and Asarhaddon descended; then it is manifest, that we must seeke Nabonassar, the Babylonian King, among these Princes; yea, and conclude him to be none other than Salmanassar, who is knowne to haue reigned in those yeeres, which Ptolomey the mathematician hath assigned vnto Nabonassar. As for Merodach, who supplanted Asarhaddon, manifest it is, that he and his successors were of another house. This is the scope and end of all his disputation.

But they that maintaine the contrary part, will not be satisfied with such coniectures. They lay hold vpon the conclusion, and by shaking that into pieces, hope to ouerthrow all the premisses, vpon which it is inferred. For (say they) if Nabonassar, that reigned in Babylon, could not be Salmanassar, or any of those other Assyrian Kings, then is it manifest, that the races were distinct, and that Phul and Belosus were severall Kings. This consequence is so plaine, that it needes no confirmation. To proue that Nabonassar was a distinct person from Salmanassar, are brought such arguments as would stagger the resolution of him that had sworne to hold the contrary. For first, Nabonassar was King of Babylon, and not of Assyria. This is proued by his name, which is meerey Chaldean, whereas Salmanassar, the first part of Salmanassars name, is proper to the Assyrians.
Bbb 3 It

It is likewise proued by the Astronomical observations, which proceeding from the Babylonians, not from the Assyrians, doe shew, that Nabonassar, from whom Ptolome draws that Epoch, or account of times, was a Babylonian, and no Assyrian. Thirdly, and more strongly, it is confirmed by the successor of Nabonassar, which was Mardochempadus, called in his owne language Mero-dac-ken-pad, but more briefly in Esay his prophesie, Merodach, by the former part of his name; or Merodach Baladan, the sonne of Baladan. Now if Merodach, the sonne of Baladan, King of Babel, were the sonne of Nabonassar, then was Nabonassar none other than Baladan King of Babel, and not Salmanaassar King of Assyria.

What can be plainer? As for the cadence of these two names, Nabonassar and Salmanaassar, which in Greeke or Latine writing hath no difference, we are taught by Scaliger, that in the Hebrew letters there is found no affinity therein. So concerning the places of Babylonia, wherinto Salmanaassar carried captiue some part of the ten Tribes, it may well be granted, that in the Prouince of Babylon, Salmanaassar had gotten somewhat, yet will it not follow that he was King of Babylon it selfe. To conclude, Merodach began his reign ouer Babylon in the first yeere of Hezekia, at which time Salmanaassar took Samaria; therefore, if Salmanaassar were King of Babylon, then must we say that he and Merodach, yea and Nabonassar, were all one man. These are the arguments of that noble and learned Writer Ioseph Scaliger; who not contented to follow the common opinion, founded vpon likelihood of coniectures, hath drawne his proofes from matter of more necessary inference.

Touching all that was said before of Phul Belosus, for the prouing that Phul and Belosus were not sundry Kings; Ioseph Scaliger pitties their ignorance, that haue spent their labour to so little purpose. Honest and painefull men he confesseth that they were, who by their diligence might haue won the good liking of their Readers, had they not, by mentioning Anniius his Authors, giuen such offence, that men refused thereupon to reade their Bookes and Chronologies. A short answer.

For mine owne part, howsoeuer I beleue nothing that Anniius his Berosus, Metasthenes, and others of that stampe affirme, in respect of their bare authority; yet am I not so squeamish, but that I can well enough digest a good Booke, though I finde the names of one or two of these good fellowes alleaged in it: I haue (somewhat peradventure too often) already spoken my minde of Anniius his Authors: neuertheless, I may say here againe, that where other Histories are silent, or speake not enough, there may we without shame borrow of these, as much as agrees with that little which elsewhere we finde, and serueth to explaine or enlarge it without improbabilities.

Neither indeede are those honest and painfull men (as Scaliger tearmes them, meaning, if I mistake him not; good silly fellowes) who set downe the Assyrian Kings from Pul forwards, as Lords also of Babylon, taking Pul for Belosus, and Salmanaassar for Nabonassar, such Writers as a man should be ashamed or vnwilling to reade. For (to omit a multitude of others, that herein follow Anniius, though disliking him in generally) Gerard Mercator is not so slight a Chronologer, that he should be laughed out of doores, with the name of an honest meaning fellow.

But I will not make comparisons betweene Scaliger and Mercator, they were both of them men notably learned: let vs examine the arguments of Scaliger, and see whether they be of such force, as cannot either be resisted or auoided. It will easily be granted, that Nabonassar was King of Babylon; that he was not King of Assyria, some men doubt whether Scaligers reasons be enough to proue. For though Nabonassar be a Chaldean name, and Salmanaassar an Assyrian; yet what hinders vs from beleueing, that one man in two languages might be called by two seuerall names? That Astronomie flourished among the Chaldees, is not enough to proue Nabonassar either an Astrologer, or a Chaldean. So it is, that Scaliger himselfe calls them, Prophetas nescio quos, qui Nabonassarum Astronomum fuisse in somnis viderunt; Prophets I know not who, that in their sleepe haue dreamt of Nabonassar, that he was an Astrologer.

Whether Nabonassar were an Astrologer or no, I cannot tell; it is hard to maintaine the negatiue. But as his being Lord ouer the Chaldeans, doth not proue him to haue bene learned in their sciences; so doth it not proue him, not to haue bene also King of Assyria. The Emperour Charles the fift, who was borne in Gan, and Philip his Sonne, King of Spaine, and Lords of the Netherlands, had men farre more learned in all Sciences;

Sciences, and particularly in the Mathematicks, among their Subjects of the Low Countries, than were any that I read of then living in Spaine, if Spaine at that time had any; yet I thinke, Posteritie will not vse this as an argument, to proue that Spaine was none of theirs. It may well be, that Salmanaassar or Nabonassar, did vse the Assyrian Souldiers, and Babylonian Schollers; but it seemes, that hee and his posteritie, by giuing themselves wholly to the more warlike Nation, lost the richer, out of which they first issued, as likewise King Philip lost partly, and partly did put to a dangerous hazard all the Netherlands, by such a course. As for the two vn-answerable arguments, (as Scaliger termes them, being me-thinkes none other than answers to somewhat that is or might be alleaged on the contrary side) one of them which is drawne from the vnlike sound and writing of those names, Salmanaassar and Nabonassar in the Hebrew, I hold a point about which no man will dispute; for it is not likenesse of sound, but agreement of time, and many circumstances else, that must take away the distinction of persons: the other likewise may be granted; which is, that Salmanaassar might be Lord of some places in the Prouince of Babylon, yet not King of Babylon it selfe: this indeed might be so, and it might be otherwise. Hitherto there is nothing saue conjecture. But in that which is alleaged out of the Prophet Esai, concerning Merodach the sonne of Baladan; and in that which is said of this Merodach, or Mardochempadus, his being the Successor of Nabonassar, and his beginning to reigne in the first yeere of Hezekia, I finde matter of more difficultie, than can be answered in haste. I will therefore deferre the handling of these objections vntill I meet with their subiect in his proper place; which will be when wee come to the time of Hezekia, wherein Merodach liued and was King. Yet that I may not leaue too great a scruple in the minde of the Reader, thus farre will I heere satisfie him; that how strong soeuer this argument may seeme, Scaliger himselfe did liue to retract it, ingeniously confessing, that in thinking Merodach to be the sonne of Nabonassar, hee had bene deceived.

Now therefore let vs consider, in what sort they haue fashioned their Storie, who taking Pul to bee a distinct person from Belosus or Belesis, haue in like sort, as was necessary, distinguished their off-spring, making that of Pul to faile in Asarhaddon, which left all to Merodach the Babylonian. And heere I must first confesse mine want of Bookes, if perhaps there be many, that haue gone about to reduce this narration into some such order, as might present vnto vs the bodie of this Historie, in one view. Diuers, indeed, there are, whom I haue seene, that since Ioseph Scaliger deliuered his opinion, haue written in fauour of some one or other point thereof: but Sethus Caluistius himselfe, who hath abridged Scaligers learned Worke, De emendatione Temporum, hath not bene carefull to giue vs notice, how long Belosus, Baladan, Pul, or Tiglat Pulasar, did reigne, (perhaps because he found it not exprest in Scaliger) but is content to set downe Baladan, for the same person with Nabonassar, which Scaliger himselfe reuoked. In this case therefore I must lay downe the plot of these diuided Kingdomes, in such sort as I finde it continued by Augustinus Torniellus; who onely of all that I haue seene, sets downe the succession, continuance, and acts, of those that reigned in Assyria after Sardanapalus, distinguishing them from Belosus, and his Posteritie, of whom hee hath the like remembrance. This Torniellus is a Regular Clarke of the congregation of S. Paul, whose Annales were printed the last yeere; he appears to me a man of curious industrie, sound iudgement, and free Spirit; yet many times (and I take it, wilfully) forgetfull of thanking, or mentioning those Protestant Writers, by whose Bookes hee hath receiued good information, and enriched his workes by inserting somewhat of theirs. But in this businesse hee hath openly professed to follow Scaliger, whose helpe, without wrong or dishonour to himselfe, he hath both vsed and acknowledged. For mine owne part, I will not spare to doe so right vnto Torniellus; but confesse my selfe to haue receiued benefit by his writing; and with that his Annales had sooner come to light; for that as he hath much confirmed mee in some things, so would he haue instructed and emboldned me, to write more fully and lesse timorously in other things, which now I haue not leisure to reuise. Particularly in that coniecture (which I had faintly deliuered, and yet feared lest it had ouer-hastily passed out of my hand, and bene exposed to other mens constructions) of the foure Kings that invaded the Vallie of Siddim, and were slaine by Abraham, I find him aduenuring, as I haue done, to say, that they may probably be thought to haue bene some pettie Lords; the contrary opinion of all Writers notwithstanding. But now let vs consider how how he hath ordered these last Assyrian and Babylonian Kings. After the destruction of Sardanapalus, Arbaces being the most mightie, fought to get all to himselfe, but was opposed by Belofus; in which contention, one Phul, a powerfull man in Assyria, sided with Belofus, and they two preuailed so farre, that finally Arbaces was content to share the Empire with them, making such a diuision thereof, as was long after made of the Roman Empire, betwene Octavian, Antonine, and Lepidus.

Another conjecture is (for Tornellus offers not this, or the rest, as matter of certaintie) that Arbaces made himselfe Soueraigne Lord of all, and placed the seare of his Empire in Media, appointing Belofus his Lieutenant in Babylonia, and Phul in Assyria. But in short space, that is, in foure yeeres, it came to passe, by the iust judgement of God, that Phul and Belofus rebelled against Arbaces, like as Arbaces had done against Sardanapalus; and in stead of being his Viceroyes, made themselves absolute Kings. And to this later opinion Tornellus himselfe leanes, holding it much the more probable, as being more agreeable to that which is found in prophane Histories. Why he did make and publish the former supposition, resolving to hold the later, I shall anon, without any wrong to him, make bold to guess. Having thus deuised, how Phul and Belofus might, at the first, attaine to be Kings, he orders their time, and their successors, in this manner.

Foure yeeres after Arbaces, Phul begins to reigne, and continues eight and forty yers. Theglathphasar (whose name, and the names of other Princes, I write diuerly, according as the Authors whom I haue in hand are pleased to diuersifie them) succeeding vnto Phul, reigned three and twentie. Salmanassar followed him, and reigned tenne. After him Senacherib reigned seuen: and when he was slaine, Asarhaddon his sonne ten yeeres; in whom that Line failed.

The same time that Phul tooke vpon him as King of Assyria, or not long after, (why not rather afore? for so it had bene more likely) Belofus vsurped the Kingdome of Babylon, and held it threescore and eight yeeres; at the least threescore and eight yeeres did passe, before Nabonassar followed him in the possession.

To Nabonassar, whom (with Scaliger) he thinks to be Baladan, are assigned sixe and twentie yeeres: then two and fiftie to Merodach, or Mardocempadus: foure and twentie to Ben Merodach: and lastly, one and twentie to Nabolasar, the father of Nabuchodonosor, who is like to offer matter of further disputation.

Concerning the originall of these Assyrian and Babylonian Kingdomes, I may truly say; That the conjectures of other men, who giue all to Belofus, and confound him with Phul, appeare to me more necerly resembling the truth. Neither doe I thinke, that Tornellus would haue conceiued two different wayes, by which Phul might haue gotten Assyria (for how Belofus came to get Babylon, it is plaine enough) if either of them alone could haue contented him. He adheres to the later of the two, as better agreeing with Diodore, and other Historians. But he perceiued, that to make Phul on the suddain King of Assyria; or to giue him so noble a Prouince, as would, of it selfe, inuite him to accept of the name and power of a King, was a thing most vnlikely to haue happened, vnlesse his deserts (whereof wee finde no mention) had bene proportionable to so high a reward. And for this cause (as I take it) hath he deuised the meanes, whereby Phul might be made capable of so great a share in the Empire. If this were a true or probable supposition, then would a new doubt arise, Why this Phul, being one of the three that diuided all betwene them, was vnto all Historians forgotten? yea, why this diuision it selfe, and the ciuill Warres that caused it, were neuer heard of? Questionlesse, the interuening of some Treasures by Belofus, with his Iudgement, Condemnation, and Pardon following, were matters of farre lesse note. Therefore I doe not see, how one of the two inconueniences can this way be auoyded; but that eyther we must confesse, the Dominion giuen to Phul to haue bene exceeding his merits, or elsse his merits, and name withall, to haue bene strangely forgotten: either of which is enough to make vs thinke, that rather the conjecture, inferring such a sequele, is wide of the truth. As for the rebellion of Phul and Belofus against Arbaces, it was almost impossible for the Assyrians to recouer such strength in foure yeeres, as might serue to hold out in rebellion: for Belofus, it was needlesse to rebell, considering, that Arbaces did not seeke to molest him, but rather permitted (as being an ouer-great fauourer of libertie) euen the Medes, that were vnder his owne Government to doe what they listed.

But

But it is now fit that wee peruse the Catalogue of these Kings: not passing through them all (for some will require a large discourse in their owne times) but speaking of their order and time in generall. If it be so vnlawfull to thinke, that some of Annius his tales (let them all be counted his tales, which are not found in other Authors as well as in his) may be true, especially such, as contradict no acknowledged truth, or apparant likelihood, why then is it said, that Phul did reigne in Assyria eight and fortie yeeres? For this hath no other ground than Annius. It is true, that painefull and iudicious Writers haue found this number of yeeres, to agree fitly with the course of things in History; yet all of them rooke it from Annius. Let it therefore be the punishment of Annius his forgerie (as questionlesse he is often guilty of this crime) that when he tells truth, or probability, he be not beleecued for his owne sake; though for our owne sakes we make vse of his boldnesse, taking his words for good, whereas (nothing elsse being offered) we are vnwilling our selues to be Authors, of new, though not vnprobable conjectures. Heerein we shall haue this commoditie, that we may without blushing alter a little, to helpe our owne opinions, and lay the blame vpon Annius, against whom wee shall be sure to finde friends that will take our part.

The reignes of Theglathphasar and Salmanassar did reach, by Annius his measure, to the length of sixe and twenty yeeres the one, and seuentene the other; Tornellus hath cut off two from the former, and seuen from the latter of them, to fit (as I thinke) his owne computation; vsing the liberty whereof I spake last: for that any Author, saue our good Metasthenes, or those that borrowed of him, hath gone about to tell how long each of these did reigne, it is more then I haue yet found. To Senacherib and Asarhaddon, Tornellus giues the same length of reigne, which is found in Metasthenes. I thinke there are not many, that will arrogate so much vnto themselves, as may very well be allowed vnto a man so iudicious as is Tornellus: and yet I could wish that hee had forborne to condemne the followers of Annius, in this businesse, wherein hee himselfe hath chosen, in part, rather to become one of them, than to say, as elsse he must haue done, almost nothing.

The like liberty we finde that he hath vsed in measuring the reignes of the Chaldeans; so filling vp all the space betwene the end of Sardanapalus, and the beginning of Nabonassar, with the threescore and eight yeeres of Belofus. In this respect it was, perhaps, that he thought Belofus might haue begun his reigne somewhat later than Phul: for threescore and eight yeeres would seeme a long time for him to hold a Kingdome, that was no yong man when he tooke possession of it. But how is any whit of his age abated by shortning his reigne, seeing his life reacheth to the end of such a time, as were alone, without adding the time wherein he was a priuate man, enough for a long liuer? Indeed, eight and forty yeeres had been somewhat of the most, considering that hee seemes by the storie to haue bene little lesse, at such time as he ioyned with Arbaces; and therefore the addition of twenty yeeres, did well deferue that note (which Tornellus aduisedly giues) that if his reigne extended not so farre, then the reigne of such as came after him, occupied the middle time, vnto Nabonassar.

Neither doe reprehend the boldnesse of Tornellus, in conjecturing, nor the modestie of Scaliger and Sethus Caluissius, in forbearing to set downe as warrantable, such things as depend onely vpon likelihood. For things, whereof the perfect knowledg is taken away from vs by Antiquitie, must be described in History, as Geographers in their Maps describe those Countries, whereof as yet there is made no true discouerie, that is, eyther by leaving some part blanke, or by inserting the Land of Pigmies, Rockes of loadestone, with Head-lands, Bayes, great Riuers, and other particularities, agreeable to common report, though many times controlled by following experience, and found contrarie to truth. Yet indeed the ignorance growing from distance of place, allowes not such liberty to a Describer, as that which ariseth from the remedlesse obliuion of consuming time. For it is true that the Poet saith;

— Neg. fernidis
Pars inclusa caloribus
Mundi, nec Boreae finitimum latus,
Durat aq. sole Nixes,
Mercatorem abigunt: horrida callidi
Vincunt aquora Nauis.

Nor

Nor Southerne heate, nor Northerne snow
That freezing to the ground doth grow,
The subject Regions can fence,
And keepe the greedie Merchant thence.
The subtil Shipmen way will finde,
Storme neuer so the Seas with winde.

Therefore the fictions (or let them be called conjectures) painted in Maps, doe serue onely to mis-lead such discoverers as rashly beleue them; drawing vpon the publishers, eyther some angry curses, or well deserued scorne; but to keepe their owne credit, they cannot serue alwaies. To which purpose I remember a pretie jest of Don Pedro de Sarmento, a worthy Spanish Gentleman, who had bene employed by his King in planting a Colonie vpon the Streights of Magellan: for when I asked him, being then my Prisoner, some question about an Island in those Streights, which me thought, might haue done eyther benefit or displeasure to his enterprize, he told me merrily, that it was to be called the Painters wines Island; saying, That whilest the fellow drew that Map, his wife sitting by, desired to put in one Countrey for her; that she, in imagination, might haue an Island of her owne. But in filling vp the blankes of old Histories, wee need not be so scrupulous. For it is not to be feared, that time should runne backward, and by restoring the things themselves to knowledge, make our conjectures appeare ridiculous: What if some good Copie of an ancient Author could be found, shewing (if we haue it not already) the perfect truth of these vncertainties: would it bee more shame to haue beleued in the meane while, Annius or Tornellus, than to haue beleued nothing? Heere I will not say, that the credit, which wee giue to Annius, may chance otherwhiles to be giuen to one of those Authors whose names he pretendeth. Let it suffice, that in regard of authority, I had rather trust Scaliger or Tornellus, than Annius; yet him than them, if his assertion be more probable, and more agreeable to approued Histories than their conjecture, as in this point it seemes to me; it hauing moreouer gotten some credit, by the approbation of many, and those not meanly learned.

To end this tedious disputation; I hold it a sure course in examination of such opinions, as haue once gotten the credit of being generall, so to deale as Pacuvius in Capua did with the multitude, finding them desirous to put all the Senatours of the Citie to death. He lockt the Senatours vp within the State-house, and offered their liues to the Peoples mercie; obtaining thus much, that none of them should perish, vntill the Commonaltie had both pronounced him worthy of death, and elected a better in his place. The condemnation was hastie; for as fast as euery name was read, all the town cried, Let him die: but the execution required more leisure; for in substituting of another, some notorious vice of the Person, or baseness of his condition, or insufficiencie of his qualitie, made each new one that was offered, to be rejected: so that finding the worse and lesse choise, the further and the more that they fought, it was finally agreed, that the olde should be kept for lacke of better.

§ V.

Of the Olympiads, and the time when they began.

After this diuision of the Assyrian Empire, follows the instauration of the Olympian games, by Iphitus, in the reigne of the same King Vezia, and in his one and fiftieth yeere. It is, I know, the generall opinion, that these games were established by Iphitus, in the first of Iotham: yet is not that opinion so generall, but that Authors, waightie enough, haue giuen to them a more early beginning. The truth is, that in fitting those things vnto the sacred Historie, which are found in prophane Authors, wee should not be too carefull of drawing the Hebrewes to those workes of time, which had no reference to their affaires; it is enough, that setting in due order these beginnings of accmpts, we ioine them to matters of Israel and Iuda, where occasion requires.

These Olympian games and exercises of actiuitie, were first instituted by Hercules, who measured the length of the race by his owne foot; by which Pythagoras found out the stature and likely strength of Hercules his bodie. They tooke name, not from the Mountaine Olympus, but from the Citie Olympia, otherwile Pisa, neere vnto Elis; where also

Iupiters Temple in Elis, famous among the Grecians, and repired among the wonders of the World, was knowne by the name of the Temple of Iupiter Olympius. These games were exercised from euery fourth yeare compleat, in the plaines of Elis, a Citie of Peloponnesus, neere the riuer Alpheus.

After the death of Hercules, these meetings were discontinued for many yeeres; till Iphitus by aduice from the Oracle of Apollo, re-established them; Lycurgus the Law-giuer then liuing: from which time they were continued by the Grecians, till the reigne of Theodosius the Emperor, according to Cedrenus: others thinke that they were dissolved vnder Constantine the Great.

From this institution, Varro accompted the Grecian times, and their stories, to be certaine: but reckoned all before either doubtfull, or fabulous: and yet Plinie giues little credit to all that is written of Greece, till the reigne of Cyrus, who began in the five and fiftieth Olympiad, as Eusebius out of Diodore, Castor, Polybius, and others hath gathered, in whose time the feuen wise Grecians flourished. For Solon had speech with Cyrus, and Craesus was ouerthrowne and taken by Cyrus.

Many patient and piercing braines haue laboured to finde out the certaine beginning of these Olympiads, namely, to set them in the true yeere of the World, and the reigne of such and such Kings: but seeing they all differ in the first accompt, that is, of the Worlds yeare, they can hardly iumpe in particulars thereon depending.

Cyril against Julian, and Didymus, begin the Olympiads the nine and fortieth of Osias, or Azarias.

Eusebius, who is contrarie to himselfe in this reckoning, accounts with those that finde the very first Olympiad in the beginning of the foure hundreth and sixth yeere after Troy, yet yeerelittle vs, that it was in the fiftieth yeere of Vezia, which is (as I finde it) two yeeres later.

Eratothenes placeth the first Olympiad foure hundred and seuen yeeres after Troy, reckoning the yeeres that passed betwene; to whom Dionysius Halicarnassensis, Diodorus Siculus, Solinus, and many others adhere.

The distance betwene the destruction of Troy, and the first Olympiad, is thus collected by Eratothenes. From the taking of Troy, to the descent of Hercules his Posteritie into Peloponnesus, were fourescore yeeres; thence to the Ionian expedition, threescore yeeres; from that expedition to the time of Lycurgus his gouernement in Sparta, one hundred fiftie nine; and thence to the first Olympiad, one hundred and eight yeeres. In this account the first yeare of the first Olympiad is not included.

But vaine labour it were, to seeke the beginning of the Olympiads, by numbering the yeeres from the taking of Troy, which is of a date farre more vncertaine. Let it suffice, that by knowing the instauration of these games, to haue been in the foure hundreth and eight yeere current after Troy, wee may reckon backe to the taking of that Citie, setting that, and other accidents, which haue reference thereto, in their proper times. The certaintie of things following the Olympiads, must needs teach vs how to finde when they began.

To this good vse, we haue the ensuing yeeres, vnto the death of Alexander the Great, thus diuided by the same Eratothenes. From the beginning of the Olympiads, to the passage of Xerxes into Greece, two hundreth fourescore and seuentene yeeres; from thence to the beginning of the Peloponnesian Warre, eight and fortie yeeres; forwards to the victorie of Lysander, seuen and twentie; to the battaile of Leuctra, thirtie foure; to the death of Philip King of Macedon, fife and thirtie; and finally to the death of Alexander, twelue. The whole summe ariseth to 453. yeeres; which number he otherwile also collecteth, and it is allowed by the most.

Now for placing the institution of the Olympiads in the one & fiftieth yeere of Vezias, we haue arguments grounded vpon that which is certaine, concerning the beginning of Cyrus his reigne, and the death of Alexander; as also vpon the Astronomically calculation of sundrie Eclipses of the Sunne, as of that which happened, when Xerxes set out of Sardis with his Armie to invade Greece; and of diuers other.

Touching Cyrus, it is generally agreed that his reigne as King, before he was Lord of the great Monarchie, began the first yeere of the fife and fiftieth Olympiad, and that hee reigned thirty yeeres; they who giue him but twentie nine yeeres of reigne (following Herodotus rather than Tully, Justin, Eusebius, and others) begin a yeere later, which comes

all to one reckoning. So is the death of Alexander set by all good Writers, in the first yere of the hundreth and fourteenth Olympiad. This later note of Alexanders death, serueth well to leade vs backe to the beginning of Cyrus; as many the like observations doe. For if wee reckon vpwards from the time of Alexander, wee shall finde all to agree with the yeeres of the Olympiads, wherein Cyrus began his reigne, either as King, or (taking the word Monarch, to signifie a Lord of many Kingdomes) as a great Monarch. From the beginning of Cyrus, in the first yere of the five and fiftieth Olympiad, vnto the end of the Persian Empire, which was in the third of the hundreth and twelfth Olympiad, wee finde two hundred and thirty yeeres compleat: from the beginning of Cyrus his Monarchie, which lasted but seuen yeeres, we finde compleat two hundred and seuen yeeres, which to was the continuance of the Persian Empire.

Now therefore seeing that the first yere of Cyrus his Monarchie (which was the last of the sixtieth Olympiad, and the two hundreth and fortieth yere from the institution of those games by Iphitus) followed the last of the seuentie yeeres, of the captiuitie of Juda, and desolation of the Land of Israel; manifest it is, that we must reckon backe those seuentie yeeres, and one hundred threescore and ten yeeres more, the last which passed vnder the Kings of Juda, to finde the first of these Olympiads; which by this accompriseth the one and fiftieth of Vzziah, as we haue already noted.

The Eclipses whereof wee made mention, serue well to the same purpose. For examples sake, that which was seene when Xerxes mustered his Armie at Sardis, in the two hundred threescore, and seuenth yere of Nabonassar, being the last of the threescore and fourteenth Olympiad, leades vs backe vnto the beginning of Xerxes, and from him to Cyrus, whence we haue a faire way through the threescore and ten yeeres, vnto the destruction of Ierusalem; and so vpwards through the reignes of the last Kings of Juda, to the one and fiftieth yere of Vzziah.

Thus much may suffice, concerning the time wherein these Olympiads beganne.

To tell the great solemnitie of them, and with what exceeding great concourse of all Greece they were celebrated, I hold it a superfluous labour. It is enough to say that all bodily exercises, or the most of them, were therein practised; as Running, Wrestling, Fighting, and the like. Neither did they onely contend for the Masticke in those feates; whereof there was good vse, but in running of Chariots, fighting with Whorle-bars, and other the like ancient kindes of exercises, that serued onely for ostentation. Thither also repaired Orators, Poets, Musicians, and all that thought themselves excellent in any laudable qualitie, to make triall of their skill. Yea the very Cryers which proclaimed the victories, contended which of them should get the honour, of hauing plaid the best part.

The Eleans were Presidents of those Games; whose iustice, in pronouncing without partialitie, who did best, is highly commended. As for the rewards giuen to the Victors, they were none other than Garlands of Palme, or Oliue, without any other commoditie following, than the reputation. Indeed there needed no more. For that was held so much, that when Diagoras had seene his three sonnes crowned for their severall victories in those games, one came running to him with this gratulation: Morere, Diagoras, non enim in celum ascensus es; that is; Die Diagoras, For thou shalt not come vnto heaven: as if there could be no greater happinesse on earth, than what already had befallen him. In the like sense Horace speaks of these Victors, calling them,

Quos Elæa domum reducit Palma celsæ.

Such as like heavenly wights doe come
With an Elæan Garland home.

Neither was it onely the voice of the People, or songs of Poets, that so highly extolled them, which had wonne these Olympian prizes; but euen graue Historians thought it a matter worthie of their noting. Such was (as Tullie counts it) the vanitie of the Greekes, that they esteemed it almost as great an honour, to haue wonne the victorie at Running or Wrestling in those games, as to haue triumphed in Rome for some famous victorie, or conquest of a Prouince.

That these Olympian games were celebrated at the full of the Moone, and vpon the fifteenth day of the Moneth Hecatombezion, which doth answere to our June; and what meanes they vsed to make the Moneth begin with the new Moone, that the fifteenth day might be the full; I haue shewed in another place. Wherefore I may now returne vnto the Kings of Juda, & leaue the merrie Greekes at their games, whom I shall meet in more serious employments, when the Persian quarrells draw the bodie of this Historie into the coasts of Ionia and Hellepont.

§ VI.

Of Iotham and his Contemporaries.

Iotham the sonne of Vzziah, when hee was five and twenty yeeres old, and in the second of Pekah King of Israel, was anointed King in Ierusalem, his Father King. 15. 32 yet liuing. He built an exceeding high Gate to the Temple, of threescore cubits vpright, and therefore called Ophel: besides diuers Cities in the Hills of Juda, and in the Fortells, Towers, and Palaces: he enforced the Ammonites to pay him Tribute, to wit, of Silver an hundreth talents, and of Wheat and Barly two thousand measures: he reigned fixe and twentie yeeres: of whom Iosephus giues this testimonie: Eiusmodi verbò Principis hic fuit, ut nullum in eo virtutis genus desideres: ut qui Deum adeo pè coluerit, hominibus suis adeo iuste præsuerit, urbem ipsam tanta sibi cura esse passus sit, & tantopere 10 auxerit, ut vniuersum regnum hostibus quidem minime contemnendum, domesticis autem eius incolis atque ciuibus felix, faustum & fortunatum sua virtute effecert: This was such a Prince, as a man could finde no kinde of vertue wanting in him: hee worshipped God so religiously, he gouerned his men so righteously, he was so prouident for the Citie, and did so greatly amplify it, that by his vertue and prouesse he made his whole Kingdome not contemptible to his enemies, but to his Seruants, Inhabitants and Citizens, prosperous and happy.

This is all that I finde of Iotham: his reigne was not long, but as happie in all things, as he himselfe was deuout and vertuous.

Auchomenes about this time succeeded Phelesteus in Corinth: after whom, the Corinthians erected Magistrats, which gouerned from yere to yere. And yet Pausanias in his second Booke, with Strabo and Plutarch, in many places are of opinion, That Corinth was gouerned by Kings of the race of the Bacidae, to the time of Cypselus, who droue them out.

Tiglathpalsar, or Tiglathpelsar, the sonne of Phul, the second of the Babylonians and Assyrians that was of this new race, about this time inuaded Israel, while Pekah (who murdered his Master Pekaiab) was King thereof. In which Expedition he tooke most of the Cities of Nephthali and Gabile, with those of Gilead, ouer Jordan, and carried the inhabitants captiue. This Tiglath reigned five and twentie yeeres, according to Metasthenes. But Krentzheimius findes, that with his sonne Salmanassar he reigned yet two yeeres longer: which yeeres I would not ascribe to the sonne, because the Aera of Nabonassar begins with his single reigne, but reckon them to Tiglath Phulassar himselfe, who therewith reigned 27. yeeres.

Aeschylus, the sonne of Agamnestor, about the sametime, the twelfth Archon in Athens, ruled 25. yeeres. Alcarnenes gouerned Sparta: after whom, the Estate changed, according to Eusebius: but therein surely Eusebius is mistaken. For Diodore, Plutarch, Pausanias, and 13. others witnesse the contrary. Pausanias affirmeth, That Polydorus, a Prince of eminent vertues, succeeded his father, and reigned 60. yeeres, and out-liued the Messenack warre: which was ended by Theopompus, the sonne of Nicander, his royall companion.

At this time liued Nahum the Prophet, who foretold the destruction of the Assyrian Empire, and of the Citie of Ninive; which succeeded (saith Iosephus) a hundred & fiftie 50 yeeres after. The Cities of Cyrene and of Aradus were built at this time, while in Media, Sesarmus and Medius reigned, being the second and third Kings of those parts.

§. VII.

Of Achaz and his Contemporaries.

Has, or Achaz, succeeded vnto Iotham in the seuenteenth yere of Pekah, the son of Remalia: the same being also the last yere of his fathers reigne, who began in the second of the same Pekah, and reigned 16, but not compleat yeeres. This Achaz.

Abaz was an Idolater, exceeding all his predecessors. He made molten Images for Baalim, and burnt his sonne for sacrifice before the Idoll Moloch, or Saturne, which was represented by a man-like brazen bodie, bearing the head of a Calfe, set vp not farre from Ierusalem, in a Valley shadowed with Woods, called Gehinnom, or Tophet, from whence the word Gehenna is vsed for Hell. The children offered, were inclosed within the car-kasse of this Idoll, and as the fire encreased, so the sacrificers, with a noyle of Cymbals and other Instruments, filled the ayre, to the end the pittifull cries of the children might not be heard: which vnnatural, cruell, and diuellish Oblation, Ieremie the Prophet vehemently reprehendeth, and of which Saint Jerome vpon the tenth of Matthew hath written at large. By the prohibition in Leuiticus the eighteenth, it appeareth that this horrible sinne was ancient: in the twelfth of Deuteronomie, it is called an abomination which God hateth. That it was also practised elsewhere, and by many Nations remote from Iudaea, diuers Authors witness, as Virgil in the second of Aeneids, — Sanguine placastis, &c. and Silius, — Poscere cede Deos. Saturne is said to haue brought this custome into Italie, besides the casting of many foules into the Riuer of Tyber, in stead of which, Hercules commanded, that the waxen Images of men should be throwne in and drowned. The Deuill also taught the Carthaginians this kinde of butchery, in so-much, that when their Citie was besieged, and in distresse, the Priest made them belecue, that because they had spared their owne children, and had bought and brought vp others to be offered, that therefore Saturne had stirred vp, and strengthened their Enemies against them: whereupon they presently caused two hundred of the noblest youths of their Citie to be slaine, and offered to Saturne or Satan, to appease him: who besides these forenamed Nations had instructed the Rhodians, the people of Crete, and Chios, of Messena, of Galatia, with the Massagets, and others, in these his seruices. Further, as if he were not content to destroy the foules of many Nations in Europe, Asia, and Africa, (as Acosta writeth) the Mexicans and other people of America, were brought by the Deuill vnder this fearefull seruitude, in which he also holdeth the Floridians and Virginians at this day.

For the wickednesse of this King Abaz, God stirred vp Rezin of Damascus, and Pekah the Sonne of Remaliah, King of Israel against him, who invaded Iudaea, and besieged Ierusalem, but entred it not.

The King of Syria, Rezin, posselt himselfe of Elah by the Red Sea, and cast the Iewes out of it; and Pekah slaughtered in one day an hundred and twenty thousand Iudaans, of the ablest of the Kingdome, at which time Maasiah, the Sonne of Achaz was also slaine by Zichri, with Azrikam the Gouvernour of his house: and Elcanath the second person vnto the King. Besides all this, two hundred thousand prisoners of women and children, the Israelites led away to Samaria: but by the counsell of the Prophet Oded, they were returned and deliuered backe againe.

As Israel and Aram vexed Iuda on the North; so the Edomites and the Philistims, who euermore attended the ruine of Iudaea, entred vpon them from the South; and took Beth-semes, Aialon, Gaderoth, Socho, Tinnah, and Gemo, slew many people, and carried away many prisoners. Whereupon when Achaz saw himselfe enuironed on all sides, and that his Idols and dead gods gaue him no comfort, he sent to the Affyrian Tiglatphileser, to desire some aide from him against the Israelites and Aramites, presenting him with the silver and gold both of the Temple, and Kings House.

Tiglatphileser wanted not a good example to follow, in making profit of the troubles that rose in Palestina. His Father hauing lately made himselfe from a Prouinciall Lieutenant, King of Babylon and Affyria, had a little before led him the way into Iudaea, invited by Menahem, King of Israel. Wherefore now the Sonne willingly harkened to Achaz, and embraced the aduantage. As for Belochus himselfe, he was content to assigne some other time for going through with this enterprize: because (as I haue said before) he was not firmly settled at home, and the Syrian Kings lay directly in his way, who were yet strong both in men and fame. But Tiglat, hauing now, with the treasures of Ierusalem, prepared his Armie, first invaded the Territorie of Damascus, wanne the Citie, and killed Rezin the last of the race of the Adads, who began with Dauid, & ended with this Achaz. At Damascus Achaz met Tiglat, and taking thence a patterne of the Altar, sent it to Uriah the Priest, commanding the like to be made at Ierusalem, whereon at his returne hee burnt Sacrifice to the Gods of the Syrians. In the meane while Tiglat posselt all Basin, and and the rest beyond Jordan, which belonged to the Tribes of Reuben, Gad, and Manasse. And then passing the Riuer, he mastered the Cities of Galilee, invaded Ephraim, and the Kingdome of Israel, and made them his Vassalls. And notwithstanding that he was invited and waged by Achaz, yet after the spoile of Israel, he posselt himselfe of the greater part of Iuda, and as it seemeth, enforced Achaz to pay him Tribute. For in the second of Kings, the eighteenth, it is written of Ezechias, that he revolted from Assur, or rebelled against him, and therefore was invaded by Senacherib. After Abaz had beheld and borne these miseries, in the end of the sixteenth yeere of his reigne he died: but was not buried in the Sepulchers of the Kings of Iuda.

10 With Abaz liued Medius, the third Prince in Media, who gouerned 40. yeeres, saith Eusebius: Diodorus and Ctesias finde Anticarnus instead of this Medius, to haue bene Euseb. in Chr. Sofarmus his Successour, to whom they giue 50. yeeres.

Tiglat Phileser held the Kingdome of Affyria, all the reigne of Abaz; yet so, that Salmanassar his Sonne may seeme to haue reigned with him some part of the time. For wee finde that Abaz did send vnto the Kings of Assur to helpe him. The Genea note saies, that these Kings of Assur, were Tiglat Phileser, and those Kings that were vnder his Domini-on. But that he or his Father had hitherto made such conquests, as might giue him the Lordship ouer other Kings, I doe neither finde any Historie, nor circumstance that pro-ueth. Wherefore I thinke that these Kings of Assur, were Tiglat, and Salmanassar his 20 Sonne, who reigned with his Father, as hath bene said before: though how long hee reigned with his Father, it had bene hard to define.

At this time began the Ephori in Lacedaemon, a hundred and thirty yeeres after Lycurgus Plut. in vita Solo. according to Plutarch. Eusebius makes their beginning farre later, namely, in the fifteenth Olympiad. Of these Ephori, Elalus was the first; Theopompus and Polydorus, being then joynt Kings. These Ephori, chosen euery yeere, were controuersers, as well of their Senators as of their Kings, nothing being done without their aduice and consent. For (saith Cicero) they were opposed against their Kings, as the Roman Tribunes against the Consuls. In the time of Abaz died Aeschylus, who had ruled in Athens euery since the fiftieth yeere of Vezia. Alcamenon the thirteenth of the Medontids, or Gouvernours of the Athenians (so called of Medon who followed Codrus) succeeded his Father Aeschylus, and was the last of their Gouvernors: he ruled onely two yeeres. For the Athenians changed first from Kings (after Codrus) to Gouvernors for life; which ending in this Alcamenon, they erected a Magistrate, whom they termed an Archon, who was a kinde of Burghomaster, or Gouvernour of their City for ten yeeres.

This alteration Pausanias in his fourth Booke begins, in the first yeere of the eight Olympiad. Eusebius and Halicarnassus in the first of the seuenth Olympiad: at which time indeed, Carops the first of these, began his ten yeeres rule.

The Kingdome of the Latines gouerned about three hundred yeere by the Syluij, of the race of Eneas, tooke end in the same Abaz time: the foundation of Rome, being layed by Romulus and Remus in the eight yeere of the same King. Codoman builds it the eleuenth of Achaz, Bucholzer in the eighth, as I thinke hee should; others somewhat later, and in the reigne of Ezechias. Cicero, Eutropius, Orosius, and others, square the time of the foundation to the third yeere of the sixth Olympiad. But Halicarnassus, Solinus, Antiochennus, Cleuens Alexandrinus, and Eusebius, to the first yeere of the seuenth: who seeme not onely to me, but to many very learned Chronologers, to haue kept herein the best accompt.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of the Antiquities of Italie, and foundation of Rome in the time of Ahas.

§. I.

Of the old Inhabitants, and of the name of Italie.

And here to speake of the more ancient times of Italie, and what Nations posselt it before the arriual of Aeneas, the place may seeme to inuite vs: the rather because much fabulous matter hath beene mixed with the truth of those elder plantations. Italie before the fall of Troy, was knowne to the Greekes by diuers names: as first Hesperia, then Ausonia, the one name arising of the feate, the other of the Ausones, a people inhabiting part of it: one ancient name of it was also Oenotria, which it had of the Oenotri: whom Halicarnassens thinkes to haue beene the first, that brought a Colonie of Arcadians into that Land. Afterward it was called Italie of Italus: concerning which changes of names, Virgil speakes thus:

Terra antiqua, potens armis, atque ubere glebae:
Oenotrij coluere viri, nunc fama, minores
Italiam dixisse, ducis de nomine, gentem.*

There is a Land which Greekes Hesperia name,
Ancient, and strong, of much fertilitie:
Oenotrians held it, but we heare by fame,
That by late ages of Posteritie,
'Tis from a Captaines name called Italie.

Who this Captaine or King may haue beene, it is very vncertaine. For Virgil speakes no more of him, and the opinions of others are many and repugnant. But like enough it is, that the name which hath continued so long vpon the whole Countrey, and worne out all other denominations, was not at the first accepted without good cause. Therefore to finde out the originall of this name, and the first planters of this noble Countrey, Reineccius hath made a very painfull search, and not improbable coniecture. And first of all he grounds vpon that of Halicarnassens, who speakes of a Colonie which the Eleans did leade into Italie, before the name of Italie was giuen to it: Secondly, vpon that of Iustine, who saith, that Brundisium was a Colonie of the Atolians: Thirdly, vpon that of Strabo, who affirms the same of Temesa or Tempsa, a Citie of the Brutij in Italie: Lastly, vpon the authoritie of Plinie, who shewes that the Italians did inhabite onely one Region of the Land, whence afterward the name was deriued ouer all. Concerning that which is said of the Eleans and Atolians, who (as hee shewes) had one originall; from them he brings the name of Italie. For the word Italia, differs in nothing from Atolia, save that the first Letter is cast away, which in the Greeke words is common; and the letter (o) is changed into (a) which change is found in the name of Athalia an Island neere Italie, peopled by the Atholians: and the like changes are very familiar in the Aolie Dialect; of which Dialect (being almost proper to the Atolians) the accent & pronunciation, together with many words little altered, were retained by the Latines, as Dionysius Halicarnassens, Quintilian, and Priscian the Grammarian teach.

Heereunto appertaines that of Julian the Apostata, who called the Greekes, cousins of the Latines. Also the common Originall of the Greekes and Latines from Iauan; and the Fable of Ianus, whose Image had two faces, looking East and West, as Greece and Italie lay, and was stamped on Coynes, with a Shippe on the other side; all which is, by interpretation, referred to Iauan, father of the Greekes and Latines: who sayling ouer the Ionian Sea, that lies betwene Atolia and the Westerne parts of Greece and Italie, planted Colonies in both. Now whereas Reineccius thinkes, that the names of Atlas and Italus belonged both to one man, and thereto applies that of Berosus, who called Cethim, Italus; though it may seeme strengthened by the marriage of Dardanus, whilst he abode in Italie with Electra, the daughter of Atlas, yet is it by arguments (in my valuation) greater and stronger, easily disproued. For they who make mention of Atlas, place him before the time of Moses: and if Atlas were Cethim, or Kitim, then was he the sonne of Iauan, and nephew of Lapheth, the eldest sonne of Noah: which antiquity farre exceeds the name of Italie, that began after the departure of Hercules out of the Countrey, not long before the Warre of Troy.

Likewise Virgil, who speakes of Atlas, and of Dardanus his marriage with Electra, hath nothing of his meeting with her in Italie, but calleth Electra & her sister Maja (poetically) daughters of the Mountaine Atlas in Africa, naming Italus among the Kings of the Aborigines; which he would not haue done, had Atlas and Italus been one person.

As for the authoritie of Berosus in this case, we need the lesse to regard it, for that Reineccius himselfe, whose coniectures are more to be valued than the dreames wherewith Annianus hath filled Berosus, holds it but a figment.

That the name of Italie began long after Atlas, it appeares by the Verses of Virgil last rehearsed, wherein hee would not haue said, — Nunc fama minores Italiam dixisse ducis de nomine gentem, had that name beene heard of ere Dardanus left the Countrey. But seeing that, when Hercules, who died a few yeeres before the Warre of Troy, had left in Italie a Colonie of the Eleans (who in a manner were one and the same Nation with the Atolians, as Strabo, Herodotus, and Pausanias teach) then the name of Italie began: and seeing Virgil makes mention of Italus among the Italian Kings, it were no great boldnesse to say, that Italus was Commander of these Eleans. For though I remember not that I haue read of any such Greeke as was named Italus, yet the name of Atolus, written in Greece Atolus, was very famous among the Atolians, and among the Eleans, he being sonne of a King of Elis, and founder of the Atolian Kingdome. Neyther is it more hard to deriue the name of Italus from Atolus, then Italia from Atolia. So may Virgil's authoritie stand well with the collections of Reineccius; the name of Italie being taken both from a Captaine, and from the Nation, of which hee and his people were.

§. II.

Of the Aborigines, and other Inhabitants of Latium, and of the reason of the names of Latini and Latium.

Italie the Latines and Hetrurians were most famous, the Hetrurians hauing held the greatest part of it vnder their subiection; and the Latines by the vertue and felicity of the Romans, who were a branch of them, subduing all Italie, and in few ages whatsoeuer Nation was knowne in Europe: together with all the Westerne parts of Asia, and North of Africk.

The Region called Latium, was first inhabited by the Aborigines, whom Halicarnassens, Varro, and Reineccius (following them) thinke to haue been Arcadians: and this name of Aborigines (to omit other significations that are strained) imports as much as originall, or native of the place, which they possessed: which title the Arcadians are known in vaunting manner to haue alwaies vsurped, fetching their antiquitie from beyond the Moone; because indeed, neither were the inhabitants of Peloponnesus inforced to forsake their seares so oft as other Greekes were, who did dwell without that halfe Island, neyther had the Arcadians so vnure a dwelling as the rest of the Peloponnesians, because their Countrey was lesse fruitfull in land, mountainous, and hard of access, & they themselves (as in such places commonly are found) very warlike men. Some of these therefore hauing occupied a great part of Latium, & held it long, did according to the Arcadian manner, stile themselves Aborigines, in that language, which either their new Seate, or their Neighbours thereby had taught them. How it might be that the Arcadians, who dwelt somewhat far from Sea, & are alwaies noted as vnapt men to proue good Mariners, should haue bene Authors of new discoueries, were a question not easie to be answered, were it not so, that both fruitfulness of children, in which those ages abounded, inforced the superfluous companie to seeke another sear, and that some expeditions of the Arcadians, as especially that of Enander, into the same parts of Italie, are generally acknowledged.

After the Aborigines, werethe Pelafgi, an ancient Nation, who sometimes gaue name to all Greece: but their antiquities are long since dead, for lacke of good records. Neither was their glorie such in Italie, as could long sustaine the name of their owne Tribe; for they were in short space accounted one people with the former inhabitants. The Sicani, Aufones, Arunci, Rutili, and other people, did in ages following disturbe the peace of Latium, which by Saturne was brought to some ciuilitie; and he therefore canonized as a god.

This Saturne S. Augustine calleth Sterces or Sterculius, others terme him Stercutius and say, that he taught the people to dung their grounds. That Latium tooke his name of Saturne, because he did latere, that is, lie hidden there, when he fled from Iupiter, it is questionlesse a fable. For as in Heathenish superstition, it was great vanitie to thinke that any thing could be hidden from God, or that there were many gods of whom one fledde from another; so in the truth of Historie, it is well knowne, that no King reigning in those parts was so mighty, that it should bee hard to finde one Countrie or another, wherein a man might be safe from his pursuit. And yet, as most fables and poetical fictions were occasioned by some ancient truth, which eyther by ambiguity of speech, or some allusion, they did maimedly and darkely expresse (for so they fained a passage ouer a Riuer in Hell, because death is a passage to another life; and because this passage is hatefull, lamentable, and painfull, therefore they named the Riuer Styx of Hate, Corytus of Lamentation, and Acheron of Pain: so also because men are stonie-hearted, and because the Greeke word people, and stones, are neere in sound, therefore they fained in the time of Deucalion stones conuerted into men, as at other times men into stones: in like manner it may be, that the originall of Saturne, hiding himselfe, was some allusion to that olde opinion of the wife of the Heathen, that the true God was ignotus Deus, as it is noted in the Aëti; whence also Esay of the true God saies, tu Deus abscondite. For it can not be in vaine, that the word Saturnus should also haue this very signification, if he deriued (as some thinke) from the Hebrew Satar, which is to hide: Howbeit I denie not, but that the originall of this word, Latium, ought rather to be sought elsewhere.

Esay 45. 1. 5.

Reyneccius doth coniecture that the Ceteans, who descended of Cethim, the Sonne of Iauan, were the men who gaue the name to Latium. For these Ceteans are remembered by Strabo as aiders of the Troians in their Warre. Strabo interpreting the place of Homer, calls them subjects to the Crowne of Troy. Heereupon Reyneccius gathers, that their abode was in Asia: viz. in agro Elaitico; in the Elaitian Territorie, which agreeth with Strabo. Of a City which the Æolians held in Asia, called Elaea, or Elaita, Pausanias makes mention: Stephanus calls it Cidamis, or (according to the Greeke writing) Cidamis, which name last rehearsed hath a very neere found to Cethim, Citima, or Cithim; the Greeke Letter (D) hauing (as many teach) a pronunciation very like to (TH) differing onely in the strength or weakenesse of vterance, which is found betwene many English words written with the same letters. Wherefore that these Ceteans being descended of Cethim, Citima, or Kittima, the Sonne of Iauan, who was Progenitor of the Greekes, might very well take a denomination from the Citie, and Region, which they inhabited, and from thence be called Elaites, or Elaites, it is very likely, considering that among the Arcadians, Phocians, Æolians, and Eleans, who all were of the Æolique Tribe, are found the names of the Mountaine Elaus, the Hauen Elaeus, the people Elaites, the Citie Elaus, Elaita, and Elaitia; of which last it were somewhat harsh in the Latine tongue to call the Inhabitants by any other name then Elaitini, from whence Latini may come. Now whereas both the Cetei and Arcadians, had their originall from Cethim, it is nothing unlikely, that agreeing in language and similitude of names, they might neuertheless differ in sound and pronunciation of one and the same word. So that as he is by many called Sabinus, to whom some (deriuing the Sabines from him) giue the name of Sabus: in the like manner might he whom the Arcadians would call Elatus (of which name they had a Prince that founded the Citie Elaitia) be named of the Ceteans Latinus. Reyneccius pursuing this likelihood, thinks, that when Eurypilus, Lord of the Ceteans, (being the Sonne of Telephus, whom Hercules begat vpon Auge, the daughter of Aleus King of Arcadia) was slaine by Achilles in the Troian Warre: then did Telephus, brother to Eurypilus, conduct the Ceteans, who (fearing what euill might befall themselves by the Greekes, if the affairs of Troy should goe ill): passed into that part of Italie, whereas the Arcadians were planted by Oenotrus. And Reyneccius farther thinks, that Telephus being the more gracious among among the Oenotrian Arcadians, by the memory of his G. and-mother Auge, an Arcadian Lady, was well contented to take an Arcadian name, and to be called Elatus, which in the dialect and pronunciation either of the Ceteans, or of the Oenotrians, was first Elatus, and then Latinus. That this name of Elatus may haue beene taken or imposed by the Arcadians, it is the more easie to be thought, for that there were then two Families, the one of Aphidas, the other of Elatus, who were Sons of Arcas King of Arcadia, which gaue name to the Countrie: and betwene these two Families the succession in that Kingdome did passe, almost interchangeably for many ages, till at the end of the Troian warre it fell into the hand of Hippothens of the race of Elatus, in whose Posteritie it continued vntill the last. Again, the name of Latinus, hauing a derivative found, agrees the better with the supposition of such an accident. This is the coniecture of Reyneccius, which if he made ouer-boldly, yet others may follow it with the lesse reproofe, considering that it is not easie to finde either an apparent truth, or faire probability among these disagreeing Authors, which haue written the originals of Latium.

S. III.

Of the ancient Kings of the Latines vntill Aeneas his coming.

20 The Kings which reigned in Latium before the arrivall of Aeneas, were Saturnus, Picus, Faunus and Latinus. Of Saturne there is nothing remembred, saue what is mentioned already, and many fables of the Greekes, which whether they be applicable to this man, it is for him to iudge, who shall be able to determine, whether this were the Saturne of the Greekes, called by them Kronos, or some other, stiled Saturne by the Aborigines. For the age wherein he liued, may very well admit him to haue beene the same: but the names of * Sterces, and Stercutius (for it may be, this name was not borrowed from the skill which he taught the people, but rather the foyle which they laid on their grounds, had that appellation from him) doe rather make him seeme some other man.

30 Of Picus it is said, that he was a good Horse-man. The fable of his being changed into a Bird, which we call a Pie, may well seeme (as it is interpreted) to haue growne from the skill which he had in sooth-saying, or diuination, by the flight and chattering of Fowles. Faunus, the Sonne of Picus, reigned after his Father. He gaue to Euander the Arcadian (who hauing slaine by mischance his Father Echemus King of Arcadia, fled into Italie) the waste grounds on which Rome was afterward built.

Fauna, called Fatma, the sister of Faunus, who was also his Wife, as all Historians agree; she was held a Prophetesse, and highly commended for her chastitie; which praise in her must needs haue been much blemished by her marriage, it selfe being meely incestuous.

It is not mentioned that Faunus had by his sister any childe, neither doe we reade of any other Wife which he had, saue onely that Virgil giues vnto him Latinus as his Sonne, by a Nymph, called Marica.

But who this Marica was it is not found, saue onely that her abode was about the Riuer Liris neere Minturne.

Of the name Latinus, there are by Pomponius Sabinus recounted foure: one, the Sonne of Faunus, another of Hercules, a third of Plysses by Circe, the fourth of Telemachus. Suidas takes notice onely of the second, of whom he saith, that his name was Telephus, and the people anciently named the Cetij, were from his surname called Latini. This agrees in effect with the opinion of Reyneccius, the difference consisting almost in this onely, that Suidas calls Telephus, the sonne of Hercules, whereas Reyneccius makes him his Nephew, so by a sonne of the same name. This Latinus hauing obtained the succession in that Kingdome after Faunus, did promise his onely Daughter and Heire Launina, to Turnus the son of Ventus, who was sister to Amata Latinus his Wife.

But when Aeneas arrived in those parts with fiftie ships, or perhaps fewer, wherein might be imbarcked according to the rate which Thucydides allowes to the Vessels then vied, about one thousand and two hundred men: then Latinus finding that it would stand best with his assurance, to make alliance with the Troian, and moued with the great reputation of Aeneas, which himselfe had heard of in the Warre of Troy, gaue his Daughter to him, breaking off the former appointment with Turnus; who incensed here.

* Exeget often calls the Idols of the heathen Idols stercorae: and hence it may be that in the Euangelist we reade of Belzebub, Belzebub, which is interpreted Domus stercoris: and it may be that after that Saturne became the name of an Idol, it pleased God that in a like sense this name stercoris should stick vnto him. Aeneid 7.

herewith, fought to auenge himselfe by warre: which was soone ended with his owne death.

Of Amata the Wife of Latinus, it is very certaine, that were she an Italian, she could not haue borne a Daughter marriageable at the arriuall of Aeneas; vnlesse we should wholly follow Suidas, and rather giue the conduct of the Cetei into Italie, to Telephus the Father, than to his Sonne, who serued in the last yeere of the Troian Warre. But Reynecius holds her an Asiatique, and thinkes withall, that Lauinia was borne before Telephus came into Italie. That this name Amata, by which Virgil and Italicarnassens call her, was not proper, but rather a surname, it may seeme by Varro; who calleth her Palatia: which name very well might be deriued from the Greeke name Pallas. Amata, which signifies beloued, or deare, was the name by which the High Priest called euery Virgin, whom he tooke to seruie as a Nunne of Vesta, wherefore it is the more easie to be thought a surname, howsoeuer Virgil discourse of her and Venilia her sister.

Lauinia, the daughter of Latinus, being giuen in marriage to Aeneas, the Kingdome of Latium, or the greatest part of that Countrey, was established in that race: wherein it continued vntill it was ouer-grown by the might and greatnesse of the Romans.

§. IIII.

Of Aeneas, and of the Kings and Gouernors of Alba.

Aeneas himselfe being of the royall bloud of Troy, had the command of the Dardanians: he was a valiant man, very rich, and highly honoured among the Troians. By his wife Crensa, the daughter of Priamus, he had a sonne called Ascanius, whose surname was Iulus, hauing before the ruine of Troy (as Virgil notes) bene surnamed Ilus. But when Aeneas was dead, his wife Lauinia, the daughter of Latinus, being great with child by him, and fearing the power of this Ascanius, fled into the Woods, where she was deliuered of a sonne, called thereupon Sylvius, and surnamed Posthumus, because he was borne after his fathers Funerall. This flight of Lauinia was so euill taken by the people, that Ascanius procured her returne, entreated her honourably, and vsing her as a Queene, did foster her yong sonne, his halfe-brother Sylvius. Yet afterwards, whether to auoid all occasions of disagreement, or delighted with the situation of the place; Ascanius leauing to his mother in law the Citie Lauinium, which Aeneas had built and called after his new wiues name, founded the Citie Alba Longa, and therein reigned. The time of his reigne was, according to some, eight and twenty yeeres: Virgil giues him thirtie; others fiue and thirty, and eight and thirtie. After his decesse, there arose contention betwene Sylvius, the sonne of Aeneas, and Iulus the sonne of Ascanius, about the Kingdome: but the people inclining to the sonne of Lauinia, Iulus was contented to hold the Priesthood, which he and his race enioyed, leauing the Kingdome to Sylvius Posthumus, whose posterity were afterwards called Syluij.

The reigne of the Alba Kings, with the continuance of each mans reigne, I finde thus set downe:

Ilia, called also Rhea and Syluia.
Romulus. Remus.

The most of these Kings liued in peace, and did little or nothing worthy of remembrance.

Latinus founded many Townes in the borders of Latium: who standing much vpon the honour of their originall, grew thereby to be called Prisci Latini. Of Tiberinus some thinke that the Riuer Tiber had name, being formerly called Albula: but Virgil giues it that denomination of another called Tibris, before the coming of Aeneas into Italie. The Mountaine Auentinus had name (as many write) from Auentinus King of the Albanes: who was buried therein: but Virgil hath it otherwise. Iulius, the brother of Auentinus, is named by Eusebius as father of another Iulius, and grandfather of Iulius Proculus, who leauing Alba, dwelt with Romulus in Rome. Numitor, the elder sonne of Procas, was deprived of his Kingdome by his brother Amulius; by whom also his sonne Agesthus was slaine, and Ilia his daughter made a Nunne of Vesta, that thereby the issue of Numitor might be cut off. But she conceiued two sonnes, either by her Vncle Amulius, as some thinke, or by Mars, as the Poets faine, or perhaps by some man of warre. Both the children, their Vncle commanded to be drowned, and the mother buried quicke, according to the Law; which so ordained, when the Vestall Virgins brake their chastitie. Whether it was so, that the mother was pardoned at the entreatie of Ancho, the daughter of Amulius, or punished as the Law required (for Authors herein doe varie) it is agreed by all, that the two children were preferred, who afterward reuenged the cruelty of their Vncle, with the slaughter of him and all his, and restored Numitor their grandfather to the Kingdome: wherein how long he reigned, I finde not, neither is it greatly materiall to know; for as much as the Estates of Alba and of Latium were presently eclipsed by the swift increase of Rome; vpon which the computation of Time following (as farre as concerns the things of Italie) is dependant. After the death of Numitor, the Kingdome of Alba ceased; for Numitor left no male issue. Romulus chose rather to liue in Rome; and of the Line of Sylvius none else remained. So the Albanes were gouerned by Magistrates; of whom onely two Dictators are mentioned, namely Caius Cluilius, who in the dayes of Tullus Hostilius, King of the Romans, making Warre vpon Rome, dyed in the Campe; and Metius Suffetius, the successor of Cluilius, who surrendered the Estate of Alba vnto the Romans, hauing committed the hazard of both Signories to the successe of three men of each side, who decided the quarrell by Combat: in which, the three brethren Horatij, the Champions of the Romans, preuailed against the Curatij, Champions of the Albanes. After this Combat, when Metius (following Tullus Hostilius with the Albane forces against the Veientes and Fidenates) withdrew his Companies out of the battaile, hoping thereby to leaue the Romans to such an ouerthrow, as might make them weake enough for the Albanes to deale with, Tullus, who notwithstanding this falsehood, obtained the victory, did reward Metius with a cruell death, causing him to be tyed to two Chariots, and so torne in pieces. Then was Alba destroyed and the Citizens carried to Rome, where they were made free Denizens, the noble Families being made Patritians; among which were the Iulij: of whom C. Iulius Caesar being descended, not onely gloried in his ancient, royall, and forgotten pedigree, in full assembly of the Romans, then gouerned by a free Estate of the People: but by his rare industrie, valour, and iudgement, obtained the Soueraigntie of the Romane Empire (much by him enlarged) to himselfe and his posteritie; whereby the name of Aeneas, and honour of the Troian and Alban Race, was so reuiued, that seldome, if euer, any one Family hath attained to a proportionable height of glory.

§ V.

Of the beginning of Rome, and of Romulus birth and death.

Of Rome, which deuoured the Alban Kingdome, I may here best shew the beginnings, which (though somewhat vncertaine) depend much vpon the birth and education of Romulus, the grand-child of Numitor, the last that reigned in Alba. For how not onely the bordering people, but all Nations betwene Eubrates and the Ocean where broken in pieces by the yron teeth of this fourth Beast, it is not to be described in one place, hauing bene the worke of many Ages; whereof I now doe handle onely the first, as incident vnto the discourse proceeding. Q. Fabius Pictor, Por- sius Cato, Calpurnius Piso, Sempronius, and others, seeke to deriue the Romans from Iunio; but Herodotus, Marcellus, and many others of equall credit, giue the Gracians for their ancestors: and as Strabo reporteth in his fifth Booke; Cæcilius rerum Romanarum scriptor eo argumento colligit, Romam à Gracis esse conditam, quod Romani Græco ritu, antiquo instituto, Herculi rem sacram faciunt, matrem quoque Euandri venerantur Romani; Cæcilius (saith he) a Romane Historiographæ, doth by this argument gather, that Rome was built by the Greeks, because the Romanes, after Greekiſh fashion, by ancient ordinance doe sacrifice to Hercules: the Romanes also worship the mother of Euander.

Plutarch in the life of Romulus remembred many founders of that Citie: as Romulus the sonne of Phylles and Circe; Romus the sonne of Emathion, whom Diomedes sent thither to from Troy; or that one Romus, a Tyrant of the Latines, who draue the Tuscans out of that Country, built it. Solinus bestowes the honour of building Rome vpon Euander, saying, That it was before times called Valentia. Heracles giues the denomination to a captiue Lady, brought thither by the Gracians: others say, That it was anciently called Febris, after the name of Februa, the mother of Mars; witnesse Saint Augustine in his third Booke de Ciuitate Dei. But Linie will haue it to be the worke of Romulus, euen from the foundation: of whom and his comforts, Iunemal to a Roman Citizen, vaunting of their originall, answered in these Verses:

Maior um quisquis primus fuit ille tuorum,
Aut pastor fuit, aut illud quod dicere nolo.*

Yet though thou fetch thy pedegree so farre;
Thy first Progenitor, who ere he were,
Some Shepheard was, or else, that Ile forbear.
meaning either a Shepheard, or a Theefe.

Now of Romulus begetting, of his education and preferuation, it is said, That he had Rhea for his mother, and Mars supposed to be his father, that he was nursed by a Wolfe, found and taken away by Faustula, a Shepheards wife. The same vnnatural nursing had Cyrus, the same incredible fostering had Semiramis; the one by a Bitch, the other by Birds. But, as Plutarch saith, it is like enough that Amulius came couered with armour to Rhea, the mother of Romulus, when he begat her with childe; and therein it seemeth to me that he might haue two purposes; the one, to destroy her, because she was the daughter and heire of his elder brother, from whom he iniuriously held the Kingdome; the other to satisfie his appetite, because she was faire and goodly. For she being made a Nunne of the goddesse Vesta, it was death in her, by the Law, to breake her chastitie. I also finde in Fauchet his Antiquitez de Gaule, that Merouée, King of the Frances, was begotten by a Monster of the Sea: but Fauchet sayes, Let them beleue it that list; Il le croira qui vouldra: Also of Alexander, and of Scipio African, there are poeticall inuentions: but to answer these imaginations in generall, it is true, that in those times, when the World was full of this barbarous Idolatry, and when there were as many gods as there were Kings, or passions of the minde, or as there were of vices and vertues; then did many women greatly borne, couer such slips as they made, by protesting to be forced by more than humane power: so did Oenone confesse to Paris, that she had bene rauished by Apollo. And Anchyses boasted that he had knowne Venus. But Rhea was madewith childe by some man of Warre, or other, and therefore called Mars, the god of battell, according to the sense of the time. Oenone was overcome by a strong wit, and by such a one as had those properties ascribed to Apollo. The Mother of Merouée might fancie a Sea Captaine to be gotten with yong by such a one: as the Daughter of Inachus fancied, according to Herodotus. Aneas was a bastard and begotten vpon some faire Harlot, called for her beautie Venus, and was therefore the childe of lust, which is Venus. Romulus was nursed by a Wolfe, which was Lupa, or Lupina, for the Curtesians in those dayes were called Wolfes, que nunc (saith Halicarnassæus) honestiori vocabulo amica appellantur; which are now by an honest name called friends. It is also written, that Romulus was in the end of his life taken vp into heauen, or rather out of the world by his father Mars, in a great storme of thunder, and lightning: so was it said that Aneas vanished away by the Riuer Numicus: but but thereof Linie also speaketh modestly; for hee rehearseth the other opinion that the storme was the furie of the Senators, but seemeth to adhere partially to this taking vp; and many Authors agree, that there was an vnatural darkenesse, both at his birth and at his death, and that hee might be slaine by thunder or lightning, it is not vnlikely. For the Emperour Anastasius was slaine with lightning, so was Strabo the Father of Pompey slaine with a thunder-bolt: so Carus the Emperour (who succeeded Probus) whilst hee lodged with his Armie vpon the Riuer Tigris, was there slaine with lightning. But a Mars of the same kinde might end him that began him; for he was begotten by a man of war, and by violence destroyed. And that he died by violence (which destinie followed most of the Roman Emperours) it appeareth by Tarquinius Superbus: who was the seienth King after him: who when he had murdered his Father-in-law, commanded that he should not be buried, for (saith hee) Romulus himselfe died and was not buried. But let Halicarnassæus end this dispute; whose words are these: They (saith hee) who drew neereſt to the truth, say that he was slaine by his owne Citizens; and that his crueltie in punishments of offenders, together with his arrogancie, were the cause of his slaughter. For it is reported, that both when his mother was rauished, whether by some man, or by a god, the whole body of the sunne was eclipsed, and all the earth couered with darknesse like vnto night, and that the same did happen at his death.

Such were the birth and death of Romulus: whose life historified by Plutarch, doth containe (besides what is here already spoken of him) the conquest of a few milles, which had soone bene forgotten, if the Roman greatnesse built vpon that foundation, had not giuen it memorie in all ages following, euen vnto this day. A valiant man he was; very strong of bodie, patient of trauell, and temperate in diet, as forbearing the vice of wine and delicacies: but his raging ambition he knew not how to temper, which caused him to slay his brother, and neglect to reuenge the death of Tatius, his companion in the Kingdome, that he himselfe might be Lord alone in those narrow Territories. He reigned 37. yeres: first alone, then with Tatius, and after his death, single, till hee was slaine, as is already shewed: after which time the Soueraigntie fell into the hands of Numa, a man to him vnknowne, & more Priest-like then King-like: wherein Rome it selfe in her later times hath somewhat resembled this King. For hauing long bene sole Gouvernesse till Constantine shared with her: afterwards, when as the Greeke Emperour was cruſhed by forraigne enemies, and the Latines dispoyled of Imperiall power, the fell into the subiection of a Prelate, swelling by degrees from the Sheepe-hooke to the Sword, and therewith victorious to excessiue magnificence, from whence by the same degrees it fell, being driuen from luxurie to defenseiue armes, and therein hauing bene vnfortunate, at length betakes herselfe againe to the Croſier staffe.

And thus much of Rome in this place by occasion of the Storie of the times of King Abaz, during whose reigne in Iurie, the foundations of this famous Citie were laid.

CHAP. XXV.

S. 1.

Of the beginning of Ezekias, and of the agreeing of Ptolomies, Nabonassar, Nabopolassar, and Mardocempadus, with the historie of the Bible.

50 The first yere of Abaz his Reigne was confounded with the last of his father Iotham, so was the later end of his sixteene yeres taken vp in the three first of Ezekias his sonne. This appears by the Reigne of Hosea, ouer Israel, which beganne in the twelfth of Abaz, and therefore the third thereof was concurrent with Abaz his fourteenth. But the third of Hosea was the first of Ezekia, so it followes, that Ezekia beganne to reigne in his Fathers fourteenth yere. Like enough it is, that the third yere of Hosea, the same being the fourteenth of Abaz, was almost spent when Ezekia beganne, and so the fifteenth yeere of Ahaz may haue bene concurrent, for the most part, with the first of Ezekia.

By supposing that Hosea began his Kingdome, when the twelfth yeere of Ahaz was almost compleat, some would finde the meanes how to disioyne the first of Ezekia from the fifteenth of Ahaz, placing him yet one yeere later, of which yeere, Ahaz may perhaps haue liued not many dayes. But seeing that the foureteenth and fifteenth yeeres of Ezekia, may not be removed out of their places, it is vaine labour to alter the first yeere.

In the foureteenth yeere of Ezekia, Sennacherib inuading Iuda, and the Countries adioyning, lost his Armie by a miraculous stroake from Heauen, fled home, and was slaine. The yeere following it was that God added fifteene yeeres to the life of Ezekia, when he had already reigned foureteene of his nine and twenty: and the same yeere was that miracle scene of the Sunnes going backe; of which wonder (as I heare) one Bartholomew Scultet, who is much commended for skill in Astronomie, hath by calculation found the very day which answered vnto the twenty fifth of April, in the Italian yeere, being then Thursday. I haue not scene any workes of Scultet; but surely to finde a motion so irregular and miraculous, it is necessary that he produce some record of obseruation made at such a time. Howsoever it be, the fifteenth yeere of Ezekia agreed vpon; and therefore we may not alter the first. As for that saying, which is vsuall in like cases, that Ahaz slept with his Fathers, and Ezekia his Sonne reigned in his stead, it doth no more proue Ezekia reigned not with his Father, than the like saying doth interre the like at the death of Iehosaphat, and succession of Iehoram; whereof, as concerning the beginning of the Soane to reigne whilest his Father liued, wee haue already said enough.

Of this godly King Ezekias, we finde, that his very beginning testified his deuotion and zeale. For whether it were so, that his vnfortunate and vngacious Father (who had our-worne his reputation) gaue way to his Sons proceedings, which perhaps it lay not in him to hinder, or whether (as I rather thinke) the first yeere and first moneth of his reigne, wherein Ezekias opened the doores of the Temple, were to be vnderstood as the beginning of his sole gouernment; we plainly finde it to haue bene his first worke, that he opened the doores of the house of the Lord, which Ahaz had shut vp, cleansed the Citie and Kingdome of the Idols, restored the Priests to their offices and estates, commanded the Sacrifices to be offered which had bene for many yeeres neglected, & brake downe the brasen Serpent of Moses, because the people burnt incense before it, and he called it Nehushtan, which signifieth a lump of brasse. He did also celebrate the Passe-over with great magnificence, inuiting thereunto the Israelites of the ten Tribes: many there were, euen out of those Tribes, that came vp to Ierusalem, to this feast. But the generall multitude of Israel did laugh the Messengers of Ezekia to scorne.

It was not long ere they that scorned to solemnize the memoriall of their deliuerance out of the Egyptian seruitude, fell into a new seruitude, out of which they neuer were deliuered. For in the fourth of Ezekia his reigne, Salmanassar the Sonne of Tiglath, the Sonne of Belochus, hearing that Hosea King of Israel had practised with Soc King of Egypt, against him, inuaded Israel, besieged Samaria, and in the third yeere (after the inhabitants had endured all sorts of miseries) forced it, and carried thence the ten Idolatrous Tribes into Assyria and Media: among whom Tobias and his Sonne of the same name, with Anna his Wife, were sent to Nimue, in whose Seates and Places the Assyrians sent strangers of other Nations, and among them many of the ancient Enemies of the Israelites, as those of Cutha, Ana, Hamah, and Sphernaim, besides Babylonians: whose Places and Nations I haue formerly described in the Treatise of the Holy Land.

These later Assyrian Kings, and the Persians, which followed them, are the first, of whom we finde mention made both in Prophane and Sacred bookes. These therefore serue most aptly to ioyn the times of the old World, (whereof none but the Prophets haue written otherwife than fabulously) with the Ages following that were better knowne, and described in course of History. True it is, that of Cyrus and some other Persians, we finde in the Bible the same names by which other Authors haue recorded them: but of Phul and Salmanassar, with other Assyrian, Chaldean Kings, diuersity of name hath bred question of the persons. Therefore, whereas the Scriptures doe speake of Salmanassar, King of Assur, who reigned in the time of Ahaz and Ezekia, Kings of Iuda, and of Hosea King of Israel, whom he carried into captiuitie: and whereas Ptolomie makes mention of Nabonassar, speaking precisely of the time wherein he liued, it is very pertinent to shew, that Salmanassar and Nabonassar were one and the same man. The like reason also requirith, that it be shewed of Nabuchadnezzar, that he was the same, whom Ptolomie calleth Nabopolassar.

Of both these points Bucholerus hath well collected sufficient prooffe from the exact calculations of sundry good Mathematicians. For by them it appeares, that betwene Nabonassar and the birth of Christ, there passed seauen hundred fortie and five yeeres: at which distance of time the reigne of Salmanassar was. One great prooffe herof is this, which the same Bucholerus alleadgeth out of Erasmus Reinholdus, in the Prutenick Tables. Mardocepadus King of Babylon (whom Ptolomie, speaking of three Eclipses of the Moone, which were in his time, doth mention) was the same whom the Scriptures call Merodach, who sent Embassadors to Ezekia, King of Iuda. So that if we reckon backwards to the difference of time, betwene Merodach and Salmanassar, we shall finde it the same which is betwene Mardocepadus and Nabonassar. Likewise Funtius doth shew, that whereas from the destruction of Samaria, to the destruction of Ierusalem, in the nineteenth of Nabuchadnezzar, we collect out of the Scriptures, the distance of one hundred thirty and three yeeres: the selfe-same distance of time is found in Ptolomie, betwene Nabonassar and Nabopolassar. For, whereas Ptolomie seemes to differ from this account, making Nabonassar more ancient by an hundred and fortie yeeres, than the destruction of Ierusalem, we are to vnderstand that he tooke Samaria in the eighth yeere of his reigne; so that the seauen foregoing yeeres added to these one hundred thirty and three, make the accounts of the Scriptures fall euen with that of Ptolomie. Ptolomies computation is, that from the first of Nabonassar, to the fifth of Nabopolassar, there passed one hundred twentie and seauen yeeres. Now if we adde to these one hundred twentie seauen, the thirteene ensuing of Nabuchadnezzars yeere, before the Citie and Temple were destroyed, we haue the summe of one hundred and fortie yeeres. In so plain a case more proofes are needlesse, though many are brought, of which this may serue for all, that Ptolomie placeth the first of Nabopolassar one hundred twentie and two yeeres, after the first of Nabonassar, which agreeth exactly with the Scriptures. To these notes are added the consent of all Mathematicians: which in account of times I hold more sure than the authority of any History; and therefore I thinke it folly to make doubt, whereas Historians and Mathematicall obseruations doe so thoroughly concur.

Yet forasmuch as that argument of the learned Scaliger doth rest vnanswered, whereby he proued Baladan the Father of Merodach, to haue bene this Nabonassar, I will not spare to lose a word or two in giuing the Reader satisfaction herein. It is true, that the next obseruations of the heauenly Bodies, which Ptolomie recorded, after the time of Nabonassar, were in the reigne of Mardocepadus; the second yeere of whose reigne, is, according to Ptolomie, concurrent in part with the twentie seauen of Nabonassar. For the second of three ancient Eclipses which he calculates, being in the second yeere of Mardocepadus, was from the beginning of Nabonassar twentie seauen yeeres, seauenteene dayes, and cleauen houres: the account from Nabonassar, beginning at high-noon the first day of the Egyptian moneth Thot, then answering to the twenty six of February, and this Eclipse being fiftie minutes before mid-night, on the eighteenth day of that Moneth, when the first day thereof agreed with the nineteenth of February; so that the difference of time betwene the two Kings Nabonassar and Mardocepadus, is noted by Ptolomie, according to the Egyptian yeeres. But how does this proue, that Mardocepadus or Merodach, was the Sonne of Nabonassar? yea, how doth it proue, that he was his next Successour, or any way of his Linage? It was enough to satisfie me, in this argument, that Scaliger himselfe did afterwards beleue Mardocepadus to haue bene rather the Nephew, than the Sonne of Baladan, or Nabonassar. For if hee might be either the Nephew, or the Sonne; hee might perhaps be neither the one, nor the other. But because our Countre-man Lidyate hath reprehended Scaliger for changing his opinion; and that both Tornilius, who followes Scaliger herein, and Setbus Caluissius, who hath drawne into forme of Chronologie, that learned worke, De Emendatione Temporum, doe hold vp the same assertion, confounding Baladan with Nabonassar: I haue taken the paines to search, as farre as my leisure and diligence could reach, after any sentence that might proue the Kindred or succession of these two. Yet cannot I finde in the Almagest (for the Scriptures are either silent in this point, or aduerse to Scaliger; and other good authority, I know none, in this businesse) any sentence more neerely prouing the succession of Merodach to Nabonassar, than the place now last rehearsed: which makes no more, to shew that the one of these was Father to the other, than (that I may vse a like example) the as neere succession of William the Conqueror, declares him, to haue bene Sonne, or Grand-childe to Edward the Confessor. This considered, we may safely goe on with our accompt from Nabonassar, taking him for Salmanassar; and not fearing, that the Readers will be driuen from our booke, when they finde something in it, agreeing with Annius, forasmuch as these Kings mentioned in Scriptures, reigned in Babylon and Assyria, in those very times which by Diodorus and Protonie are assigned to Belus, Nabonassar, and Mardocempadus, and the rest: no good History naming any others, that reigned there in those ages; and all Astronomical observations, fitly concurring, with the yeeres that are attributed to these, or numbered from them.

§. II.

Of the danger and deliuerance of Iudea from Sennacherib.

When Salmanassar was dead, and his son Sennacherib in possession of the Empire, in the fourteenth yeere of Ezechias, he demanded of him such Tribute as was agreed on, at such time as Tiglath, the Grand-father of Sennacherib, and Father of Salmanassar, inuited by Abaz, inuaded Rezen King of Damascus, and deliuered him from the dangerous Warre which Israel had vnderaken against him. This Tribute and acknowledgement when Ezechias denied, Sennacherib, hauing (as it seemes) a purpose to inuade Egypt, sent one part of his Armie to lye before Ierusalem. Now though Ezechias (fearing this powerfull Prince) had acknowledged his fault, and purchased his peace, as he hoped, with thirty hundred talents of siluer, and thirty talents of gold: wherewith he presented Sennacherib, now set downe before Lachis in Iudea; yet vnder the colour of better assurance, and to force the King of Iudea to deliuer hostages, the Assyrian enuironed Ierusalem with a grosse Armie, and hauing his Sword in his hand, thought it the fittest time to write his owne conditions.

Ezechias directed his three great Counsellors, to parlie with Rabfases, ouer the Wall, and to receiue his demands: who vsed three principall arguments to perswade the people to yelde themselves to his Master Sennacherib. For though the Chancellor, Steward, and Secretarie, sent by Ezechias, desired Rabfases to speake vnto them in the Syrian tongue, and not in the Iewish, yet he with a louder voice directed his speech to the multitude in their owne language. And for the first, he made them know, That if they continued obstinate, and adhered to their King, that they would, in a shoit time, be inforced to eate their owne dung, and drinke their owne vrine: Secondly, he altogether disabled the King of Egypt, from whom the Iudeans hoped for succour; and compared him to a broken Staffe, on which whoeuer leaneth, pierceth his owne hand: Thirdly, that the gods who should helpe them, Ezechias had formerly broken and defaced, meaning chiefly (as it is thought by some) the brasen Serpent, which had bene preferred euer since Moses time: and withall he bade them remember the gods of other Nations: whom, notwithstanding any power of theirs, his Master had conquered and throwne downe; and for God himselfe, in whom they trusted, hee perswaded them by no means to relye on him, for hee would deceiue them. But finding the people silent (for so the King had commanded them) after a while, when he had vnderstood that the King of Arabia was marching on with a powerfull Armie, hee himselfe left the Assyrian forces in charge to others, and fought Sennacherib at Labama in Iudea, either to inforce him of their resolution in Ierusalem, or to conferre with him concerning the Armie of Tarhaca the Arabian. Soone vpon this there came letters from Sennacherib to Ezechias, whom hee partly aduised, and partly threatned to submit himselfe: vsing the same blasphemous outrage against the all-powerfull God, as before. But Ezechias sending those Counsellors to the Prophet Esay, which had lately bene sent to Rabfases, receiued from him comfort, and assurance, that this Heathen Idolater should not preuaile; against whom the King also besought aide from Almighty God, repeating the most insolent and blasphemous parts of Sennacherib's letter, before the Altar of God in the Temple, confessing this part thereof to be true. That the King of Asshur had destroyed the Nations and their Lands, and had set fire on their gods, for they were no Gods, but the worke of mans hands, euen wood and stone, &c.

Altar

Thereason that moued Sennacherib to desire to possesse himselfe in haste of Ierusalem, was, that he might thereinto haue retrained his Armie, which was departed as it seemeth from the siege of Pelusium in Egypt, for feare of Tarhaca: and though the Scriptures are silent of that enterprize (which in these booke of the Kings, and of the Chronicles or Paralipomenon, speake but of the affaires of the Iewes in effect) yet the ancient Berosus, and out of him Iosephus, and Saint Hierome, together with Herodotus, remember it as followeth. Herodotus calleth Sennacherib King of Arabia and Assyria: which he might iustly doe, because Tiglath his Grand-father held a great part thereof, which he wrested from Pekah King of Israel: as Gilead ouer Jordan, and the rest of Arabia Petraea adioyning: the same Herodotus also maketh Sechon King of Egypt, to be Vulcans Priest, and reporteth that the reason of Sennacherib's returne from Pelusium in Egypt, which he also besieged, was, that an innumerable multitude of Rats had in one night eaten in funder the Bow-strings of his Archers, and spoyled the rest of their weapons in that kinde, which no doubt might greatly amaze him: but the approach of Tarhaca, remembered by Iosephus and Berosus, was the more vrgent. Saint Hierome vpon the seauen and thirtieth of Esay, out of the same Berosus, as also in part out of Herodotus, whom Iosephus citeth somewhat otherwise than his words lye, reports Sennacherib's retreat in these words. Pugnasti autem Sennacherib Regem Assyriorum contra Aegyptios, & obsidisti Pelusium, iamque extructis aggeribus urbi capiende, venisse Taracham Regem Aethiopi in auxilium, & una nocte iuxta Ierusalem, centum octoginta quinque millia exercitus Assyri pestilentia corripuisse narrat Herodotus: & plenissime Berosus Chaldaica scriptor Historie, quorum fides de propriis libris petenda est; That Sennacherib King of the Assyrians fought against the Aegyptians, and besieged Pelusium, and that when his Mounts were built for taking of the Citie, Tarhaca King of the Aethiopians came to helpe them, and that in one night, neere Ierusalem, one hundred eightie thousand of the Assyrian Armie perished by pestilence; of these things (saith Hierome) * Herodotus reports: and more at large Berosus a writer of Ierusalem, the King of Chaldea storie, whose credit is to be taken from their owne Bookes. Out of Esay it is gathered, that this destruction of the Assyrian Armie was in this manner: Thou shalt be visited of the Lord of Hosts with thunder and shaking, and a great noyse, a whirlwinds and a tempest, and a flame of deuouring fire. But Iosephus hath it more largely out of the same Berosus, an authority (because so well agreeing with the Scriptures) not to be omitted; *Sennacherib*us autem ab Aegyptiaco bello reuertens, ostendit ibi exercitum, quem sub Rabfasis imperio reliquerat peste diuinitus immixta deletum, prima nocte posteaquam urbem oppugnare ceperat, absumptis cum Ducibus & Tribunis centum octoginta quinque millibus Militum; qua clade territus, & de reliquis copijs sollicitus, maximis itineribus in regnum suum contendit, ad regiam qua Ninus dicitur. Vbi paulo post per uisitas Seniorum & filijs suis, Adramelech, & Sennari, vitam amisit: occisus in ipso Templo quod dicitur Arasce, quem praeipuo cultu dignabatur: quibus ob patricidium à popularibus pulsus & in Armeniam fugientibus, Aharacoldas minor filius in Regnum successit; Sennacherib (saith Iosephus) returning from the Egyptian warre, found there his Armie, which he had left vnder the command of Rabfases, destroyed by a pestilence sent from God, the first night that he had begunne to assault the Towne: one hundred fourescore and five thousand of the Souldiers being consumed with their Chieftaines and Coronells. With which destruction being terrified, and withall afraid what might become of the rest of his Armie, he made great marches into his Kingdome, to his Royall Citie, which is called Ninus, where shortly after by the treason of two of the eldest of his Sonnes, Adramelech and Sennari or Sharezer, hee lost his life in the Temple dedicated to Arasce, or Nesroch: whom hee especially worshipped. These his Sonnes being for their parricide chased away by the people: and flying into Armenia, Aharacoldas his younger Sonne succeeded in the Kingdome. Who in the beginning of his reigne sent new troupes out of Assyria and Samaria, to fortifie the Colonie therein planted by his grand-father Salmanassar. What this Nesroch was, it is vncertaine: Hierome in his Hebrew traditions hath somewhat of him, but nothing positively. It is certaine, that Venus Prania was worshipped by the Assyrians; and so was Iupiter Belus, as Dion, Eusebius, and Cyrillus witness. Many fancies there are, what cause his sonnes had to murder him; but the most likely it is, that he had formerly dis-inherited those two, and conferred the Empire on Assarhaddon. Tobit tells vs, that it was fiftie five dayes after Senacherib returned, ere he was murdered by his sonnes; during which time he slew great numbers of the Israelites in Ninene, till the most iust God, turned the Sword against his owne brest.

§. III.

Of Ezekias his sicknesse and recouerie; and of the Babylonian King that congratulated him.

After this maruellous deliery, Ezekias sickned, and was told by Isaiah, that he must dye: but after he had besought God with teares for his deliery, Isaiah, as he was going from him, returned againe, and had warrant from the Spirit of God to promise him recovery after three dayes, and a prolongation of life for fiftene yeeres. But Ezekias somewhat doubtfull of this exceeding grace, prayeth a signe to confirme him: whereupon, at the prayer of Isaiah, the shadow of the Sunne cast it selfe the contrary way, and went backe tenne degrees, vpon the Dyall of Achaz. The cause that moued Ezekias to lament (saith Saint Hierome) was, because he had as yet no sonne, and then in despair that the Messias should come out of the house of Dauid, or at least of his Seede. His disease seemeth to be the Pestilence, by the medicine giuen him by the Prophet, to wit, a masse of Figges, layed to the Borch or Sore.

This wonder when the Wife-men of Chaldea had told to Merodach, King of Babylon, the first of that house, he sent to Ezekias, to be informed of the cause: at which time Ezekias shewed him all the Treasure he had, both in the Court and in the Kingdome: for which he was reprehended by the Prophet Isaiah, who told him; The dayes are at hand, that all that is in thine house, and whatsoever thy fathers haue layed up in store to this day, shall be carried into Babel; nothing shall be left, saith the Lord. It may seeme strange, how Ezekias should haue got any treasure worth the shewing: for Senacherib had robbed him of all, the yeere before. But the spoyle of the same Senacherib his Campe repayed all with aduantage, and made Ezekias richer vpon the suddaine than euer he had bene: which v unexpected wealth was a strong temptation to boasting. After this time Ezekias had rest, and spending without noyse that addition which God had made vnto his life; he dyed, hauing reigned nine and twentie yeeres. One only offense Warre he made, which was against the Philistims with good successe. Among his other acts (shortly remembred in Ecclesiasticus) he deuised to bring water to Ierusalem.

In two respects they say that he offended God: the one, that he reioyced too much at the destruction and lamentable end of his enemy; the other, that he so much gloried in his riches, as he could not forbear to shew them to strangers. But the reason which moued Ezekias (speaking humanely) to entertaine the Embassadors of Merodach in this friendly and familiar manner, was, because he came to visit him, and brought him a present, congratulating the recovery of his health; as also in that Merodach had weakened the house of Senacherib, his fearefull enemy. For Merodach, who was Commander and Lieutenant vnder Senacherib in Babylon, vsurped that State himselfe, in the last yeere of that King, and held it by strong hand against his son Assarhaddon, who was not onely simple, but impaired in strength, by the molestation of his brothers. This aduantage Merodach espied, and remembering, that their ancestor Phul Belochus had let his owne master Sardanapalus besides the cushion, thought it as lawfull for himselfe to take the opportunity which this Kings weakenesse did offer, as it had bene for Belochus to make vse of the others wickednesse: and so, finding himselfe beloued of the Babylonians, and sufficiently powerfull, he did put the matter to hazard, and preuailed. The assertion of this history is made by the same arguments that were vsed in maintaining the common opinion of Writers, touching Phul Belochus; which I will not here againe rehearse. So of this new Race, which cut a-sunder the Line of Ninus, there were onely five Kings.

Tiglath Philassar.

But forasmuch as the last yeere of Salmanassar was also the first of Senacherib his son, we reckon the time, wherein the house of Phul held the Assyrian Kingdome, to haue been an hundred and one yeeres, of which, the last five and twentie were spent with Ezekias, vnder Salmanassar, Senacherib, and Assarhaddon.

§. IIII.

The Kings that were in Media during the reigne of Ezekias: Of the difference found betweene sundry Authors, in rehearsing the Median Kings. Other contemporaries of Ezekias: of Candaces, Gyges, and the Kings descended from Hercules.

IN the time of Ezekias, Medius, and after him Cardiceas, reigned in Media. Whether it were so, that variety of names, by which these Kings were called in several Histories, hath caused them to seeme more than indeede they were, or whether the sonnes reigning with the fathers, haue caused not onely the names of Kings, but the length of Time, wherein they gouerned Media, to exceede the due proportion: or whether the Copies themselves, of Ctesias and Annus his Metasthenes, haue bene faulty, as neither of these two Authors is ouer-highly commended of trustinesse: so it is, that the names, number, and length of reigne, are all very diuersly reported of these Median Kings, that follow Arbaces: therefore it neede not seeme strange, that I reckon Medius and Cardiceas as contemporaries with Ezekias. For to reconcile so great a difference, as is found in those Writers that varie from Eusebius, is more then I dare vndertake. I will onely hereset downe the roll of Kings that reigned in Media, accordingly as sundry Authors haue deliuered it.

Annus his Metasthenes orders them and their reignes thus:

Diodorus Siculus following Ctesias (as perhaps Annus made his Metasthenes follow Diodorus, with some little variation, that he might not seeme a borrower) placeth them thus.

Astybara. } the continuance of these two he doth not mention.
Astyages.

Mercator hath laboured with much diligence, to reconcile these Catalogues, and to make them also agree with Eusebius. But forasmuch as it seemes to me an impossible matter, to attaine vnto the truth of these forgotten times, by coniectures founded vpon

Ctesias and Metasthenes, I will lay the burthen vpon Eusebius, who liued in an age better furnished than ours, with bookes of this argument. Let it therefore suffice, that these two Kings (whom I haue reckoned as contemporaries with Ezekia) Medidus and Cardiceas, are found in Eusebius: for whether Cardiceas were Diodorus his Arbaces, I will not stay to search. The Kings of Media, according to Eusebius, reigned in this order.

| Arbaces.   | 28 | } reigned } yeeres. |
| Sofarmus.  | 30 |                     |
| Medidus.   | 40 |                     |
| Cardiceas. | 15 |                     |
| Driscos.   | 54 |                     |
| Phraortes. | 24 |                     |
| Cyaxares.  | 32 |                     |
| Astyages.  | 38 |                     |

These names, and this course of succession I retaine; but adde vnto these, Cyaxares the sonne of Astyages, according to Xenophon; and sometimes follow Herodotus, in setting down the length of a Kings reigne, otherwife than Eusebius hath it: of which variations, I will render my reasons in due place.

The twentie nine yeeres of Ezekia were concurrent, in part, with the rule of the same first that were chosen Gouernors of Athenes for ten yeeres, that is, of Charops, Asimedes, Elidicus, and Hippones. Touching the first of these I heare nothing, saue that Rome was built in his first yeere; of which perhaps himselfe did not heare. Of the second and third I finde onely the names. The fourth made himselfe knowne by a strange example of iustice, or rather of cruelty, that he shewed vpon his owne Daughter. For he finding that she had offended in vnchastity, caused her to be lockt vp with an Horse, giuing to neither of them any foode: so the Horse, constrained by hunger, deuoured the vnhappy Woman.

In Rome, the first King, and founder of that Citie Romulus, did reigne both before, and somewhat after Ezekia.

In Lydia, Candaules the last King, ruled in the same age.

This Region was first called Meonia. Lydis the sonne of Atys reigning in it, gaue the name of Lydia, if we beleue such authority as we finde. This Kingdom was afterward, by the appointment of an Oracle, conferred vpon Argon, who came of Alcaus the son of Hercules, by Iardana, a bond-woman. The race of these Heracleids continued reigning fiftie five yeeres (in which two and twentie Generations passed) the sonne continually succeeding the father. Candaules the son of Myrsus was the last of his race, who doated so much vpon the beautie of his owne Wife, that he could not be content to enioy her, but would needes enforce one Gyges, the sonne of Dascylus, to behold her naked body; and placed the vnwilling man secretly in her chamber, where he might see her preparing to bedward. This was not so closely carried, but that the Queene perceiued Gyges at his going forth, and vnderstanding the matter, tooke it in such high disdain, that she forced him the next day to requite the Kings folly with treason. So Gyges, being brought againe into the same chamber by the Queene, slew Candaules, and was rewarded not only with his Wife, but with the Kingdom of Lydia. He reigned thirty eight yeeres, beginning in the last of Ezekia, one yeere before the death of Romulus.

After Gyges, his son Ardis reigned nine & forty yeres; then Sadyattes, twelue; Halyattes, fiftie seauen; and finally Crasus, the son of Halyattes, fourteene yeres: who lost the Kingdom, and was taken by Cyrus of Persia.

And here by the way we may note, that as the Lydian Kings, whom Crasus his Progenitor dispossessed, are deduced from Hercules, so of the same Hercules there sprang many other Kings, which gouerned seuerall Countries very long; as in Asia, the Myrians; in Greece, the Lacedemonians, Messenians, Rhodians, Corinthians, and Argives; and from the Argives, the Macedonians; as likewise from the Corinthians, the Syracusanes: besides many great and famous, though priuate, Families.

But of the Heracleids that reigned in Lydia, I haue not troubled my selfe to take notice in the time of their seuerall reignes: for little is found of them, beside the bare names, and the folly of this last King Candaules.

CHAP. XXVI.

Of the Kings that reigned in Egypt, betweene the deliuerance of Israel from thence, and the reigne of Ezekiah in Juda, when Egypt and Juda made a league against the Assyrians.

§. I.

That many names of Egyptian Kings, found in Historie, are like to haue belonged onely to Viceroyes. An example prouing this out of William of Tyre his Historie of the holy warre.

He emulation and quarrels arising in these times, between the mighty Kingdomes of Egypt and Assyria, doe require our paines, in collecting the most memorable things in Egypt, and setting downe briefly the state of that Countie, which had continued long a flourishing Region, and was of great power, when it contended with Assyria for the Maistrie. Of Cham the sonne of Noah, who first planted that Countie, and of Osiris, Orus, and other ancient Kings, that reigned there, vntill the Israelites were thence deliuered, more hath bene saide already than I can stand to; though I hold it no shame to faile in such coniectures. That which I haue deliuered, in speaking mine opinion of the Egyptian Dynasties, must heere againe helpe me. For it may truly be affirmed, That the great number of Kings, which are said to haue reigned in Egypt, were none other than Viceroyes or Stewards, such as Ioseph was, and such as were the Soldanes in later ages. Therefore I will not onely forbear to seeke after those, whom Herodotus and Diodorus haue reckoned vp, from the mouthes of Egyptian Priests, deliuering them by number, without rehearsing their names; but will saue the labour of marshalling them in order, whose names onely are found; the yeares of their reignes, and other circumstances prouing them to haue bene Kings in deed, being not recorded.

But that I may not seeme before hand, to lay an imaginarie ground, whereupon after I may build what I list; it were not amisse, to giue vnto the Reader such satisfaction in this point, as apparent reason, and truth of Historie doth afford. First therefore, wee ought not to beleue those numbers of Generations, which the lying Priests haue reckoned vp, to magnifie their Antiquities. For wee know, that from Abraham, our Sauour Christ was remoued onely fortie two descents, which makes it euident, that in farre shorter time, namely before the Persian Empire, there could not haue passed away twice as manie successions in Egypt: especially considering, that many of these, whose continuance is expressed, hauing reigned longer than fortie yeeres. It followes that we should square the number of the Egyptian Kings in some euen proportion, to those which did beare rule in other Countries. As for the rest, whose names we finde scattered here and there, any man that will take the paines to reade the nineteenth booke of the holy Warre, written by William Archbishop of Tyre, may easily perswade himselfe, that it is not hard to finde names enow, of such as might be thought to haue reigned in Egypt, being none other than Regents or Viceroyes. Yet will I here insert, as briefly as I can, some things making to that purpose for the pleasure and information of such, as will not trouble themselves with turning ouer many Authors.

When Elahdech the Caliph ruled in Egypt, one Dargan, a powerfull and a subtile man, made himselfe Soldan, by force and cunning, chasing away Sanar an Arabian, who was Soldan before & after him. This Dargan ministred matter of quarrell to Amalricke King of Ierusalem; and sustained, with little losse, an inuasion, which Amalricke made vpon Egypt. Heereupon he grew so insolent and proud, that Sanar the former Soldan hoped to make his partie good against him, if he could get any forces wherewith to enter Egypt. Briefly, Briefly, Sanar sueth to Noradine, King of Damasco, for aide, who sends an Army of his Turkes, vnder the command of Syracon, against the Soldan Dargan. So Dargan and Sanar met, and fought: The Victorie was Dargans; but he enioyed it not: for in few daies after, hee was slaine by treason, whereby Sanar did recouer his Dignitie: which to establish, he slew all the Kindred and Friends of Dargan, that he could finde in the great Citie of Cairo.

To all these doings, the Caliph Elhadach gaue little regard: for he thought it little concerned him, which of them liued, and had the administration of the Kingdome, whilest he might haue the profit of it, and enioy his pleasure. But new troubles presently arise, which (one would thinke) do neerly touch the Caliph himselfe. Syracon with his Turkes, to whom Sanar hath gotten to come into Egypt, will not now be intreated there to leaue him, and quietly go their way home. They seize vpon the Towne of Belbeis, which they fortifie, and there attend the arriual of more company from Damasco, for the conquest of all Egypt. The Soldan perceiues their intent, and findes himselfe not strong enough to expell them; much lesse to repell the Turkish Armie, that was likely to second them. He therefore sends Messengers to King Almaricke of Ierusalem; whom with large promises, hee gets to bring him aide, and so driues out the Turkes. Of all this trouble, the great Caliph heares nothing, or not so much, as should make him looke to the playing of his owne game.

A greater mischief ariseth, concerning the Caliph Elhadach particularly; in his owne Title. Syracon, Captaine of the Turkes that had bene in Egypt, goes to the Caliph of Baldach (who was opposite to him of Egypt, each of them claiming as heire to Mahomet that false prophet, the Soueraignetic ouer all that were of the Saracen Law) and tells him the weaknesse of the Egyptian, with his owne abilitie of doing seruice in those parts, offering his best meanes for the extirpation of the Schismaticall Caliph, and the reduction of all Egypt, with the Westerne parts, vnder the subiection of the Babylonian. This motion is readily and ioyfully entertained; all the Easterne Prouinces are vp in Armes; and Syracon, with a mighty power, descendeth into Egypt. The noyse of this great expedition so affrighteth King Almaricke, that with all his forces hee hasteth into Egypt: well knowing how neerely it concerned him and his Kingdome of Ierusalem, to keepe the Saracens from ioyning all vnder one head. Sanar the Soldan perceiuing the faithfull care of the Christians his friends, welcomes them, and bestirs himselfe in giuing them all manner of content, as it behooued him: for by their admirable valour, hee finally draue the enemies out of the Countrie. But this victorie was not so soone gotten, as it is quicklie told.

Strange it is (which most concernes our present purpose) that of so desperate a danger, the Caliph, as yet, seemes to know nothing. May we not thinke him to haue bene King in title onely, who meddled so little in the Gouvernment? The Soldan, finding that the Christians (without whose helpe, all was lost) could not well stay, so long as his necessities required, makes large offers to King Almaricke, vpon condition that he should abide by it. He promiseth a great Tribute (William of Tyre calls it a Tribute; the Saracens, perhaps, called it a Pension) which the Kings of Ierusalem should receive out of Egypt, for this behoouefull assistance. But the Christians vnderstanding that the Soldan (how much fouler he tooke vpon him) was subiect to an higher Lord, would make no bargain of such importance, with any other than the Caliph himselfe. Hereupon Hugh Earle of Casarea, and a Knight of the Templars, are sent vnto Elhadach to ratifie the couenants. Now shall we see the greatnesse of the Caliph and his estate.

These Embassadors were conueighed by the Soldan to Cairo; where arriuing at the Palace, they found it guarded by great troupes of Souldiers. The first entrance was through darke Porches, that were kept by many armed bands of *Ethiopian*s, which with all diligence, did reuerence to the Soldan as he passed along. Through these streights the Warders led them, into goodly open Courts, of such beautie and riches, that they could not retaine the grauitie of Embassadors, but were enforced to admire the things which detained their eyes. For there they saw goodly Marble Pillars, gilded Beames, all wrought ouer with embossed workes, curious pauements, fish-ponds of marble with cleare waters, and many sorts of strange birds, vnknowne in those parts of the world, as comming perhaps from the East Indies, which then was vndiscovered. The further they went, the greater was the magnificence; for the Caliph his Eunuches conueyed them into other Courts within these; as farre exceeding the former, as the former did surpass ordinarie houses. It were tedious perhaps to rehearse, how, the further they entered, the more high state they found, and cause of maruaile; suffice it, that the good Archbishop, who wrote these things, was neuer held a vaine Author. Finally they were brought into the *Caliph*s owne lodgings, which were yet more stately, and better guarded, where entering the Presence, the Soldan hauing twice prostrated himselfe, did the third time cast off his Sword, that he wore about his necke, and throw himselfe on the ground, before the curtain, behinde which the Caliph sat. Presently the transe; wrought with Gold and pearles was opened, and the Caliph himselfe discovered, sitting with great Maiestie on a throne of gold, hauing few of his most inward seruants and Eunuches about him. When the Soldan had humbly kissed his Masters feet, he briefly told the cause of his coming; the danger wherein the Land stood, and the offers that he had made vnto King Almaricke, desiring the Caliph himselfe to ratifie them, in presence of the Embassadors. The Caliph answered, That he would throughly performe all which was promised. But this contented not the Embassadors: They would haue him to giue his hand vpon the bargain; which the Egyptians, that stood by, thought an impudent request. Yet his greatnesse condescended at length, after much deliberation, at the earnest request of the Soldan, to reach out his hand. When the Earle of Casarea saw that the Caliph gaue his hand, neither willingly nor bare, he told him roundly thus much in effect: Sir, Truth seekes no holes to hide it selfe; Princes, that will hold couenant, must deale openly, nakedly, and sincerely; Giuevs therefore your bare hand, if you meane that we shall trust you, for wee will make no bargain with your Gloue. Much adoe there was about this: for it seemed against the Maiestie of such a Prince to yeeld so farre. But, when it would none otherwise be, with a smiling cheare (though to the great grieve of his seruants) he vouchsafed to let the Earle take him by the bare hand; and so rehearsing the couenants word by word, as the Earle spake them, he ratified all; dismissing finally the Embassadors, with such rewards as testified his Greatnesse.

In this Caliph and his Sultan, wee may discern the Image of the ancient Pharaoh, and his Viceroy: wee see a Prince of great estate, sitting in his Palace, and not vexing himselfe with the great preparations made against him, which terrifie his neighbour Countries: wee see his Viceroy, in the meane season, vsing all Royall power, making warre & peace, entertaining, & repelling Armies of strangers; yea making the Land of Egypt tributarie to a forren Prince. What greater authoritie was giuen to Ioseph, when Pharaoh said vnto him, Thou shalt be ouer mine house, and at thy word shall all my people be armed, onely in the Kings Throne will I be above thee, Behold, I haue set thee ouer all the Land of Egypt.

I doe not commend this forme of Gouvernment; neither can I approue the coniecture of mine Author, where he thinks, that the Egyptians, euer since *Ioseph*s time, haue felt the burden of that seruitude which he brought vpon them, when he bought them, and their Lands, for Pharaoh. Herein I finde his iudgement good; that he affirms this manner of the Egyptian Kings, in taking their ease, and ruling by a Viceroy, to be part of the ancient customes, practised by the Pharaohs. For we finde, that euen the Ptolomies (excepting Ptolomeus Lagi, and his sonne philadelphus, founder and establisher of that race) were giuen, all of them, wholly to please their owne appetites, leauing the charge of the Kingdome to Women, Eunuches, and other ministers of their desires. The pleasures which that Countrie afforded, were indeed sufficient to inuite the Kings thereof vnto a voluptuous life; and the awfull regard wherein the Egyptians held their Princes, gaue them securitie, whereby they might the better trust their Officers, with so ample commission. But of this matter, I will not stand longer to dispute. It is enough to haue shewed, that the great and almost absolute power of the Viceroyes gouerning Egypt, is set downe by Moses; and that a liuely example of the same is found in William of Tyre; who liued in the same age; was, in few yeeres after, Chancellour of the Kingdome of Ierusalem; and had full discourse with Hugh Earle of Casarea, touching all these matters. Wherefore it remains, that we be not carried away with a vaine opinion, to beleue that all they were Kings, whom reports of the fabulous Egyptians haue honoured with that stile; but rest contented with a Catalogue of such, as we finde by circumstance, likely to haue reigned in that Countrie, after whom it follows that we should make enquiry.

§. II.

Of Acherres; whether he were Vchorus that was the eighth from Osymandyas. Of Osymandyas and his Tombe.

IN this businesse I hold it vaine to be too curious. For who can hope to attaine to the perfect knowledge of the truth, when as Diodorus varies from Herodotus, Eusebius, from both of them; and late Writers, that haue sought to gather the truth out of these and others, finde no one with whom they can agree? In this case Annius would doe good seruice, if a man could trust him. But it is enough to be beholding to him, when others doe either say nothing, or that which may iustly bee suspected. I will therefore hold my selfe contented, with the pleasure that he hath done me, in saying somewhat of Osiris, Isis, Orus, and those antiquities remoued so farre out of sight: as for the Kings following the departure of Israel out of Egypt, it shall suffice, that Herodotus, Diodorus, and Eusebius, haue not bene silent, and that Reineccius hath taken paines, to range into some good order the names that are extant in these, or else found scattering in others.

From the departure of Israel out of Egypt, vnto the reigne of Thunoris (who is generally taken to bee the same that the Greekes call Proteus) there is little or no disagreement about the Egyptian Kings. Wherefore I set downe the same which are found in Eusebius, and giue to euery one the same length of reigne.

Acherres was the first of these, who succeeded vnto Chenchers, that perished in the Red Sea. This King seemes to Reineccius to be the same whom Diodorus calls Vchorus, the founder of Memphis. But whereas mention is found in Diodorus of a great King, named Osymandyas, from whom Vchorus is said to be the eighth; it will either hardly follow, that Timaus (as Reineccius coniectures) was the great Osymandyas; or else that this Acherres was Vchorus: for the distance betwene them was more then eight generations. Mercurator iudgeth Osymandyas to haue been the husband of Ancheres, Orus the seconds daughter; thinking that Manethon (cited by Iosephus) doth omit his name, and insert his wifes, into the Catalogue of Kings, because he was King in his wifes right. As for Vchorus, it troubles not Mercurator to finde him the eighth from this man: for he takes Ogdous, not to signifie in this place of Diodore (as that Greeke word else doth) the eighth, but to be an Egyptian name, belonging also to Vchorus, who might haue had two names, as many of the rest had. I will not vex me by braines in the vnprofitable search of this, and the like inextricable doubts. All that Diodore hath found of this Osymandyas, was wrought vpon his monument; the most thereof in figures, which I thinke the Egyptians did fabulously expound. For whereas there was pourtraied a great Armie with the siege of a Towne, the captiuitie of the People, and the triumph of the Conqueror; all this, the Egyptians said to denote the conquest of Babylonia made by that King: which how likelie it was, let others iudge. I hold this goodly peece of worke, which Diodore so particularly describes, to haue been erected for a common place of buriall, to the ancient Kings and Queenes of Egypt, and to their Viceroyes; whilest yet they were not so ambitious, as euery one to haue his own particular monument, struing therein to exceed all others. This appeares by the many statuaes, therein placed, by the Warres, the iudgement seat, the receiuing of Tribute, the offering Sacrifice to God, the account of Reuenues, and plentie of all Cattell and Foode; all which were there curiously wrought, shewing the seuerall Offices of a Gouverneur. On the Tombe of Osymandyas was this inscription. I am Osymandyas King of Kings; If any desire to know what I am, or where I lie, let him exceed some of my workes. Let them, that hope to exceed his workes, labour to know what he was. But since by those words, Or where I lie, it should seeme that hee lay not there interred, wee may lawfully suspect that it was Ioseph, whose body was preferred among the Hebrewes, to be buried in the land of Canaan, and this empty Monument might King Orus, who out-liued him, erect in honor of his high deserts, among the royal Sepulchers. To which purpose, the plentie of Cattell, and all manner of viands, had good reference. The name Osymandyas doth not hinder this coniecture; seeing Ioseph had one new name giuen to him by Pharaoh, for expounding the dreame, and might, vpon further occasions, haue another, to his increafe of honor. As for that stile, King of Kings, it was perhaps no more than Beglerbeg, as the Turkish Bassas are called, that is, Great about the Great.

Now

Now although it be so, that the reckoning falls out right, betwene the times of Ioseph and Acherres (for Acherres was the eight in order, that reigned after the great Orus, whose Viceroy Ioseph was) yet will I heereby seeke, neither to fortifie mine owne coniecture, as touching Ioseph, nor to inferre any likelihood of Acherres his beeing Vchorus. For it might well be, that Memphis was built by some such King as was Gehaar, Lieutenant vnto the Caliph Elcain, who hauing to his Masters vse conquered Egypt, and many other Countries, did build, not farre from old Memphis, the great Citie of Cairo (corruptly so pronounced) naming it Elcaira, that is, an enforcing, or an imperious Mistress, though he himselfe were a Dalmatian slaue.

John Leo Hist. Asie. l. 1. c. 6. 8.

§. III.

Of Cherres, Armeus, Rameffes, and Amenophis. Of Myris, and the Lake that beares his name.

WHEN Acherres had reigned eight yeeres, Cherres succeeded, and held the Kingdom fifteen yeeres: then reigned Armeus five yeeres, and after him Rameffes, threecore and eight. Of Armeus and Rameffes is that Historie vnderstood by Eusebius, which is common among the Greekes, vnder the names of Danaus and Egyptus. For it is said that Danaus, being expelled out of Egypt by his brother, fledde into Greece, where he obtained the Kingdom of Argos: that he had fiftie Daughters, whom vpon seeming reconciliation, he gaue in marriage to his brothers fiftie sonnes, but commanded euery one of them to kill her husband the first night; that onely Hypermetra, one of his Daughters, did saue her husband Lyncus, and suffered him to escape; finally, That for this fact, all the bloudie sisters, when they died, were enioyned this foolish punishment in Hell, to fill a leaking Vessel with water.

Thereigne of Danaus in Argos was indeed in this age; but that Armeus, was Danaus; and Rameffes, Egyptus; is more then Reineccius beleuees: he rather takes Armeus to haue bene Myris, or Meris, who caused the great lake to be made which beares his name. For my owne part, as I can easily beleue, that he which fled out of Egypt into Greece, was a man of such qualitie as the Soldan Sanar, of whom we spake before; so doe I not finde how in so short a reigne, as five yeeres, a worke of that labour could bee finished, which was required vnto the Lake of Myris, and the Monuments therein; whereof his owne Sepulcher and his wifes being some part, it is manifest that hee was not buried in Argos. Wherefore of Myris, and of all other Kings, whose age is vncertaine, and of whose reignes we haue no assurance, I may truly say, that their great workes are not enough to proue them of the house of Pharaoh, seeing that greater deeds or more absolute, than were those of Ioseph, who bought all the people of Egypt as bond-men, and all their Land for bread; of Gehaar, who founded Cairo; and of Sanar, who made the Countie Tributarie; were performed by none of them.

It shall therefore be enough to set downe the length of their reignes, whom we finde to haue followed one another in order of succession: but in rehearsing the great acts which were performed, I will not stand to examine, whether they that did them were Kings or no.

The Lake of Myris is, by the report of Diodore and Herodotus, three thousand sixe hundred furlongs in compasse, and fiftie fadomes deepe. It serued to receiue the waters of Nilus, when the ouer-flow, being too great, was harmefull to the Countie; and to supply the defect, by letting out the waters of the Lake, when the Riuer did not rise high enough. In opening the sluices of this Lake, for the letting in or out of waters, were spent fiftie talents; but the Lake it selfe defraied that cost; seeing the tribute imposed vpon Fish taken therein, was euery day one talent, which Myris gaue to his Wife to buy sweet oynments, and other ornaments for her bodie. In the midst of it was left an Island, wherein were the Sepulchers of Myris and his Wife, and ouer each of them a Pyramid, that was a furlong, or (according to Herodotus) fiftie paces high; hauing on the top their statuaes, sitting in Thrones. I finde not the description of this Lake in Maps, answerable to the report of Historians: yet is it very great. The yeeres of Armeus are by Manethon diuided, by inserting one Armesis (whom Eusebius omits) that should haue reigned one yeere and odd months of the time; but I hold not this difference worthy of examination.

After

After Rameſſes, his ſonne Amenophis held the Kingdome fortye yeeres. Some giue him onely nineteene yeeres; and Mercator thinks him to haue beene the King that was drowned in the Red Sea: whereof I haue already ſpoken in the firſt Booke.

§. IIII.

Of the Kings that reigned in the Dynaſtie of the Larthes.

Ethoſis, or Zethus, reigned after his Father Amenophis, fiftie ſiue yeeres. To him are aſcribed the famous acts of that ancient Seſoſtris. But the ſtate of the world was not ſuch at theſe times, that ſo great an expedition as the old Seſoſtris made, to could haue beene cyther eaſily performed, or forgotten in the Countries through which he paſſed, had it now beene performed; as any man will perceiue, if hee looke vpon my Chronologicall Table, and conſider who liued with this Zethus. With this King began the Dynaſtie of the Larthes; which Reineccius coniectures to haue had the ſame ſignification, wherein the old Kings of Hetruria, were called Lartes, (the Hetrurians being iſſued out of Lydia, the Lydians out of Aegypt) and to haue ſignified as much as Imperator or Generall. The Warres in which theſe Kings were Generalls, I take to haue beene againſt the Aethiopians: for ſure I am, that they troubled not the Countie of Paleſtina, that lay next vnto them on the one hand; nor is it likely that they trauelled ouer the deſart ſands, on the other hand; to ſeek matter of conqueſt, in the poore Countries of Africa. But theſe Generalls (if the Larthes were ſuch) were not many. Five onely had that title; and the laſt of theſe tooke it, perhaps, as hereditarie from the firſt; in ſuch fort as the Roman Emperours were proud for a while, to be called Antonini, till the moſt vnſutable conditions of Heliogabalus, made his ſucceſſors forget the name.

Here it may be objected, that the Dynaſties (as appears by this particular) tooke name from the Kings, that the Kings alſo did adminiſter the gouernment themſelues; and that therefore I am deceived in aſcribing ſo much vnto the Viceroyes. But it is to be conſidered, that what is ſaid of theſe Larthes, depends onely vpon coniecture, and that the authoritie of the Regents, or Viceroyes, might be great enough, though ſome few Kings tooke the conduct of Armies into their owne hands. For ſo wee finde in Iohn Leo, that the Soldan of Aegypt (after ſuch time as the Soldane Saladin, murdering the Caliph, got the Soueraigntie to himſelfe) had vnder him a Viceroy, ſtilled Eddagwadare, who had authoritie to place, or diſplace, any Magiſtrates, or Officers; and that this mans Familie was almoſt as great, as the Soldans owne. Yet was there alſo the Amir Cabir, or Lord Generall of the Soldans forces, who had the charge of defending the Land, and might as he thought good, ſpend of the Soldans Treafure. So might the office of the Viceroyes continue, though the Kings themſelues, taking the charge, or title of Generalls vpon them, did ſomewhat abridge the greatneſſe of that ſecond place. As for the names of the Dynaſties, it ſkills not whence they were drawne; whether from their Countie, as thoſe of the Thebans and Diapolitans, or from ſome eminent men, or man, who ruled in that time; as many thinke, that the ſeuenteenth Dynaſtie was called of the Sheep-heards, becauſe Ioseph gouerned in part thereof; or from the Kings themſelues that reigned; as this was ſaid to be of the Larthes or Generalls. The next, as Manetho (but Annius his Manetho) hath it, was without any Larthes or Generalls, yet was it not without Kings, for ſomuch as Vaphres, and Sefac, reigned therein, if many others did not. But let vs now returne to the buſineſſe which we left.

Ramſes was King after Zethus, or Sethoſis, threeſcore and ſixe yeeres. He is miſtaken for that ſecond Seſoſtris, of whom I haue ſpoken in the firſt bookes. I find nothing worth rehearſall of this Ramſes, or of Amenophis and Annemens, that followed him in order, the former of which reigned fortye, the later ſixe and twenty yeeres. Wherefore it may very well bee, that the name which Zethus had from valour, was taken by theſe as hereditarie.

Thooris, the laſt of the Larthes, reigned onely ſeuē yeeres; yet is hee thought to haue beene that Proteus, of whom Herodotus hath mention, ſaying, That he took Helen from Parus, and after the ſacke of Troy, reſtored her to Menelaus. I neede ſay no more in reſtitation of this, than that the time of Thooris his reigne, laſted not ſo long as from the Rape of Helen to her reſtitution.

This

This Proteus or Cetes (as he is named by ſome) together with Thon, and others, mentioned by Greeke Writers in this buſineſſe, or in other ſuch matters, may ſeeme to be vnder Officers: for ſuch onely are like to haue had their reſidencie about Pharos, and the Sea-coaſt, where Menelaus arrived.

Of Proteus, who detained Helen, it is ſaid, That he could foretell things to come, and that he could change himſelfe into all ſhapes: whereby is ſignified his craftie head, for which he is growne into a Proverbe. The Poets ſained him a Sea-God, and keeper of Neptunes Seale-fiſhes, for belike hee was ſome vnder-Officer to the Admirall, hauing charge of the Fiſhing about the Iſle of Pharos, as was ſaid before.

Remphes, the Sonne of Proteus, is reckoned the next King, by Diodore, as alſo by Herodotus, who calls him Ramſinitus, and tells a long tale, fit to pleaſe children, of his couetouſneſſe, and how his treaſure-houſe was robbed by a cunning Theefe, that at laſt married his Daughter. But of this a man may beleeue what hee liſt. How long this King reigned I know not, nor thinke that either he, or his Father, did reigne at all.

§. V.

Of the Egyptian Kings whoſe names are found ſcattering in ſundrie Authors, their times being not recorded. The Kings of Aegypt, according to Cedrenus. Of Vaphres and Sefac.

MAny other names of Egyptian Kings, are found ſcattered heere and there; as Tonepherſobis, of whom Suidas deliuerſ onely the bare name and title, Senemures, or Senepos, mentioned in Macrobins, who perhaps was the ſame that by Suidas is called Senyes, or Euenes, noted by occaſion of a great Phyſician that liued vnder him; Zanchyris, recorded by the ſame Suidas, for his great iuſtice; and Thulis, of whom Suidas tells great matters; as that his Empire extended to the Ocean Sea; that he gaue name to the Iſle of Thule, which ſometake to be Iſeland; and that he conſulted with the Deuill; or (which is all one) with Scraphis, deſiring to know, who before him had beene, or after him ſhould be ſo mighty as himſelfe. The anſwere or confeſſion of the Deuill was remarkable; which I finde Engliſhed in the tranſlation of Pleſius his worke, Of the true ſenſe of Chriſtian religion. The Greeke Verſes are ſomewhat otherwiſe, and much more imperfect in thoſe Copies that I haue of Cedrenus and Suidas, but the ſenſe is all one; which is this:

Fiſt God, and next The world, and then The ſpirit,
Which three be One, and joyne in One all three:
Whoſe force is endleſſe. Get thee hence fraile wight,
The Man of Life vnknowne excelleth thee.

I ſhould haue thought that Suidas had borrowed all this of Cedrenus, had I not found ſomewhat more in Suidas, than Cedrenus hath hereof; as the forme of inuocation which Thulis vſed, and that claue, of his giuing name to the Iland: though in this laſt point I hold Suidas to be deceived, as alſo Cedrenus is, or (at leaſt) ſeems to me, in giuing to this King ſuch profound antiquitie of reigne. Indeed the very name of that booke, cited of Cedrenus, which he calls Little Genesius, is alone enough to breed ſuſpition of ſome impoſture: but the Friery ſuſtice that he alledgeth out of it, is ſuch as would ſerue to diſcredit himſelfe, were it not otherwiſe apparant, that hee was a man both deuout, and of good iudgement, in matters that fell within his compaſſe. I will here ſet downe the Liſt of olde Egyptian Kings deliuered by him, and leaue the cenſure to others.

The firſt King of Aegypt that he ſets downe, is Mizraim, the ſonne of Cham. After him he finds many of a new race, deriuing their pedigree thus: Nimrod, the ſon of Chus, was alſo ſo called Orion, and further, tooke vpon him the name of the Planet Saturne, had to wife Semiramis, who was of his own Linage, and by her three ſonnes, Picus, ſurnamed Iupiter, Belus and Ninus. Picus chaſing his father out of Aſſyria into Italie, reigned in his ſtead thirtye yeeres, and then gaue vp that Kingdome to Iuno, his ſiſter and wife, and to Belus his ſonne: after which Belus, who reigned onely two yeeres, Ninus had the Kingdome, and married his owne mother Semiramis. But Picus went into Italie, to viſit his olde father Saturne; Saturne forth-with reſigned the Kingdome vnto him. Picus Iupiter reigned in Italie threeſcore and two yeeres, had threeſcore and tenne Wives or Concubines, and about as many children: finally died, and lyes buried in the Iſle of Crete.

Ecc

The

The Principall of Iupiters sonnes were Faunus, Perseus, and Apollo. Faunus was called by the name of the Planet Mercurie: he reigned in Italie, after his father, five and thirtie yeeres: and then (finding that all his brethren conspired against him) he went into Egypt, with abundance of Treasure; where, after the death of Mizraim, he got the Kingdome, and held it nine and thirtie yeeres. After Mercurie, Vulcan reigned in Egypt, foure yeeres and a halfe. Then Sol, the sonne of Vulcan, reigned twentie yeeres and a halfe. There followed in order Sofis, Osiris, Orus, and Thules, of whom wee speake before: the length of their severall reignes is not set downe. After Thules, was the egiptian Sesostris King twenty yeeres. His successor was Pharao, called Narecho, that held the Crowne fiftie yeeres, with which there passed from him the surname of Pharao, to averry long posteritie.

These reports of Cedrenus I hold it enough to set downe as I finde them: let their credit rest vpon the Author.

Others yet we finde, that are said to have reigned in Egypt, without any certaine note, when, or how long: about whom I will not labour, as fearing more to be reprehended of vaine curiositie, in the search made after these already rehearsed, than of negligence, in omitting such as might have bene added.

Vaphres, the father in law to Salomon; and Sesac, the afflicter of Rehoboam, leade vs againe into faire way, but not farre. The name of Vaphres is not found in the Scriptures; but wee are beholding to Clemens Alexandrinus and Eusebius for it. These giue vs not the length of his reigne; but we know, that he liued in the times of Dauid and of Salomon. He came into Palestina with an Armie, took Gezar from the Canaanites, and gaue it to his daughter, Salomons wife: though for her sake perhaps it was, that in time following either he, or (as I rather take it) Sesac his sonne did fauour the enemies of Salomon, who kept so many Wiues and Concubines, besides this Egyptian Princeesse. In the life of Rehoboam all hath bene written that I finde of Sesac, excepting the length of his reigne, which must have bene fixe and twentie yeeres, if he were that Sennedius with whom Eusebius begins the one and twentieth Dynastie.

Now forasmuch as it would serue to no great purpose, that wee knew the length of Sesac his reigne, and of theirs that followed him, vnlesse therewithall wee knew the beginning of Sesac, vpon which the rest haue dependance; this course I take. From the fourth yeere of Iehoiakim, King of Iuda, in which Pharao Neco was flaine, I reckon vponwards the yeeres of the same Neco, and of his predecessors, vnto the beginning of Sesac: by which accompt, the first yeere of Sesac is found, concurrent with the twentieth of Salomons reigne, and the twentie fixe of Sesac with the fifth of Rehoboam: wherein Sesac spoyled the Temple, and died, enjoying the fruits of his Sacriledge no longer, than Ios the Israelite, & Crassus the Romane did; who, after him, spoyled the Temple of Ierusalem.

To fill vp the time betwene Sesac and Neco, I haue rather taken those Kings that I finde in the Greeke Historians, than them which are in Eusebius his Catalogue. For of these that are deliuered by Eusebius, we finde no Name nor Act recorded elswhere, save onely of Bocchoris, who is remembered by Diodore, Plutarch, and others, much being spoken of him, that makes him appeare to haue bene a King. Hereunto I may adde, that the succession is often interrupted in Eusebius by Aethiopians, which got the Kingdome often, and held it long: whereas contrariwise it appears by the Prophet Esaie, that the Counsellors of Pharao did vaunt of the long and flourishing continuance of that house, inasmuch, that they said of Pharao, I am the Sonne of the wife, I am the Sonne of the ancient King. But that which ouerthrowes the reckoning of Eusebius, is, the good agreement of it with his mistaken times of the Kings of Iuda. For though it please him well to see how the reignes of Iosias and Neco meet by his computation, yet this indeed marres all; the reigne of Iosias being misplaced. This error growes from his omitting, to compare the reignes of the Kings of Iuda with theirs of Israel: by which occasion, Ioram, King of Israel, is made to reigne three yeeres after Abazaa of Iuda; Samaris is taken by Salmannassar before Hezekias was King: and in a word, all, or most of the Kings, haue their beginnings placed in some other yeere of their collateralls than the Scriptures haue determined.

§. VI.

Of Chemmis, Cheops, Cephrenes, and other Kings recited by Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus, which reigned betwene the times of Rehoboam and Ezekia.

Following therefore the Greeke Historians, I place Chemmis, or (according to Diodore) Chemmis, first in the ranke of those that were Kings after Sesac. He reigned fiftie yeeres, and built the greatest of the three Pyramides, which was accounted one of this worlds Wonders. The Pyramis hath his name from the shape, in that it resembleth a flame of fire, growing from the bottome vpwards narrower and narrower to the top. This of Chemmis being foure-square, had a Base of seuen akers euery way, and was aboute fixe akers high. It was of a very hard and dureable Stone, which had lasted, when Diodore saw it, about a thousand yeeres, without complaining of any iniurie that it had suffered by weather in so long space. From the reigne of Chemmis, vnto the age of Augustus Caesar, wherein Diodore liued, are indeede a thousand yeeres; which doth giue the better likelihood vnto this time wherein Chemmis is placed. As for this and other Pyramides, late Writers doe testifie, that they haue scene them yet standing.

After Chemmis, Diodore placeth Cephrenes his brother; but doubtfully, and enclining rather to the opinion, that his sonne Chabreus succeeded. Herodotus hath Cheops (who might be Chabreus) and Cephrenes after him. These are said to haue bene brethren; but the length of their reignes may argue the later to haue bene sonne to the former: for Cheops reigned fiftie yeeres; Cephrenes fiftie fixe. These were, as Chemmis had bene, builders of Pyramides, whereby they purchased great hatred of their people, who already had ouer-labored themselves in erecting the first. These Pyramides were ordained to be Tombes for those that raised them; but the malice of the Egyptians is said to haue cast out their bodies; and to haue called their Monuments by the name of an Heardf-man, that kept his Beasts thereabouts. It may be, that the robbing them of their honor, and entitling a poore fellow to their workes, was held to be the casting out of their bodies: otherwise, it is hard to conceiue, how it might be, that they, who had not power to auoid the like slauerie, laid vpon them by the younger brother or sonne, should haue power or leisure to take such reuenge vpon his Predecessor. To the like malice may be ascribed the tale deuised against Cheops his Daughter; That her Father, wanting money, did prostitute her, and that she, getting of euery man that accompanied her, one stone, did build with them a fourth Pyramis, that stood in the middelt of the other three. Belike she was an insolent Lady, and made them follow their drudgery, for her sake, longer a while than they thought to haue done, in raising a Monument, with the superfluitie of her Fathers prouisions.

Mycerinus, the sonne of Cephrenes, reigned after his Father fixe yeeres. He would haue built as his fore-goers did, but preuented by death, finished not what he had begun. The people thought him a good King, for that he did set open the Temples, which Cheops and Cephrenes had kept shut. But an Oracle threatened him with a short life of fixe yeeres onely, because of this his deuotion; For (said the Oracle) Egypt should haue bene afflicted an hundred and fiftie yeeres, which thy Predecessors knew, and performed for their parts; but thou hast released it, therefore shalt thou liue but fixe yeeres. It is very strange, that the gods should be offended with a King for his pietie; or that they should decree to make a Countrey impious, when the people were desirous to serue them; or that they hauing so decreed, it should lie in the power of a King, to alter destinie, and make the ordinance of the gods to faile in taking full effect. But these were Egyptian gods. The true God so was, doubtlesse, more offended with the restitution of such Idolatrie, than with the interruption. And who knowes, whether Chemmis did not learne somewhat at Ierusalem, in the last yeere of his Father Sesac, that made him perceiue, and deliuer to those that followed him, the vanity of his Egyptian superstition? Most sure it is that his reigne, and the reignes of Cheops, and Cephrenes, were more long and more happie, than that of Mycerinus, who, to delude the Oracle, reuelled away both dayes and nights, as if by keeping candles lighted, hee had changed his nights into dayes, and so doubled the time appointed: a seruice more pleasing to the Diuell, than the restitution of Idolatrie durst then seeme, when it could speede no better. I finde in Reineccius fiftie yeeres yeeres assigned to this King; which I verily beleue to haue been some error of the print, though I finde it not corrected among other such ouersights: for I know no Author that giues him so many yeeres, and Reineccius himselfe takes notice of the Oracle, that threatened Mycerinus with a short life, as is before shewed.

Bocchorus is placed next vnto Mycerinus, by Diodore, who speaks no more of him than this, that he was a strong man of body, and excelling his predecessors in wit. He is spoken of by diuers Authors, as one that loued iustice; and may bee taken for that Banchyris, whom Suidas commends in that kinde: Eusebius reckons 44. yeeres of his reigne.

After Bocchorus, one Sabacus an Ethiopian followes, in the Catalogue of Diodore; but certaine ages after him. Herodotus, quite omitting Bocchorus, hath Apychis; who made a sharpe law (as it was then held) against bad debtors, that their dead bodies should be in the creditors disposition, till the debt were paid. This Apychis made a Pyramis of bricke, more costly and faire, in his owne iudgement, than any of those that the former Kings had raised. Besides this Apychis, Herodotus placeth one Anysis, a blinde man, before the Ethiopian. The reignes of these two are perhaps those many ages, which the Egyptians, to magnifie their antiquities, accounted betwene Bocchorus, and him that followed them. But all this could make but fixe yeeres; and so long doth Funitius, so long doth Reineccius hold, that these two Kings, between them both did gouerne. If any man would lengthen this time, holding it vnprobable that the reignes of two Kings should haue been so soone spent; hee may doe it by taking some yeeres from Sethon or Psammeticus, and adding them to either of these. To adde vnto these, without subtracting from some other, would breede a manifest inconuenience: forasmuch as part of Sesac his reigne, must haue beene in the fifth of Rehoboam, as also the last of Pharao Neco was the fourth of Iehoiakim, and the first of Nabuchadnezzar. For mine owne part I like it better to allow fixe yeeres only to these two Kings, than to lose the witness of Herodotus, who, concurring herein with the Scriptures, doth speake of Sennacherib's warre: at which time Sethon was King of Egypt. I will not therefore adde yeeres vnto these obscure names; for by adding vnto these men three yerres, we shall thrust the beginning of Sethon out of place, and make it later than the death of Sennacherib. In regard of this agreement of Herodotus with the Scriptures, I am the more willing to hold with him, in his Egyptian Kings. Otherwise it were a matter of no great enuie, to leaue both Apychis and Anysis out of the roll; which were easily done, by placing Sesac lower, and extending his life yet fixe yeeres further, or more, (if the like abridgement shall bee required of Psammeticus his reigne) into the yeeres of Rehoboam.

Of Sabacus the Ethiopian, who took the Kingdome from Anysis, it is agreed by the most, that he reigned fiftie yeeres. He was a mercifull Prince, not punishing all capitall offences with death, but imposing bondage and bodily labour vpon malefactors; by whose toyle he both got much wealth into his owne hands, letting out their seruice to hire, and performed many workes, of more vse than pompe, to the singular benefit of the Countrey. Zonaras calls this King Sua; the Scriptures call him So. Hisea, the last King of Israel, made a league with him against Salmanassar, little to his good: for the Egyptian was more rich than warlike, and therefore his friendship could not preferue the Israelite from destruction.

It seemes, that the encroching power of the Assyrian, grew terrible to Egypt about these times; the victories of Tiglath Phulassar, and Salmanassar, hauing eaten so farre into Syria, in the reigne of this one King So or Sabacus. Yea, perhaps it was in his dayes (for his reigne began in the fourth of Menahem) that Phul himselfe did make the first entrance into Palestina. This caused So to animate the halfe subdued people, against their Conquerours; but the helpe which he and his Successor gaue them was so faint, that Sennacherib's Embassador compared the Egyptian succour to a broken staffe of Reede. Such indeed had Hosea found it, and such Ezekia might haue found it, had hee not beene supported by the strong staffe of Him, that ruleth all Nations with a rodde of yron. It appeareth by the words of Rabsake, that the opinion was great in Juda, of the Egyptian forces, for Charrats and Horse-men; but this power, whatsoever it was, grew needfull, within a little while, for the defence of Egypt it selfe which So left vnto Sethon his successor, hauing now fulfilled the fiftie yeeres of his reigne. Herodotus and Diodorus haue both one tale, from the relation of Egyptian Priests, concerning the departure of this King; saying, that he left the Countrey, & willingly retired into Ethiopia, because because it was often signified vnto him in his dreames, by the god which was worshipped at Thebes, that his reigne should be neither long nor prosperous, vnlesse hee slew all the Priests in Egypt; which rather than to do, he resigned his Kingdome. Surely, these Egyptian gods were of a strange qualitie, that so ill rewarded their seruants, and inuited Kings to doe them wrong. Well might the Egyptians (as they likewise did) worship Dogs as gods, when their chiefe god had the proprietie of Dogs, which loue their Masters the better for beating them. Yet to what end the Priests should haue feigned this tale, I cannot tell; and therefore I thinke that it might be some deuice of the fearefull olde man, who seeing his Realme in danger of an inuasion, sought an honest excuse for his departure out of it, and with drawing himselfe into Ethiopia, where hee had beene bred in his youth. What if one should say, that the Ethiopia into which hee went, was none other than Arabia, whereof Tirhaka the King (perhaps at the instigation of this man) raised an Armie against Sennacherib, when he meant to inuade Egypt, within two or three yeeres after? But I will not trouble my selfe with such enquire. This I hold, that So, or Sabacus, was not indeed an Ethiopian (for in his time liued the Prophet Esay, who mentioneth the antiquitie of Pharaohs house) but onely so furnished for his education, and because issuing from thence, he got the Kingdome from Anysis, who was his opposite. The quiet and milde forme of his gouernment; his holding the Kingdome so long without an Armie; and many other circumstances argue no lesse. But whether hee betooke a priuate life, or whether hee fore-went his Life and Kingdome at once, being now very olde, it is time that we leaue him, and speake of Sethon his next Successor, who is omitted by Diodore, but remembered by Herodotus, by a sure token of his hauing beene King.

§. VII.

Of Sethon who reigned with Ezekia, and sided with him against Sennacherib.

The first yeere of Sethon's reigne falls into the twelfth of Ezekia, which was the fifth of Sennacherib. It was a troublefome age, and full of danger; the two great Kingdomes of Assyria and Egypt, being then engaged in a Warre, the issue whereof was to determine, whether of them should rule or serue. The Assyrian had the better men of Warre; the Egyptian better provision of necessities: the Assyrians, more Subjects; the Egyptians, more Friends; and among the new conquered halfe Subjects of Assur, many that were Egyptian in heart, though Assyrian in outward shew.

Of this last sort were Ezekia, and his people; who, knowing how much it concerned Pharao, to protect them against his owne great Enemie, preferred the friendship of so neere and mighty a Neighbour, before the seruice of a terrible, yet farre removed King. But herein was great difference, betwene Ezekia and his Subjects: For the good King, fixing his speciall confidence in God, held that course of policie, which hee thought most likely to turne to the benefit of his Countrey: the multitude of Juda, looking into the faire hopes which this Egyptian league promised, were puffed vp with vaine conceits, thinking that all was safe, and that now they should not need to feare any more of those iniuries, which they had suffered by the Assyrians, and so became forgetfull of God, taking counsaile but not of him. The Prophet Esay complained much of this presumption; giving the people of Juda to vnderstand, That the Egyptians were men, and not God, and their Horses flesh, and not spirit; that God himselfe should defend Israel vpon repentance, and that Assur should fall by the sword, but not of man. As for the Egyptians (said the Prophet) they are vanitie, and they shall helpe in vaine, their strength is to sit still.

According to the Prophets words it came to passe. For in the treatie of Confederation, that was held at Zorn, all manner of contentment and assurance was giuen to the Jewes, by Sethon, or his Agents, who filled them with such reports, of Horses and Chariots, that they did not looke (as Esay saith) vnto the Holy one of Israel, nor seeke vnto the Lord. But yet is wisest.

After while came Sennacherib with his Armie, & wakened them out of these dreames, for Sethon their good Neighbour, as neere as he was, did seeme farre off, being vnreadie, when his helpe was most needfull. It may seeme that hee purposed, rather to make Palestina than Egypt the stage, whereon this great Warre should be acted, and was not without hope, that the Assyrians and Jewes, weakening one another, should yeeld vnto him.

faire aduantageouer both. Yet he fought with monie; for hee sent Horfes and Camels laden with treasure, to hire the Arabians, whom Esay calleth a people that cannot profit. These Arabians did not profit indeede; for (besides that it seemes by the same place of Esay, that the rich treasures miscarried, and fell into the enemies hands before any helpe appeared from Tirhaca,) all the strong Cities of Iuda were taken by Sennacherib, except Libna, Lachis, and Ierusalem it selfe, which were in fore distress, till the sword of God, and not of Man, defeated the Affryan, who did goe, for feare, to his Tower, that is, hee fled to Nineue, where he was slaine.

Concerning this expedition of Sennacherib, Herodotus takes this notice of it: That it was purposed against Egypt, where the men of warre, being offended with Sethon their King, who had taken away their allowance, refused to beare armes in defence of him and their Country; that Sethon being Vulcans Priest, bemoaned himselfe to his god, who by dreame promised to send him helpers; that hereupon Sethon, with such as would follow him, (which were crafts-men, shop-keepers, & the like) marched towards Pelufium; and that a great multitude of field-mice entering the Campe of Sennacherib by night, did gnaw the bowes, quiuers, and straps of his mens armour, that they were faine the next day to flie away in all haste, finding themselves disarmed. In memorie hereof (saith Herodotus) the statue of this King is set vp in the Temple of Vulcan, holding a Mouse in his hand, with this inscription: Let him, that holds me, serue God. Such was the relation of the Egyptian Priests, wherein how farre they swarued from the truth, being desirous to magnifie their owne King, it may easily be perceiued. It seemes that this Image of Sethon was fallen downe, and the tale forgotten in Diadorus his time, or else perhaps, the Priests did forbear to tell it him (which caused him to omit it) for that the Nation of the Iewes was then well knowne to the world, whereof euery childe could haue told, how much falsehood had bene mingled with the truth.

Wee finde this historie agreeable to the Scriptures, thus farre forth; That Sennacherib King of the Affrians and Arabians, (so Herodotus calleth him: the Syrians, or peraduenture some borderers vpon Syria, being meant by the name of Arabians) liued in this age, made Warre vpon Egypt, and was miraculously driuen home. As for that exployt of the Mice, and the great pleasure that Vulcan did vnto his Priest; happy it was (if Sethon were a Priest) that he tooke his god now in so good a moode. For within three or foure yeeres before this, all the Priests in Egypt should haue bene slaine, if a mercifull King had not spared their liues, as it were halfe against the gods will. Therefore this last good turne was not enough to serue as an example, that might stir vp the Egyptians to pietie, seeing that their deuotion, which had lasted so long before, did bring all the Priests into danger of such a bad reward. Rather I thinke, that this Image did represent Sennacherib himselfe, and that the Mouse in his hand, signified Hieroglyphically (as was the Egyptian manner of expressing things) the shamefull issue of his terrible expedition, or the destruction of his Armie, by meanes which came, no man knew from whence. For the vengeance of God, shewed vpon this vngodly King, was indeed a very good-moode to pietie. But the Embleme, together with the Temple of Vulcan (being perhaps the chiefe Temple in that Towne where this Image was erected) might giue occasion to such a fable; the Deuill helping to change the truth into a lie, that God might be robbed of his honour. Yet that wee may not belie the Deuill, I hold it very likely, that Sethon finding himselfe in danger, did call vpon his gods, that is, vpon Vulcan, Serapis, or any to whom he had most deuotion. But so had other of his predecessors done in the like need: yet which of them had obtained succour by the like miracle? Surely the Iewes (euen such of them as most were giuen to Idolatrie) would haue bene ashamed of the confidence which they reposed in the Charets of Egypt, because they were many, and in the Horsermen, because they were very strong; had it beene told them, that Sethon, in stead of sending those Horse-men and Charets, was beseeching Vulcan to send him and them good lucke, or else (for these also were Egyptian gods) addressing his prayers to some Onyon or Cat. Howsoeuer it was, doubtlesse the prophetic of Esay tooke effect, which said, They shall be all ashamed of the people that cannot profit them, nor helpe, nor do them good, but shall be a shame and also a reproch. Such is commonly the issue of humane wisdom, when resting secure vpon prouision that it selfe hath made, it will no longer seem to stand in need of God.

Tarachus the Ethiopian, and therefore the twenty yeeres which are giuen to Tarachus, they allow to the reigne of Sethon. These haue well obserued, that Tarachus the Ethiopian is mentioned in the Scriptures, not as a King of Egypt, but as a friend to that Countrey, or at least an enemy to Sennacherib, in the war last spoken of, the Ethiopians (as they are englished) ouer which he reigned, being indeede Chusites or Arabians. Hereupon they suppose aright, that Eusebius hath mistaken one King for another. But whereas they think, that this Tarachus or Tirhaca, is placed in the roome of Sethon, & therefore giue to Sethon the twentie yeeres of Tarachus, I hold them to haue erred on the other hand. For this Ethiopian (as he is called) began his Reigne ouer Egypt, by Eusebius his account, after the death of Sennacherib and of Ezekia, in the first yeere of Manasses King of Iuda. Therefore he, or his yeeres, haue no reference to Sethon.

Herodotus forgets to tell how long Sethon reigned, Functius peremptorily, citing no author, nor alleading reason for it, sets him downe thirty three yeeres; many omit him quite, and they that name him, are not carefull to examine his continuance. In this case, I follow that rule which I propounded vnto my selfe at the first, for measuring the reignes of these Egyptian Kings. The yeeres which passed from the fitt of Reboboam, vnto the fourth of Ezoiakim, I so diuide among the Egyptians, that giuing to euery one the proportion allowed vnto him by the Author in whom he is found, the rest is to be conferred vpon him whose length of reigne is vncertaine; that is, vpon this Sethon. By this account I finde the thirty three yeeres, that are set downe by Functius, to agree very neerely, if not precisely, with the time of Sethons reigne; therefore I conforme my owne reckoning to his, though I could be content to haue it one yeere lesse. The reason of this computation I shall render more at large, when I arriue at the time of Psammiticus, whereupon it hath much dependance, and whereinto the course of this History will shortly bring me, the Egyptian affaires growing now to be interlaced with the matters of Iuda, to which is meete that I returne.

CHAP. XXVII.

Of Manasse and his Contemporaries.

§. I.

The wickednesse of Manasses. His imprisonment, Repentance, and Death.

Manasse, the Sonne of Ezekias, forgetting the pietie of his Father, and the prosperity which followed him, set vp, repaired, adorned, and furnished, all the Altars, Temples, and high Places, in which the Diuell was by the Heathen worshipped. Besides, he himselfe esteemed the Sunne, the Moone, and the Starres, with all the Hoste of Heauen, as gods, and worshipped them: and of all his acts the most abominable was, that he burnt his Sonnes for a Sacrifice to the Diuell Moloch, or Melchor, in the Valley of Hinnon, or Benhennon: wherein was kindled the fire of Sacrifice to the Diuels.

He also gaue himselfe to all kinde of Witchcraft and Sorcerie, accompanied and maintained those that had familiar Spirits, and all sorts of Enchanters: besides, hee shed so much innocent blood, as Ierusalem was replenished therewith, from corner to corner. For all his vices and abominations, when he was reprehended by that aged and reuerent Prophet Esay (who was also of the Kings race, and as the Iewes affirme, the Father-in-law of the King) he caused the Prophet neere vnto the Fountaine of Siloe to be sawne in sunder, with a wooden saw, in the eightieth yeere of his life: a cruelty more barbarous and monstrous than hath bene heard of. The Scriptures indeede are silent hereof, yet the same is confirmed by Epiphazius, Isidore, Eusebius, and others, too many to rehearse, and too good to be suspected. Therefore the Lord brought vpon them the Captaines of the Hoste of the Kings of Athar, which tooke Manasse, and put him in fetters, and bound him in chaines, and carried him to Babel: Where after he had lien twenty yeeres as a captiue, and dispoyled of all honour and hope; yet to his hearty repentance and continuall tinuall prayer, the God of infinite mercy had respect, and moued the Assyrians heart to deliuer him.

It is also likely that Merodach, because he loued his father Ezechias, was the easilier perswaded to restore Manasse to his liberty and estate. After which, and when he was againe established, remembring the miseries which followed his wickednesse, and Gods great mercies toward him, he changed forme, detested his former foolish and deuillish Idolatry, and cast downe the Idols of his owne erecting, prepared the Altar of God, and sacrificed thereon. He repaired a great part of Ierusalem: and dyed after the long reigne of fiftie five yeeres. Glycas and Suidas report, that Manasse was held in a cage of yron by the Assyrians: and therein fed with bread of bran and water, which men may beleue as it to shall please their fancies.

§. II.

Of troubles in Egypt following the death of Sethon. The reigne of Psammiticus.

THat the wickednesse of King Manasses was the cause of the euill, which fell vpon his Kingdome and Person, any Christian must needes beleue: for it is affirmed in the Scriptures. Yet was the state of things, in those parts of the World, such, at that time, as would haue inuited any Prince (and did perhaps inuite Merodach, who fulfilled Gods pleasure, vpon respect borne to his owne ends) desirous to enlarge his Empire, to make attempt vpon Iuda. For the Kingdome of Egypt, which was become the pillar, whereon the state of Iuda leaned, about these times was miserably distracted with ciuill diffension, and after two yeeres, ill amended by a diuision of the gouernment betweene twelue Princes. After some good agreement betweene these, eleuen of them fell out with the twelfth of their colleagues, and were all finally subdued by him, who made himselfe absolute King of all. This Inter-regnum, or meere Anarchie, that was in Egypt, with the diuision of the Kingdome following it, is placed by Diodore, who omitteth Sethon, betweene the reigne of Sabacus, and Psammiticus: but Herodotus doth set the Aristocratie, or twelue Gouernours, immediately before Psammiticus, who was one of them, and after Sethon.

The occasion of this diffension seemes to haue beene the vncertainty of title to that Kingdome (for that the crown of Egypt passed by succession of bloud, I haue often shewed) which ended, for a while, by the partition of all among twelue, though things were not settled, vntill one had obtained the Soueraigntie.

These twelue Rulers gouerned fiftene yeeres, in good seeming agreement, which to preferue, they made strait couenant and alliances one with another, being ielous of their estate, because an Oracle had foretold, that one of them should depose all the rest, noting him by this token, that hee should make a drinke-offering, in Vulcans Temple, out of a Copper goblet. Whilest this vnitie lasted, they ioyned together in raising a Monument of their Dominion, which was a Labyrinth, built nere vnto the Lake of Meris; a worke so admirable, that (as Herodotus, who beholding it, affirms) no words could giue it commendation, answerable to the stateliness of the worke it selfe. I will not here set downe that vnperfect description, which Herodotus makes of it, but thinke enough to say, that he preferres it farre before the Pyramides, one of which (as he saith) excelled the Temple of Diana at Ephesus, or any of the fairest workes in Greece. Diodorus reports this Labyrinth to haue beene the worke of Marus, or Menides, a King which liued five generations before Protesus, that is, before the Warre of Troy; and from this Labyrinth (saith he) Dadalus took the patterne of that which he made for Minos in Crete. Who this Marus, or Menides was, I cannot tell. Reineccius takes him to haue beene Annemenes, which reigned immediately before Thuris. But this agrees not with Diodore: for Dadalus & Minos were both dead long before Annemenes was King. Belike Reineccius, desiring to accommodate the fabulous relations of Manethon, Charemon, & others, that are found in Iosephus, touching Amerophis and his children, to the storie of Amasis, and Astisanes the Ethiopian, mentioned by Diodore; held it consequent, after he had coniectured Manethons Amerophis, to be Diodorus his Amasis; that Sethon should be Astisanes, and that Annemenes should be Marus. In this case I might intrude a coniecture; the times which we now handle are those, about which Reineccius hath erred in making search; Amasis was Amasis, Astisanes was Sabacus; and Marus was one of these twelue Princes, to whom Herodotus giues the the honour of building this famous Labyrinth. For Astisanes the Ethiopian deposed Amasis; Sabacus the Ethiopian deposed Amasis; Astisanes gouerned well, and was milde in punishing offenders; so likewise was Sabacus; Marus the next King after Astisanes built this Labyrinth; and the next (sauiug Sethon, whom Diodore omits, as hauiug not heard of him) that ruled after Sabacus, performed the same worke, according to Herodotus, who was more likely to heare the truth, as liuing neerer to the Age wherein it was performed. The varietie of names, and difference of times, wherein Diodore beleueed the Priests, might be a part of the Egyptian vanitie, which was familiar with them, in multiplying their Kings, and boasting of their antiquities. Here I might adde, that the twelue great Halls, Parlours, and other circumstances remembred by Herodotus, in speaking of this building, doe helpe to proue, that it was the worke of these twelue Princes. But I hasten to their end.

At a solemn feast in Vulcans Temple, when they were to make their drinke-offerings, the Priest, forgetting himselfe, brought forth no more than eleuen Cuppes. Hereupon Psammiticus, who standing last, had not a Cup, took off his brazen Helmet, and therewith supplied the want. This caused all the rest to remember the Oracle, and to suspect him as a Traitor; yet, when they found that it was not done by him vpon set purpose, or ill intent, they forbore to kill him, but, being ielous of their estate, they banished him into the marish Countries by the Sea side. This Oracle, and the euent, is held by Diodore as a fable, which I beleue to haue beene none other: In the rest Herodotus & Diodore agree, saying, that Psammiticus hyrcd Souldiers out of Caria and Ionia, by whose aide hee vanquish his Companions, and made himselfe sole King.

The yeeres of his reigne, according to Herodotus, were fiftie foure; according to Eusebius, fortie foure; Mercator, to reconcile these two, giues fortie foure yeeres to his single reigne, and ten to his ruling, ioynly with the Princes before spoken of. Indeede, hee that was admitted, being a man growne (for he cannot in reason be supposed to haue beene then a yong fellow) into the number of the twelue Gouernours, must be thought to haue liued vnto extreame age, if he ruled partly with others, partly alone, threescore and nine yeeres. I therefore yeelde rather to Eusebius; but will not aduenture to cut five yeers from the Aristocratie: though peraduenture Psammiticus was not at first one of the twelue, but succeeded (either by election, or as next of bloud) into the place of some Prince that dyed, and was ten yeeres companion in that gouernment.

Another scruple there is, though not great, which troubles this reckoning. The yeeres of these Egyptians, as we finde them set downe, are more by one, than serue to fill vp the time, betweene the fift of Rehoboam, and the fourth of Iehoiakim. This may not be. Wherefore either we must abate one yeere from Sethons reigne; that was of vncertaine length, or else (which I had rather doe; because Furnius may haue followed better authority than I know, or than himselfe alleadgeth, in giuing to Sethon a time so neerely agreeing with the truth) we must confound the last yeere of one reigne, with the first of another. Such a supposition were not insolent. For no man can suppose, that all the Kings, or any great part of them, which are set downe in Chronologicall tables, reigned precisely so many yeeres as are prescribed vnto them, without any fractions: it is enough to thinke, that the surplusage of one mans time, supplied the defect of anothers. Wherefore I confound the last yeere of those fiftene, wherein the twelue Princes ruled, with the first of Psammiticus, who surely did not fall out with his Companions, fight with them, and make himselfe Lord alone, all in one day.

Concerning this King, it is recorded, that he was the first in Egypt, who entertained any strait amitie with the Greekes; that he retained in pay his Mercenaries of Caria, Ionia, and Arabia, to whom he gaue large rewards and possessions; and that he greatly offended his Egyptian Souldiers, by bestowing them in the left wing of his Armie, whilest his Mercenaries held the right wing (which was the more honorable place) in an expedition that he made into Syria. Vpon this disgrace it is said, that his Souldiers, to their number of two hundred thousand, forsooke their naturall Countrey of Egypt, and went into Ethiopia, to dwell there: neither could they be reuoked by kinde Messages, nor by the King himselfe, who ouer-tooke them on the way; but when he told them of their Countrey, their Wiues, and Children, they answered, that their weapons should get them a Countrey, and that nature had enabled them to get other wiues and children.

It is also reported of him, That he caused two Infants to be brought vp in such sort, as they might not heare any word spoken; by which meanes, he hoped to finde out, what Nation or Language was most ancient; forasmuch as it seemed likely, that nature would teach the children to speake that language, which men speake at the first. The issue hereof was, that the children cried, Beccus, Baccus, which word being found to signifie Bread in the Phrygian tongue, serued greatly to magnifie the Phrygian antiquitie. Goropius Becanus makes no small matter of this, for the honour of his Low-Dutch, in which the word Becker, signifies (as Baker in English) a maker of bread. He that will turne ouer any part of Goropius his workes, may finde enough of this kinde, to perswade a willing man, that Adam and all the Patriarks vsed none other tongue than the Low-Dutch, before the confusion of languages at Babel; the name it selfe of Babel, being also Dutch, and giuen by occasion of this confusion; for that there they began to babble, and talke, one knew not what.

But I will not insist vpon all that is written of Psammiticus. The most regardable of his acts was the siege of Azotus in Palestina, about which he spent nine and twenty yeeres. Neuer haue we heard (saith Herodotus) that any Citie endured so long a siege as this; yet Psammiticus carried it at the last. This Towne of Azotus had beene won by Tartan, a Captaine of Senacherib, and was now, as it seemeth, relicued, but in vaine, by the Babylonian, which made it hold out so well.

§. III.

What reference these Egyptian matters might haue to the imprisonment and enlargement of Manasses. In what part of his reigne Manasses was taken prisoner.

ERE it certainly knowne, in what yeere of his reigne Manasses was taken prisoner, and how long it was before he obtained libertie; I thinke we should finde these Egyptian troubles to haue beene no small occasion, both of his captiuitie and enlargement: God so disposing of humane actions, that euen they, who intended onely their owne businesse, fulfilled onely his high pleasure. For either the ciuill warres in Egypt that followed vpon the death of Sethon; or the renting of the Kingdome, as it were, into twelue peeces; or the warre betwene Psammiticus and his Colleagues; or the expedition of Psammiticus into Syria, and the siege of Azotus, might minister vnto the Babylonian, either such cause of hope, to enlarge his Dominion in the South parts; or such necessity of sending an Armie into those parts, to defend his owne, as would greatly tempt him, to make sure worke with the King of Juda. The same occasions sufficed also, to procure the deliuerie of Manasses, after he was taken. For he was taken (as Iosephus hath it) by subtiltie, not by open force, neither did they that apprehended him, winne his Countrey, but onely waste it. So that the Iewes, hauing learned wit, by the ill successe of their folly, in redeeming Azmazias, were like to be more circumspect, in making their bargain vpon such another accident: and the Babylonian (to whom the Egyptian matters presented more weighty arguments of hope and feare, than the little Kingdome of Juda could afford) had no reason, to spend his forces, in pursuing a small conquest, but as full of difficultie as a greater, whereby he should compell his mightiest enemies to come to some good agreement, when by quitting his present aduantage ouer the Iewes, he might make his way the fairest into Egypt.

Now concerning the yeere of Manasses his reigne, wherein he was taken prisoner; or concerning his captiuitie it selfe, how long it lasted the Scriptures are silent, and Iosephus giues no information. Yet I finde cited by Torniellus three opinions, the one of Bellarmino, who thinks that Manasses was taken in the fifteenth yeere of his reigne; the other of the Author of the greater Hebrew Chronologie, who affirms, that it was in his twentieth seauenth yeere; the third, of Rabbi Kimhi vpon Ezekiel, who saith, that he was forty yeeres an Idolater, and liued fiftene yeeres after his repentance. The first of these coniectures is vpheld by Torniellus, who rejects the second, as more vnprobable, and condemnes the third as most false. Yet the reasons alleaged by Torniellus in defence of the first, and refutation of the last opinion, are such as may rather proue him to fauour the Cardinall, as farre as he may, (for where neede requires, hee doth freely dissent from him) than to haue vsed his accustomed diligence in examining the matter, before before he gaue his iudgement. Two arguments he brings to maintaine the opinion of Bellarmino: the one, that Amnon the Sonne of Manasses, is said by Iosephus, to haue followed the workes of his Fathers youth; the other, that had Manasses growne old in his sinnes, it is not like that he should haue continued, as he did, in his amendment vnto the end of his life. Touching the former of these arguments, I see no reason, why the sinnes of Manasses might not be distinguished from his repentance in his old age, by calling them workes of his youth, which appeared when he was twelue yeeres old; though it were granted that he continued in them (according to that of Rabbi Kimhi) vntill hee was but fiftene yeeres from death. Touching the second; howsoeuer it be a fearefull thing, to cast off vnto the last those good motions vnto repentance, which we know not whether euer God will offer vnto vs againe; yet were it a terrible hearing, That the sinnes, which are not forsaken before the age of two and fiftie yeeres, shall be punished with small impenitency. But against these two collections of Torniellus, I will lay two places of Scripture, whence it may be inferred, as not vnlikely, That Manasses continued longer in his wickednesse, than Bellarmino hath intimated, if not as long as Rabbi Kimhi hath affirmed. In the second Booke of Kings, the euill which Manasses did, is remembred at large, and his repentance vnto the end omitted; so that his amendment may seeme to haue taken vp no great part of his life; the story of him being thus concluded, in the one and twentieth Chapter: Concerning the rest of the acts of Manasses, and all that he did, and his sinne that he sinned, are they not written in the booke of the Chronicles of the Kings of Juda? The other place is in the foure and twentieth Chapter of the same Booke, where in rehearsing the calamities with which that Nation was punished in the time of Iehoiakim, the great Grand-child of this Manasses, it is said, Surely by the commandement of the Lord came this vnto Juda, that he might put them out of his sight, for the sinnes of Manasses, according to all that he did, and for the innocent blood that he shed (for he filled Ierusalem with innocent blood) therefore the Lord would not pardon it. Who so considers well these places, may finde small cause to pronounce it most false, That the repentance and amendment of Manasses was no earlier then fiftene yeeres before his death; or most probable, That when he was twenty seauen yeeres old, he repented, and becoming a new man, liued in the feare of God fortie yeeres after. I will no longer dispute about this matter, seeing that the truth cannot be discovered. It sufficeth to say, that two yeeres of ciuill dissension in Egypt; foureteene or fiftene yeeres following, wherein that Kingdome was weakened, by partition of the Soueraignty: the warre of Psammiticus against his Associates: and foure and twenty yeeres, of the nine and twenty, wherein the siege of Azotus continued, being all within the time of Manasses, did leaue no one part of his reigne (after the first fiftene yeeres) free from the danger of being oppressed by the Babylonian, whose men of warre had continuall occasions of visiting his Countrey. All which I will adde hereto is this; that the fifteenth of Manasses, was the last yeere of Sethon in Egypt, and the one and thirtieth of Merodach his reigne, or (accounting from the death of Asarhaddon) the twentieth: The seauen and twentieth of Manasses was the tenth of the twelue Princes, and the three and fortieth of Merodach: his fortieth, was the twenty third of Psammiticus, and the fift of Nabulassar, the sonne of Merodach, in Babylon: but which of these was the yeere of his imprisonment, or whether any other, I forbear to shew mine opinion, lest I should thereby seeme to draw all matters ouer-violently to mine owne computation.

This was the first great mastrie that the Babylonians had of the Kingdome of Juda. For though Achaz promised Tribute to Salmanassar, yet Ezechias neuer payed it. True it is, that he hoped to stay *Sennacherib*s enterprife against him, by presenting him with three hundred talents of siluer, and thirty of gold, besides the plare which couered the doores and pillars of the Temple.

But Manasses being pressed with greater necessity, could refuse no tollerable conditions, that the Babylonians would impose vpon him; among which it seemes, that this was one, (which was indeede a point of seruitude) that he might not hold peace with the Egyptians, whilst they were enemies to Babylon. This appeares not onely by his fortifying with men of warre all the strong Cities of Juda after his returne (which was rather against Psammiticus, whose party he had forsaken, than against the Babylonian, with whom he had thenceforth no more controuersie) but likewise by that opposition, which Iosias made afterwards to Pharao Neco, in fauour of Nabulassar, which had beene against all reason reason and policie, if it had not beene his duty by couenant. Of this I will speake more in conuenient place.

†. IIIL.

Of the first and second Messenian warres, which were in the reignes of Ezekia, and Manasses, Kings of Iuda.

NOW concerning such actions as were performed abroad in the world, about thesetimes of Manasses, the most remarkeable were the Messenian Warres, which happened in this age, and being the greatest action performed in Greece, betweene the Troian and Persian Wars, deserue not to be passed ouer with silence.

The first Messenian Warre began and ended in the dayes of Ezekia; the second in the reigne of Manasses: but to auoide the trouble of interrupting our Historie, I haue thought it best, to rehearse them both in this place. Other introduction is needelasse, than to say, that the posteritie of Hercules, driuing the issue of Pelops and the Achaens out of their seats, diuided their lands betweene themselves, and erected the Kingdomes of Lacedaemon, Argos, Messene, and Corinth; all which agreeing well together a while, did afterwards forget the bond of Kindred, and fought one anothers ruine with bloudy Wars; whereof these Messenian were the greatest.

The pretended grounds of the Messenian Warre, are scarce worth remembrance; they were so sleight. Ambition was the true cause of it: wherewith the Lacedaemonians were so transported, that any thing serued them as a colour, to accomplish their greedy desires. Yet other matter was alleaged; namely, that one Polychares a Messenian had slaine many Lacedaemonians, for which the Magistrates of Sparta desiring to haue him yeeled into their hands, could not obtaine it. The Messenians on the other side, excused Polychares, for that he was growne franticke, through iniuries receiued from Euphros a Lacedaemonian. This Euphros had bargained to giue pasture to the Cattell of Polychares, and was therefore to receiue part of the increase: but not contented with the gaine appointed, he sold the Cattails, and slaues that kept them, to Merchants; which done, he came with a faire tale to his friend, saying, that they were stolen. Whilest the lye was yet scarce out of his mouth, one of the slaues that had escaped from the Merchants, came in with a true report of all. The Lacedaemonian being thus deprehended, confessed all, and promised large amends; which to receiue, he carried the Sonne of Polychares home with him; but hauing him at home, he villanously slew him. Wherefore the Lacedaemonians hauing refused, after long suite made by the wretched Father, to doe him right against this Theefe and Murderer, ought not to picke matter of quarrell, out of those things, which he did in that madnesse, whereinto they themselves had cast him. So said the Messenians, and further offered to put the matter to compromise, or to stand vnto the iudgement of the Amphictyones, who were as the generall Counsaile of Greece, or to any other faire course. But the Lacedaemonians, who had a great desire to occupie the faire Countie of Messene, that lay close by them, were not content with such allegations. They thought it enough, to haue some shew for their doings, which the better to colour, they reckoned vp many old iniuries, and so without sending any defiance, secretly tooke an oath to hold warre with Messene, till they had mastered it: which done, they seized vpon Amphias, a frontier Towne of that Prouince, wherein they put all to the Sword without mercy, very few escaped.

Hereupon the Messenians tooke Armes, and were met by the Enemie. A furious battail was fought betweene them, which ended not vntill darke night, with vncertaine victory. The Messenians did strongly encampe themselves; The Lacedaemonians, vnable to force their Campe, returned home. This Warre began in the second yeere of the ninth Olympiad, and ended in the first of the foureteenth Olympiad, hauing lasted twentie yeeres. The two enemie Nations tried the matter, for a while, with their proper forces; the Lacedaemonians wasting the inland parts of Messene; and the Messenians, the Sea-coast of Laconia. But it was not long ere friends, on both sides, were called in to helpe. The Arcadians, Argiues, and Sicyonians, tooke part with Messene; the Spartans had, besides many Subjects of their owne, aide from Corinth, and hired Souldiers out of Crete. So a second, third, and fourth battail, were fought, with as great obstinacie as the first; sauing that, in the fourth battail, the Lacedaemonians were enforced ced to turne their backs; in the other fights, the victory was still vncertaine, though in one of them the Messenians lost Euphros their King, in whose stead they chose Aristodemus.

Many yeeres were spent ere all this bloud was shed; for pestilent diseases, and want of money to entertaine Souldiers, caused the Warre to linger. And for the same reasons, did the Messenians forsake all their inland Townes, excepting Ithome, which was a mountaine with a Towne vpon it, able to endure more than the enemies were likely to doe. But, as some Authorstell vs, the Lacedaemonians were so obstinate in this Warre, because of their vow, that hauing absented themselves ten yeeres from Sparta, their wiues sent them word, that their Citie would grow vnpeopled, by reason that no children had bene borne them in all that time: Whereupon they sent backe all their ablest young men, promiscuously to accompany the young women, who got so many of them with childe, as they became a great part of their Nation, and were called Parthenians. Diodorus refers the begetting of these Parthenians to a former time. But in proceesse of this Messenian Warre, when the Diuell in an Oracle had aduised the Messenians to sacrifice a Virgin of the stocke of * Egyptus, that so they might be victorious against the Lacedaemonians; the lot falling vpon the Daughter of one Lyciscus; Epibolus the Priest, willing to saue her, said, she was onely a fostered childe, and not borne of the wife of Lyciscus: which answeere giuing delay to the execution of the Maide, Lyciscus secretly fled away with her into Sparta. Then Aristodemus, which afterwards was King, voluntarily offered his owne Daughter: but a young Noble man, being in loue with the Maide, when otherwile he could not preuaile, said openly that she was no Virgin, but that he had defoured her, and got her with childe: whereupon the Father in a rage ripped vp his innocent Daughters belly, to disproue the Louers slander: at the graue of which Daughter of his, afterwards, falling, by other superstitions, into despaire of preuailling against the Lacedaemonians, he slew himselfe, to the great hurt of his Countrey, which he loued most dearly. For after his death the Messenians lost their courage, and finding themselves distressed by many wants, especially of victuals, they craued peace, which they obtained in most rigorous conditions. Halfe the yeerely fruites of their Land they were bound to send vnto Sparta; and they, with their Wiues, to make solemne lamentations, at the death of euery Spartan King; they were also sworne to liue in true subiection to the Lacedaemonians; and part of their Territorie was taken from them, which was giuen to the Asmai, and such as had followed the Spartans in this Warre.

This peace being made vpon so vnconuenient termes, was not like to hold long. Yet nine and thirte yeeres it continued (the Messenians not finding how to helpe themselves) and then brake out into a new and more furious Warre, than the former. The able young men, that were growne vp in the roome of those Messenians whom the former Warre had consumed, began to consider their owne strength and multitude, thinking themselves equall to the Lacedaemonians, and therefore scorned to serue such Masters, as had against all right, oppressed their Fathers. The chiefe of these was Aristomenes, a noble Gentleman, of the house of Egyptus; who perceiued the vniforme desires of his Countie-men, aduentured to become their Leader. He therefore founding the affections of the Argiues and Arcadians, which he found thoroughly answerable to his purpose, began open warre vpon the State of Lacedaemon. This was in the fourth yeere of the three and twentieth Olympiad; when the Lacedaemonians, hasted to quench the fire before it should grow too hot, with such forces as they could raise of their owne, without troubling their friends, meaning to deal with their Enemies, ere any succour were lent them. So a strong battail was fought betweene them, and a doubtfull; saue that the Messenians were pleased with the issue, forasmuch as they had thereby taught their late proud Lords, to thinke them their equals. Particularly, the valour of Aristomenes appeared such in this fight, that his people would haue made him their King; but hee, refusing the honour of that name, accepted of the burthen, and became their Generall. Within one yeere another battail was fought, whereunto each part came better provided. The Lacedaemonians brought with them the Corinthians, and some other friends to helpe: the Messenians had the Argiues, Arcadians and Sicyonians. This also was a long and bloudie fight; but Aristomenes did so behaue himselfe, that finally hee made the Enemies runne for their liues. Of such importance was this victory, that the Lacedaemonians beganne to berhinke themselves, of making some good agreement.

But one Tyrteus an Athenian Poet, whom by appointment of an Oracle they had gotten to direct them, re-enforced their spirits with his Verses. After this, Aristomenes took by surprise a Towne in Laconia, and vanquished in fight Anaxander King of Sparta, who did set vpon him in hope to haue recouered the bootie.

But all these victories of Aristomenes perished, in the losse of one battaile, whereof the honour (if it were honour) or surely the profit, fell vpon the Lacedemonians, through the treason of Aristocrates, King of Arcadia, who being corrupted by the enemies with money, fled away, and left the Messenians exposed to a cruell butchery. The losse was so great, that together with Andania their princall Citie, all the townes in Messene, standing too farre from the Sea, were abandoned, for lacke of men to defend them, and the Mount Era fortified, whither the multitude, that could not be safe abroad, was conueyed into a place of safetie. Here the Lacedemonians found a tedious worke, that held them cleauen yeeres. For besides that Era it selfe was a strong peece, Aristomenes with three hundred stout Souldiers, did many incredible exploits, that wearied them, and hindered their attendance on the siege. He wasted all the fields of Messene, that were in the enemies power, and brake into Laconia, taking away Corne, Wine, Cattails, and all provisions, necessarie for his owne people; the Slaues and household stuffe hee changed into money, suffering the owners to redeme them. To remedy this mischief the Lacedemonians made an Ediſt, that neither Messene, nor the adioyning parts of their owne Countrie, should be tilled or husbanded; which bred a great tumult among priuate men, that were almost vndone by it. Yet the Poet Tyrteus appeased this vproare with pleasing Songs. But Aristomenes grew so bold, that he not onely ranged ouer all the fields, but aduentured vpon the Townes, surprised, and sackt Amycle, and finally caused the enemies to encrease and strengthen their Companies; which done, there yet appeared no likelihood of taking Era.

In performing these and other seruices, thrice Aristomenes was taken prisoner, yet still he escaped. One escape of his deserues to be remembered, as a thing very strange and maruailous. He had with too much courage aduentured to set vpon both the Kings of Sparta; and being in that fight wounded, and felled to the ground, was taken vp senselesse, and carried away prisoner, with fiftie of his Companions. There was a deepe natural Cauer into which the Spartans vied to cast head-long, such as were condemned to dye for the greatest offences. To this punishment were Aristomenes and his companions adiudged. All the rest of these poore men dyed with their fells; Aristomenes (howeuer it came to passe) took no harme. Yet was it hard enough to be imprisoned in a deepe Dungeon, among dead carcasses, where he was like a vermin through hunger and stench. But after a while he perceived by some small glimmering of light (which perhaps came in at the top) a Foxe that was gnawing vpon a dead body. Here vpon he bethought himselfe, that this beast must needs know some way, to enter the place and get out. For which cause he made shift to lay hold vpon it, and catching it by the taile with one hand, saued himselfe from biting with the other hand, by thrusting his coare into the mouth of it. So letting it creepe whither it would, he followed, holding it as his guide, vntill the way was too strait for him; and then dismissed it. The Foxe being loose, ran through an hole, at which came in a little light; and there did Aristomenes delue so long with his nailes, that at last he clawed out his passage. When some fugitiues of Messene brought word to Sparta, that Aristomenes was returned home, their tale sounded alike, as if they had said, that a dead man was reuiued. But when the Corinthian forces, that came to helpe the Lacedemonians in the siege of Era, were cut in peeces, their Captaines slaine, and their Campe taken; then was it easily beleueed, that Aristomenes was alieue indeede.

Thus cleauen yeeres passed whilest the enemies hovering about Era, saw no likelihood of getting it; and Aristomenes with small forces did them greater hurt than they knew how to requite. But at the last, a slaue, that had fled from Sparta, betrayed the place. This fellow had enticed to lewdnesse the wife of a Messenian, and was entertained by her, when her husband went forth to watch. It happened in a rainie-winter-night, that the husband came home vnlooked for, whilest the Adulterer was within. The Woman hid her Paramour, and made good countenance to her husband, asked him, by what good fortune he was returned so soone. He told her, that the storme of foule weather was such, as had made all his fellowes leaue their Stations, and that himselfe had done as the rest rest did; as for Aristomenes, he was wounded of late in fight, and could not looke abroad; neither was it to be feared, that the enemies would stirre, in such a darke rainie night as this was. The slaue that heard these tidings, rose vp secretly out of his lurking hole, and got him to the Lacedemonian Campe with the newes. There he found Emperamus his Master, commanding in the Kings absence. To him he vttered all; and obtaining pardon for his running away, guided the Armie into the Towne. Little or nothing was done that night. For the Allarme was presently taken; and the extreame darkenesse, together with the noise of winde and raine, hindered all directions. All the next day was spent in most cruell fight; one part being incited, by meere hope of ending a long worke; the other enraged by meere desperation. The great aduantage that the Spartans had in numbers, was recompenced partly by the assistance, which women and children (to whom the hatred of seruitude had taught contempt of death) gaue to their husbands and fathers; partly by the narrownesse of the streetes and other passages, which admitted nor many hands to fight at once. But the Messenians were in continuall toyle; their enemies fought in course, refreshing themselves with meate and sleepe, and then returning supplied the place of their wearie fellowes, with fresh Companions. Aristomenes therefore, perceiuing that his men for want of reliefe were no longer able to hold out, (as hauing bene three dayes, and three nights vexed with all miseries, of labour, watchings, fighting, hunger and thirst, besides continuall raine and cold) gathered together all the weaker sort, whom hee compassed round with armed men, and so attempted to breake out through the midst of the enemies. Emperamus General of the Lacedemonians was glad of this: and to further their departure, caused his Souldiers to giue an open way, leauing a faire passage to these desperate madmen. So they issued forth, and arriued safe in Arcadia, where they were most louingly entertained.

Vpon the first bruit of the taking of Era, the Arcadians had prepared themselves to the rescue: but Aristocrates their false-hearted King, said it was too late, for that all was already lost. When Aristomenes had placed his followers in safety, he chose out fise hundred the lustiest of his men, with whom he resolved to march in all secret haste vnto Sparta, hoping to finde the Towne secure, and ill manned, the people being runne forth to the spoyle of Messene. In this enterprise, if he sped well, it was not doubted, that the Lacedemonians would be glad to recouer their owne, by restitution of that which they had taken from others; if all failed, an honourable death was the worst that could happen. There were three hundred Arcadians that offered to ioyne with him; but Aristocrates marred all, by sending speedily aduertisement thereof, to Anaxander King of Sparta. The Epistle which Anaxander sent backe to Aristocrates, was intercepted by some that mistrusted him to whom it was directed. Therein was found all his falsehood, which being published in open assembly, the Arcadians stoned him to death, and casting forth his body vnburied, erected a monument of his trecherie, with a note: That the Periuicer cannot deceiue God.

Of Aristomenes no more is remaining to be said, than that committing his people to the charge of his Son Gorgius and other sufficient Gouvernors, who should plant them in some new seat abroad, he resolved himselfe to make aboad in those parts, hoping to finde the Lacedemonians worke at home. His daughters he bestowed honourably in marriage. One of them Demagetis, who reigned in the Ile of Rhodes, tooke to wife, being willed by an Oracle, to marry the daughter of the best man in Greece. Finally, Aristomenes went with his daughters to Rhodes, whence he purposed to haue trauailed vnto Ardis the Sonne of Oges King of Lydia, and to Phraortes King of Media: but death preuented him at Rhodes, where he was honourably buried.

The Messenians were inuited by Anaxilas (whose great Grandfather was a Messenian) and went into Italie after the former warre) being Lord of the Rhegiens in Italie, to take his part against the Zancleans in Sicilie, on the other side of the Streights. They did so; and winning the Towne of Zancle, called it Messene, which name it keeps to this day.

This second Messenian warre ended in the first yeere of the twentie eight Olympiade. Long after which time, the rest of that Nation, who staying at home serued the Lacedemonians, found meanes to rebell; but were soone vanquished, and being driuen to forsake Peloponnesus, they went into Acarmania; whence likewise, after few ages they were expelled by the Lacedamonians; and then followed their ancient Countrymen into Italie and Sicilie, some of them went into Africa, where they chose vnto themselves a seate.

It is very strange, that during two hundred and foure score yeeres, this banished Nation retained their name, their ancient customes, language, hatred of Sparta, & loue of their forsaken Countrey, with a desire to returne vnto it. In the third yeere of the hundred and second Olympiad, that great Epaminondas, hauing tamed the pride of the Lacedamonians, reuoked the Messenians home, who came flocking out of all quarters, where they dwelt abroad, into Peloponnesus. There did Epaminondas restore vnto them their old possession, and helpe them in building a faire Citie; which, by the name of the Prouince, was called to Messene, and was held by them euer after, in despite of the Lacedamonians, of whom they neuer from thenceforth stood in feare.

§ V.

Of the Kings that were in Lydia and Media, while Manasses reigned. Whether Deioces the Mede were that Arphaxad which is mentioned in the Booke of Iudith. Of the historie of Iudith.

Ardys King of Lydia, and Phraortes of the Medes, are spoken of by Pausanias, as reigning shortly after the Messenian war. Ardys succeeding vnto his father Ogyes, began his reigne of nine and fortie yeeres, in the second of the five and twentieth Olympiad. He followed the steps of his father, who encroaching vpon the Ionians in Asia, had taken Colophon by force, and attempted Miletus and Smyrna. In like manner Ardys wan Priene, and assailed Miletus; but went away without it. In his reigne, the Cimmerians, being expelled out of their owne Countrey by the Scythians, ouerran a great part of Asia, which was not freed from them before the time of Algyates this mans Grandchilde, by whom they were driuen out. They had not onely broken into Lydia, but wan the Citie of Sardes; though the Castle or Citadell thereof was defended against them, and held still for King Ardys; whose long reigne was vnable, by reason of this great storme, to effect much.

Phraortes was not King vntill the third yeere of the nine and twentieth Olympiad, which was six yeeres after the Messenian war ended; the same being the last yeere of Manasses his reigne over Juda.

Deioces the father of this Phraortes, was King of Media, three and fiftie of these five and fiftie yeers in which Manasses reigned. This Deioces was the first that ruled the Medes in a strict forme, commanding more absolutely than his Predecessours had done. For they, following the example of Arbaces, had giuen to the people so much licence, as caused euery one to desire the wholesome seuerity of a more Lordly King. Herein Deioces answered their desires to the full. For he caused them to build for him a stately Palace; he tooke vnto him a Guard, for defence of his person; he seldom gaue presence, which also when he did, it was with such austerity, that no man durst presume to spit or cough in his sight. By these and the like ceremonies he bred in the people an awfull regard, and highly vpheld the Maiestie, which his Predecessours had almost letten fall, through neglect of due comportments. In execution of his Royall Office, he did vprightly and seuerely administer iustice, keeping secret spies to informe him of all that was done in the Kingdome. He cared not to enlarge the bounds of his Dominion; by encroaching vpon others; but studied how to gouerne well his owne. The difference found betwene this King, and such as were before him, seemes to haue bred that opinion which Herodotus deliueis, that Deioces was the first who reigned in Media.

This was he that built the great City of Ecbatane, which now is called Tauris; and therefore he should be that King Arphaxad, mentioned in the storie of Iudith, as also Ben Merodach, by the same account, should be Nabuchodonosor the Assyrian, by whom Arphaxad was slaine, and Holophernes sent to worke wonders vpon Phud and Lud, and I know not what other Countreies. For I reckon the last yeere of Deioces to haue bene the nineteenth of Ben Merodach; though others place it otherwile, some earlier in the time of Merodach Baladach, some later, in the reigne of Nabulassar, who is also called Nabuchodonosor.

In

In fitting this booke of Iudith to a certaine time, there hath much labour bene spent with ill successe. The reignes of Cambyses, Darius Hystaspis, Xerxes, and Ochus, haue bene sought into; but afford no great matter of likelihood: and now of late, the times, foregoing the destruction of Ierusalem, haue bene thought vpon, and this age that we haue in hand, chosen by Bellarmino, as agreeing best with the storie; though others herein cannot I speake of such as faine would agree with him. Whilest Cambyses reigned, the Temple was not rebuilt, which in the storie of Iudith, is found standing and dedicated. The other two Persian Kings, Darius and Xerxes are acknowledged to haue bene very fauourable to the Iewes; therefore neither of them could be Nabuchodonosor, whose part they refused to take, and who sent to destroy them. Yet the time of Xerxes hath some conueniences, aptly fitting this History; and aboue all, the opinion of a few Ancient writers (without whose iudgement the authority of this Booke were of no value) hauing placed this argument in the Persian Monarchie, inclines the matter to the Reigne of this vaine-glorious King. As for Ochus, very few, and they faintly, entitle him to the business. Manifest it is, and granted, that in the time of this Historie, there must be a returne from captiuitie lately foregoing; the Temple rebuilt; Ioachim High Priest; and a long peace, of three-score and ten yeeres or thereabout, ensuing. All these were to be among the Iewes. Likewise on the other side, we must finde a King that reigned in Ninuiie, eightene yeeres at the least; that vanquished and slew a King of the Medes; one whom the Iewes refused to assist; one that fought to be generally adored as God, and that therefore commanded all temples, of such as were accounted gods, to be destroyed; one whose Viceroy or Captaine Generall knew not the Iewish Nation, but was faine to learne what they were of the bordering people.

Of all these circumstances, the Priesthood of Ioachim, with a returne from Captiuitie, are found concurring, with either the time of Manasses before the destruction of Ierusalem, or of Xerxes afterward: the rebuilding of the Temple a while before, and the long peace following, agree with the reigne of Xerxes; the rest of circumstances requisite, are to be found all together, neither before, nor after the Captiuitie of the Iewes, and desolation of the Citie. Wherefore the briefe decision of this controuersie is, That the Booke of Iudith is not Canonically. Yet hath Torniellus done as much, in fitting all to the time of Xerxes, as was possible in so desperate a case. For he supposeth, that vnder Xerxes there were other Kings, among which Arphaxad might be one (who perhaps restored and redified the Citie of Ecbatane, that had formerly bene built by Deioces) and Nabuchodonosor might be another. This granted, he addes, that from the twelfth yeere to the eighteenth of Nabuchodonosor, that is five or six yeeres, the absence and ill fortune of Xerxes, in his Grecian expedition (which he supposeth to haue bene so long) might giue occasion vnto Arphaxad, of rebelling: and that Nabuchodonosor hauing vanquished and slaine Arphaxad, might then seeke to make himselfe Lord of all, by the Armie which he sent forth vnder Holophernes. So should the Iewes haue done their dutie, in adhering to Xerxes their Soueraigne Lord, and resisting one that rebelled against him; as also the other circumstances rehearsed before, be well applied to the argument. For in these times, the affaires of Iurie were agreeable to the Historie of Iudith, and such a King as this supposed Nabuchodonosor, might well enough be ignorant of the Iewes, and as proud as we shall neede to thinke him. But the silence of all Histories, takes away beliefe from this coniecture: and the supposition it selfe is very hard, that a rebell, whose King was abroad, with an Armie consisting of seauenteene hundred thousand men, should presume so farre, vpon the strength of twelue hundred thousand foot, and twelue thousand Archers on horsebacke, as to thinke that he might doe what he list, yea that there was none other God then himselfe. It is indeede easie to finde enough that might be said against this deuice of Torniellus: yet if there were any necessity, of holding the booke of Iudith to be Canonically, I would rather choose to lay aside all regard of prophane Histories, and build some defence vpon this ground; than, by following the opinion of any other, to violate, as they all doe, the text it selfe. That Iudith liued vnder none of the Persian Kings, Bellarmino (whose workes I haue not read, but finde him cited by Torniellus) hath proued by many arguments. That she liued not in the Reigne of Manasses, Torniellus hath proued very substantially, shewing how the Cardinal is driuen, as it were to breake through a wall, in saying that the text was corrupted, where it spake of the destruction of the Temple foregoing her time. That the Kings Arphaxad and Nabuchodonosor, chodonomos, found out by Tornilius, are the children of mere fantasie, it is so plaine that it needes no prooffe at all. Wherefore we may truly say, that they, which haue contented about the time of this Historie, being well furnished of matter, wherewith to confute each other, but wanting wherewith to defend themselves (like naked men in a stonie field) haue chased Holofernes out of all parts of time, and left him and his great expedition, Extra anni solisque vias, in an age that neuer was, and in places that were neuer knowne.

23. & 25.*

Surely, to finde out the borders of Iapheth, which were towards the South, and ones against Arabia; or the Countries of Phud and Lud, that lay in Holofernes his way; I thinke it would as much trouble Cosmographers, as the former question hath done Chronologers. But I will not busie my selfe herewith; hauing already so farre digressed, in shewing who liued not with Manasses, that I thinke it high time, to returne vnto mine owne worke, and rehearse what others I finde, to haue had their part, in the long time of his Reigne.

§. VI.

Of other Princes and actions that were in these times.

THE first yeere of Manasses was the last of Romulus; after whose death, one yeere the Romanes wanted a King. Then was Numa Pompilius a Sabine chosen a peaceable man and seeming very religious in his kinde. He brought the rude people, which Romulus had employeed onely in warres, to some good ciuilitie, and a more orderly fashion of life. This he effected by filling their heads with superstition; as perswading them, that he had familiaritie with a Nymph called Egeria, who taught him a many of Ceremonies, which he deliuered vnto the Romans as things of great importance. But all these deuices of Numa were, in his owne iudgement, no better then mere delusions that serued onely as rudiments to bring the sauage multitude of theues and out-lawes, gathered into one body by Romulus, to some forme of milder discipline, then their boysterous and wilde natures was otherwise apt to entertaine. This appeared by the Bookes that were found in his graue, almost fixe hundred yeeres after his death, wherein the Superstition taught by himselfe was condemned as vaine. His graue was opened by chance, in digging a piece of ground that belonged to one L. Petilius a Scribe. Two Coffines or Chests of stone were in it, with an inscription in Greeke and Latine letters, which said, That Numa Pompilius the sonne of Pompo, King of the Romanes lay there. In the one Coffin was nothing found; his body being vtterly consumed. In the other were his Bookes, wrapped vp in two bundels of waxe; of his owne constitutions leuen, and other leaues of Philosophie. They were not onely vncorrupted, but in a manner fresh and new. The Pretour of the Citie desiring to haue a sight of these Bookes, when he perceiued whereunto they tended, refused to deliuer them backe to the owner, and offered to take a solemne oath that they were against the Religion then in vse. Hereupon the Senate, without more adoe, commanded them to be openly burnt. It seemes that Numa did meane to acquite himselfe vnto wiser ages, which he thought would follow, as one that had not bene so foolish as to belecue the Doctrine wherein he instructed his owne barbarous times. But the poyson wherewith he had infected Rome, when hee fate in his Throne, had not left working, when he ministred the Antidote out of his graue. Had these Bookes not come to light, vntill the dayes of Tully and Cesar, when the miste of ignorance was somewhat better discussed; likely it is that they had not onely escaped the fire, but wrought some good (and peraduenture generall) effect. Being as it was, they serued as a confutation, without remedy, of Idolatry that was inueterate.

Numa reigned three and fortie yeeres in continuall peace. After him Tullus Hostilius the third King was chosen, in the fixe and fortieth of Manasses, and reigned two and thirtie yeeres, busied, for the most part in warre. Hee quarrelled with the Albans, who met him in the feldes; but in regard of the danger, which both parts had cause to feare, that might grow vnto them from the Thuscans, caused them to bebinke themselves of a course, whereby without effusion of so much blood, as might make them too weake for a common enemy, it might be decided, who should command, and who obey.

There

There were in each Campe three Brethren, Twins borne at one birth (Dionysius sayes that they were Cosen Germans) of equall yeeres and strength, who were appointed to fight for their severall Countries. The end was, that the Horatii, Champions for the Romanes, got the victory, though two of them first lost their liues. The three Curatii that fought for Alba (as Luie teils it) were all aliue, and able to fight, yet wounded, when two of their opposites were slaine; but the third Horatius, pretending feare, did runne away, and thereby drew the others, who by reason of their hurts, could not follow him with equall speed, to follow him at such distance one from another, that returning vpon them, he slue them, as it had bene in single fight, man after man, ere they could ioine together and set vpon him all at once. Dionysius reports it somewhat otherwise, telling very particularly, what wounds were giuen and taken, and saying, that first one of the Horatii was slaine, then one of the Curatii, then a second Horatius, and lastly the two Curatii, whom the third Horatius did cunningly seuer the one from the other, as is shewed before.

This is one of the most memorable things in the old Roman Historie, both in regard of the action it selfe, wherein Rome was laid, as it were in a wage, against Alba, and in respect of the great increase which thereby the Roman State obtained. For the Citie of Alba did immediately become subiect vnto her owne Colonie, and was shortly after, vpon some treacherous dealing of their Gouvernour, vtterly razed, the people being remoued vnto Rome, where they were made Citizens. The strong Nation of the Latines, whereof Alba, as the mother Citie, had bene chiefe, became ere long dependant vpon Rome, though not subiect vnto it, and diuers petty States adiacent, were by little and little taken in: which additions, that were small, yet many, I will forbear to rehearse (as being the works of sundrie ages, and few of them remarkable considered apart by themselves) vntill such time as this fourth Empire, that is now in the infancie, shall grow to be the maine subiect of this Historie.

The seventh yeere of Hippomenes in Athens, was current with the first of Manasses. Also the three last Gouvernours for ten yeeres, who followed Hippomenes, were in the same Kings time. Of these I finde only names, Leocrates, Abxander, and Erixtas. After Erixtas 30 yeerely Rulers were elected.

These Gouvernours for ten yeeres, were also of the race of Medon and Codrus, but their time of rule was shortned, & from teame of life reduced vnto ten yerres; it being thought likely that they would gouerne the better, when they knew that they were afterwards to liue priuate men vnder the command of others. I follow Dionysius of Halicarnassus, in applying their times vnto those yeeres of the Olympiads, wherein the Chronologicall table, following this worke, doth set them. For he not onely professeth himselfe to haue taken great care in ordering the reckoning of times; but hath noted alwaies the yeeres of the Greeks, how they did answere vnto the things of Rome, throughout all the continuance of this Historie. Whereas therefore hee placeth the building of Rome, in the first 40 yeere of the seventh Olympiad, and affirmes, that the same was the first yeere of Charops gouernement in Athens; I hope I shall not need excuse, for varying from Pausanias, who sets the beginning of these Athenians somewhat sooner.

In the Reigne of Manasses it was, that Midas, whom the Poets fained to haue had Asses eares, held the Kingdome of Phrygia. Many fables were deuised of him; especially that hee obtained of Bacchus, as a great gift, that all things which hee should touch, might immediately be changed into Gold: by which meanes he had like to haue bene starued (his meat and drinke being subiect to the same transformation) had not Bacchus deliuered him from this miserable facultie, by causing him to wash himselfe in the River Pactolus, the streame wherof hath ever since, forsooth, abounded in that precious Metall. Finally, it is said hee died by drinking Bulls blood; being inuaded by the Scythians.

In this age flourished that Antimachus, who (saith Plutarch in the life of Romulus) obserued the Moones Eclipse at the foundation of Rome.

The Milesians, or, (as Eusebius hath it) the Athenians hauing obtained some power by Sea, founded Macieratis a City on the East of Egypt. Psammiticus herein seemes to haue assisted them, who vsed all means of drawing the Greekes into Egypt, accounting them his surest strength. For neither Miletus nor Athens were now of power sufficient to plant a Colonie in Egypt by force.

About

Plut. &amp; Euseb.

About this time Archias with his companion Miscellus, and other Corinthians founded Syracusa in Sicily, a Citie in after-times exceeding famous.

* Whence in Strabo there is from Astacus a part of Propontis where this Citie standeth. Paul. 1. 3. Strabo. 6.

The Citie of Nicomedia sometime * Astacus, was enlarged and beautified in this age by Zipartes native of Thrace. Sybilla of Samus, according to Pausanias, liued much about this time.

About these times also was Croton founded vpon the Bay of Tarentum by Miscellus, the companion of Archias that built Syracusa. Strabo makes it somewhat more ancient: and so doth Pausanias.

Iustini. 3. Paul. 1. 10.

About the same time the Parthenians being of age, and banished Lacedaemon, were conducted by Phalantus into Italie: where it is said they founded Tarentum: but Iustine and Pausanias finde it built before, and by them conquered and amplified: and about the same time Manasse yet liuing, the Citie Phaselis was founded in Pamphylia, Gela in Sicily, Interamne in the Region of the Vmbri, now Vrbini in Italie. About which time also Chalcedon in Asia, ouer against Byzantium (now Constantinople) was founded by the Megareses: who therefore were vpbraid as blinde, because they chose not the other side of Bosphorus. It were a long worke to rehearse all that is said to haue beene done in the fiftie yeeres of Manasses: that which hath already beene told is enough: the rest being not greatly worth remembrance, may well be omitted, referuing only Ben Merodach, and Nabulassar, to the businesse that will shortly require more mention of them.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Of the times from the death of Manasses to the destruction of Ierusalem.

§. I.

Of Ammon and Iofias.

Ammon the sonne of Manasse, a man no lesse wicked than was his Father before his conuersion, restored the exercise of all sorts of Idolatrie: for which God hardened the hearts of his owne seruants against him: who slew him after hee had reigned two yeeres. Philo. Eusebius. and Nicephorus giue him ten yeeres, following the Septuagint.

Iofias succeeded vnto Ammon, being but a child of 8. yeres olde, he began to seek after the God of Dauid his Father; and in his twelfth yere he purged Iuda and Ierusalem from the high places, and the groues, & the carued and molten Images: and they brake downe in his sight the Altars of Baalim: He caused all the Images as well those which were grauen, as molten, to be stampd to powder, and strewed on their graues that had erected them, and this he commanded to be done throughout all his Dominions. He also slew those that sacrificed to the Sunne and Moone, and caused the Chariots and Horses of the Sunne to be burnt. Of Iofias it was prophesied in the time of Ieroboam the first, when he erected the Golden Calfe at Bethel, that a childe should be borne vnto the house of Dauid, Iofias by name, and vpon thee (said the Prophet speaking to the Altar) shall he sacrifice the Priests of the high places, that burne incense vpon thee: a prophecy verie remarkable.

In the eighteenth yeere of his reigne, hee rebuilt and repaired the Temple, at which so time Helkiah the Priest found the Booke of Moses, called Deuteronomy, or, of the Law, which he sent to the King: which when he had caused to be read before him, and considered of the seuer commandements therein written, the prosperitie promised to those that obserue them, and the sorrow and extirpation to the rest, he rent his garments, and commanded Helkiah, and others, to aske counsell of the Prophetesse Huldah, or, Olda, concerning the Book, who answered the messengers in these words: Thus saith the Lord. Behold, I will bring euill vpon this place, and vpon the inhabitants thereof, even all the curse that are written in the Booke, which they haue read before. the King of Iuda, because they haue forsaken foraken mee, and burnt incense to other gods. Onely for the King himselfe, because he was a louer of God and his Lawes, it was promised that this euill should not fall on Iuda and Ierusalem in his dayes, but that he himselfe should inherit his graue in peace.

2. King. 22. 15.
2. Chron. 34.

Iofias assembled the Elders, caused the Booke to be read vnto them, made a couenant with the Lord, and caused all that were found in Ierusalem and Beniamin to doe the like, promising thereby to obserue the Lawes and commandements in the Booke contained.

The execution done by Iofias vpon the Altar, idols, monuments, and bones of the false Prophets, at Bethel, argueth his Dominion to haue extended vnto those Countries, so that had beene part of the Kingdome of the ten Tribes. Yet I doe not thinke, that any victorie of Iofias in warre got possession of these places; but rather that Ezekias, after the flight and death of Senacherib, when Merodach opposed himselfe against Asarhaddon, did vie the advantage which the faction in the North presented vnto him, and laid hold vpon so much of the Kingdome of Israel, as he was able to people. Otherwise also it is not improbable, that the Babylonian finding himselfe vnable to deale with Psammiticus in Syria (as wanting power to raise the siege of Azotus, though the Towne held out nine and twenty yeeres) did giue vnto Manasses, together with his libertie, as much in Israel as himselfe could not easily defend. This was a good way to breake the amitie that the Kings of Iuda had so long held with those of Egypt, by casting a bone betweene them, and withall by this benefit of enlarging their Territoris with addition of more than they could challenge, to redeeme the friendship of the Iewes, which had beene lost by injuries done, in seeking to bereaue them of their owne. When it is said, that Manasses did after his deliuerance from imprisonment, put Captaines of warre in all the strong Cities of Iuda; it may be that some such businesse is intimated, as the taking possession, and fortifying of places deliuered into his hands. For though it be manifest that he tooke much paines, in making Ierusalem it selfe more defensible; yet I should rather beleeeue, that hee, hauing already compounded with the Babylonian, did fortifie himselfe against the Egyptians, whose side he had forsaken, than that he trauelled in making such prouisions, only for his mindes sake. The earnestnesse of Iofias in the King of Babel his quarrell, doth argue, so that the composition which Manasses had made, with that King or his Ancestor, was vpon such friendly termes, as required not onely a faithfull obseruation, but a thankfull requitall. For no perswasions could suffice to make Iofias sit still, and hold himselfe quiet in good neutralitie, when Pharao Neco King of Egypt passed along by him, to warre vpon the Countries about the Riuer of Euphrates.

The last yeere of Iofias his reigne it was, when as Neco the sonne of Psammiticus, came with a powerfull Armie towards the border of Iudea, determining to passe that way, being the neereest toward Euphrates, eyther to strengthen the passages of that Riuer, about Carchemish, or Cercusium, for the defence of Syria (as long after this, Dioclesian is said by Ammianus Marcellinus to haue done,) or perhaps to inuade Syria it selfe. For it seemeth so that the trauaile of Psammiticus had not beene idly consumed about that one Towne of Azotus, but had put the Egyptians in possession of no small part of Syria, especially in those quarters, that had formerly belonged vnto the Adades Kings of Damasco.

Neither was the industrie of Neco lesse than his Fathers had beene, in pursuing the warre against Babel. In which war, two things may greatly haue auailed the Egyptians, and advanced their affaires and hopes: the extraordinarie valor of the mercenary Greeks, that were far better Souldiers than Egypt of it selfe could afford, and the danger wherein Assyria stood, by the force of the Medes, which vnder the command of more absolute Princes, began to feele it selfe better; and to shew what it could doe. These were great helpes, but of shorter endurance than was the warre; as in place more conuenient shall be noted. At the present it seemes, that either some preparation of the Chaldeans to reconquer, did enforce, or some disabilitye of theirs to make resistance, did inuite the King of Egypt, into the Countries bordering vpon Euphrates; whither Pharao Neco ascended with a mighty Armie.

These two great Monarchs, hauing their swords drawne, and contending for the Empire of that part of the World, Iofias aduised with himselfe to which of these hee might adhere, hauing his Territorie set in the mid-way betweene both; so as the one could not inuade the other; but that they must of necessitie tread vpon the very face and bodie of his Countrie; Now though it were so that Neco himselfe desired by his Embassadors, leaue leau to passe along by Iudaa, protesting that hee directed himselfe against the Assyrians onely, without all harmefull purpose against Iosias; yet all sufficed not, but the King of Israel would needs fight with him.

Many examples there were, which taught, what little good the friendship of Egypt could bring to those that had affiance therein: as that of Hosea the last King of Israel, who when he fell from the dependance of the Assyrian, and wholly trusted to Sabacus, or Sous King of Egypt, was vtterly disappointed of his hopes, and in conclusion lost both his life and estate, which the Assyrian so roored vp and tare in pieces, as it could neuer after be gathered together or replanted. The calamities also that fell vpon Iuda in the thirteenth and fourteenth yeeres of Ezekia, whilst that good King and his people relied vpon Sethon, and more lately, the imprisonment of Manasses, were documents of sufficient prooffe, to shew the ill assurance, that was in the help of the Egyptians, who (neere neighbors though they were) were alwaies vnready, when the necessities of their friends required their assistance. The remembrance hereof might bee the reason why Neco did not seeke, to haue the Iewes renew their ancient league with him, but onely craved that they would be contented to sit still, and behold the pastime betwene him and the Assyrians. This was an easie thing to grant, seeing that the countenance of such an Armie, as did, soone after this, out-face Nabulassar vpon his owne borders, left vnto the Iewes, a lawfull excuse of feare, had they forborne to giue it any checke vpon the way. Wherefore I beleue, that this religious and vertuous Prince Iosias, was not stirred vp onely by 20 politike respects, to stop the way of Neco; but thought himselfe bound in faith & honor, to doe his best in defence of the Babylonian Crowne; whereunto his Kingdome was obliged, either by couenant made at the enlargement of Manasses, or by the gift of such part as he held in the Kingdome of the ten Tribes. As for the Princes and people of Iuda, they had now a good occasion to shew, both vnto the Babylonians, of what importance their friendship was, and to the Egyptians what a valiant Nation they had abandoned, and thereby made their enemy.

Some thinke, that this action of Iosias, was contrarie to the aduice of Ieremie the Prophet; which I doe not finde in the Prophecie of Ieremie, nor can finde reason to beleue. Others hold opinion, that he forgot to aske the counsell of God: and this is very likelie; 30 seeing hee might beleue that an enterprize grounded vpon fidelitie and thankfulness due to the King of Babel, could not but be displeasing vnto the Lord. But the wickednes of the people (in whom the corruptions of former times had taken such roote, as all the care of Iosias in reforming the Land, could not plucke vp) was questionlesse farre from harkening how the matter would stand with Gods pleasure, and much farther from enquiring into his secret will, wherein it was determined, that their good King, whose life stood between them and their punishment, should now be taken from among them, and that in such sort, as his death should giue an enterance to the miseries ensuing. So Iosias leauing all the strength he could make, neere vnto Megiddo, in the halfe Tribe of Manasses, encountered Neco: and there hee receiued the stroke of death, which lingring 40 about him till hee came to Ierusalem, brought him to the Sepulchers of his Ancestors. His losse was greatly bewailed of all the people and Princes of Iuda, especially of Ieremie the Prophet: who inserted a sorrowfull remembrance thereof in his booke of Lamentations.

§. II.

Of Pharao Neco that fought with Iosias: Of Ichoahaz and Ichoiakim Kings of Israel.

 F these warres, and particularly of this victorie, Herodotus hath mention, among 50 the acts of Neco. He tels vs of this King, that he went about to make a channell, whereby Ships might passe, out of Nilus into the Red sea. It should haue reached about an hundred miles in length, and bene wide enough for two Gallies to rowe in front. But in the midst of the worke, an Oracle foretold that the Barbarians should haue the benefit of it, which caused Neco to desist when halfe was done. There were consumed in this toyle some businesse twelue hundred thousand Egyptians; a losse great enough to make the King forsake his enterprize, without troubling the Oracle for admonition. Howsoeuer it were, he was not a man to be idle; therefore hee built a Fleet, and and leaued a great Armie, wherewith he marched against the King of Babel. In this expedition he vsed the seruice, as well of his Nauie, as of his land forces; but no particular exploits of his therein, are found recorded, saue onely this victorie against Iosias, where Herodotus calls the place Magdolos, and the Iewes Syrians; which is a small error, seeing that Iudaa was a Prouince of Syria, and Magdolos or Magdala is taken to haue bene the same place (though diuersly named) in which this battell was fought. After this, Neco 10 rooke the Citie of Cadytis, which was perhaps Carchemish, by Euphrates, and made himselfe Lord, in a manner, of all Syria, as Iosephus witnesseth.

Particularly we finde, that the Phanicians, one of the most powerfull Nations in Syria, 20 were his Subiects, and that by his command they surrounded all Africa, setting saile from the gulf of Arabia, and so passing along all the Coast, whercon they both landed, as need required, and sowed corne for their sustenance; in that long voyage which lasted three yeeres. This was the first Navigation about Africa, wherein that great Cape, now called Of good hope, was discovered; which after was forgotten, vntill Vasco de Gama the Portugall found it out, following a contrarie course to that which the Phanicians held; for they, beginning in the East, ranne the way of the Sunne, South and then Westward, after which they returned home by the pillars & streights of Hercules (as the name was then) called now the streights of Gybraltar, hauing Africke still on the right hand: but the 30 Portugals, beginning their voyage not farre from the same streights, leaued Africke on the Larboord, and bend their course vnto the East. That report of the Phanicians, which Herodotus durst not beleue, how the Sun in this iourne was on their right hand, that is, on the North side of them, is a matter of necessarie truth, and the obseruation then made hereof, makes me the better to beleue, that such a Voyage was indeed performed.

But leauing these discourses of Neco his magnificence, let vs tell what he did, in matters more importing his Estate. The people of Iuda, while the Egyptians were busie at Carchemish, had made Ichoahaz their King, in the roome of his father Iosias. The Prophet Ieremie calls this new King Shallum, by the name of his younger brother; alluding per- 40 haps to the short Reigne of Shallum King of the tenne Tribes: for Shallum of Israel reigned but one moneth; Ichoahaz no more than three. He was not the eldest son of Iosias:

30 Wherefore it may seeme that he was set vp as the best affected vnto the King of Babel; the rest of his house being more inclined to the Egyptian, as appeares by the sequele. An Idolater he was, and thrived accordingly. For when as Neco had dispatched his businesse in the North parts of Syria, then did he take order for the affaires of Iudaa. This Countie was now so farre from making any resistance, that the King himselfe came from Riblah in the Land of Hamath, where the matter wen so ill on his side, that Neco did cast him into bonds, and carry him prisoner into Egypt, giuing away his Kingdome to Eliakim his elder brother, to whom of right it did belong. The Citie of Riblah, in after times called Antiochia, was a place vnhappie to the Kings and Princes of Iuda, as may bee obserued in diuers examples. Yet heere Ichoiakim, together with his new name, got his 40 Kingdome; an ill gaine, since hee could no better vse it. But how-euer Ichoiakim thrived by the bargain, Pharao sped well, making that Kingdome Tributarie, without any stroke stricken, which three moneths before was too stout to giue him peace, when hee desired it. Certaine it is, that in his march outward, Neco had a greater task lying vpon his hands, than would permit him to waste his forces vpon Iudaa: but now the reputation of his good successe at Megiddo, and Carchemish, together with the dissention of the Princes Iosias his sonnes (of whom the eldest is probably thought to haue stormed at the preferment of his yonger brother) gaue him power to doe, euen what should please himselfe. Yet he did forbear to make a conquest of the Land; perhaps vpon the same reason, which had made him so earnest, in seeking to hold peace with it. For the Iewes 50 had suffered much, in the Egyptians quarrell, and being left by these their friends, in time of need, vnto all extremities, were driuen of necessitie to forsake that partie, and to ioyne with the enemies; to whom if they shewed themselves faithfull, who could blame them? It was therefore enough to reclaime them; seeing they were such a people as would not vpon euery occasion shift side, but endure more, than Pharao, in the pride of his victories, thought that any henceforth should lay vpon them: so good a Patron did he meane to be vnto them. Neuerthelesse hee laid vpon them a Tribute, of an hundred Talents of siluer, and one Talent of gold; that so hee might both reape at the present, some fruit of his paines taken, and leaued vnto them some document in the future, of greater greater punishment than verball anger, due to them, if they should rebell. So he departed, carrying along with him into Egypt the vnfortunate King Iehoahaz, who died in his Captiuitie.

The reigne of Iehoahaz was included in the end of his Fathers last yeere; otherwise it would hardly be found, that Iehoiakim, his successour, did reigne tenne whole yeeres; whereas the Scriptures giue him eleuen, that are current and incomplete. If any man will rather cast the three moneths of this short reigne, into the first yeere of the brother, than into the fathers last; the same arguments that shall maintaine his opinion, will also proue the matter to be vnworthy of disputation; and so I leaue it.

Iehoiakim in impietie was like his brother, in faction hee was altogether Egyptian, as he hauing receiued his Crowne at the hand of Pharao. The wickednesse of these last Kings, being expressed in Scriptures none otherwise, than by generall words, with reference to all the euill that their Fathers had done; makes it apparent, that the poyson wherewith Ahas and Manasses had infected the Land, was not so expelled by the zealous goodnesse of Iosias, but that it still cleaued vnto the chiefe of the people, Tea vnto the Priests also; and therefore it was not strange, that the Kings had their part therein. The Royall authoritie was much abased by the dangers wherein the Countrie stood, in this trouble some age: the Princes did in a manner what they listed; neither would the Kings forbear to professe, that they could denie them nothing. Yet the beginning of Iehoiakim had the countenance of the Egyptian to grace it, which made him insolent and cruel, as wee finde by that example of his dealing with Vria the Prophet: though heerein also the Princes doe appeare to haue bene instigators. This Holy man denounced Gods iudgements against the Citie and Temple, in like sort as other Prophets had formerlie done, and did in the same age. The King with all the men of power, and all the Princes, hearing of this, determined to put him to death. Heereupon the poore man fled into Egypt: but such regard was had vnto Iehoiakim, that Vria was deliuered vnto his Embassadour, and sent backe to the death; contrarie to the custome vsed, both in those dayes, and since among all ciuill Nations, of giuing refuge vnto strangers, that are not held guiltie of such inhumane crimes, as for the generall good of mankind should be exempted from all priuiledge.

It concerned Pharao to giue all contentment possible to Iehoiakim: for the Affryan Lyon, that had not stirred in many yeeres, began about these times, to roare so lowd vpon the banks of Euphrates, that his voyce was heard vnto Nilus, threatening to make himselfe Lord of all the Forrest. The causes that hitherto had withdrawne the house of Merodach, from opposing the Affryan in his conquest of Syria, require our consideration in this place; before wee proceed to commit them together at Charchemish, where shortly after this, the glory of Egypt is to fall.

§. III.

Of the Kings of Babylon and Media. How it came to passe that the Kings of Babel could not giue attendance on their businesse in Syria; which caused them to lose that Province.

Merodach the sonne of Baladan, who taking the aduantage that Sennacherib misadventure and death, together with the disension betweene his children presented, made himselfe King of Babylon, was eleuen yeeres troubled with a powerfull Enemie Asarhaddon the sonne of Sennacherib, reigning ouer the Affryans in Ninive, from whom whilst hee could not any other way diuert his cares, hee was faine to omit all businesse in Syria, and (as hath bene formerly shewed) to make ouer vnto Ezekia, some part of the Kingdome of the tenne Tribes. From this molestation, the death of Asarhaddon did not onely set him free, but gaue vnto him some part of Affrya, if not (as is commonly, but lesse probably thought) the whole Kingdome. How greatly this was to the liking of the Affryans, I will not heere stand to enquire: his long reigne following, and his little intermeddling in matters of Syria, make it plaine, that he had work enough at home, either in defending or in establishing that which hee had gotten. Iosephus giues him the honour of hauing wonne Ninive it selfe; which wee may beleue; but surely hee did not hold it long. For in the times soone following, that great Citie was free, and vanquished Phraortes the Median. Perhaps it yeelded vpon some capitulation: and and refused afterwards to continue subiect, when the Kings being of the Chaldean race, preferred Babylon before it.

Some thinke that this was the Affryan King, whose Captaines tooke Manasses prisoner, but I rather beleue those that hold the contrarie; for which I haue giuen my reasons in due place. To say truth, I finde little cause why Merodach should haue looked into those parts, as long as the Iewes were his friends, and the Egyptians, that maligned the Northerne Empire, held themselves quiet at home, which was vntill the time of Psammiticus, about the end of this Kings Reigne, or the beginning of his sonne.

Ben Merodach the son and successour of this King, is not mentioned in the Scriptures; yet is he named by good consent of Authors, and that speake little of his doings. The length of his Reigne is gathered by inference to haue bene one and twentie yeeres, for so much remaineth of the time that passed betwene the beginning of his Fathers and his Nephewes Reignes (which is a knowne summe) deducting the yeeres of his Father, and of his sonne Nabulassar. This (as I take it) was he that had Manasses Prisoner and released him. Hee spedde ill in Syria; where Psammiticus, by the vertue of his Mercenarie Greeks, did much preuaile. This may haue bene some cause that he released Manasses; and did put into his hands some part more of the Kingdome of Samaria: which is made probable by circumstances alleaged before.

Nabulassar that reigned in Babylon after his Father Ben Merodach, had greater businesse in his owne Kingdome, than would permit him to looke abroad: inso much as it may be thought to haue bene a great negligence or ouer-sight of Psammiticus and Neco, that they did not occupie some good part of his Dominions beyond Euphrates. For it was in his time, that Phraortes King of the Medes inuaded Affrya, and besieged Ninive; from whence he was not repelled by any force of Nabulassar, but constrained to remooue by the coming of Scythians, who in these ages did ouer-flow those parts of the World, laying hold vpon all, that they could master by strong hand. Of these Scythians, and the Lordship that they held in Asia, it is conuenient that I speake in this place, shewing brieflie afore-hand, how the Medes, vpon whom they first fell, were buied in the same times with hopes of conquering Affrya.

Phraortes, the sonne of Deioces, King of the Medes, hauing by many victories enlarged his Dominions, conceiued at length a faire possibilitie of making himselfe Lord of Ninive.

That Citie (as Herodotus reports it) hauing beene a Soueraigne Ladie, was not forsaken of all her dependants; yet remained in such case, that of her selfe she was well enough.

This makes it plaine, that howsoeuer Merodach had gotten possession of this imperiall seat, and made it subiect as was the rest of the Countrie; yet it found the meanes to set it selfe at libertie: as after this againe he did, when it had bene regained by Nabulassar, his Grand-child.

Sharpe warre, and the very noueltie of suddaine violence, vsed to dismay any State or Countrie, not inured to the like: but custome of danger hardeneth euen those that are vnwarlike. Ninive had bene the Palace of many valiant Kings lately reigning therein; it had suffered, and resisted, all the furie, wherewith either Domestickall tumults betweene the sonnes of Sennacherib, or forreign warre of the Babylonians, could afflicke it: and therefore it is the lesse wonderfull, that Phraortes did speed so ill in his journey against it. Hee and the most of his Armie perished in that expedition: whereof I finde no particular circumstances (perhaps he vnderualued their forces, and brought a lesse power than was needfull.) It is enough, that herein we may beleue Herodotus.

Cyaxares the sonne of Phraortes, a brauer man of warre than his Father, wan as much of Asia the lesse, as lay Eastward, from the River of Halys; he sought reuenge vpon the Affryans for the death of his Father, and besieged Ninive it selfe, hauing a purpose to destroy it. I rather beleue Eusebius, That hee tooke the Citie, and fulfilled his displeasure vpon it, than Herodotus, That the Scythian Armie came vpon him whilst hee lay before it. For where equall authorities are contradictorie (as Eusebius, though far later then Herodotus, yet hauing seen other Authors that are now lost, it is to be valued according to his great reading) there doe I hold it best, to yeeld vnto the best likelihoods.

To thinke that the Scythians came vpon Cyaxares, whilst he lay before Ninive, were to accuse him of greater improvidence, than ought to bee suspected in one commended as a good Souldier. But to suppose that he was faine to leaue the Towne, when a Warre so so dangerous fell vpon his owne Countrie, doth well agree both with the condition of such businesse as that Scythian expedition brought into those parts, and with the State of the Chaldaean and Assyrian affaires ensuing.

The destruction of this great Citie is both foretold in the Booke of Tobit, and there set downe as happening about these times; of which Booke whosoever was the Author, he was ancient enough to know the Story of those ages, and hath committed no such error in reckoning of times, as should cause vs to distrust him in this. As for the Prophecie of Nahum, though it be not limited vnto any certaine tearme, yet it appears to haue taken effect, in the finall destruction of Ninive by Nabuchodonosor, according to the common opinion. For the Prophet hath mention of a Conquest of Egypt, foregoing to this calamitie, whereof we will speake in due place. Some that ascribe more authoritie then the reformed Churches yeeld, to the Booke of Tobit, are carefull, as in a matter of necessitie, to affirme, that about these times, Ninive was taken; but they attribute (coniecturally) the victorie ouer it, to Ben Merodach: a needlesse coniecture, if the place of Eusebius be well considered. Yet I hold it probable, that Nabulassar the son of Ben Merodach, did seize vpon it, and place a King or Viceroy therein, about such time as the Countrie of Assyria was abandoned by Cyaxares, when the Scythian Warre ouerwhelmed Media. For then was the Conquest wrought out readie to his hand; the swelling spirits of the Ninivites were allayed, and their malice to Babylon so much asswaged, that it might be thought a great fauour, if Nabulassar, appointing vnto them a peculiar King, tooke him and them into protection: though afterwards to their confusion, this vnthankfull people and their King, rebelled againe, as shall be shewed in the Reigne of Nabuchodonosor.

§. IIII.

The great expedition of the Scythians, who ruled in Asia eight and twentie yeeres.

†. I.

The time of this expedition.

NOW that I haue shewed what impediment was given by the Assyrians and the Medes, to the Babylonians, who thereby were much disabled to performe any action of worth vpon the Aegyptians in Syria; it is time that I speake of that great Scythian expedition, which grieuouly afflicted not onely the Babylonians, but the Medes and Lydians, with the Countries adiacent, in such wise, that part of the trouble redounded euen to the Aegyptians themselves. Of the Scythian people in generall, Herodotus makes very large discourse, but interlaced, as of matter ill knowne, with many Fables; of this expedition he tels many particulars, but ill agreeing, with consent of time. Concerning his fabulous reports, it will be needlesse to recite them, for they are farre enough distant from the businesse in hand. The computation of times which by inference out of his relations, may seeme very strange, needeth some answer in this place: lest otherwise I should eyther seeme to make my selfe too bold with an Authour, inciting him after a manner different from his owne tale; or else to be too forgetfull of my selfe, in bringing to act vpon the Stage, those persons, which I had already buried. Eight and twentie yeeres, he saith, that the Scythians reigned in Asia, before Cyaxares deliuered the Countrie from them. Yet hee reports a warre betwene Cyaxares and Halyattes the Lydian, as foregoing the siege of Ninive; the siege of Ninive being ere the Scythians came. And further he tels, how the Scythians, hauing vanquished the Medes, did passe into Syria, and were encountred in Palestina by Psammiticus King of Egypt, who by gifts and entreatie procured them to depart from him. These narrations of Herodotus may, every one of them, be true; though not in such order of time, as hee hath marshalled them. For Psammiticus was dead before Cyaxares began to reigne: and Cyaxares had spent halfe of his fortie yeeres, ere Halyattes was King of Lydia; so that hee could not, after those Lydian Warres, reigne eight and twenty yeeres together with the Scythians. It is true, that Eusebius doth also call Psammis the sonne of Phraao Neco, by the name of Psammiticus; and this King Psammis may, by some strained coniecture, be thought to haue beene he that met with the Scythians: for hee liued with with both Cyaxares and Halyattes. But Eusebius himselfe referres all that businesse of the Scythian irruption into Palestina, to Psammiticus the Father of Necho, whom hee leaues dead before the Reigne of Halyattes. Therefore I dare not relye vpon Herodotus, in this matter, otherwise than to belecue him, that such things were in these ages, though not in such order as he sets them downe.

It remaines, that I collect as well as I can, those memorials which I finde of this expedition scattered in diuers places: a worke necessarie, for that the greatnesse of this action was such, as ought not to be omitted in a generall Historie; yet not easie, the consent of those that haue written thereof, being nothing neere to vniformitie.

I haue noted before, that in the Reigne of Ardus King of Lydia, the Cimmerians ouerran that Kingdome, and were not expelled, vntill Halyattes the Nephew of Ardus got the vpper hand of them. In these times therefore of Ardus, Sadiattes, and Halyattes, are wroth the eight and twentie yeeres, wherein the Scythians reigned ouer Asia. Now forasmuch as Psammiticus the Aegyptian had some dealings with the Scythians, euen in the height of their prosperitie, wee must needs allow more than one or two of his last yeeres vnto this their Dominion. But the beginning of Halyattes his Reigne in Lydia, being three and twentie yeeres compleat after the death of Psammiticus, leaues the space very scant, eyther for the great victories of the Scythians, necessarily supposed before they could meete the Aegyptian in Syria, or for those many losses, which they must haue receiued ere they could be driuen quite away. To increase this difficultie, the victorious Reigne of Nabuchodonosor in Babylon, is of no small moment. For how may we thinke it possible, that hee should haue aduentured the strength of his Kingdome against the Aegyptians and Jewes, had he stood in daily feare of losing his owne; to a more mighty Nation, that lay vpon his necke? To speake simply as it appeares to me; the victories ascribed to Cyaxares and Halyattes ouer these warlike people, were not obtained against the whole body of their Armie, but were the defeatures of some troopes, that infested their seuerall Kingdomes; other Princes, and among these, Nabulassar hauing the like successe, when the pleasures of Asia had mollified the courages of these hardie Northern Laddes. Wherefore we may probably annexe the eight and twentie yeeres of the Scythians rule, to as many almost the last of Nabulassars Reigne, in compasse whereof their power was at the greatest. This is all that I can say of the time, wherein Asia suffere the violence of their oppressors.

†. II.

What Nations they were that brake into Asia; with the cause of their Iournie.

Touching the expedition it selfe, Herodotus tells vs, that the Cimmerians being driuen out of their Countrie by the Scythians, inuaded and wasted some part of Asia; and that the Scythians not contented with hauing wonne the land of the Cimmerians, did follow them, I know not why, into farre remoued quarters of the world, so (as it were by chance) falling vpon Media and Egypt, in this pursuit of men that were gone another way into Lydia. Heereby wee may gather that the Cimmerians were an odious and base people; the Scythians, as mischieuous and foolish; or else Herodotus, and some other of his Countymen, great slanderers of those, by whom their Nation had bene beaten, and Tonia, more than once, grieuouly ransackt. The great valour of the Cimmerians or Cimbrians is so well knowne, and their many Conquests so well testified in Histories of diuers Nations, that the malice of the Greekes is insufficient to staine them with the note of Cowards. These were the posteritie of Gomer, who peopled the greatest part of our Western World; and whose re-flow did ouerwhelm no small portion of Greece and Asia, as well before and after, as in the age whereof we doe now entreat. Hee that would more largely informe himselfe of their originall and actions, may peruse Goropius Becanus his Amazonica; of many things in which Booke, that may be verified, which the learned Ortelius is said to haue spoken, of all Goropius his workes, that it is easie to laugh at them, but hard to confute them: There wee finde it prouoed, by such arguments and authorities, as are not lightly to be regarded, that the Cimmerians, Scythians and Sarmatians, were all of one Linage and Nation; howsoeuer distinguished in name, by reason of their diuers Tribes, professions, or perhaps dialect of speech. Homer indeed hath mention of the Cimmerians; whose Countrie whether he placeth in the West, as neere vnto the Ocean and bounds of the Earth, or in the North, as being farre from the Sunne, and covered with eternall darknesse; certaine it is that he would haue them neere neighbours to Hell: for he had the same quarrell to them, which Herodotus had, and therefore belike would haue made them seeme a kinde of Goblins. It was the manner of this great Poet (as Herodotus writing his life affirms) to insert into his workes the names of such as liued in his owne time, making such mention of them, as the good or ill done by them to himselfe deferred. And for this reason it is proued by Eustathius, that the Cimmerians were so disgraced by him, because they had wasted his Countrey. Perhaps that inuasion of Phrygia by the Amazons, whereof Homer puts a remembrance into Priamus his discourse with Helen, was the very same, which Eusebius noteth to haue happened somewhat before the age of Homer, at what time the Cimmerians with the Amazons, together inuaded Asia.

This is certaine, that both the Amazons and the Cimmerij (who in after-times were called Cimbri) did often breake into Greece and Asia; which though it bee not in expresse rearmes written, that they did with ioynt-forces, yet seeing they inuaded the selfe-same places, it may well be gathered, that they were companions. One iourney of the Amazons into Greece, mentioned also by Eusebius, was by the streights of the Cimmerians, as we finde in Diodore, who further telleth vs, that the Scythians therein gaue them assistance. The same Authour, before his entrie into those discourses of the Amazons, which himselfe acknowledgeth to be fabulous, doth report them to haue bene wiues of the Scythians, and no lesse Warre-like than their Husbands; alleading the example of that Queene who is said to haue slaine the great Perfian Cyrus. That it was the manner of the Cimbri to carry their wiues along with them to the Warres; and how desperate the courage was of those Women; the terrible descent of them into Italie, when Marius the Roman ouerthrew them, giues prooffe sufficient. I will not heere enter into a discourse of the Amazons; another place will giue mee better leasure to speake of them: but seeing that they are noted by diuers Historians to haue belonged vnto the Cimmerians, to the Scythians, and to the Sarmatians, we may therefore the better approve Geopropius his conclusion, That these three Nations were one, at least that they were neere allies.

Now as concerning the expulsion of the Cimmerians by the Scythians, it appears to haue bene none other than the sending a Colonie of them forth into Asia, with an Armie of Scythians to helpe them, in purchasing a new seate, and establishing the plantation.

The Sarmatians also were companions in this iourneie. For the Citie of Novograd in Russia (which Countrey is the same that was called Sarmatia) stood in their way homewards, as shall anon be further shewed. So that all the North was vp in Armes: and therefore it is no maruell though many Countreies felt the weight of this great inundation. Such another voyage was that, which the same people made five hundred yeres and more after this, when they were encountered by the Romans. For they issued from the parts about the Lake Maotis; they were then likewise assisted (saith Plutarch in the most likely report of them) by the Scythians their neighbours; they had in their Armie about three hundred thousand fighting men, besides a huge multitude of women and children; they wandered ouer many Countreies, beating all downe before them; and finally, thinking to haue settled themselues in Italie, they diuided their Companie, for the more easie passage thither, and were consumed in three terrible batailles by the Roman Consuls. Meere necessitie enforced these poore Nations, to trouble the World, in following such hard aduentures. For their Countrey, being more fruitfull of men than of sustenance, and shut vp on the North side with intollerable cold, which denied issue that way to their ouer-swelling multitudes; they were compelled to discharge vp-on the South, and by right or wrong to drie others out of possession, as hauing tide to all that they had power to get, because they wanted all, that weaker, but more ciuill, people had. Their sturdie bodies, patient of hunger, cold, and all hardnesse, gaue them great aduantage ouer such as were accustomed vnto a more delicate life, and could not bee without a thousand superfluities. Wherefore most commonly they preuailed verie farre; their next neighbours giuing them free passage, that they might the sooner be ridde of them; others giuing them, besides passage, victuals and guides to conduct them to more wealthie places; others hiring them to depart with great presents; so as the the farther they went on, the more pleasant Lands they found, and the more effeminate people.

†. III.

Of the Cimmerians warre in Lydia.

The first Companie of these, consisting for the most part of Cimmerians, held the way of the Euxine Seas, which they had still on the right hand; leauing on the other side, and behinde them, the great Mountaines of Caucasus. These hauing passed through the Land of Cholchis, that is now called Mengrelli, entered the Countrey of Pontus; and being arrived in Paphlagonia, fortified the Promontorie whereon Sinope, a famous Ha-Herod. lib. 4. uen Towne of the Greekes, was after built. Here it seemes that they bestowed the weakest and most vnfructueable of their traine, together with the heauiest part of their carriages, vnder some good gard: as drawing neere to those Regions, in conquest wherof they were to trie the utmost hazard. For in like sort afterwards did the Cimbri (of whom I speake now) dispose of their impediments, leauing them in a place of strength, where Antwerpe now stands, when they drew neere vnto Gaule, vpon which they determined to aduenture themselues in the purchase. From Synope, the way vnto Phrygia, Lydia, and Ionia, was faire and open to the Cimmerians, without any ledge of Mountaines, or any deepe Riuers at all to stay their march: for Iris and Haly they had already passed.

What battells were fought between these inuaders and the Lydians, and with what variable successe the one or other part wanne and lost, I finde not written, nor am able to coniecture. This I finde, that in the time of Ardys, the Cimmerians got possession of Sardes the capitall Citie of Lydia; only the Castle holding out against them. Further I obserue, that whereas Herodotus tells of the acts performed by Gyges and Ardys Kings of Lydia, before this inuasion, and by Halyattes and Crasus in the times following; all that Ardys did against the Cimmerians, and all, saue burning the Milesians Cornie fields, that was done in twelue yeres by Sadiattes his Son (who perhaps had his hands so full of this businesse, that hee could turne them to nothing else) is quite omitted: whereby it may seeme, that neither of the two did any thing worthie of remembrance in those wars, but were glad enough that they did lose all.

Certainly the miseries of warre are neuer so bitter and many, as when a whole Nation, or great part of it, forsaking their owne seates, labour to root out the established possessions of another Land, making roome for themselues, their wiues and children. They that fight for the masterie, are pacified with tribute, or with some other seruices and acknowledgements, which had they bene yeelded at the first, all had bene quiet, and no sword bloodied. But in these migrations, the assailants bring so little with them, that they need all which the defendants haue, their Lands and Cattell, their houses and their goods, euen to the cradles of the sucking infants. The mercilesse tearmes of this controuersie arme both sides with desperate resolution: seeing the one part must either winne, or perish by famine; the other defend their goods, or lose their liues without redemption. Most of the Countreies in Europe haue felt examples thereof; and the mightie Empire of Rome was ouerthrowne by such inuasions. But our Isle of Britaine can best witness the diuersitie of Conquests; hauing by the happy victorie of the Romans, gotten the knowledge of all Ciuill Arts, in exchange of libertie, that was but slenderly instructed therein before; whereas the issue of the Saxon and Danish Warres, was, as were the causes, quite contrarie. For these did not seeke after the Dominion onely, but the entire possession of the Countrey, which the Saxons obtained, but with so horrible crueltie, cradicating all of the British Race, and defacing all memoriall of the ancient inhabitants through the greater part of the Land. But the Danes (who are also of the Cimmerian blood) found such end of their enterprize, as it may seeme that the Cimmerians in Lydia, and Scythians in the higher Asia, did arrive vnto. So that by considering the proceesse of the one, we shall the better conceiue the fortune of the other. Many battailes the Danes wonne, yet none of such importance, as sufficed to make them absolute Conquerours: Many the Saxons wonne vpon the Danes, yet not so great, as could drie them quite away, and backe from hence, after they had gotten firme footing. But in course of time, the long continuance euen of vtter enmitie, had bred such acquaintance betweene them, as bowing the natures of both these people, made the one more pliant vnto the other. So their disagreeable qualities, both ill and good, being reduced into one milde temper, no small number of the Danes became peaceable cohabitants with the Saxons, in England, where great slaughter had made large roome; others returning home, found their owne Country wide enough to receiue them, as hauing disburthened it selfe of many thousands, that were sent to seeke their graues abroad. And such (as I thinke) was the end of the Cimmerian warre in Lydia; whereunto though some victorie of Halyattes may haue hastened the conclusion, yet the wearisome length of time seemes to haue done most, in compelling them to desire of rest. I know not why I should feare to adde heereunto my further coniecture; which is, that the matter was so compounded to betweene the Cimmerians and Halyattes, that the Riuer of Haly should diuide their Territories. For Haly was henceforth the border of the Lydians, and on the Eastern side of the Riuer was the Countrey of the Amazons, that is indeed, of the Cimmerians and other Scythian people; whose wiues and daughters these warlike women are supposed to haue bene.

And hereunto the quarrell ensuing, betweene Halyattes and Cyaxares the Mede, hath very good reference. For Halyattes (as is said) fought in defence of certaine Scythians, vpon whom the Median sought reuenge. And it stands with reason, that the Lydians and Cimmerians, being much weakened with mutuall slaughters, should haue ioynd in a league of mutuall defence for their common safetie: though otherwise it had bene dangerous to Halyattes, if hee had permitted the Median to extend his Kingdome so farre Westward, whatsoeuer the pretences might be, of taking reuenge vpon such as had spoiled each of their Countries. As for that occasion of the Warre betweene these two Kings, which Herodotus relates, I finde it of little waight, and lesse probability. Hee tells of Scythians, that being chased out of their Countrey by faction, came vnto Cyaxares; who committed vnto them certayne Boyes, to bee instructed in the Scythian tongue, and feate of Archerie. Now it so fell out (saith he) that these Scythians vnto much to hunt, and commonly bringing home somewhat with them, did neuerthelesse other-whiles misse of their game, and come home as they went. Hereupon the King being froward and cholericke, bitterly reuiled them; and they, as impatient as hee, killed one of the Boyes that was vnder their charge, whom dressing like Venison, they presented vnto him; which done, they fledde vnto Halyattes. This Herodotus deliues, as the ground of a Warre that lasted fixe yeeres betweene the Medes and Lydians; the one King demanding these Fugitiues to be deliuered into his hand, the other refusing to betray such men as were become his suppliants. To this I will say no more, than that I see no cause that might induce the Scythians, to betake themselves to either of these Kings, vnto whom their Nation had wrought so much displeasure. Particullie they had reason to distrust Cyaxares, for the treacherie that he shewed in the massacring of their Countrey men, that were in his Kingdome; of whom it is now meet that wee should speake.

†. IIII.

The warre of the Scythians in the higher Asia.

As the Cimmerians held their course Westerly, along the shores of the Euxine Sea: so the Scythians and Sarmatians tooke the other way, and hauing the Caspian Sea on their left hand, passed betweene it and Caucasus through Albania, Colchene, and other obscure Nations, where now are the Countries of Seruan and Georgia, and so they entered into Media. The Medes encountered them in Armes; but were beaten, and thereupon glad to come to any agreement with them. This was in the time of Phraortes, whilst Psammiticus reigned in Egypt. If it were in the sixth yeere of Nabulassars Reigne ouer Babylon (supposing him to haue reigned fixe and thirtie; otherwise we must allow to Ben Merodach what we take from him) then doe the eight and twenty yeeres of their Dominion end, one yere before the great Nabuchodonosor was King; so giuing him good leaue to provide securely, for the inuasion of Syria, which expedition hee began while his Father yet liued, as Iosephus out of Berosus relates the Historie.

Now the Medes, desirous to saue themselves as well as they might, from this terrible Nation, which when they had no lust to a second triall of the sword, refused not to vnder-goethe burthen of a Tribute, but thought nothing dishonourable, that would serue to remove these troublesome guests into some other lodging. On the other part, the Scythians finding still the Countries pleasanter and better, the further that they marched into the South, did suffer themselves to be perswaded, that a little more trauaile, would adde a great deale more to their content. For they relied so much vpon their owne valour, that they feared no resistance; and being the brauest men, they thought it reason that they should dwell in the best Region. That Phraortes perswaded them into Egypt, I doe not thinke: Babylon was neere enough; whither if he could send these Locusts to graze, then should not his vaffriendly Neighbours haue cause to laugh at his misfortune. What shift Nabulassar made with them, or that at all he had any dealings with them, I doe not reade. But it is well known, that his Dominions lay in the middest betweene Media and Egypt, as also, that they made all those parts of Asia Tributarie; wherefore we may very well beleue, that they watered their horses in his Riuers, and that he also was content to giue them pender.

Psammiticus hearing of their progresse (like the ialous Husband of a faire Wife) tooke care that they might not looke vpon Egypt; lest the sight thereof should more easily detain them there, than any force or perswasion, that he could vse, would send them going. Therefore he met them in Syria, presuming more on the great gifts which he meant to bestow vpon them, than on his Armie that should keepe them backe. Egypt was rich; and halfe the riches had not bene ill spent in sauing all. Yet Psammiticus tooke the most likely course, whereby to make his part good against them by strong hand, in case they had bene so obstinate as to refuse all indifferent composition. For he lay close vpon the edge of the Wildernesse in Gaza (as I take it) the Southermost border of Palestina; whence he neuer aduanced to meete with the Scythians; but gaue them leaue to feede as much of the scalding Sunne-beames, ill agreeing with their temper, as all the length of Syria could beat vpon them. When they were come as farre as Ascalon, the next Citie to Gaza, then did he assay them with goodly words, accompanied with gifts, which were likely to worke so much the better, by how much the worse they were pleased with the heate of a Climate so farre different from their owne. Psammiticus had at his backe a vast wildernesse, ouer the scorching sands whereof, the Scythians more patient of cold and wet, than of the contrary distempers, could ill haue endured to pursue him, through vnknowne wayes, had they fought with him and preuailed: especially the Kingdome of Egypt being ready to entertaine him with reliefe, and them with new trouble at the end of their wearie iourney. Wherefore they were content to be intreated, and taking in good part his courteous offers, returned back to visite their acquaintance in the high Countries. The Egyptian King (besides that he preferred his owne Estate from a dangerous aduerture, by hyring this great Armie to depart from him) found all his Cost well repayed in the processe of his warres in Syria, where the Nations beyond Euphrates had no power to molest him, being more than euer troubled themselves with the returne of their oppressors. For the Scythians, resolving now to seeke no further, began to demand more than the Tribute formerly imposed. And not contented to fleece the Naturals with grieuous exactions, they presumed to liue at discretion vpon the Countrey, taking what they listed from the Owners; and many times (as it were to saue the labour of taking off) taking all at once. This Tyrannous Dominion they long vsed ouer the higher Asia, that is, ouer the Countrey lying betweene the Caspian and Red Seas; and betweene India and Asia the lesse. Happy it was for the poore people, that in so large a space of ground, there was roome enough for these new comers; otherwise the calamitie that fell, as it were by chance, vpon those priuate men, to whose wealth any Scythian did beare a fancie, would haue lighted in generall vpon all at one clap, leauing few aliue, and none able to relieue their fellowes. Yet it seemes that the heauiest burthen lay vpon Media; for it was a fruitfull, Countrey not farre from their owne home, and lay vnder a Climate well agreeing with the constitution of their bodies; there also it was that they had the fatall blow, by which their insolent Rule was taken from them.

Cyaxares King of the Medes, who in this extremity was no better then a Rent-gatherer for the Scythians, perceiuing that his Land lay vnmanured and waste, through the negligence of his people, that were out of heart by daily oppressions, and that the matter could not be remedied by open force, resolved to proue what might be done by stratagem.

stratagem. The managing of the businesse is thus delinered in brieft; That he, and his Medes, feasted the better part of the Scythians, made them drunke, and slew them; recovering hereby the possession of all that they had lost.

Such another slaughter was committed vpon the Danes in England; but it was reuenged by their Countymen, with greater cruelty than euer they had practised before. That the Scythians, which escaped this bloody feast, made any stirre in Media, I doe not finde; neither doe I reade that either in reuenge hercof, or vpon other pretence, the Medes were troubled by inuasion from Scythia in time following.

This is the more strange, for that the Armie returning home out of Media, was very strong, and encountred with opposition (as Herodotus reports it) no lesse than it had found abroad. Wherefore it may be, that the deuice of Cyaxares to free his Countrey, tooke good effect, with lesse blood-shed than hath beene supposed. For if he surpris'd all the chiefe of them, it was no hard matter to make a good composition. Many of them doubtlesse in eight and twenty yeeres had so well sciled themselves, that they were desirous of rest; and might be permitted, without any danger, to remaine in the Countrey; many (of whom I shall speake anon) hauing done what they could in the businesse, for which they came forth, were willing to returne home, with what they had gotten; such as were not pleased with either of these two courses, might goe ioyne with the Cimmerians in Lydia, or seeketh their fortunes in other Prouinces, among their owne Companions. Whereas all the Families of the North are said to haue bene with Nabuchadnezzar, it may so be vnderstood, that a great part of the Scythians, vpon hope of gaine, or desire to keepe what they had already gained, were content to become subiect vnto Nabuchadnezzar: mens loue of their wealth being most effectuell, in taming the more vaquett lone of inordinate liberty. This is certaine, that Nabuchadnezzar, as euer after, so in his first beginning of warre, did beate the Egyptians, who in ages foregoing had bene accustomed to deale with the Babylonians after another fashion: and this new successe of that King may be imputed, in regard of humane meanes, to such addition as this of new forces.

Of the Scythian Armie returning out of Media, diuers Authors report a Storie, which confirms me in the opinion, that this Companie went forth to assist their kindred and friends, in acquiring a new seate, and establishing their plantation. For these had left their wiues behinde them; a good argument to proue that they meant to come againe. The Scythian women, to comfort themselves in their husbands absence, became bed-fellows to their slaues. These got a lusty brood of youths, that were loath to be troubled with Fathers in Law, and therefore prepared to fight with them at their returne. If they were onely the children of slaues, which compounded an Armie (as Herodotus would haue it, who tels vs, that the Scythians were wont to pull out all their bond-mens eyes) it must needes be that they were very Boyes, or else that the Women did very little while continue chaste. Wherefore I rather beleue that tale as it is told by the Russes themselves, who agreeing in the rest with the consent of Histories, make that report of their Ancestors returning homewards, which I will set downe, as I finde it in Master Doctor Fletcher his exact discourse of the Russe Common-wealth. They vnderstood by the way, that their Chelopey, or Bond-slaues whom they left at home, had in their absence possessed their Townes, Lands, Houses, Wiues, and all. At which newes being somewhat amazed, and yet disdaining the Villanie of their seruants, they made the more speede home: and so not farre from Novograd met them in warlike manner marching against them. Whereupon aduising what was best to be done, they agreed also to set vpon them with no other shew of weapon but with their horse-whips (which as their manner is, euery man rideth withall) to put them in remembrance of their seruile condition, thereby to terrifie them, and abate their courage. And so marching on, and lashing all together with their whips in their hands, they gaue the onset: which seemed so terrible so in the eares of their Villaines, and strooke such a sense into them of the smart of the whip, which they had felt before, that they fled all together like Sheepe before the Driners. In memorie of this victorie, the Novogradians euer since haue stamped their Coine (which they call a Dingoe, Novogradskey, currant through all Russia) with the figure of a Horseman shaking a whip aloft in his hand. It may seeme, that all the women of that Countrey, haue feared the worse euer since, in regard of their vniuersall fault: for such a Padkey or whip, as terrified those slaues, curiously wrought by her selfe, is the first present that the Mosconian Wife, euen in time of wooing, sends to him that shall be her husband, in token of subiection; being well well assured to feele it often on her owne loines. But this was a Document vnto the Scythians; or rather Sarmatians (for Novograd stands in the Countrey that was called Sarmatia) to beware of absenting themselves any more so long from their Wiues; which after this, I finde not that they did.

Thus much I thought good to set downe of the Scythian expedition, not onely because it is the most memorable act performed abroad by that Nation, famous in Histories, and terrible to many Countreies; but for that it appears to haue bene a great cause, of the Egyptians preuailing hitherto in Syria, and about Iudea, which continues yet a while the cause of our discourse.

§ V.

Of Princes living in diuers Countreies, in these ages.

¶ Auing thus farre digressed from the matters of Iuda, to auoide all further occasion of doing the like, I will here insert a note of such Kings and men of marke, as were betweene the death of Manasses, and the ruine of Ierusalem. Of the Egyptians, Babylonians, Medes, and Lydians, I haue spoken as much as I thought needefull. In Rome, Tullius Hostilius held the Kingdome, vntill the one and twentieth yeere of Iosias; at which time Ancus Martius succeeding, reigned foure and twenty yeeres. After him L. Tarquinius Priscus, a new-come stranger, but very rich, preuailed so farre by his graciousnesse among the people, that he got the kingdome to himselfe, disappointing the sonnes of Ancus, ouer whom he was Tutor. He began in the fourth yeere of Zedekias, and reigned eight and thirtie yeeres. In this time it was, namely, in the second yeere of the thirtieth Olympiad, that the Lacedaemonians, berinking them how to beaueged of the Arcadians, who gaue succour to the Messenians against them in the former warre, entred their Territorie, tooke the Citie of Phigalia or Phialia, from whence their Garrisons were soone after beaten out. Cypselus expelling the race of the Bacidae, made himselfe Lord of Corinth about these times, and gouerned it in peace thirtie yeeres; leauing for successeur his sonne Perian der, one of the seauen Sages, but a cruell Tyrant: who among other vile acts, slew his owne wife, and afterwards, as in her honour, stripped all the Corinthian women starke naked, burning their apparell, as an acceptable offering to her Ghost. Hereby we may perceiue, that the wisdom of the Greekes was not excellent in those dayes; when such a one as this could be admired as excelling all the Countrey.

In these times also were Zaleucus and Draco, famous Lawgiuers, the one among the Locrans in Italie, the other in the Citie of Athens. The Lawes of Draco were so rigorous, that he was said to haue written them with blood: for he rewarded euery small offence with death. Wherefore his Constitutions were soone abrogated, and power giuent to Solon, by the Athenians, to make new in their stead. But the Lawes of Zaleucus were very milde. He forbade any Gentlewoman to walke abroad with more than one Bond-woman attending on her, unless it were when she was drunke; or to goe forth of the Towne by night, unless it were to some sweet-hearts bed; or to dresse her selfe vp in immodest brauery, unless it were to inuigle a loucr. By which pleasant Ordinances, he effected his desire: for none would seeme, in breaking the Statutes, to be in such case as challenged the dispensation. It is noted in this man as a singular example of iustice, that when his owne son had committed adultery, and was therefore to lose both his eyes, he did not cause him to be pardoned, but gaue one eye of his owne to saue the young man (who also lost one) from vter blindness.

I shall not henceforth neede, so farre to wander, as hitherto I often haue done, in pursuing of actions collateral to the Historie, for inserting them in their order of time. The Chaldeans will soone fall vnder the Persians; ere long, encounter with the Greekes; the Greekes, with the Romans; the Romans, with many Nations. Concerning all these, as they shall successively present themselves, in their flourishing Estate; it will be enough to recapitulate the most memorable accidents, that befall them in their Minoritie. But in the long space of more than thirteene hundred yeeres, which passed betwene the calling of Abraham, and the destruction of Ierusalem, wee finde little matter, wherein the History of Israel had any dealing with other Nations, than the very neere borders. Yet readewe of many Kingdomes, that in these many ages were erected, and and throwne downe; aslikewise, many memorable acts were performed in Greece and elswhere, though not following one another at any neere distance; all which must haue beene quite omitted, or else referred vnto a very vnseasonable rehearfall, had they not beene disposed in this method, whereof he that will not allow the conueniency, may pardon the necessity.

§. VI.

The appression of Iudaa, and destruction of Ierusalem by the Chaldeans.

NOW to returne to the Iewish Storie, from whence we haue so farre digressed. In the third yeere of Iehoiakim, Nabuchodonosor the second, his Father yet liuing, entered Iudaa with a great Armie, who besieging and forcing Ierusalem, made Iehoiakim his Vassall in despite of Necho, that had established him King, and rooke with him for pledges Daniel, being as yet a childe, with Ananias, Misael, and Azarias. Altho hee tooke a part of the Church treasures, but stayed not to search them thoroughly; for Necho hastned to the succour of Iehoiakim, hoping to finde Nabuchodonosor in Iudaa: where in this great Babylonian had no disposition to hazard himselfe and his Armie, it being a Countrie of an euill affection towards him, as also farre off from any succour or sure place of retreat. If he had, as may be supposed, any great strength of Scythian horse-men in his Armie; it was the more wisely done of him, to fall backe, out of the rough, mountainous, and ouer-hot Countrie, into places that were more euen and temperate. But besides all these reasons, the death of his father, happening at the same time, gaue him iust occasion to returne home, and take possession of his owne Kingdome; before he proceeded further in the second care, of adding more vnto it. This he did at reasonable good leisure: for the Egyptian was not ready to follow him so farre and to bid him battaile, vntill the new yeere came in; which was the fourth of Iehoiakim, the first of Nabuchodonosor, and the last of Necho. In this yeere the Babylonian lying vpon the Banke of Euphrates (his owne Territorie bounding it on the North-side) attended the arrivall of Necho. There, after a resolu'd contention for victory, Necho was slaine, and his Armie remaining forced to saue it selfe, which full ill it did, by a violent retreat. This victory Nabuchodonosor so well pursued, as he recovered all Syria, and whatsoever the Egyptians held out of their proper Territorie towards the North. The Egyptians being in this conflict beaten, and altogether for the present discouraged, Iehoiakim held himselfe quiet, as being friend in heart vnto the Egyptian, yet hauing made his peace with the Chaldean the yeere before; who contented with such profit as he could then readily make, had forborne to lay any Tribute vpon Iuda. But this coole referu'dnesse of Iehoiakim, was, on both sides, taken in ill part. The Egyptian King Psammitis, who succeeded vnto Necho, began to thinke vpon restoring Iehoiakim, taken Prisoner by his Father, and setting him vp, as a Domesticall Enemy, against his vngratefull brother. Against all such accidents, the Iudean had prepared the vsuall remedy, practised by his fore-fathers: for hee had made his owne sonne Iechonia King with him long before, in the second yeere of his owne Reigne, when the Boy was but Eight yeeres old. As for this rumour of Iehoiakim's returne; the Prophet Jeremie foretold, that it should prouide idle, saying: he shall not returne thither, but he shall dye in the place whither they haue led him captive, and shall see this Land no more. The Egyptians indeede, hauing spent all their Mercenarie forces, and receiued that heauie blow at Carchemish, had not remaining such proportion of sharpe Steele, as of faire gold, which without other helpe, is of little effect. The valour of Necho was not in Psammitis Apries who reining after Psammitis, did once aduenture to shew his face in Syria; but after a bigge looke, he was glad to retire, without aduerting the hazard of a battaile. Wherefore this decaying Nation fought onely with braue words, telling such friuolous tales, as men that meane to doe nothing, vse, of their glorious acts fore-past, against Iofias and Iehoiakim. In this case it was easie for Iehoiakim to giue them satisfaction, by letting them vnderstand the sincerity of his affection towards them, which appeared in time following. But Nabuchodonosor went to worke more roundly. He sent a peremptory message to Iehoiakim, willing him not to stand vpon any nice points, but acknowledge himselfe a Subiect, and pay him Tribute: adding herunto such fearefull threats, as made the poore Iudean lay aside all thought of Pharaoh, and yeeld to doe, as the more mighty would haue him. So hee continued in the

2 Chron. 36. 9.

Jer. 22. 11. 12.

Ezech. 11. 12. 13.

the obedience of Nabuchodonosor three yeeres. At this time Jeremie the Prophet cried out against the Iewes, putting them in minde that he had now three and twenty yeeres exhorted them to repentance, but because they had stopt their eares against him, and the rest of the Prophets, he now pronounced their captiuitie at hand, and that they should endure the yoke of bondage full seauenty yeeres. The same calamitie he threatened to all the neighbouring Nations, to the Egyptians, Moabites, Ammonites, Idumeans, and the rest; foretelling that they should all drinke out of the Babylonian Pitcher, the wine of his furie, whom they had forsaken and after the seauenty yeeres expired, that the Babylonians themselves should taste of the same cup, and be vterly subuerted by the Medes, and Per. 25. the Iudeans permitted to returne againe into their owne fields and Cities. The first imprisonment of the Prophet Jeremie seemes to haue beene in the fourth yeere of this Iehoiakim, at which time Baruch the Scribe wrote all his Prophecies out of his mouth, whom he sent to reade them vnto the people, and afterward to the Princes, who offered them to the King: but fearing the Kings furie, they had first set Jeremie at liberty, and aduised him and Baruch to hide themselves.

Iehoiakim, after he heard a part of it and perceiued the ill newes therein deliuered, made no more adoe, but did cut the Booke in peeces and cast it into the fire. All which Jeremie caused to be new written, with this addition; that the dead body of Iehoiakim, should be cast out, exposed in the day to the heat, and in the night to the frost, and there should be none of his seede to sit on the Throne of Dauid.

Time thus running on, while Iehoiakim rested secure of all danger, as Tributary to the Babylonian, yet well thought of by the Egyptian; the mightie Citie of Tyre opposed it selfe against the Chaldean forces; and vpon iust confidence of her owne strength, despised all preparation that could be made against her. Now forasmuch as the tearme of seauentie yeeres was prescribed vnto the desolation, as well of Tyre, as of Ierusalem, & other Townes and Countries; it is apparent, that they which refer the expugnation of this Citie vnto the nineteenth yeere of Nabuchodonosor, haue sure authority for their warrant. Whereupon likewise it followes of necessity, that the siege thereof began in the seauenth of his Reigne, as hauing lasted thirteene yeeres.

Here I will take leaue to intrude a brieffe note, concerning the seuerall beginnings that are reckoned of this great Prince his Rule, whereupon hath risen much disputation. The third yeere of Iehoiakim, was the last of Nabulassar, who being deliuered from other cares, tooke notice of such as had revolted from him vnto Pharaoh Necho, and sent this Noble Prince, his sonne, with an Armie into Syria, to reclaime them. In this expedition was Daniel carried away, who therefore makes mention of the same yeere. The yeere next following, being the fourth of Iehoiakim, was the first of Nebuchadnezzar; which Jeremie affirmeth in expresse words, and from this we reckon all his time and actions that follow. In his three and twentieth yeere he conquered Egypt; and then began to reigne as a great Monarch, finding none that durst offend him. The second from this yeere it was, wherein he saw that vision, of the Image consisting of sundry Metals; which did prefigure the succession of great Kingdomes, that should rule the Earth, before the coming of Christ. I will not stand to dispute about this, which is the best conclusion that I finde, of long disputations: but returne vnto the siege of Tyre, which began in the seauenth of his Reigne.

The Citie of Tyre couered all the ground of an Island, that was diuided from the maine, by a deepe and broad channell of the Sea. The Chaldeans had no Fleet, and were no Sea-men; the Tyrians, in multitude of goodly Ships, and skill to vse them, excelled all other Nations; and euery winde, from one part or other, brought needefull provisions into the Citie. Wherefore neither force, nor famine could greatly hurt the place; whereof neuertheless the iudgements of God (denounced against it by Esay, Jeremie, Ezechiel) had threatened the destruction; and the obstinate resolution of Nabuchodonosor, had fully determined to performe it. This high-minded King, impatient of resistance, vnderooke a vast peece of worke, euen to fill vp the Sea, that parted the Island from the Continent. The Citie of old Tyrrus, that stood opposite to the new, vpon the firme Land; and the mountaine of Libanus neere adioyning that was loaden with Cedars, and abundance of other trees, might furnish him with materials. Thirteene yeeres were spent in this laborious, and almost hopelesse business: Which needeth not seeme strange: for Alexander working vpon that foundation which was remainyng of Nabuchodonosor's Perte; and being being withall assisted by a strong Fleet, was yet seauen moneths ere he could make way into the Citie. Wherefore, if the raging of the Sea was able to carry away that where-with Alexander laboured to couer a shelue; with much more violence could it ouerturne; and as it were consume, the worke of Nabuchodonosor, who laid his foundations in the bottome of the deepe, straining as it were, to fill the empty belly of this Cormorant, whereas the Macedonian did onely stop the throat of it. Euery man knowes, God could haue furthered the accomplishment of his owne threats, against this place (though it had not pleased him to vse, either miracle, or such of his more immediate weapons, as are Earth-quakes, and the like) by making at least the Seas calme, and adding the fauourable concurrence of al second helpees. But so it pleaseth him oftentimes, in chastising the pride of man, to vse the hand of man, euen the hand of man struing, as may seeme, against all resistance of nature and fortune. So in this excessive labour of the Chaldeans, Euery head was made bald, and euery shoulder was made bare. Yet Nabuchodonosor would not giue ouer till he was master of the Towne.

Ioseph. Antig.
Iud. 1. 10. c. 7.

When he was entred vpon this desperate seruice; whether it were so, that some losse receiued, some murinie in his Armie, or (which is most likely; and so Iosephus reports) some glorious rumours of the Egyptians, gaue courage to his euill willers; Iehoiakim renounced his subiection, and began to hope for the contrary of that which quickly fell out. For Nabuchodonosor gaue him no leasure to doe much hurt: but with part of his Armie marched directly into Iudea, where the amazed King made so little resistance (the Egyptians hauing left him, as it were in a dreame) that he entred Ierusalem, and layed hands on Iehoiakim: whom he first bound and determined to send to Babylon, but changing counsell, he caused him to be slaine in the place, and gaue him the Sepulcher of an Asse, to be deuoured by beasts and rauinous birds, according to the former Prophecies: leauing in his place, Iehoiakim or Iechonias his sonne; whom after three moneths and ten dayes, Nabuchodonosor remoued, and sent prisoner to Babylon, with Ezekiel, Mar docheus, and Iosedech, the high Priest. The mother of Iechonias, together with his seruants, Eunuchs, and all the ablest men, and best Artificers of the Land, were also then carried away Captiues. This Iechonias, following the counsell of Ieremie the Prophet, made no resistance, but submitted himselfe to the Kings will: wherein he both pleased God, and so did that which was best for himselfe; though at the present it might seeme otherwise, to such as considered the euill that befell him, rather then the greater euill that he there by auoided. This onely particular act of his is recorded; which was good. But it seemes that he was partaker, at least, of his Fathers faults, if not an instigator: which was the cause, that his submitting himselfe to Gods pleasure did not preferue his Estate: for so we read in generall words, that he did euill in the sight of the Lord, according to all that his Father had done. In his stead Nabuchodonosor established Mathania his Vncle in the Kingdome of Iuda, and called him Zedechias, which is as much to say, as the Iustice of God. For like as Neco, King of Egypt, had formerly displaced Iehoiabaz, after his Father Iosias was slaine, and set vp Iehoiakim, the sonne of another mother; so Nabuchodonosor slue Iehoiakim, who depended on the Egyptians, and carrying his sonne Iechonias Prisoner to Babel, gaue the Kingdome to this Zedechias, that was whole Brother to that Iehoiabaz, whom Neco tooke with him into Egypt. From Zedechias he required an oath for his faithfull obedience, which Zedechias gaue him, and called the liuing God to witness in the same, that he would remaine assured to the Kings of Chaldees.

In the first yeere of Zedechias, Ieremie saw and expounded the Vision of the ripe and rotten Grapes, the one signifying those Iudeans that were carried away captiue, the other those that stayed, and were destroyed.

In the fourth of Zedechias, Ieremie wrote in a Booke all the euill that should fall vpon Babylon, which Booke or scrole he gaue to Sheraias, when he went with the King Zedechias to Babylon, to visit Nabuchodonosor, willing him first to reade it to the Captiue Iewes, and then to binde it to a stone, and cast it into Euphrates, pronouncing these words: Thus shall Babel be drowned, and shall not rise from the euill that I will bring vpon her. This iourne of Zedechias to Babel is probably thought to haue beene in way of visitation, carrying some presents. But I further thinke, that hee had some suite there to make, which his Lordly Master refused to grant, and sent him away discontented. For at his returne all the bordering Princes sent Messengers to him, inciting him (as it seemes) to those vniquiet courses, from which Ieremie dehorted both him and them. The Prophet, by Gods appoint-appointment, made bonds and yokes; one of which he wore about his own necke, others he sent vnto the five Kings, of Edom, Moab, Ammon, Tyre, and Zidon, by those Messengers which came to visit Zedechias: making them know, that if they & the Kings of Iuda abode in the obedience of Babylon, they should then possesse and enioy their owne Countries; if not, they should assuredly perishe by the sword, by fire, and by pestilence.

He also fore-told them, that those Vessels, which as yet remained in Ierusalem, should also trauaile after the rest, and at length they should be restored againe.

The same yeere Ananias, the false Prophet, tooke off the wooden Chaine which Ieremie wore, in signe of the Captiuitie of the Iewes, and brake it: Vaunting, that in like manner, after two yeeres, God would breake the strength of Babel, and the yoke which he layed on all Nations; restore Iechonias, and all the Iewes, with the Vessels and riches of the Temple, and giue an end to all these troubles. But Ieremie in stead of his wooden Yoke wore a Coller of yron: and in signe that Ananias had giuen a deceitfull and false hope to the people, he fore-told the death of this cold Prophet, which seized vpon him in the second moneth. After this, when Zedechias had wauered long enough betwene Faith and Passion, in the eight yeere of his Reigne he practised more seriously against Nabuchodonosor, with his Neighbours, the Edomites, Ammonites, Moabites, Tyrians, and others that were promised great aides of the Egyptians: in confidence of whose resistance, he determined to shake off the Babylonian yoke. Hereof when Nabuchodonosor had knowledge, he marched with his Armie in the dead of Winter, toward Ierusalem, and besieged it. Ieremie perswaded Zedechias to render the Citie and himselfe: but being confident of the helpe from Egypt, and being perswaded by his Counsellors, and false Prophets, that it was vnpossible that the Kingdome of Iuda should be extirpate, vntill the coming of Silo (according to the Prophecies of Iacob) he despised the words of Ieremie, Gen. 49. 10. and imprisoned him. For Ieremie had told the King that the Citie should be taken and burnt; that the King should not escape, but be taken Prisoner, and brought to the presence of Nabuchodonosor; that he should not perishe by the sword, but being carried to Babel, die his naturall death.

Ierusalem, being the following yeere, surrounded by Nabuchodonosors Armie; the King of Egypt, Pharaos Hophra, according to Ieremie (Herodotus calleth him Apries) entered the border of Iuda, with his Armie, to succour Zedechias, of whose reuolt he had bene the principall Author. But Ieremie gaue the Iewes faithfull counsell, willing them not to haue any trust in the succours of Egypt: for he assured them, that they should returne againe, and in no sort relieue them. And it fell out accordingly. For when the Chaldeans remoued from Ierusalem to encounter the Egyptians, these vaunting Patrons abandoned their enterprise, and taking Gaza in their way homeward, returned into Egypt, as if they had already done enough; leauing the poore people of Ierusalem to their destined miseries.

In the meane while the Iewes, who, in their first extremity, had manumitted their Hebrew Bond-men (as Gods Law required at the yeere of Iubile) and made them free, there by the better to encourage them to fight; did now vpon the breaking vp of the Chaldean Armie, repent them of their Charitie: and thinking all had beene at an end, held them perforce to their former slauerie. But the Chaldees being returned to the siege, the Prophet Ieremie, when the State of Ierusalem began now to grow to extremity, counselled Zedechias to render himselfe vnto them; assuring him of his owne life, and the safetie of the Citie, if he would so doe. But his obstinate heart conducted him to that wretched end, which his neglect of God, and his infidelity and perurie, had provided for him.

Three and twenty Moneths (as some doe reckon it) or according to Iosephus eightene, the Babylonian Armie lay before Ierusalem, and held it exceeding fraightly besieged. For they built Forts against it round about, or (as P. Martyr hath it) extruxerunt contra eam turres lignas per circuitum: They surrounded the Citie with wooden Towers, so as the besieged could neither fall out, nor receiue into the Citie any supply of men or victuals. Iosephus reports, that they ouer-topped the Walls, with high Towers raised vpon mounts, from which they did so beat vpon the Wall with their Engines, that the defendants were compelled to forsake their stations. Now although it were so that the besieged also raised Counter-buildings, like vnto these; yet the great King of Babel, who commanded all the Regions thereabouts, and had the Woods and Riuers to obey him, found means to ouer-throw all the Citizens endeouours; and to beat down as fast from without, as they raised from within; the body and foundation of his owne workes being guarded, by the Walls of Ierusalem interposed; and theirs within, layed open to their enemies disturbance. Besides, both famine and pestilence (which commonly accompany men streightly besieged) grew on fast vpon them, whereby, when the number, strength, and courage of the Iewes failed, the Chaldeans made a breach, and forcing an entry, their Princes did fear themselves, as Lords of the Towne, in the middle gate. Zedechias beholding this vncomfortable sight, and finding no remedy of the danger present, lost both his courage and his hope at once; and shifted himselfe together with his Wiues, Children, Princes, and principall Seruants, out of the Citie, by away to vnder ground; leaving his amazed and guidelesse people, to the merclesse swords of their enemies. Thus he, who, when Ieremie the Prophet perswaded him to render himselfe, despised both the counsell of God, and the force of Nabuchodonosor; vied now the remedy, which Wolphius truly termeth: triste, turpe, & infelix: Wofull, shamefull, and vnmfortunate.

By this secret subterranean vault, Zedechias making his stealth, recovered (by the helpe of the darke night) the Plaines or Defarts of Iericho: but by reason of the traine, that followed him and his, (euery one leading with him those whom they held most deare vnto them) he was easily traced and pursued. How great soeuer the company was that attended on him, yet, as Iosephus reports it, they on whose fidelity he most reposed himselfe, no sooner beheld the Chaldeans approach, but they all abandoned his defence, and shifted themselves into the Defarts as they could. For whom God had forsaken, no man followed, but the Ministers of his vengeance; by whom Zedechias being made Prisoner, with his Children, and Princes, he was conueighed to Rebla or Reblath a Citie (as some thinke) of Nephtalim, where Nabuchodonosor then lay, as a place indifferent betwene Ierusalem and Tyre, with both which at one he had to doe.

Now after Nabuchodonosor had layed before Zedechias the many graces and benefis conferred vpon him, together with the notable falsehood and periurie, wherewith he had requited them; he commanded his Children, Princes, and Friends, to be slaine before his face. This being done, to the end that so lamentable a spectacle should be the last, that he should behold in the World, he caused his eyes to be torne out of his head, and so carried him in a slauish manner to Babel, where he consumed the rest of his wretched life in perpetuall imprisonment. Herein this most maruailous Prophecie of Ezechiel was performed; Adducam eum in Babylonem & ipsam non videbit. I will bring him into Babylon, and he shall not see it.

Thus in the Eleauenth and last yeere of Zedechias, which was the eighteenth of Nabuchodonosor, the Chaldeans entered the Citie by force, where sparing no sexe nor age, they committed all to the sword that they therein found,

In the yeere next following, Nabuzaradan, Generall of the Armie, burnt the Kings Palace, and the rest of Ierusalem: and after this fire had lasted from the seauenth to the tenth day, he also burnt the Temple of God to the ground, when it had stood four hundred thirtie and one yeeres.

After this, vpon a second search, Nabuzaradan (not yet satiated with blood) commanded seauenty and two others to be slaughtered, which had hidden themselves from the first furie, to wit, the chiefe and the second Priest, two Commanders of Zedechias his men of Warre, five of his House-hold seruants, and others to that number; carrying away to Babylon the ablest of the people throughout all Iudea; and leaving the poorest labouring soules, with some that followed the partie of Nabuchodonosor, to till the ground: ouer whom he left Gouvernour, Godolia the Nephew of that Saphan, whom Iosias had formerly employed in the reformation of Religion, who is, for his iustice and equitie, by Iosephus highly commended. This man, a Iewe by Nation, left Zedechias as it seemeth, in the beginning of the warre: and by Ieremies desire to liue with him, it appeareth that he had embraced the same aduice, which the Prophet gaue vnto Zedechias; which was, to submit himselfe altogether to the Babylonians, who being ordained by God to exercise his iustice, was therefore resistlesse. The Prophet Ieremie being left to his owne choice, either to liue in Chaldea, or elsewhere, he made election of Godolia, to whom he was recommended; who not onely embraced Ieremie, but gaue comfort to all the other Iewes, that were left vnder his charge, promising them fauour & liberty, so long as they remained obedient Subjects to Nabuchodonosor, by whom he was established Prouinciall Gouvernour of his owne Nation.

But ere that yeere was expired, a Prince of the late Kings house (who during the siege of Ierusalem, had kept himselfe out of the storme, with Balsis King of the Ammonites) being followed by ten other chosen men, while Godolia feasted them in Maspha or Mispha, the Citie of his residence, trayterously slue him, together with diuers Chaldeans and Iewes that accompanied him. This done, he made an escape, and in his way encountering with eightie persons, repairing towards Godolia with presents, he slue the most of them, and spared the rest, because they promised to discover vnto him some Treasures hidden in the fields during the warre. He also tooke with him a Daughter of Zedechias, committed to the care of Godolia by Nabuchodonosor. This practice and intent of Ismael had beene formerly discovered vnto Godolia by Iohanan, one of the Leaders of the few remaining Iewes; but Godolia was incredulous.

Ismael being now left without a Gouvernour (for Ismael durst not take it vpon him, but retired himselfe, or rather fled as fast as he could to the Ammonites) the residue of the Iewes, fearing the reuenge of the Chaldeans, resolved to flye away into Egypt, and besought Ieremie to aske counsell of God for them: who readily made them answere, that if they remained in Iudea, God would prouide for them, and shew them mercy; but if they sought to saue themselves in Egypt, that they should then vndoubtedly perish. Nor withstanding this aduice, the Iewes held their determination; and despising the Oracle of God, and constraining Ieremie and Baruch to accompanie them, they traualled into Egypt, and inhabited by the permission of Pharao, neere vnto Taphnes: where, when Ieremie often reprehended them for their Idolatrie, foretelling both the destruction of themselves, and the Egyptians also, he was by these his owne hardhearted and vngratefull Countymen, stoned to death; and by the Egyptians, who greatly reuenced him, buried neere the Sepulchre of their owne Kings.

THE FIRST PART OF THE HISTORIE OF THE WORLD:

Intreating of the Times from the destruction of Ierusalem, to the time of PHILIP of MACEDON.

THE THIRD BOOKE.

CHAP. I.

Of the time passing betweene the destruction of Ierusalem, and the fall of the Assyrian Empire.

§. I.

Of the connexion of Sacred and prophane Histories.

THE course of Time; which in prophane Histories might rather be discerned through the greatest part of his way, hitherto passed in some out-worne foot-steps, than in any beaten path, hauing once in Greece by the Olympiads, and in the Easterne Countries by the account from Nabonassar, left surer marks, and more applicable to actions concurrent, than were the warre of Troy, or any other token of former date; begins at length in the ruine of Ierusalem to discover the connexion of antiquitie fore-spent, with the storie of succeeding ages. Manifest it is, that the originall and progresse of things could ill be sought in those that were ignorant of the first creation: as likewise that the affaires of Kingdomes and Empire afterwards growne vp, are not to be found among those, that haue now no state nor policie remaining of their owne. Hauing therefore pursued the storie of the world vnto that age, from whence the memorie of succeeding accidents is with little interruption of fabulous discourse deriued vnto vs, I hold it now conuenient briefly to shew, by what means and circumstances the Historie of the Hebrewes, which of all other is the most ancient, may be conioyned with the following times, wherein that Image of sundry metalls, discovered by God vnto Nebuchadnezzar, did reigne ouer the earth, when Israel was either none, or an vnregarded Nation.

Herein I doe not hold it needfull, to insist vpon those authorities, which giue, as it were by heare-say, a certaine yeere of some old Assyrian King vnto some action or event, whereof the time is found expressed in Scripture: for together with the end of Nimrod his line in Sardanapalus, if not before, all such computations were blotted out; the succession of Belochus and his issue did occupied the kingdome afterwards, depending vpon the vncertaine relations of such, as were neither constant in assigning the yeeres of his beginning, nor of credit enough for others to relye vpon. Let it therefore suffice; that the consent and harmonie, which some haue found in the yeeres of those ouer-worne Monarchs, doth preserve their names, which otherwise might haue bene forgotten. Now concerning the latter Kings of that Nation, howsoeuer it be true that we finde the names of all or most of them in Scriptures, which are recorded by prophane Historians, yet hereby could we onely learne in what age each of them liued, but not in what yeere his reigne began or ended, were it not that the reigne of Nabuchadnezzar is more precisely applied to the times of Zebaiakim and Zedekias. Hence haue we the first light whereby to discover the meanes of connecting the sacred and prophane Histories. For vnder Nebuchadnezzar was the beginning of the captiuitie of Juda, which ended when 70. yeeres were expired; and these 70. yeeres tooke end at the first of Cyrus, whose time being well knowne, affords vs meanes of looking backe into the ages past, and forwards into the race of men succeeding. The first yeere of Cyrus his reigne in Perfit, by generall consent, is ioyned with the first yeere of the 55. Olympiad, where, that he reigned three and twentie yeeres before his Monarchie, and seauen yeeres afterwards, it is apparent, and almost out of controuersie. Giuing therefore foure hundred and eight yeeres vnto the distance betweene the fall of Troy, and the instauration of the Olympiads by Iphitus, we may easily arriue vnto those antiquities of Greece, which were not merely fabulous. As for Princes ruling the whilst in sundry parts of the world, S. Augustine and others may be trusted in setting downe their times, which they had by Tradition from authors of wel-approved faith and industrie.

From Cyrus forwards, how the times are reckoned vnto Alexander, and from him to the battaile of Actium, it were (peraduenture) in this place impertinent to set downe. But seeing that the beginning and end of the Babylonian captiuitie are markes whereby we are chiefly directed, in passing from the first vnto the latest yeeres of the world, through any storie, with least interruption; it is very expedient that we take some paines to informe our selues truely of the 70. yeeres, during which it continued, euen from Nebuchadnezzar vnto Cyrus.

§. II.

A briefe rehearfall of two opinions, touching the beginning of the captiuitie: with an answer to the cauals of Porphyrie, inuicighing against S. Matthew, and Daniel, vpon whom the later of these opinions is founded.

Any Commentators, and other Historians, & Chronologers finde, that the captiuitie then began, when Iechonias was carried prisoner into Babylon, eleauen yeeres before the finall destruction of Ierusalem vnder Zedekias. This they proue out of diuers places in Ezekiel, especially out of the fourteenth chapter, where he makes a plaine distinction betweene the beginning of the Captiuitie, and vter destruction of Ierusalem by Nabuzardan, in these words: In the five and twentieth yeere of our being in captiuitie, in the beginning of the yeere, in the tenth day of the moneth, in the foureteenth yeere after that the Citie was smitten. In which words he beginneth the captiuitie in plaine termes, eleauen yeeres before the Citie was destroyed. Beroaldus is of opinion that it began in the first of Nabuchodonosor, and the fourth of Ioakim, which he endeouours to proue out of the second of Chronicles, but more especially out of Saint Matthew, and Daniel, whose words afford matter of disputation, but serue not to make good so much as Beroaldus would enforce. That place of S. Matthew, and the whole booke of Daniel, haue mislaid occasion of scoffing and railing at the Christian religion to that wretched man Porphyrie, who, not vnderstanding how the sonnes of King Iosias were called by diuers names, as Epiphanius hath shewed at large, thought that the Apostle had spoken here knew not what in reckoning the sonnes, or, according to some translations, the Sonne and Nephewes of that good King, begotten about the time of the captiuitie. Vpon Daniel also the same Porphyrie doth spend the twelfth of his malicious bookes written against the Christians, affirming that these prophecies and visions remembred by Daniel, were written long after his death, and at, or neere the time of Antiochus Epiphanes. This fond supposition of his, Eusebius, Apollonius, and others, haue sufficiently answered. For the seauenty Interpreters, who conuerted the old Testament about an hundred yeeres before Epiphanes, did also turne this booke of Daniel out of Hebrew into Greece, as a part of Scripture receiued. And were there no other argument to confound Porphyrie, than that of Alexander Macedon, it were sufficient, who liued diuers yeeres before Antiochus Epiphanes. For Iaddus the high Priest shewed that great Conqueror, when he came towards Ierusalem to haue destroyed it, this booke of Daniel, wherein he beheld his owne glory foretold, as the same was plainly expounded vnto him; which not onely stayed his hand from the harme of that Citie and people, but his assurance and resolution was so confirmed and strengthened thereby, to as despising all future perill and resistance, he conquered Darius, and the Easterne Empire in a shorter time than Nabuchodonosor had done one Citie, to wit, Tyre in Phenicia.

It is true indeede that the Iewes themselves giue lesse authoritie to Daniel, than to Moses, and the Prophets, accompting his booke among those which they call Cetaphim, or Hagiographa, or holy Writings, which they say *Esdra*s and the Seniors of the Synagogue compiled after their returne from Babylon. But first, that the booke of Daniel (I meane so much as is found in the Hebrew) is Canonically: secondly, that it was written by Daniel himselfe, and not by *Esdra*s and the Seniors, we may assure our selues by testimonie of Councels, and Fathers. For in the Councell of Laodicea held about the yeere of our Lord 368. after the death of Iouinian the Emperour, and after the Nicene Councell three and forty yeeres, this booke of Daniel was receiued, verified and confirmed among the other Canonically Scriptures, as in the Epitomie of the same Councell it may be seene, and so doth Meliton the most ancient Bishop of Sardis number it, witnesse Eusebius in his Ecclesiasticall history, the fourth booke, and five and twentieth chapter: so doth the same Author in the Catalogue of Canonically bookes vpon Origen, so doth Hilarius in his Preface vpon the Psalmes, and Epiphanius in his booke of Waights and Measures, &c. To these I may adde Saint Hierome, Gregorie Nazianzene, and others. For the Hagiographa bookes or holy Writings, the Iewes and Rabbins reckon to be these, Daniel, Psalmes, Prouerbs, Iob, Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Hester, Esa, Nehemiah, and the Chronicles. And that it was Daniel, and not *Esdra*s, that wrote this booke, Gods commandment vnto him by his Angell, to scale vp the same to the time appointed, is an vnanswerable testimonie. Yea that which exceedeth all strength of other prooffe, our Saviour Christ who citeth no Apocryphall Scripture, in Matthew and Marke alleageth Daniel the Prophet, to wit, the last verse of his ninth chapter. Further, in the fifth of Iohn, Christ distributeth the risen from the dead, as in Daniel the twelfth verse the second. Saint Paul describeth Antichrist out of Daniel, and the Reuelation is wholly an interpretation of *Daniel*s visions.

§. III

That the 70. yeeres of captiuitie are to be numbered from the destruction of Ierusalem; not from the migration of Iechonia.

IN Auing thus farre digressed, in maintaining that authority, which must often be cited in the present argument, it is now conuenient, that we returne vnto the differences of opinion, concerning the beginning of these 70. yeeres. Neither will I stand to trouble my selfe and others with laying open the grounds or weakenesse of that which Eusebius and some few namelesse Authors, haue sometimes held in this point, which is lately reuiued by Beroaldus; but will forth-with enter into consideration of that opinion, which many both ancient and late Writers haue so earnestly maintained, that it wants not much of being common.

Four Kings of Iuda were carried away captiues to Babylon: First, Manasses; then Iehoiakim, and with him among others, Daniel the Prophet: thirdly, Iechonias, and with him Ezekiel: lastly, Zeackias, at which time the Citie and Temple were destroyed. To the first of these captiuities the beginning of the 70. yeeres is referred by none that I haue read; to the second, by few and with weake prooffe; to the third, by very many and with much confidence. For besides those places of Ezekiel already cited, there is a strong argument gathered gathered out of Ieremie, which may seeme to make the matter plaine. For the Prophet in comforting the people that were carried away with Iechonias, vseth these words: Thus saith the Lord, After 70. yeeres be accomplished at Babel, I will visit you, and perform my good promise towards you, and cause you to returne to this place.

But it stands indeed with little reason that we should seeke the interpretation of a prophetic out of circumstances, when the prophetic is such as doth sufficiently expound itselfe. Ieremie had already, in the fourth yeere of Iehoiakim, denounced the iudgement of God against the Land, for the finnes and impenitencie of that obstinate people, in these words: Behold, I will send and take to me all the families of the North, saith the Lord, and Nebuchadnezzar, the King of Babel, my seruant; and will bring them against this Land, and against the inhabitants thereof, and against all these Nations round about, and I will destroy them, and make them an astonishment, and an hissing, and a continuall desolation. Moreover, I will take from them the voyce of mirth, and the voyce of gladnesse, the voyce of the Bridegrome, and the voyce of the Bride, the noyse of the mill-stones, and the light of the candle, and this whole Land shall be desolate, and an astonishment, and these Nations shall serue the King of Babel 70. yeeres. And when 70. yeeres are expired, I will visit the King of Babel. Heere we see prescribed vnto the captiuitie the terme of 70. yeeres, which were to commence, neither when the prophetic was vttered; nor when Iehoiakim, who then reigned, was taken by Nebuchadnezzar; nor yet in the time of Iechonia; but with the vtter desolation of the Citie, whereof Ieremie did againe giue notice to those that were already in Babylon, at such time as he sent them the comfort of deliuerance before rehearsed. And so did the people vnderstand this prophetic, in those times when they saw it accomplished, beginning the 70. yeeres at the time of the desolation, as manifestly appears in the end of the Historie of Iuda, where it is said thus: They burnt the house of God, and brake downe the wall of Ierusalem, and burnt all the Palaces thereof with fire, and all the precious vessels thereof to destroy all: And they that were left by the sword, carried he away to Babel, and they were seruants to him and to his sonnes, vntill the Kingdome of the Persians had rule, to fulfill the word of the Lord by the mouth of Ieremie, vntill the Land had her fill of her Sabbath: for all the daies that she lay desolate, she kept Sabbath, to fulfill 70. yeeres. But in the 30. yeere of Cyrus King of Persia (when the word of the Lord, spoken by the mouth of Ieremie, was finished) the Lord stirred up the spirit of Cyrus. Wee seldome find one piece of Scripture so precisely and plainly expounded by another, as in this prophetic, to haue afterwards becne the subiect of altercation. For one can hardly deuise, how cyther the desolation could haue beene expressed more sensibly, than it was by the Prophet, or the event of the prophetic haue beene more exactly set downe, than it was in the place now last of all cited. If it be requisite that we bring more prooffe in so euident a case, the ninth Chapter of Daniel yeelds testimonie sufficient, vnto this expedition of Ieremie his prophetic, that Ierusalem was to lie waste 70. yeeres. For in the first yeere of Darius, the Mede, which was the last of the 70. Daniel obtained of God the deliuerance that had bene promised by prayer, which hee made vpon consideration of the time that was expired: as he telleth in these words: In the first yeere of his reigne, I Daniel vnderstood by the bookes the number of the yeeres, whereof the Lord hath spoken vnto Ieremie the Prophet, that he would accomplish 70. yeeres in the desolation of Ierusalem. So that howsoeuer the time of Daniel his owne captiuitie be reckoned from the taking of Iehoiakim, and that the people carried away with Iechonia, did accompt, as well they might, the yeeres of their owne captiuitie; yet with the generall desolation of the Countrey, wherein were few or none of the Israelites left remaining to inhabite, beganne in the nineteenth yeere of Nabuchodonosor the great captiuitie, which by Gods appointment continued vnto the end of seuentie yeeres.

This I will not further seeke to prooue, by the authoritie of Iosephus and others affirming the same; for as much as that which already hath beene produced, is enough to satisfie any man that hath not fully determined to hold the contrarie.

§. II. III.

WHat Kings reigned in Babylon, during these seuentie yeeres of the captiuitie, and how long each of them did weare the Diademe, it is a matter of no great importance to know, for as much as neither their acts were notable in the age wherein they liued, nor the length of their reignes, any way helpfull to the concordance of times, fore-going or succeeding. The conquests recounted by Xenophon of Syria, Arabia, (or rather some part of it) Hyrcania, Bactria, and perhaps of some other Countries, may seeme fruits of the victories obtained by Nebuchadnezzar the Great (or by some of his Ancestors) in the former part of his life, before he betooke himselfe to ease, and to the sumptuous building of his great Babel, for the house of his Kingdome, and for the honour of his Maiestie, where it may seeme that hee and his Heires kept a great state, and did very little. The idle behauiour of the Assyrian Souldiers, in such skirmishes as afterwards they had with the Medes, doth argue no lesse. For whereas vnder Nebuchadnezzar, they were so stout and industrious, that (to omit other proofes) they attempted, and finished, that hardie piece of worke, of winning the strong Citie of Tyre, by ioyning vnto it the continent, filling vp the deepe and broad channell of the Sea, diuiding it from the maine with a mole, or peece of earth, and other matter, the reparation whereof, when the Sea had washed it away, was the very greatest of Alexanders workes; in the times following, they became timorous, that they durst not approach neerer to the enemie than their bowes would carrie, but were readie to turn their backs, as soone as anie, though inferiour in numbers, aduenturing within the distance offered to charge them.

Now as their actions from the end of Nebuchadnezzars warres, till the ruine of their Empire, were not worthy to bee recorded; so was the distinction of their times, and reigne of their seuerall Kings, vnworthy of the great labour that hath in vaine bene taken in that businesse. For when it is granted, that the captiuitie of Jude, ending with that Empire, lasted 70. yeeres, wee may as reasonably forbear to search into the particular continuance of two or three slothful Kings, as we are contented to beignorant of the ages of the Patriarchs, and their children liuing in the Egyptian seruitude; resting satisfied in both with the generall assured summe.

Yet for as much as many haue trauelled in this businesse, vpon desire (as I take it) to approue the beginning and end of the 70. yeres, not onely by the reignes of other Princes, ruling else-where, but by the times of the Assyrians themselues: I will not refuse to take a little paines in collecting their opinions, and shewing what I thinke, may best be held for likely, if the certaine truth cannot be found.

The opinions are many, and greatly repugnant, both in recounting the Kings themselves, and in setting downe the yeeres of their seuerall reignes. The first (as I take it) the surest, is theirs, who merely follow the authoritie of the Scriptures, without borrowing any helpe from others. These name onely three Kings, Nabuchadnezzar, Euilmerodach, and Balthasar. Neither haue they onely the silence of Daniel, who names none other to be their warrant, but the prophetic of Ieremie precisely, and in a manner purposely teaching the very same. For God, by the mouth of that Prophet, shewing that he being absolute Lord of all, would dispose of all according to his owne will, and making it known that he had put some Countries here named, into the hands of the King of Babel, saith thus: And all Nations shall serue him, and his Sonne, and his Sonnes Sonne, until the very time of his Land come also; then many Nations and great King shall serue themselves of him. These words expressing the continuance of the Chaldean Empire, and number of the Kings, will hardly be qualified with any distinction. But indeed I finde no other necessity of qualification to be vsed heerein, than such as may grow out of mens desire to reconcile the Scriptures vnto profane authors. And this desire were not vniust, if the consent of all histories were on the one side, and the letter of the holy Text were single on the other side.

But contrariwise, the Authors which are cited in this case, are so repugnant one to the other, and the proofes of their different reports are so slender and vninsufficient, that the succession of these Princes, had it not bin thus deliuered in Scriptures, but only set down by some Author of equall credit with the rest, might very well haue found and deferred as good beliefe, as any of those things which they haue deliuered in this point. For some there are, who following Iosephus, deriue that Empire, as by descent from father to son, through five generations; beginning with Nabuchodonosor the great, and giuing to him 43. yeeres; to Euilmerodach 18. to Niglissar the sonne of Euilmerodach 20, to Labosardach the sonne of Niglissar 9. moneths, and lastly to Balthasar (whom Iosephus intimates to be of the race of Nabuchodonosor, without naming his father) 17. yeeres. And this opinion (saue that he forbears to reckon the yeeres, and plainly calls Balthasar the sonne of Labosardach) Saint Hierome doth follow, alledging Berosus and Iosephus as a sectator of Berosus, for his Authors; though Berosus as he is cited by Iosephus, report the matter farre otherwise. For hee tells vs that Euilmerodach the sonne of Nabuchodonosor did reigne but two yeeres, being for his wickednesse and lust, slaine by his sisters husband Nizigissoroor, who occupied the kingdome after him foure yeeres, and left it to his owne sonne Labosardach; who being an ill-conditioned boy, was at the end of nine moneths slaine by such as were about him, and the kingdome giuen to one Nabonidus, who held it by the election of the Conspirators, and left it vnto Cyrus after 17. yeeres. This relation ill agrees with that of Iosephus, and both of them as bad with the Scriptures, in number either of yeeres, or of generations; yet the particularities which they handle, haue procured vnto them some authority, so that the names which they haue inserted, are taken as it were vpon trust. There is a third opinion which makes the three last kings brethren, and sonnes of Euilmerodach; and this may well enough agree with the Scripture: though I had rather belieue Xenophon, who saith that the last King of Babylon was immediate succellour to his father. But whereas the Author of the Scholasticall Historie, who is founder of this opinion, placeth betweene him that tooke Ierusalem, and Euilmerodach; another Nabuchodonosor: plaine enough it is that he hath, out of any Historie sacred or profane, as little warrant to guide him, as we haue reason to follow him. Eusebius, Sulpitius Severus, and Theodoret, vpon better ground, haue supposed, that Euilmerodach and Balthasar were brethren and sonnes of the great Nabuchodonosor. This is built on the fifth chapter of Daniel, wherein Balthasar (for of Euilmerodach there is none that euer doubted) is often called Nabuchodonosor his sonne. And so common grew this explication, that S. Hierome called it the vulgar opinion. But the place of Ieremie before cited, proues that Balthasar was not the sonne indeed, but the grand-childe of that great conquerour, though by the phrase very common in Scriptures, and familiar in those Eastern languages, he was called the sonne.

Annius his Metasthenes hits very rightly the seuentie yeres of captiuitie, giuing to Nabuchodonosor 45. yeeres, to Euilmerodach 30. yeeres, and to the three sonnes of Euilmerodach, nephews of Nabuchodonosor fourteene yeres; that is, to Reg-Assar the eldest son three yeeres, to Lab-Assar Dach the second sonne fixe yeeres, and to Balthasar the third sonne five.

To this accompt agreeing with the Scriptures, both in the whole summe of yeeres, and in the number of generations, I haue sometime subscribed, as not daring to reiect an appearance of truth, vpon no greater reason than because the Author was of Annius his edition. Yet could I not satisfie my selfe herein, both for that none of the Ancient, and few such of the moderne Writers as deserue to be regarded, haue consented with this Metasthenes; and for that in making Balthasar succeed vnto his brother in the kingdome, and not vnto his father, he is wholly against Xenophon, whose Historie of the elder Cyrus in his Assyrian warre I can not slightly value in many respects, and especially because it is very agreeable to the Scriptures, in the taking of Babylon, while the king was at his drunken feast.

Seeking therefore diligently into all circumstances that might giue any light in this obscuritie, I found manifest proofe, that the time allotted vnto Balthasar, by Annius his Metasthenes, was farre short of the truth, which is enough to render all suspected that he hath said in distributing what part of the 70. yeeres he pleased amongst the rest. For in the third yeere of Balthasar, Daniel saw a vision, after which he was sicke certaine dayes, but when he rose vp, he did the Kings businesse: from which businesse, that he did afterwards withdraw himselfe, and liue retired, so long that he was forgotten in the Court, it appeares plainly, both by the many words which the old Queene vsed to set out his sufficiencie, and by the Kings asking of him, when hee came into his presence, whether hee were were Daniel. Now to thinke that a man of such account and place as Daniel had held, could in two yeeres haue beene worne out of remembrance, were in my iudgement a very strange conceit, which rather than I would entertaine, I can well be contented, to thinke the whole storie (thus related) a part of Annius his impostures.

Dan. 11. 4. 2.

Out of these reports of Iosephus, Berosus, and others, many new opinions are framed, by coniectures of late Writers. For the endurance of the captiuitie being 70. yeeres, and these yeeres extending vnto the first of Cyrus, in which course of time Nebuchadnezzar, his sonne and grand-child, must haue reigned; it hath seemed needfull to supply the yeeres of these three descents, by inserting some, whose reignes might fill vp the whole continuance of the captiuitie; with which the time allotted by Berosus and others, to Euilmerodach and Balthasar, ioyned vnto the yeeres following the ninteen of Nebuchadnezzar, (wherein Ierusalem was laid desolate) are nothing euen.

Therefore Mercator and others following him, fashion the yeeres of Euilmerodach in this sort. They say, that the 18. yeeres giuen to him by Iosephus in the tenth of his Antiquities, should be read and numbred 28. yeeres, and the two yeeres that Berosus hath allowed to Euilmerodach should be written 23. in the first number the figure of (1) is mistaken for the figure of (2) and in the later there should haue been added the figure of (3) to that of (2 : ) this granted (to wit) that Euilmerodach reigned 28. yeeres, whereof five together with his father, and 23. after his death, and the same number of 23. added to the 25. which Nabuchodonosor liued after the destruction of Ierusalem, make 49; then 4. 20 yeeres of Niglissar according to Berosus, 9. moneths of Labassardach his sonne, and 17. yeeres of Labonidus or Balthasar, make vp the number of 70. yeeres to the first of Cyrus. But whether by error in figures, or in words, the numbers be vtterly mistaken in all copies extant; vpon how weake a foundation doe they build, who hauing nothing to helpe them, saue onely the bare names of two vknowne Kings, found in Authors manifestlie corrupted, and such as if they had beene entirely extant, were not worthy, to haue that place of Ieremie called into dispute, in regard of their authoritie?

§ V.

A more particular examination of one opinion touching the number, persons, and reignes of the Babylonian Kings.

Ther suppositions, little different in substance from this of Mercator, I purpose to rehearse, as falling vnder the same answer. That of Ioseph Scaliger I may not forget, as deserving to be considered apart from the rest. He giues to Nebuchadnezzar 44. yeeres, to Euilmerodach two, to Belsazer, five: and to Nabonidus 17. So that from the 19. of Nabuchadnezzar, in which Ierusalem was destroyed, vnto the time of Cyrus hee accounteth onely 59. yeeres; beginning (as many doe) the captiuitie 11. yeres sooner, from the transportation of Iechonia. But hercof enough hath beene said already. That which wee are now to consider, is his distribution of the time 40 running between the 19. of Nabuchadnezzar, and the fall of the Caldean Empire: wherein if he haue erred, then is all further inquisition fruitiuous.

Concerning the length of Nabuchadnezzar's reigne, I shall hereafter vpon better occasion deliuer my opinion. The time which he giues to Euilmerodach, is very short, and more precisely agreeing with Berosus than with the Scriptures. For we finde in Ieremie, that this Euilmerodach in the first of his reigne, shewing all fauour to Iechonia, did among other things take order for him at his table; and that he did continually eat bread before him all the dayes of his life. His portion was a continuall portion giuen him of the King of Babel, euery day a certaine, all the dayes of his life vntill he died. The very sound of these words (which is more to be esteemed, than the authority of Berosus, were he perfectly extant) imports a farre longer time than two yeeres, wherein Iechonia, vnder this gentle Prince, enioyed the comfort sent by God, whose commandement he had obeyed in yeelding himselfe to Nabuchadnezzar. Indeepe how long Iechonia did liue, it cannot be proued; but plaine it is hereby, that all his remaining dayes he did eate bread before this King. Now that he liued not so short a while after this as 2. yeeres, it is more than likely, for he was but 55. yeeres old when he was set at liberty, hauing bin 37. yeeres in the prison, whereinto he was cast at the age of 18. yeeres; after which time it seemes plaine that he begat Salathiel, as well by the age of Zorobabel, who is said to haue beene but but a young man, and one of Darius his Pages threescore yeeres after this, as by other circumstances of his imprisonment it selfe.

Of Belsazer, to whom Scaliger giues the next five yeeres, naming him also Laborosardach, I should wonder why hee calls him Nebuchadnezzar's daughters sonne, were it not that herein I finde him very carefull to helpe out Berosus, by shifting in his Niriglossor, as husband to Nabuchadnezzar's daughter, and Protector of his sonne fouré of these yeeres; by which means there remains about one yeere to Belsazer alone, agreeing neerely with the nine moneths assigned by Berosus to the sonne of Niglissar. But Ieremie hath told vs that it was to Nebuchadnezzar, and to his son, and to his sons son (not to his daughters sonne) that the Empire was promised: which difficultie if Scaliger could not helpe, it was well done of him, to passe it ouer with silence.

Nabonidus the last of these (whom others, desirous to reconcile Berosus to the Scriptures) haue iudged to be all one with Balthasar, is by Scaliger thought to be Darius of the Medes. But herein Scaliger is no firme Berosian: for Berosus makes him of the same stocke or race a Babylonian. I speake not this to disgrace the trauaile of that most learned man (for it highly commends his diligence and iudgement, that he was not so wedded to any author, as affected with the loue of truth) but to shew that hee himselfe hauing in some points disliked those Writers, whom in generall he approacheth, might with greater reason haue wholly reformed them by the Scriptures, wherein can be no error. Two things there are which chiefly did breed or confirme this opinion in Scaliger, that he whom Berosus calls Nabonidus, was the same whom Daniel had called Darius of the Medes: First, the phrase of Scripture, which signifies vnto vs, that Darius tooke the kingdome, not saying that he wanne it by force of armes: Secondly, a fragment of Megasthenes found in Eusebius, wherein this Nabonidus is called the Median. Touching the word of the Original, or of the Greeke translation, which expressing no force of armes, doth only signifie, that Darius tooke or receiued the kingdome; I see no reason why wee should thereupon inferre, that the next King entred by Election: seeing Daniel relateth not the meanes and circumstances of Balthasar's death, but onely the swift accomplishment of his owne prophetic. Neither could it indeede haue properly beene said (if Daniel had cared to vse the most expresse termes) that Darius of the Medes breaking into the Citie, did winne the kingdome; seeing this was performed by Cyrus in the absence of Darius, though by his forces, and to his vse. Now concerning the fragment of Megasthenes, true it is, that in Eusebius his workes printed at Basile, in the yeere 1559. I finde onely thus much of Megasthenes, cited out of Alpheus; That Nabuchodonosor was more valiant than Hercules; that he subdued all Lybia, and the rest of Asia as farre as to the Armenians; and that as the Chaldeans report, being returned into his kingdome, and rapt with a diuine furie, he cried with a loud voyce: O Babylonians, I foretell ye of a great calamitie, that shall come vpon you, which neyther Bel, nor any of the gods shall auert: There will come a Persian, halfe an Asse, that shall bring slavery vpon yee: and that, this and the like when he had spoken, hee vanished. Of all this I belecue little or nothing, sauing that Nabuchodonosor knew before-hand, that his Empire should be translated, as Daniel had foretold, from the golden head, to the siluer brest. But that hee wanne all Africa or Lybia, I doe hold it neither true nor probable.

If Scaliger's copy of Eusebius were the more perfect, out of which Megasthenes tells vs that Nabuchodonosor wanne both Africa and Spaine, I belecue the fragment so much the lesse: and am as little moued with the authoritie of it, where it calls a Median the pride and confidence of the Assyrians; as where it tells of Nebuchadnezzar his owne vanishing away. Indeepe that same title of halfe an Asse, by which he calleth Cyrus, makes me to suspect the fable as cunningly forged out of Apollo his Oracle, wherein hee termeth him a Mule, because his parentage was more noble on the mothers side, than on the fathers; as Mules are begotten by Asses vpon Mares. And thus much in answer of the two principall foundations whereon this opinion is built. As for the concinnitie and cohesions haue not wanted these commendations: neither can any man beleue that one so iudicious, industrious and deeply learned as Ioseph Scaliger, would ouer-shoot himselfe in setting downe repugnancies.

It now remaineth to examine the agreement of this with the Scriptures, from which there is no appeale. And herein it seemes that Scaliger, well knowing his own sufficiency, hath hath beene little carefull to satisfie men that would frame Arguments against him. For if the prophetic of Daniel were true, that the Kingdome of Balthasar was diuided, and giuen to the Medes and Persians, either we must thinke that Darius of the Medes was not Nabonidus, or else wee must bethinke our selues what Persian it might be that shared the kingdome with him. For it is not more certaine, that Balthasar lost his life and Kingdome, than that his Kingdome was diuided and giuen to the Medes and Persians. Neither did the Medes and Persians fall out and fight for it, as by supposing Nabonidus to haue beene Darius, they should be thought to haue done; but these two Nations did compound the body of that Empire, and were accounted as Lords ouer all the subiect Prouinces, inso much that the Greeke Historians did commonly call those warres which Darius, and after him Xerxes, made vpon Greece, The warres of the Medes. Yeare cleare this point, euen Daniel himselfe resembles that King, with whom Alexander fought, vnto a Ramme with two hornes, calling him the King of the Medes and Persians. Wherefore the whole Nation of Chronologers were not to haue beene condemned by Ioseph Scaliger, for maintaining vpon such good grounds, that Darius of the Medes, was partner with Cyrus in his victories, and not a Chaldean King by him subdued. Neither was Iosephus to be the lesse regarded, for affirming that Balthasar was destroyed by Darius of the Medes, and his nephew Cyrus, though heerein he varied from Berosus, and others, whose authority elsewhere he gladly citeth. For Iosephus had no reason to beloeue any mans faith or knowledge of those times, halfe so well as Daniels whom I beleeue that he vnderstood as farre as was needfull in this case. Lawfull it was for him to alleage all Authors that had any mention, though vnperfect, of the same things that were contained in the writings of the Iewes, to whose histories thereby hee procured reputation in the Roman world, where they were strangers, and might seeme fabulous. Euen so doe Eusebius, and other Writers, willingly embrace the testimonies of heathen bookes making for the truth in some particulars; yet will they not therefore be tied in generall by the selfe same Ethnicke Philosophers, but leaue them where they are against the truth; as Iosephus in this case hath left Berosus. And thus much I thought it meet to say of Scaligers opinion in this point; holding neuerthelesse in due regard his learning and iudgement, which if in some things it had not failed, the miracle had then beene very great.

§. VI.

What may bee held as probable of the Persons and Times of Nabuchodonosor his Successors.

IT now remaines that I freely acknowledge mine owne weakenesse, who cannot finde how the 70. yeeres of captiuitie are to bee diuided among them which reigned in Babylon, though I finde that the distribution made of them, in such wise as already is rehearsed, be ill agreeable to the holy Scriptures. Wherefore I may truly say with Pererius, that wee ought liberally to pardon those whose feet haue failed them in the slipperie wayes of Chronologie, wherein both learning and diligence are subiect to take a fall at one time or other, by ignorance, forgetfulness, or heedlesse reckoning. Yet will I aduenture to deliuer my opinion, wherein the iudgement of Lyra and others (holding those onely to haue reigned ouer Chaldeans, whose Names are found in the Scriptures) appeares more conformable to reason and account of time, than any of the other Sentences or Coniectures before rehearsed. Not that I will take vpon mee to defend Lyra his Coniectures, when hee supposeth by 2 Kings and Lazarus Sardach to bee meant the same persons which are called in Scriptures Eulmerodach and Balthasar (for this can by no good colour be maintained,) but onely to shew that the Kings by him cited, are likely to haue occupied the whole time of seuentie yeeres. First therefore let vs consider the reigne of Nabuchadnezzar, in whose eighteenth yeere Ierualem was taken and sackt, but in his nineteenth layd vnto utter desolate.

Most of Writers haue giuen to him 43. yeeres of reigne, following therein Berosus. There are who haue added one yeere more; and some haue made it vp 45. To dispute about the certainty were needlesse: for in shewing by what length of time the Scriptures measure him, we shall shew the certaine truth.

Manifest

Manifest it is, that the 19. yeere of Nabuchadnezzar, is ioyned with the 11. of Zedekia; as also that his eight yeere, was the first yeere of Iechonia his captiuitie; the reigne of Zedekia occupied all the meane space being of 11. yeeres. This is generally agreed vpon, so that it needes no further proofes: As for the beginning of his successor Eulmerodach, it was in the seuen and thirtieth yeere of Iechonia his captiuitie; so that Nabuchadnezzar, after his 8. yeere (which was the first of Iechonia his bondage), reigned 35. whole yeeres; and peradventure a good part of the fixe and thirtieth, forasmuch as Iechonia was enlarged with so great fauour, not vntill the end of the yeere. Substracting therefore out of these foure and forty, which Nabuchadnezzars reigne did well-neere occupie, those eighteene yeeres of his which passed away before the captiuitie of Iuda, and ruine of the city; we haue remaining fixe and twenty yeeres of the seuentie, that were almost wholly spent when his sonne began to reigne.

It is now to be considered how the remainder of the seuentie yeeres were diuided betwene the Kings ruling in Babylon vntill the first of Cyrus. A question more difficult (as I said before) than greatly needfull: the whole summe being certaine, and the distinction of times affording no benefit in knowledge of their actions, who were slothfull Princes. Neither can any man the more iustly suspect the beginning or end of the whole 70. yeeres, for that the distribution of some part of them is only coniecturall; seeing that none who giues any other termes to their beginning or end, hath refused to follow both vnlikely and desperate coniectures in diuiding them. I will therefore bee bold to doe as others haue done; knowing well before-hand, that whosoever shall discouer my error, must do me the pleasure (which I could rather wish in a case more materiall) of making me to vnderstand the truth.

Of the foure and forty yeeres remaining in accompt of Nabuchadnezzars death, wee are to take away the last, which was the first of Darius the Mede, and then hauing authority good enough to warrant vs from blame of presumption, in giuing vs seuentie yeeres to Balthasar, we finde left in our hands to bestow vpon Eulmerodach fixe & twentie yeeres. Of the yeere belonging vnto Darius the Mede, I haue already spoken what I thought sufficient, in deliuering my opinion of the beginning and continuance, of this captiuitie. That Balthasar did reigne seuentie yeeres, we haue the authority of Iosephus, before cited in expresse words; Wee haue also the generall consent of all, or the most late Writers, interpreting Berosus his Nabonidus, who reigned so long, and Balthasar to haue beene one. But nothing moueth mee so much to beleeue this Tradition, as first those euident places in Daniel, shewing that in the third yeere of Balthasar hee followed the Kings businesse, and yet was forgotten ere the end of his reigne, (a prooffe sufficient of no few yeeres, passing vnder this man, especially seeing it is no where found that Daniels employments tooke end either that yeere or the next.) Secondly, the consideration of Cyrus his warres against the Assyrians, which beginning with the death of this mans father, and being alwaies prosperous, could hardly haue occupied any longer time, though wee make large allowance to his deeds in the lower Asia, which fell out in the midde-way: I haue already shewed, that there appears in the Scriptures likelihood enough to make it credible, that the reigne of Eulmerodach was not short: and that men of great iudgement haue found it most probable, that he was a King three & twenty yeeres. More, I thinke, they would haue allowed him, had not the desire of satisfying Berosus caused them to rest content with this. And surely it were greatly to bee wished, that bookes of such antiquitie, as those of Berosus, were extant without corruption; a great light (no doubt) they would yeeld in many darke passages of Antiquitie. I will yet confesse, that were his workes neuer so excellent, and in all things else vnquestionably true, I would not therefore condescend vnto him in some one point, wherein the Scriptures were his open enemy. How much lesse ought I obey a broken fragment of his, containing onely seuen or eight lines, and part euen of the title corrupted, as they beleeue that follow him in the rest? The Scriptures haue told vs that God gaue the Empire to Nabuchadnezzar, to his sonne, and to his sonnes sonne: How long each of them held it, wee finde not expressed; yet would we gladly know it of Berosus, or of any other that would teach vs; provided alwaies, that helping vs in a particularitie, hee destroyed not thereby the generall truth. More words are needlesse. It is enough to say with others, that Berosus or Iosephus who cited him, hath been wronged by the carelesse of Scribes; and that it was as easie for those Scribes to erre in writing two for fixe and twentie, as for three and twentie, or perhaps more easie. For the omission of the second figure, was as likely the one way as the other; and the Character 5. signifying 6. hath a neerer resemblance of 3. than stands for 2. than hath 7. which is vsed for 3. So that the numerall notes 3 5. expressing 2 6. were not safe enough from being mistaken in the true copie, and might be altered, as ill written, if some crooked hand, or other mischance not vnusuall, had omitted the first stroke of the former letter, or added a dash to the latter, which might cause them to seeme not two different figures, but the one a correction of the other, which how it could be supposed in standing for 23. I doe not well perceiue. As for the Arithmetical figures now in vs, they were long after the time of Iosephus brought in by the Arabians; and therefore doe not appertaine vnto this businesse; vnlesse wee should ghesse that his workes were corrupted in that vnlearned age, which following the Saracen conquest, was little occupied in the studies of humanitie, but in a sort wholly giuen ouer to the doctrine of Aristotle. If this will serue to make Berosus our friend, so let it be; if not, I will not purchase the fauour of his authoritie, by forsaking Ieremie and Daniel, when they seeme to bee his opposites.

§. VII.

With what actions this time of 70. yeres was entertained by the Babylonian Kings, few haue written, or little is remaining in record. Which may peradventure haue been some cause that the time it selfe was, and is yet fought to be bridged, as not hauing left sufficient matter to witnesse the length of it. But by such an argument we might as well deny to many people euen their being. For euerie Nation (I know not whom I should except) betwene the beginning and last end of it, hath in some slothfull age rather dreamt away the time, than spent it. It is therefore no maruell, if the posteritie of Nabuchodonosor, finding all things readie to their hand, which their hearts could haue desired, betooke themselves to their ease and pleasures, thinking perhaps, like the prodigall sonnes of greedie fathers, their owne wisdom greater, which knew how to enioy, than that of their Ancestors, which wearied away their daies in the restless trauell of purchasing: Though indeed the reigne of Nabuchodonosor was so diuided, that his youthfull and strongers yeeres hauing bene exercised in victorious armes, no small part of his life was remaining to be spent in establishing what was gotten, and gathering the fruit of his worthie labours past. The nineteenth yeere of his reigne it was, when destroying vterly the great and mightie Citie of Ierusalem, hee enriched himselfe with abundance of spoyle, and terrified all that would offer to resist him, by that fearefull example. From that time forward, hee, vntill his three and twentieth yeere, laboured in the conquest of those adioyning Regions, which God had exposed vnto his sword, and commanded to weare his yoke; namely, the Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, Tyrians, Sidonians, and Egyptians, though some of these were already become his followers, and serued vnder him, when Ierusalem was beaten downe and burnt. But the Tyrians, whose Citie was founded on an Iland, safe enough from any danger of a Land-armie, and whose fleet was so strong, that they needed not to feare any enemy at sea, were neither danted with the fall of their neighbour Cities, nor with the obstinate resolution of this mighty Prince, imploying all his power to their subuersion.

That the Citie of Tyre was rather well pleased, than any way discouraged with the fall of Ierusalem (which had held the same course that Tyrrus did, and endured all that might bee in the same quarrell against the common enemy) it appears by the words which Ezekiel condemneth as the common voyce of Tyrrus; Aha, the gate of the people is broken, it is turned vnto me; for seeing shee is desolate, I shall be replenished. Yet at length, euen in the nineteenth yeere of Nabuchodonosor, that great worke of his, whereof we haue already spoken, began to appeare about the waters, and threaten them with inuincible mischief.

But those prophecies of Ieremie and of Esay, which appoint vnto this desolation of Tyre the same terme of 70. yeeres, that was prescribed vnto the reigne of the Chaldeans, doe plainly plainly shew, that shee followed Ierusalem, the same nineteenth yeere of Nabuchodonosor, in the same, or a very like fortune. The particularities, which doubtlesse were memorable in the issue of so great and laborious a siege, are in a manner vterly lost. Thus much we finde; That the Citizens perceiuing the Towne vnable to hold out, embarked themselves, and fledde into the Isle of Cyprus. Neuertheless it seemes that this euasion serued onely the principall men, who escaping with their goods, abandoned the poorer sort vnto the enemies furie. For not onely such people of Tyre as dwelt on the Continent (who are called her Daughters in the field) were put to the sword; but the like execution was done in the streets, into which, with excessive labour, the Assyrian made way for his Horses and Chariots. Thus Nabuchodonosor caused his Armie to serue a great seruice against Tyrrus, wherein euery head was made bald, and euery shoulder was made bare, yet had hee no wages, nor his Armie; but was faine to rest contented with the Honour of hauing destroyed that Citie, which in all mens iudgements had bene held invincible.

Ierem. 25. Esay. 23. 5.

The destruction of these two great and powerfull Cities, hauing made the name of the Chaldeans dreadfull in the eares of all the Nations thereabout, Nabuchodonosor took the advantage of that reputation which he had obtained by victories already gotten, to the getting of more, and more profitable, with lesse paine. The Kingdome of Egypt was the mark at which he aimed; a Country so abounding in all riches and pleasures, that it might well haue tempted any Prince, finding himselfe strong enough to seek occasion of quarrell against it; and so farre an enemy to the Crowne of Babylon, that had it bene poorer, yet either it must haue bene subdued, or the conquest of Syria could ill haue bene established. Neuertheless it was needfull, that before hee entred into this businesse, the Countries adiacent should bee reduced into such termes, that either they should wholly stand at his deuotion; or at least be vnable to worke him any displeasure. And herein the decree of God concurred, as in all prosperous enterprises, with reason of state. For the people of Moab, Ammon, Edom, Damascus, Kedar, Hazar, and other adioyning Regions, whom God for their finnes had condemned to fall vnder the Babylonian swords, were such, as regarding onely their owne gaine, had some of them, like Rauens, followed the Chaldeen Armie, to feed vpon the carcases that fell by the crueltie thereof; others taking advantage of their neighbours miseries, occupied the Countries which were by his victories belonging to Nabuchodonosor; all of them thinking, that when the Assyrian had satisfied his furie, he should be faine to forsake those desolate parts, and leaue the possession to those that could lay hand vpon it. Particularly the Edomites and Philistines had shewed much malice to the Jewes when their Citie was taken. What good seruice they had done to the Chaldeans, I finde not; if they did any, it is likely to haue bene with reference to their owne purposes, wherein they were disappointed. The Ammonites were not contented to reioyce at the fall of Ierusalem, but presently they entered vpon the Country of Gad, and tooke possession, as if not the Assyrians, but they, had subdued Israel. Neither can I perceiue what other ground that practise had of Baalis King of the Ammonites, when he sent Ismael, a Prince of the bloud of Israhel, to murder Gedalia, whom the King of Babel had left Gouvernour ouer those that remained in Israel, and to carry captiue into the Ammonites Countie the people that abode in Mizpah, than a desire of embroiling Nabuchodonosor with so many labours at once, as should make him retire into his owne Country, and abandon those wasted Lands to himselfe and others, for whom they lay conueniently. Such or the like policie the Moabites did exercise; whose pride and wrath were made frustrate by God, and their dissimulation condemned, as not doing right.

All these Nations had the art of rauening, which is familiar to such as liue or border vpon deserts; and now the time afforded them occasion to shew the vtermost cunning of their treachish wits. But Nebuchadnezzar did cut asunder all their deuices by sharpe and suddaine warre, ouerwhelming them with vnexpected ruine, as it were in one night; according to the prophecies of Esay, Ieremie, and Ezekiel, who fore-told, with little difference of words, the greatnesse and swiftnesse of the miserie that should come vpon them. With which of them hee first began, I finde not; it seemes that Moab was the last which felt his hand: for so doe many good Authors interpret the prophesie of Esay, threatening Moab with destruction after three yeeres, as hauing reference to the third yeere following the ruine of Ierusalem; the next yeere after it being spent in the Egyptian expedition expedition. This is manifest, that all the principall Townes in these Regions were burnt, and the people slaine, or made slaues, few excepted, who being preferred by flight, had not the courage to returne to their habitations ouer-hastily, much lesse to attempt any thing against Nabuchodonosor, but liued as miserable out-lawes, or at least oppressed wretches, vntill the end of the seuentie yeeres, which God had prescribed vnto the desolation of their Countries, as well as of the Land of Juda.

§. VIII.

That Egypt was conquered, and the King therein reigning slaine by Nabuchodonosor, contrary to the opinion of most Authors: who following Herodotus and Diodorus, relate otherwise.

When by a long course of victorie Nabuchodonosor had brought into subiection all the Nations of Syria, and the bordering Arabians, in such wise, that none was mie to him selfe, nor friend of the Egyptian, was left at his backe, that might giue impediment vnto his proceeding, or take aduantage of any misfortune, then did he forth-with take in hand the conquest of Egypt himselfe, vpon which those other Nations had formerly bene depending. Of this expedition, and the victorious issue thereof, the three great Prophets, Esay, Jeremie, and Ezechiel, haue written so plainly, that I hold it altogether needlesse to looke after more authoritie, or to cite for prooffe halfe of that which may be alleaged out of these. Neuerthelesse, wee finde many and good Authors, who following Herodotus, and Diodorus Siculus, are well contented to straine these Prophecies with vnreasonable diligence vnto such a sense, as giues to Nabuchodonosor little more than the honour of hauing done some spoyle in Egypt, omitting the conquest of that Land by the Babylonian, and referring the death of Apries or Hophra to a chance long after following, which had no coherence with these times or affaires. So preposterous is the delight which many men take in the meanes and second helpe conducing to their purpose, that oftentimes they doe preferre the Commentator before the Author; and to vphold a sentence, giuing testimonie to one clause, doe careleslie ouerthrow the historie it selfe, which thereby they sought to haue maintained. The reports of Herodotus and Diodorus, concerning the Kings of Egypt, which reigned about these times, are already rehearsed in the former booke: but that which they haue spoken of Apries, was purposely referred vnto this place. Herodotus doth affirme that he was a very fortunate King, but wherein he telleth not; (vnlesse we should vnderstand that he was victorious in the Warre, which he is said to haue made vpon Tyrus and Sidon) that he reigned fise and twenty yeeres, and was finally taken and put to death by his owne Subiects; who did set vp Amasis, as King, which preuailed against him. The rebellion of the Egyptians he imputeth to a great losse which they received in an expedition against the Cyrenians, by whom almost their whole Armie was destroyed. This calamitie the people of Egypt thought to be well pleasing to their King, who had sent them on this dangerous expedition, with a purpose to haue them consumed, that so he might with greater securitie reigne ouer such as staid at home. So they who escaped, and the friends of such as were slaine, rebelled against Apries, who sent Amasis to appease the tumult; but Amasis became Capitaine of the rebels, and was by them chosen King. Finally, the whole Land consented vnto this new Election; whereby Apries was driuen to trust vnto his forraine Mercenaries, the Ionians and Carians, of whom he kept continually in readinesse thirty thousand good Souldiers that fought valiantly for him, but were at length vanquished by the great number of the Egyptian forces, amounting vnto two hundred and fiftie thousand, which were all by birth and education men of Warre. Apries himselfe being taken prisoner, was gently increased by Amasis for a while, vntill the Egyptians, exclaiming vpon him, as an extreme enemy to the Land, got him deliuered into their hands, and strangled him, yet they gaue him honourable buriall. Such is the report of Herodotus, with whom Diodorus Siculus doth neere agree, telling vs that Apries did vanquish the Cyprians and Phenicians in battell at Sea, tooke by force and demolished Sidon, wanne the other townes of Phenicia, and the Isle of Cyprus, and finally, perished as is before rehearsed, when hee had had reigned two and twentie yeeres. This authoritie were enough (yet not more than enough) to informe vs of Apries his historie, if greater authoritie did not contradict it. But the destruction of Egypt by the Babylonian, foretold by the Prophets, which hath no coherence with these relations, hath greater force to compell our beliefe, than haue the traditions of Egyptian Priests (which the Greeke Historians followed) and greater probabilities to perswade those that looke onely into humane reasons. For Esay prophesied long before of the shamefull captiuitie of the Egyptians, whom the King of Asshur should carry away naked, yong and old, in such wise, that the Iewes, who fled vnto them for deliuerance from the Assyrian, should be ashamed of their owne vaine confidence in men so vnable to defend themselves.

But Ezekiel & Jeremie, as their prophecies were neerer to the time of execution, so they handled this Argument more precisely. For Ezekiel telleth plainly, that Egypt should be giuen to Nebuchadnezzar, as wages for the seruice which he had done at Tyre: Also he recounteth particularly all the chiefe Cities in Egypt, saying, That these by name should be destroyed, and goe into captiuitie, yea, that Pharaoh and all his armie should be slaine by the sword. Wherefore it must needs be a violent exposition of these Prophecies, which by applying the issue of such threatnings to an insurrection and rebellion, concludes all, without any other alteration in Egypt, than change of the Kings person, wherein Amasis did succeed vnto Apries, by force indeed, but by the vniuersall consent of all the people. Certainly, if that notable place of Jeremie, wherein hee foretelleth how the Iewes in Egypt should see Pharaoh Hophra deliuered into the hand of his enemies, as Zedekia had bene, were to be referred vnto the time of that rebellion, whereof Herodotus hath spoken, as the generall opinion hath ouer-ruled it, then was it vainely done of the same Prophet (which God forbid that any Christian should thinke, seeing hee did it by the appointment of God himselfe) to hide in the clay of a Bricke-hill, those very stones, vpon which the throne of Nabuchodonosor should be set, and his pavilion spreadde. Yea then was that prophecie no other than false, which expresse the end of Pharaoh thus: Behold, I will visite the common people of No, and Pharaoh, and Egypt, with their gods and their kings, even Pharaoh, and all that trust in him: and I will deliuer them into the hands of those that seeke their liues, and into the hand of Nebuchadnezzar, King of Babel, and into the hands of his seruants. The cleareness of this prophecy beeing such as could not but refute that interpretation of many other places, which referred all to the rebellion of Amasis, it caused me to wonder what those Commentators would say to it, who are elsewhere so diligent in fitting all to the Greeke historians. Wherefore looking vpon Iunius, who had in another place taken the enemies of Pharaoh Hophra to be Amasis, and his followers, I found him heere acknowledging that the Egyptian Priests had notably deluded Herodotus with lies, coyned vpon a vaine-glorious purpose of hiding their owne disgrace and bondage. And surely it may well be thought, that the historie of Nebuchadnezzar, was better knowne to the Iewes, whom it concerned, than to the Greekes, that scarcely at any time heard of his name. Therefore I see no cause why we should not rather beleeue Iosephus, reporting that Nabuchodonosor in the three and twentieth yeere of his reigne, and the fift yeere of the destruction of Ierusalem, did conquer Egypt, kill the King thereof, and appoint another in his stead, than Herodotus or Diodore, who being meere strangers to this businesse, had no great reason to labour in searching out the truth, but might rest contented with any thing that the Priests would tell them. Now if setting aside all aduantage of authoritie, we should onely consider the relations of Iosephus, and of the Greeke Historians, as either of them might be verified of it selfe by apparant circumstances, without reflecting vpon the Hebrew Prophets, or Egyptian Priests; me thinks the death of Apries can no way be approued as hauing bene wrought by consent of the people, but affords great matter of suspicion; yea, though no man had opposed the reports of Herodotus and Diodore. For the great loue and honor which the Egyptians did beare vnto their Kings, is notorious by the vniuersall testimonie of all others that haue handled the matters of that Countrey, as well as by the report of Diodore himselfe. How then can wee thinke it probable, that Apries hauing wonne great victories, did for one onely losse fall into the hatred of all his people, or which may serue to perswade vs, that a King of Egypt would seeke, or so demean himselfe, that he might be thought to seek the destruction of his naturall subiects? As for that armie of thirtie thousand souldiers, Carians and Ionians, which the King of of Egypt, whom Amasis tooke prisoner, is said to haue kept for his defence: doth it not argue that he was a forrainger, and one that armed himselfe against the Egyptian, wishing them few and weak; rather than any of the Pharaohs, who accounted the force of the Country, as assuredly their owne, as the strength of their owne bodies? It were more tedious then any way needfull, to vse all Arguments that might be alledged in this case. The very death of this supposed Apries, which the clamours of the people obtained of Amasis, who sought to haue kept him aliue, doth intimate that hee was some forren Gouvernour, nor a naturall Prince; otherwise the people would haue desired to saue his life, and Amasis to take it quickly from him. I will not labour any further to dis-prooue that opinion, whereunto I should not haue yeelded, though it had stood vpon a great apparence of truth, considering that the voice of Truth it selfe cries out against it; but leaue the circumstances, prouing the Conquest of Egypt by Nabuchodonosor, to be obserued, where due occasion in course of the storie following shall present them.

How Egypt was subdued and held by Nabuchadnezzar.

IT is a great losse, that the generall Historie of the Word hath suffered, by the spoile and waste which Time hath made of those Monuments, that should haue preferred the memorie of such famous actions as were accomplished by this mightie Prince Nabuchodonosor; wherein, whether his Vertue, or Fortune were greater, it is now vncertaine. That his Victories following the Conquest of Syria, and the Neighbour-Prouinces, were such as did more enlarge his Dominion, than all the former Warres had done, it may easily be gathered out of Ezekiel, who reckoneth vp in his thirtieth chapter (besides the whole Countrey of Egypt) Phut and Lud, with other Nations that may seeme to haue reached out into Mauritania, as people subdued by this great Babylonian. The circumstances of these Warres are either in a mannervenerly lost; but that the victorie was easie and swift, any man shall finde, who will take the paines to conferre the places, wherein the three great Prophets touch this Argument. Thus much I thinke worthy of more particular obseruation; that Pharaoh, who (as is already noted in the former Booke) thought himselfe most safe in Egypt by the well defended situation of his Countrey, did very vnwisely in suffering his enemies to sweepe the way cleane vnto his owne doores, by consuming all his friends and adherents in Syria. For as the labour of this businesse did more harden than wearie the Chaldean Army, so the confidence and vaine securitie of the Egyptians, relying vpon the difficult passages which the enemye was to make thorow the Arabian deserts, and the much aduantage which the great riuer of Nilus would afford vnto themselves, did little auail them in prouision for the war, and much astonish them (as may iustly be thought) in the time of execution: it being vsually seene, that the hearts of men faile, when those helps faile, in which they had reposed more confidence than in their owne vertue. Hitherto the Kingdome of Egypt had flourished vnder the rule of the Pharaohs, about a thousand five hundred and foure score yeeres; but from this time forward it remained forty yeeres without a King, vnder the subiection of the Babylonians; and then at length it began to recouer by little and little the former greatnesse, yet so, that it was neuer dreadfull vnto others, God hauing said of that people, I will diminish them, that they shal no more rule the Nations. For whereas it hath bene said of Pharaoh: I am the sonne of the wife, I am the sonne of the ancient Kings: and whereas he had vanted, The Riuer is mine, and I haue made it; the Princes of Egypt now became fooles, the riuer failed them, the King himselfe was taken and slaine, and that ancient linage quite extinguished. This came to passe in the first yeere after the destruction of Ierusalem, and the three and twentieth of Nebuchadnezzar, at which time (saith Iosephus) Hee slew the King then reigning, placed another in his roome, and carried captiues thence to Babylon, the fewes whom he found in that Countrey. Now concerning the time which Iosephus giues vnto this busines, and the businesse it selfe, I haue already shewed, that it is warrant by all the Prophecies which insinuate the same. As likewise the last destruction of Ierusalem, and carrying away those vnto Babel, who inhabited the miserable ruines of that great city, which was in the same three & twentieth yeere of Nebuchadnezzar, is not vnprobably thought by

good authors to haue bene at the returne from this Egyptian expedition. But whereas Iosephus tels vs, that there was another King put in the roome of Apries by Nebuchadnezzar, we must vnderstand, that he was onely a Viceroy, and not (as some haue mistaken it) thinke that this was Amasis. For to place the beginning of Amasis his reigne in the three and twentieth of Nebuchadnezzar, were as well repugnant vnto the prophecies before alledged, as to all Chronologie and historie. Some there are, which to helpe this inconuenience, imagine that there were two successiue bearing the name of Amasis; others, that there were two Apries, the one slaine by Nebuchadnezzar, the other by Amasis: a question of small importance, because the difference is onely about a name, it being once granted that the person mentioned in Scriptures, was deprived of life and kingdome by the Assyrians. Yet for any thing that I can perceiue, that Apries, of whom the Greeke Historians wrote, could not be the Deputie of Nebuchadnezzar, seeing that he was the Grand-child of Pharaoh Necho, and made warre (as they report) vpon the Phenicians, who were before the Egyptians, become subiect vnto the Crowne of Babylon. I might adde, perhaps, that he whom Nebuchadnezzar left as Gouvernour of Egypt, was more likely to haue had some Chaldean or Assyrian, than Egyptian name; vnlesse we should thinke that he had bene a traytor to his naturall Prince, and so rewarded by the Conquerour with Lieutenantship of the Countrey: about which it were but friuolous to dispute. Thus much in brieue we ought to beleue, that Nabuchodonosor made an absolute Conquest of Egypt; that he was not so foolish as to giue it away, any man may guesse; that he appointed one to rule the Countrey, it is consequent vnto the former; and hath authority of Iosephus; that this Gouvernour (or some successor of his) was afterwards taken and slaine by Amasis, I see probabilitie enough to perswade my selfe, and yet can well be content, that others vse their liberty, and beleue what they list. As for the armie which this Egyptian King Apries is supposed to haue kept of Ionians and Carians; I hold them to be none other than the garisons of mercenary souldiers which were left by the Assyrian for the guard of his Viceroy, & custody of the new subdued Prouince: as likewise the company returning from Cyrene and Barce, who together with the friends of such as were slaine in that expedition, remembered before out of the Greeke Historians, deposited and slew Apries, I take them to haue bene the Egyptian fugitiues, which then recovered their owne Countrey. Sure it is that this Prophecie of Ezekiel was verified, At the end of fortie yeeres will I gather the Egyptians from the people where they were scattered, and I will bring againe the captiuitie of Egypt, and will cause them to returne into the land of Pathros, into the land of their habitation, and they shall be there a small kingdome. If the Egyptian Priests alluded hereunto in the tale which they made of Amasis his obtaining the Kingdome, then are they to be helped with this or the like interpretation; if they denied matter that had no shadow of truth, onely to keepe the Greekes from knowledge of their Countries disgrace; then are they little to be regarded, since we know the truth with them.

THese victories brought the greatnesse of the Assyrian Empire to the full, and from them was reckoned the time of Nebuchadnezzars reigne in sundry places of Scripture. To speake any more of the questions arising about the supputation of Nebuchadnezzar his times, might seeme to be the ouer-handling of one Argument: Yet thus much I will note; that whereas Daniel was carried captiue in the third yeere of Babylonians reigne (which ran along with some part of Nebuchadnezzars first yeere) and was kept in diier three yeeres more, before he was brought into the Kings presence; it could not be the second of Nebuchadnezzars Kingdome, wherein he interpreted the forgotten dreame of the great Image, foretelling the successe of Monarchies, but the second of his Empire. The same or the like may be said of diuers places which referre sundry matters vnto their set yeeres; as that of Ezekiel before cited, where he fore-tels, that Egypt should be giuen in reward for the seruice done before Tyrus, dating his prophecy in the seauen and twentieth yeere; and that of Daniel, placing the erection of the golden Image in the eighteenth yeere: for these yeeres held no dependance vpon either the beginning of Nebuchad-

Nebuchadnezzars kingdome, or of his Empire, nor yet vpon any of the captiuities, but had reference to some memorable actions, omitted in Scripture, and therefore not easie to be found, nor worth the labour of vncertaine search.

Of any warre made by Nebuchadnezzar after such time as he returned from the Conquest of Egypt, I doe not reade: excepting that against Ninurie, the destruction whereof was fore-told by the Prophet Naum. Ninurie had long before beene taken by Merodach (as in due place hath beene shewed) and together with the rest of Assyria made subiect to Babylon. Yet was it left vnder a peculiar King, who rebelling against the Chaldeans, as Iehoiakim and Zedechias, tributary Kings of Juda, had done, tasted likewise of the same fortune. That the destruction of Ninurie followed the Conquest of Egypt, it appeareth by the comparison which Naum the Prophet made betwene this Citie, that was to fall, and the Citie of No in Egypt, that was fallen already. But how long after this came to passe, it is (me thinks) vnpossible to finde out. For whereas it is found in an Hebrew Chronologie, that it was in the first of Nebuchadnezzars reigne; the place of Naum last cited is enough to disprove it. Whereas it is referred by some vnto the first of his Monarchie, which began at the end of the Egyptian warres; the whole Prophecie of Naum which went betwene the one and the other, argueth strongly, that there was a longer space of time intercurrent. So that to enquire into the very yeere of this destruction, or other circumstances of the Warre, whether managed by Nabuchodonosor in person, or by his Lieutenants, were somewhat like vnto the vaine curiositie of Tyberius Caesar, enquiring who was the Mother of Hecuba; or to the like idle paines which he should take, who would seeke to learne what woman that Huzzab Queen of Ninurie was, whose wofull captiuitie the same Prophet Naum likewise did fore-tell.

§. XI.

Of the later time of Nebuchadnezzar; his buildings, madnesse, and death.

Of the time which this great Monarch spent in quiet, I thinke there are no Monuments extant; save those which we finde among the prophecies of Daniel. Among these we may reckon his great workes at Babylon, wherewith he pleased himselfe so well, that he brake out into these glorious words: Is not this great Babel that I haue built for the house of the Kingdome, by the might of my power, and for the honour of my Maiestie? Surely if those things be true that are by Iosephus rehearsed of him out of Berosus and Magasthenes, he might well delight himselfe with the contemplation of such goodly and magnificent buildings. For it is said, That he fortified Babylon with a triple wall; that besides other stately workes, he raised those huge arches wherewith were borne vp the high Orchards, hanging as it were in the ayre, and equalling the tops of Mountaines; which most sumptuous frame, that out-lasteth all the remainder of the Assyrian, and all the Persian Empire, is said to haue beene reared, and finished in fifteene dayes.

But of all this, and other his magnificence, we finde little else recorded, than that (which indeede is most profitable for vs to consider) his ouer-valuing of his owne greatnesse abased him vnto a condition, inferiour to the poorest of men. And not vnderstandedly fell these iudgements of God vpon him. For whereas God had honoured him, not onely with many victories, and much happinesse in his owne life, but with a discouery of things to come after him, yea and had approued the certainty of his dreame, by the miraculous reducing of it into his memory, and interpretation thereof by Daniel the Prophet: he neuertheless became so forgetfull of God, whose wonderfull power he had seene and acknowledged, that he caused a golden image to be set vp and worshipped: ordaining a cruell death as reward vnto them that should dare to disobey his Kingly will and pleasure, which was vtterly repugnant to the law of him that is the King of Kings. Hereof S. Hierome hath well noted; Velox obliuio veritatis, ut qui dudum seruum Dei quasi Deum adorauerat, nunc statuam sibi fieri iubet, ut ipse quasi Deus in statuâ adoraretur: A haec forgetfulness of the truth, that he who so lately had worshipped (Daniel) the seruam of God, as if he had beene God himselfe, should now command a Statua to be erected vnto himselfe, wherein himselfe might be worshipped as God. From this impietie it pleased God to reclaim him, by the strange and wonderfull deliuey of those blessed Saints out of the fiery fornace; who being throwne into it bound, for refusing to commit Idolatry, were assisted by an Angell; preserved from all harme of the fire; loosened from their bands; and finally called out with gracious words, and restored to their former honour, by the King: who amazed at the miracle, made a decree tending to the honour of God, which by erection of his Image he had violated. Yet this deuotion of Nebuchadnezzar was not so rooted in him, that it could bring forth fruit answerable to his hasty zeale. Therefore was he forewarned by God in a dreame of the terrible iudgement hanging ouer his head; which Daniel expounding, aduised him to breake off his sinne by righteousness, and his iniquitie by mercy towards the poore, that there might be an healing of his error. Hereby it seemes that iniustice and cruelty were the faults, for which he was threatned; but this threatening sufficed not vnto his reformation. For that so great a Monarch should be driuen from among men; (according to the tenor of the dreame & interpretation) yea, compelled to dwell with the beasts of the field, and made to eate grasse as the Oxen, was a thing so incredible in mans iudgement, that easily it might be thought an idle dreame, and much more easily be forgotten at the yeeres end. One whole yeeres leasure to repent was giuen to this haughty Prince: which respite of the execution may seeme to haue bred in him a forgetfulness of Gods sentence. For at the end of twelue moneths, walking in the royall Palace of Babel, he was so ouer-joyed and transported with a vaine contemplation of his owne seeming happinesse, that without all feare of Gods heauie iudgement pronounced against him, he vttered those lustie words before rehearsed, in vaunting of the Maiestieall workes which he had reared, as well becomming his maiestieall person. But his high speeches were not fully ended, when a voice from heauen, telling him that his Kingdome was departed from him, rehearsed ouer vnto him the sentence againe, was fulfilled vpon him the very same houre.

That Salomon, and many other Princes, and great ones, haue taken delight in their owne buildings, it cannot any way be doubted; yet I doe not remember that euer I haue read of any, that were punished for reioycing in workes of this kinde (though it is hard in ioy, or any passion of the minde, to keepe a iust measure) excepting onely this Nebuchadnezzar.

The like may be said of Dauid: for other (and some very godly) Kings haue mustred all their forces to the very last man; but few or none haue beene knowne to haue beene punished as Dauid was. Surely I not onely hold it lawfull to reioyce in those good things, wherewith God hath blessed vs; but a note of much vnthankfulness to entertaine them with a full and vnfeeling disposition. Yet as all humane affections, wherein due reference to God is wanting, are no better than obscure clouds, hindring the influence of that blessed light, which clarifies the soule of man, and predisposeth it vnto the brightness of eternall felicitie; so that insolent ioy, which man in the pride of his vaine imagination conceiuech of his owne worth, doth aboue all other passions blast our mindes, as it were with lightning, and make vs to reflect our thoughts vpon our seeming inherent greatnesse, forgetting the whilest him, to whom we are indebted for our very being. Wherefore these malamentis gaudia; The euill ioyes of the minde, were not vnaptly, by the Prince of Latine Poets, bestowed in the entrance of Hell, and placed further inward than sorrowes, cares, and feares: not farre from the yron Cabbins of the Furies. And certainly it is no vnlikely token of vengeance neere at hand, when these vnreasonable flushes of proud and vaine ioy, doe rage in a minde, that should haue beene humbled with a iust repentance, and acknowledgement of ill deserting.

This was verified vpon Nebuchadnezzar, whose punishment was singular and vnexampled. For he ran among beasts in the fields and woods, where for seauen yeeres he liued, not onely as a salvage man, but as a salvage beast, for a beast he thought himselfe, secundum suam imaginationem, as Thomas noteth, and therefore fed himselfe in the same manner, and with the same foode that beasts doe; Not that he was changed in figure externall, according to Mediana, in so much as he appeared a beast to other mens eyes, as S. Hierome in the life of Hilarius (how true God knowes) speaks of a woman that appeared to all other mens sight a Cow, but to Hilarius onely a woman; neither was he changed as Iphigenia the Daughter of Agamemnon was said to be, into a Hinde, nor made a Monster, as Dorotheus and Epiphanius dreamed: but according to S. Ieromes exposition of these words: At the same time was my vnderstanding restored vnto me, &c. Quando dei ci (saith S. Ierome) sensum sibi redditum, ostendit non formam se amisisse, sed mentem; When he saith that his sense was restored vnto him, he shewed that he had not lost his humane shape, but his vnderstanding. Seauen yeeres expired, it pleased God to restore Nabuchodonosor, both to his vnderstanding, and his estate, for which he acknowledged and praised God all the rest of his life, confessing his power, and euermore being; that he was the Lord of heaven and earth, and wrought without resistance what he pleased in both; that his works were all truth, and his waies righteous. Which gaue argument to many of the Fathers, and others, not to doubt of his saluation; namely, S. Augustine, Theodoret, Lyra, Carthusianus, and others. And for that place of Esay the foureteenth, out of which his perdition may be gathered, the aforementioned Authors apply the same to Balthasar, because Isay, both in the thirteenth and foureteenth Chapter, speaketh of the King, and the destruction of Babylon ioyntly.

§. XII. Of Euilmerodach.

HAuing already spoken what I could of the succession and yeeres of Nebuchodonosor, I will not here againe rehearse.

He lost some part of that which his Father had gotten, and left his Kingdome burning in a warre that consumed it to ashes. He lost Egypt by rebellion of the people, in the nineteenth yeere of his reigne, which was fortie yeeres after his Father had conquered it. But this agrees neither with the accompt of Herodotus, who allowes to Amasis foure and fortie yeeres of reigne; nor with that of Diodorus, who giues him fiftie and fiftie, saying that he died in the third yeere of the threescore and third Olympiad, when Cambyfes did conquer Egypt. There were indeede but seauen and thirtie yeeres, which passed betwene the second yeere of the foure and fiftieth Olympiad, (which was the nineteenth of Euilmerodach, and the first of Amasis) and the fift of Cambyfes his reigne, wherein he wan Egypt; of which seauen and thirtie yeeres it is credibly held, that Psammetichus, the sonne of Amasis, reigned three: so that Amasis could be no longer King than foure and thirtie yeeres. But seeing that these two Greek Historians haue bene abused by Egyptian Priests, in the substance of that which was spoken of Amasis, it is no maruell though they were also deceiued in the length of his reigne. This is the plaine answer to this objection. For to say either that the numbers were miswritten, and foure and fortie set down in stead of foure and thirtie, or that Amasis did temporise a while with the Affyrians, and not beare himselfe as absolute King of Egypt, vntill the nineteenth of Euilmerodach (at which time, and not before, it hath bene proued out of Ezechiel, that Egypt became againe a Kingdome) I hold it a superfluous excuse.

Whether these Egyptian troubles did animate the King of the Medes to deale with Euilmerodach, as with a Prince greater in fame and reputation, gotten by the decayed valour of his people, than in present forces; or whether (as I rather thinke) some foyle received by the Affyrian inuading Media, emboldned the Egyptians to rebell against him: I will neither undertake, nor seeke to define. Xenophon tells, that the first seruice of yong Cyrus in warre, was vnder Astages King of the Medes, his Grand-father, in a prosperous fight against the Affyrian Prince, who did set vpon him; at which time Cyrus was fifteene or sixteene yeeres old. If therefore Cyrus liued threescore and three yeeres (as he is said to haue died well stricken in yeeres) which is held to be the ordinary teame of no short life, then was this encounter in the third yeere of Euilmerodach his reigne. Yet by the same reckoning it should follow, that the warre began more early betwene these Nations, for as much as the manner of their fight in former times, with other circumstances insinuating as much, are found in the same place of Xenophon. And it may well be, that the death or destruction of Nabuchodonosor gaue courage vnto those that had felt him a troublesome neighbour, to stand vpon prouder teatimes with the Affyrians, than in his flourishing estate they durst haue vsed. Howsoever the quarrell began, we finde that it ended not before the last ruine of the Affyrian Monarchie. For the Babylonian, being too proud to digest the losses which he receiued by the Medes and their Allies the Persians, drew vnto his partie the Lydians, and all the people of the lesser Asia, with gifts and strong perswasions, hoping so to ouerwhelme his enemies with a strong inuasion, whom in vaine hee had sought to wearie out with a lingring Warre.

This

This happened after the death of Astages, who left the World in the nineteenth yeere of Euilmerodach, at which time Amasis tooke possession of Egypt. So that the Affyrian hauing his hands, already full of businesse, which more earnestly did affect him, seems thereby to haue giuen the better meanes vnto the Egyptians, of new erecting their Kingdome, which by long distance of place did sundry times finde occasion to rebell in after ages, and set vpon a King within it selfe, against the far more mightie Persian.

The issue of these great preparations made by Euilmerodach against the Medes, was such as opened the way vnto the fulfilling of those prophecies, which were many yeeres before uttered against Babel, by Esay and Jeremie.

For the Affyrians, and their Confederates, who, trusting in their numbers, thought to haue buried the Medes and Persians under their thicke showres of arrowes and darts, were encountered with an armie of stout and well-trained men, weightily armed for close fight, by whom they were beaten in open battell, wherein Euilmerodach was slaine: So that great frame of Empire which Nabuchodonosor had raised and vp-held, being shaken and grievously crackt vnder his vnfortunate Sonne, was left to be sustained by his unworthy Nephew: a man more likely to haue ouerthrowne it, when it was greatest and strongest, than to repaire it, when it was in way of falling.

§. XIII.

Apriate coniecture of the Author; seruuing to make good those things, which are cited out of Berofus, concerning the Successors of Euilmerodach, without wrong to the truth. The qualitie, and death of Balthasar.

Hough I haue already (as it seemes to me) sufficiently proued that Balthasar was the Sonne, and immediate Successor to Euilmerodach, yet considering earnestly the coniectures of those Writers, which following Berofus, insert Niglissar, or Nirgassator, and his sonne Labassardach betwene them: as also that which I finde in Herodotus of Nitocris, a famous Queene of Babylon; who greatly adorned and fortified that Citie: I haue thought it not superfluous here in this place to shew, by what meanes it was possible that some error might haue crept into the Historie of those times, and thereby haue brought vs to a needlesse trouble of searching out the truth, as it were by candle-light, in the vncertaine fragments of lost Authors, which we might haue found by day-light, had we adhered onely to the Scriptures. First, therefore I obserue, that the time which Berofus diuides betwixt Euilmerodach, and the two next Kings, agrees with the yeeres in which Nebuchodonosor liued wilde among brute beasts in the open field: Secondly, that the suddainenesse of this accident, which came in one houre, could not but worke much perturbation in that State, wherein doubtlesse the honour of so noble a Prince was highly regarded, his calamitie pittied, and his restitution hoped; the prediction of Daniel finding reputation in that clause which promised his recouerie, as being verified in that which had bin more incredible. Now if we doe in common reason iudge, what course was like to be taken by the great ones of the Kingdome, for setting the government, whilst the King was thus distracted, we shall finde it most likely, that his Sonne and Heire did occupie the royall Throne, with condition to restore it vnto his Father, when God should enable him to repofesse it. In this his rule Euilmerodach being to supply the vnter want of vnderstanding in his Father, as Protectors doe the vnripe of it in yong, but reasonable Kings, might easily either commit the insolencies, or fall into the troubles, incident to such an office. That he had in him very small ability of government, it appears by his ill maintaining the Empire, when he held it in his owne right. That his Sister Nitocris (if Nitocris were his sister) was a woman of an high spirit, so appears by that which Herodotus reports of her, saying that she was more cunning than Semiramis, as appeared in her magnificent and vsfull workes about the Riuer of Euphrates, and her fortification of Babylon against the Medes, who had gotten many Townes from the Affyrians, and amongst them Ninui. Wherefore it were not vnreasonable to thinke, that such a woman, seeing how the Empire went to decay through her brothers misgovernment, vsed practices to get the rule into her owne hands, and afterwards, as a mother, to leane it vnto her vngracious sonne. Other time than this, wherein Nitocris could haue reigned, we doe not finde; but we finde in Berofus (as Iosephus hath cited him) that Niglissar, who got the Kingdome from Euilmerodach, was his sisters husband; husband; which argues this to haue beene the same woman. As for Labassardach the son of Niglissar, if at the end of nine Moneths reigne he were for his lewd conditions slaine by the Nobilitie, as the same Berosus reporteth, it seemes that God prepared hereby the way for Nebuchadnezzars restitution (whose tearme of punishment was then expired) by raising such trouble, as should make him the more desired, both of the Princes and the people. I will not here vse many words to confute that which Berosus hath further set downe of Euilmerodach, telling vs that he was slaine by his sisters husband: for the plaine words of the Scripture, named the yeere wherein he gaue liberty to zechonia, doe plainly testifie that he out-liued the three or foure and fortieth yeere of his Fathers reigne, which was the last of his life.

This may suffice to shew, that they who are said to haue succeeded Euilmerodach in the Kingdome, might indeede haue so done, though not when he held it in his owne right. Of Balthasar, who was his Sonne & Heire, we finde, that he had such conditions, as God permitted to be in a King for the ruine of the people. He was from his young yeeres of a mischieuous nature, hauing in his Fathers time slaine a Noble yong man that should haue married his sister, onely for spight and enuie to see him kill two wilde beasts in hunting, at which himselfe hauing throwne his Iaueline had missed them. Another great Lord he had gelded, because a Gentlewoman commending his beauty, said it were a happy woman that should be his wife. Such barbarous vilanies caused many which had loved his Father (as a good and gracious, though vnfortunate Prince) to reuolt from him: vnto the enemy as soone as he was King. Neither doe I finde that he performed any thing worthy of record, but as a Coward and a Foole he lost all; sitting still, and not once daring to giue battell to them that daily tooke somewhat from him: Yet carelessly feasting when danger had hemmed him in on euery side, and when death arrested him by the hands of those whom he had wronged in his Fathers life. So the end of him was base and miserable; for he died as a foole taken in vnexcusable security, yet had not that happinesse, such as it is, of a death free from apprehension of feare, but was terrified with a dreadfull vision; which had shewed his ruine not in many houres before, euen whilst he was drinking in that wine, which the swords of his insulting enemies drew out of him, together with his latest blood. It is therefore in this place enough to say of him, That after a dishonourable reigne of seauene yeeres, he perished like a beast, and was slaine as he deserued. The rest that concerneth him in question of his time, hath beene spoken heretofore; in matter of his affaires, shall be handled among the acts of Cyrus, to whose storie that of Balthasar is but an appendix.

CHAP. II.

Of the originall and first greatnesse of the Persians.

§. I.

That the Medes were chiefe actors in the subuersion of the Babylonian Empire.

THE Line of Belochus being now extinguished in Balthasar, the Empire of Babylon, and of Assyria, was ioyned first to that of Media, which then was gouerned by Cyaxares or Darius Medus, after whom Cyrus became Lord and Monarch, both of Assyria and of Media it selfe.

Of the race of Phul Belochus there were ten Kings besides himselfe, and of Arbaces as many are found by Metasthenes. These two Prouinciall Gouernours hauing cut downe the last branch of Ninus in Sardanapalus, diuided betweene them the Easterne Empire. Cyaxares (whom the Scriptures call Darius Medus) the last of the race of Arbaces, dying about two yeeres after that the line of Belochus was ended in Balthasar; the Dominions aswell of the Conquerour, as of the conquered, fell to a third Familie, namely, to Cyrus of the house of Achemenes, the Princes of which blood reigning in Persia, had formerly formerly beene dependants on the Medes, and were of as little power at home, as of fame abroad in the World.

Of the Family of the Achemenes, and Line of the Persian Kings, we shall hereafter find occasion in due place to intreat.

The Nation of the Medes descended from Madai the third sonne of Sapher; that they had Kings soone after the flood, Lactantius and Diodorus haue found record; For Lactantius remembreth an ancient King of the Medes called Hydaspes, and Diodore speaketh of Pharnus with his seauen sonnes, slaine by the Assyrian in the beginning of their Empire.

But of these who succeeded Arbaces the first, that freed his Nation from the Assyrians, I take the list and number from Eusebius, adding Darius Medus: of whom I haue spoken in their proper places heretofore; and they are these.

|----------------------|-----------------|-----|---------|
| Arbaces.      | } Who reigned { | 28. | yeeres. |
| Sofarmus.     |                 | 30. | yeeres. |
| Medidus.      |                 | 40. | yeeres. |
| Cardiceas.    |                 | 13. | yeeres. |
| Diocles.      |                 | 53. | yeeres. |
| Phraortes.    |                 | 24. | yeeres. |
| Cyaxares.     |                 | 32. | yeeres. |
| Astyages.     |                 | 38. | yeeres. |
| Darius Medus. |                 |     |         |

And though the Greekes ascribe the conquest of Babylon to Cyrus alone, yet the Scriptures teach vs, that Darius was not onely King of Media, and had the Persians his followers, but that the Armie victorious ouer Balthazar was his; as the Assyrian and Babylonian Empire also was during his owne life. For we finde in Daniel, that Darius of the Medes tooke the Kingdome being threescore and two yeeres old: And further, what Officers it pleased him to set ouer the Kingdome. And so was it prophesied by Isay long before: Behold, I will stirre up the Medes against them, &c. And by Jeremie; The Lord hath raised up the Spirit of the King of the Medes: for his purpose is against Babel to destroy it; and in the eight and twentieth Verse, Prepare against her the Nations, with the King of the Medes, the Dukes thereof, the Princes thereof, and all the Land of his Dominion. These Scriptures Julius Africanus doth well open, who taking authority from Diodore, Castor, Thallus, and others, deliuereth that Babylon was taken before Cyrus began to reigne, which also agreeth with Strabo, where he saith, That as the Medes were subjugated by the Persians, so before that, both the Babylonians and Assyrians were mastered by the Medes. And therefore the reports of Iustine, and Herodotus, are not to be receiued, who attribute the taking of Babylon to Cyrus alone.

§. II.

By what meanes the Empire was translated from the Medes to the Persians.

Now the Kingdome of the Medes fell into the hands of Cyrus, it is a doubt not sufficiently cleared by Historians, but rather their different relations of his beginnings haue bred the former opinion of those who giue the conquest of Babel to the Persian onely. For somethere are who denie that Astyages had any other Successour than Cyrus his Grand-child by Mandane. Whereas Ctesias on the contrary side affirmeth, that Cyrus was no way descended from Astyages (whom he calleth Astiges or Apania) but onely that hauing vanquished him in battaile, and confined him to Bactria, he married his daughter Amysis. But I finde the relations of Ctesias often cited and seldome followed, and himselfe sometimes very iustly reprobued of wilfull vntruth.

Vignier a diligent and learned Historian of this age, produceth many probable reasons that Astyages had no such sonne as Cyaxares, or Darius Medus; and to confirme his opinion the more, he citeth Diodore, Iustine, Strabo, Plato, Aristotle, Isocrates, and before them Castor, Thallus, and Phlegon, who doe not finde any such Successor. Neither doe Tatianus, Theophilus Antiochenus, Iulius Africanus, Clemens Alexandrinus, Iustine Martyr, Lactantius, Eusebius, S. Hierome, or S. Augustine, make report out of any faithfull Author by them read, that hath giuen other Son or Successour to Astyages than Cyrus.

Yet seeing that this manner of argument ab autoritate negatiue, doth neuer inforce consent; we may be the bolder (all this great list of noble Writers by him alleaged notwithstanding) to affirme that either Astages himselfe must haue bene Darius of the Medes, which cannot agree with his place in the course of time; Or else to giue him some other Successour, according to Iosephus and Xenophon, the same whom Daniel calleth Darius. For it is manifest, and without dispute, that the King of the Medes commanded in chiefe, and was absolute Lord of that Conquest, Cyrus during his life, being no other than the Lieutenant of his Armie, and subiect to his authoritie; The strength of both Nations, to wit, the Medes and Persians, with other the Vassals of Darius, being ioyned together to compound it.

But it is very certaine that the honour of that great victorie ouer Babylon was wholly giuen to Cyrus, who was the instrument preordained and forenamed by God himselfe, for this action, but for the deliuey of his Church; a greater worke not onely in the eyes of God, than the subuersion of any State or Monarchie, how powerfull soeuer.

And it may well be thought, that the Souldiers employed in that seruice did rather ascribe the glory to him that was the best man of Warre, than to the Median, who was greatest in riches and power. All which also falling vpon Cyrus by succession, and continuing in his posteritie, did much augment the fame of his vertue, which among prophane Historians ouergrew altogether the honour due to Cyaxares, both because he was old, and did nothing in person; as also because he soone after quitted the world, and left all to Cyrus, who was posselt of whatsoeuer belonged to Darius, before the fame of any such King or Conqueror was carried farre off.

And for the Greeke Historians, they tooke all things from the relation of the Persians, who gaue to Cyrus all the praise of a most excellent Prince, making none his equall. Onely Daniel in the first, fift, and sixt Chapters of his prophecies, makes it plaine, that himselfe not onely liued a great Officer vnder King Darius, but that he continued in that estate to the first of Cyrus, which being the yere of Daniels death, could not haue bene distinguishing from the reigne of Darius, if they had begun together and reigned ioyntly; Neither can it be imagined that Darius held the Kingdome by Cyrus permission, considering that Cyrus began after him.

§ III.

Xenophons relation of the Warre with the Medes and Persians, made with ioynt forces vpon the Assyrians, and others.

THese Testimonies of the Scriptures, which neede no other confirmation, yet made more open to our vnderstanding, by that which Xenophon hath written of these wars: The cause whereof, according to his report, was this.

Vhen the Assyrian had enlarged his Empire with victories, and was become Lord of all Syria, and many other Countries, he began to hope that if the Medes could be brought vnder his subiection, there should not then bee left any Nation adioynning able to make head against him. For the King of the Medes was able to bring into the field three score thousand foot, and ten thousand horse, to which the forces of Persia being ioyned, made an exceeding strong Armie.

The Assyrian considering the strength of such a Neighbour, inuited Cræsus King of Lydia, a Prince very mighty both in men and treasure, and with him other Lords of Asia the lesse to his assistance, alleaging that those Easterne Nations were very powerfull, and so firmly conioyned by league and many alliances, that it would not be easie, no not possible, for any one Nation to resist them. With these incitements, and strengthened with great presents, he drew to himselfe so many adherents, as he compounded an Armie of two hundred thousand foot, and three score thousand horse; of which, tenne thousand horse, and fortie thousand foot were ledde by Cræsus, who had great cause of enmitie with the Medes, in regard of the Warre made by them against his Father Ahyattes; But this great Armie was by Cyaxares King of the Medes, and by Cyrus Generall of the Persian forces, vtterly broken; Vpon which defeat the Assyrian King being also slaine, so many of the Assyrians reuolted, as Babylon it selfe could not longer bee assured without the succours of Mercenaries, waged with great summes of money out of Asia the lesse, Agypt, and elsewhere. Which new gathered forces were were also scattered by Cyrus, who following his aduantage, posselt himselfe of a great part of the lesser Asia; at which time it was, as I take it, that Cræsus himselfe was also made prisoner.

The attempt of Babylon following soone after, the Armie lying before it being paid by Darius, whom Xenophon calleth Cyaxares, and led by Cyrus his sisters son, preuailed against Balthasar, as in due time shall be set downe.

Those Persians which followed Cyrus, and by him leuied, are numbred thirtie thousand foot-men, of which a thousand were armed Gentlemen, the rest of the common sort were Archers, or such as vsed the Dart or Sling. So farre Xenophon. Of whom in this argument, as it is true, that he described in Cyrus the patterne of a most Heroicall Prince, with much poetical addition: So it cannot be denied, but that the bulke and grosse of his Narration was founded vpon meere Historiicall truth.

Neither can it indeede be affirmed of any the like Writers, that in euery speech and circumstance he hath precisely tyed himselfe to the phrase of the speaker, or nature of the occasion, but borrowed in each out of his owne inuention, appropriating the fame to the times and persons of whom he treated. Putting therefore apart the Morall and Politique discourse, and examining but the Historie of things done, it will easily appeare, that Xenophon hath handled his vnder-taken subiect in such sort, that by beautifying the face thereof, he hath not in any sort corrupted the body.

§. IIIL.

OR it is commonly agreed vpon, that Achæmenes the sonne of Perses being Governour of Persia, did associate himselfe with Arbaces, who commanded in Media in that rebellion against Sardanapalus, and that each of them after the victorie obtained, held for himselfe the Dominion of those Countries, which he had formerly ruled for the Assyrians; as also that they conueyed ouer the same honour and power to their posteritie; which in Media was not absolutely Regall, but with some restraint limited, vntill such time as Deioces tooke vpon him the full authoritie and maiestie of a King. From the death of Sardanapalus to the reigne of Deioces, are vsually accounted about an hundred and forty yeeres, in the last sixtie whereof there reigned in Assyria mighty Princes, namely, Salmannassar and his Successours, whose great archieuevements in Syria and elsewhere, witnesse, that the Medes and Persians found it not for their aduantage to vndertake any offensive warre against those victorious Kings, it being also probable that the league continued as yet betweene these the successours of Belochus, and Arbaces, who had formerly shared the Empire.

Now from the beginning of Deioces to the first of Astages, there past about nine yeeres, in which if Herodotus haue written truly, that Phraortes conquered Persia, and how he and other Kings of Media by many victories greatly enlarged their dominions, and commanded many parts of Asia, it had bene but an vnaduised enterprize of the Assyrians and Babylonians, to haue wasted themselves against the Syrians and Aegyptians, leaving so able and victorious a Nation on their backs. But that the Medes had done nothing vpon the South parts of Persia; and that the Persians themselves were not masters of Susiana in Nabuchodonosors time, it is manifest in Daniel, who was then Governour for the Babylonian in Susa or Susan, the chiefe Citie thereof. It is true indeede, that the Medians, either vnder Cyaxares or Astages, or both, had quarrell with Ahyattes the father of Cræsus, which after some fixe yeeres dispute was compounded.

How the affaires of Persia stood in so many ages, I doe not finde any memory. It seemeth that the roughnesse of the mountainous Countrey which they then posselt, with the confederacie which they continued with the Medes, gaue them more security than fame: For if their Kings, being the posteritie of Achæmenes, had done any memorable acts, the greatnesse which they afterward obtained would not haue suffered any forgetfulness thereof. But as we finde all Xenophons reports, both of these Warres and the state of those Countries to be very consonant and agreeable to the relation of many other good Authors, so it appeares, that the race of Achæmenes held the Principallie of Persia from Father to Sonne for many descents. And therefore we may better giue credit to Xenophon, who affirmeth, That Cambyſes the father of Cyrus was King of Persia: than to those that make him a meane man, and say, that Aſtiages gaue him his daughter Man-dane in marriage, to the end that her ſon (whose nativity he feared) might be diſabled from any great vndertaking by his fathers ignobilitie.

For what cauſe of griefe could it be to Aſtiages, that the ſonne of his daughter ſhould become Lord of the beſt part of Aſia? No; it was more likely, that vpon ſuch a Prophe-cie his loue to his grand-childe ſhould haue encreaſed, and his care beene the greater to haue married her to ſome Prince of ſtrength and eminent vertue.

Yea, the ſame Herodotus, who is the firſt Author, and as I thinke the deuiler of the miſchiefe intended againſt Cyrus by his Grandfather, doth confeſſe, That the line of the Achemenide was ſo renowned, that the great King Xerxes in the height of his proſperitie did thence deriue himſelfe, and vaunt of it: which hee would neuer haue done, had they beene ignoble, nor had they beene the vaſſals of any other King or Monarch.

  Arſamnes.

{ Hyaſpes.

Of the Achemenide there were two races: of the firſt was Cyrus the great, whose iſſue male failed in his two ſonnes, Cambyſes and Smerdis. This royall family is thus ſet downe by the learned Reineccius.

Achemenes, the ſonne of Perſes, firſt King of Persia.

Darius.

Cyrus, the firſt of that name, had Cambyſes and Atossa, who married to Pharnaces, King of Cappadocia, had Artyſtona and other daughters.

Cambyſes had

Cyrus the Great, Cyrus had

Cambyſes, who ſucceeded him, and Smerdis ſlaine by his brother Cambyſes.

Of the ſecond were thoſe ſeauen great Princes of Persia, who hauing ouerthrowne the vſurped royaltie of the Magi, choſe from among themſelues Darius the ſonne of Hyaſpes King.

This Kingdome of Persia was firſt knowne by the name of Elam, ſo called after Elam the ſonne of Sem, and the people therein inhabiting, Elamites; by Elianus, Elyma; by Iſo-phus, Elymi.

*Euseb. l. 6. c. 8. de

Suidas deriues this Nation ſometimes from Aſſur, ſometime from Magog, of whom they were called Magnſei, which Magnſei, according to Eusebius, are not to be taken for the Nation in generall, but for thoſe who were afterward called the Magi or Wiſe men. So doe the Greekes, among many other their ſayings of them, affirme, That the Persians were anciently written Artai, & that they called themſelues Cephenes. But that they were

And that Citie which the Author of the ſecond booke of the Maccabees calleth Perſe-polis, is by the Author of the firſt called Elimaïs, but is now called Siras, being the ſame which Antiochus, for the great riches thereof, twice attempted in vaine, and to his great diſhonour. And yet this Citie, now called Siras, was not the old Perſepolis; for Alexan-der, at the requeſt of Thais the Harlot, burnt it.

The firſt King of Persia to vs knowne, if we follow the current of Authors interpreting the fourteenth chapter of Genesis, was Chedorlaomer, who liued with Amraphel or Nimias, and ioyned with him in the warre againſt thoſe Arabians; who was afterward extinguiſhed by the forces of Abraham.

Of Cyrus.

§. I.

Of Cyrus his name, and firſt actions.

Touching the name of Cyrus, Strabo ſaith, That the ſame was taken from a Riuer which watereth Persia; this great Prince hauing Agradatus for his proper name. But the great Cyrus was not the firſt of that name. Herodotus otherwiſe; and that Cyrus ſignifieth a father in the Persian Tongue, and therefore ſo intitled by the people.

It is true that for his Juſtice and other excellent vertues he was indeede called a Father; but that the name of Cyrus had any ſuch ſignification, I thinke it be miſtaken.

Plutarch hath a third opinion, affirming, That Cyrus is as much to ſay as the Sunne in the ſame Language. Howſoeuer it be, yet the Prophet Eſay, almoſt two hundred yeeres before Cyrus was borne, giues him that name, Thus ſaith the Lord vnto Cyrus, his Anointed, &c.

Before the Conqueſt of Babylon, the victories which Cyrus obtained were many and great: among which, the Conqueſt of Lydia, and other Prouinces thereto ſubieſt, together with the taking of Craſus himſelfe, are not recounted by Eusebius, Oroſius, and others, but placed among his latter atchieuements: whose opinion for this difference of time is founded vpon two reaſons; namely, That of the Median there is no mention in that laſt warre againſt Craſus: and that the obtaining of Sardis is referred to the eight and fiftieth Olympiad, and the glorious victory which Cyrus had ouer Babylon, to the ſiue and fiftieth Olympiad.

The former of which might haue bene vſed (and was by the Greekes) to exclude the Medes from the honor of hauing won Babylon it ſelfe, which in due place I haue answered. The latter ſeemes to haue reference to the ſecond Warre which Cyrus made vpon Lydia, when it rebelled; at which time he ſo eſtabliſhed his former Conqueſt, as after that time theſe Nations neuer offered to reuolt. Wherefore I like better in this particular to beleeue with Herodotus, whom the moſt of Chronologers follow, and finde the enterpriſe of Sardis to precede that of Babylon.

§. II.

Of Craſus the King of Lydia, who made warre vpon Cyrus.

HAue in the laſt Booke ſpoken ſomewhat of Craſus, of his race and predeceſſors, as alſo of thoſe Kings which gouerned Lydia in more ancient times: of which the firſt (to prophane Authors knowne) was Lydus the ſonne of Atys: Which familie extinguiſhed, the Kingdome was by an Oracle conferred vpon Argon, deſcended from Hercules, whereof there were two and twentie generations, Candaules being the laſt, who by ſhewing his faire Wife naked to Gyges his fauorite, he was by the ſame Gyges (thereto vrged vpon perill of his owne life by the Queene) the next day ſlaine. Which done, Gyges enioyed both the Queene and the Kingdome of Lydia, and left the ſame to Atys his ſonne, who was father to Sadyattes, the father of Halyattes (who thruſt the Cimerians out of Aſia) and Halyattes begat Craſus: Which ſiue Kings, of a third race, enioyed that Kingdome an hundred and ſeauenty yeeres. Halyattes the father of Craſus was an vnder-taking Prince, and after he had continued a warre againſt Cyaxares the Median, a Prince very powerfull, and maintained it fixe yeeres: a peace was concluded vpon equal conditions betwene them.

Aſtiages, the ſonne of Cyaxares, and grandfather to Cyrus, thought himſelfe greatly honoured by obtaining Argenes, Craſus ſiſter, whom he married.

Bur

But Craesus so farre enlarged his dominions after his fathers death, as he was nothing inferior in territorie to any King or Monarch of that age: Of which, about that time there were foure in effect of equall strength, to wit, the Median, the Babylonian, the Egyptian and the Lydian: onely Nabuchodonosor, after he had ioyned Phenicia, Palestina, and Egypt to his Empire, had thence-forward no competitor during his owne life.

But Craesus, notwithstanding the men and treasure spent in the quarrell of the Babylonians, he yet mastered Aolis, Doris, and Ionia, Prouinces posselt by the Greekes in Asia the lesse, adioyning to Lydia, gaue law to the Phrygians, Bithynians, Carians, Mysians, Paphlagonians, and other Nations. And that he also inforst the Ephesians to acknowledge him, notwithstanding they compassed their citie with Dianaes girdle. Herodotus witnesseth. Moreouer, Athenius out of Berosus (which also Strabo confirmeth) makes report of a Signall victory which Craesus obtained against the Sacians, a Nation of the Scythians, in memory whereof the Babylonians his allies did yeerely celebrate a Feast, which they called Sacaea: All which he performed in fourteene yeeres.

And being now confident in the continuance of his good fortune, and enuious of Cyrus fame, doubting also, that his prosperous vndertakings might in the end grow perilous to himselfe, he consulted with the Oracle of Apollo, whom he presented with maruellous rich gifts, what successe he might hope for against Cyrus, if he vnderooke him: from whom he received this riddle; Craesus passing ouer the River Halys, shall dislose a great dominion. For the diuell being doubtfull of the successe, payed him with merchandise of both sides like, and might be inuerterd either way to the ruine of Persia, or of his owne Lydia.

§. III.

¶ Ereupon Craesus being resolved to stop the course of Cyrus fortunes, if he could, despised all the arguments vsed by Sandanes to the contrary, who desired him to fore-thinke, That he vrged a Nation inhabiting a barren and mountainous Region, a people not couered with the soft silke of wormes, but with the hard skins of beaſts, not fed with such meat as they fancied, but content with what they found; drinkers of water, not of wine: and in a word, a Nation warlike, enduring, valiant and prosperous; ouer whom if he became victorious, hee could thereby enrich himselfe in nothing but fame, in which he already excelled: and if by them beaten, and subiected, so great would his losse appeare of all things which the world hath in account, as the same could neither hastily be told, nor readily conceiued.

Notwithstanding this solide Counsaile, Craesus hauing prepared a powerfull armie, he led the same towards Media, but in his passage, he was arrested at Pterium, a Citie of great strength in Cappadocia, which while he fought by all meanes to surprize or to force, Cyrus came on, and found the Lydians encamped before it. That each was inferior to other in strength or opinion, I doe not finde: for out of doubt, Craesus as he excelled any Prince of that age in riches and ability; so was he not vnder any in territorie and fame that then liued.

But as Cratippus of Mitylene answered Pompey when he complained against the gods, because they fauoured a disturber and vsurper of the Common-weale against him who fought for the Romane liberty, That Kingdomes and Commonweales had their encrease and period from diuine Ordinance: so at this time was the Winter of Craesus prosperity at hand, the leaves of his flourishing fortune ready to fall, and that of Cyrus but in the flower and first spring. The God of all power, and not Admetus Herdman, Apollo, had giuen date to the one, and a beginning of glory to the other.

When these two Armies were in view of each other, after the entertainment of diuers skirmishes, the Persians and Lydians began to ioine in grosse troups: supplies from both Kings thrust on vpon the falling off, and aduancement of either Nations: and as the Persians had somewhat the better of the day, so when the darke vaile of night had hidden each armie from the others view, Craesus doubting what successe the rising Sunne would bring with it, quitted the field to Cyrus, and with all speede possible retrayed, and taking the next way into Lydia, recovered Sardis his first Citie and Regall Seat, without any pursuit made by Cyrus to retard him. Where being arriued, and nothing suspecting Cyrus approach, or any other warre for that Winter, hee dismissed the souldiers, and sent the troups of his sundry Nations to their owne Prouinces, appointing them to re-assemble at the end of siue moneths, acquainting his Commanders with his intents for the renewing of the warre at the time appointed.

§. IIII.

The Conquest of Lydia by Cyrus.

¶ Cyrus in the following morning finding the Lydians departed, put his armie in order to pursue them, yet not so hastily, and at their heeles, as to be discovered. But hauing good intelligence of Craesus his proceeding, he so measured his marches, as he presented not himselfe before Sardis, till such time as Craesus had disposed his armie to their Wintering garrisons: which being altogether vnlooked for, and vnfeared, hee surrounded Sardis with his Armie: Wherein Craesus hauing no other Companies than his Citizens and ordinary Gards, after fourteene dayes siege the same was entred by assault, and all executed that resisted. Craesus hauing now neither armes to fight, nor wings to flye, Sardis being on all parts strongly encompassed, thrust himselfe into the heape and miserable multitude of his vassals, and had vndergone the common fortune of common persons vanquished, had not a sonne of his, who had beene dumbe all his life (by extremitie of passion and feare enabled) cried out to the souldiers to spare Craesus. Who thereupon being taken and imprisoned, despoyled of all things but the expectation of death, he was forthwith tied in fetters, and set on the top of a grear and high heape of wood, to be consumed to ashes thereon. To which when the fire was set and kindled, remembering the discourse which hee had with the Athenian Law-giuer, he thrice cried out on his name, Solon, Solon, Solon: and being demanded what he meant by that inuocation, he first vsed silence: but vrged againe, he told them, That hee had now found it true which Solon had long since told him, That many men in the race and courses of their liues might well be accounted fortunate, but no man could discern himselfe for happy indeed, till his end.

Of which answer Cyrus being speedily informed, remembering the changes of fortune and his owne mortalitie, hee commanded his ministers of Iustice to withdraw the fire with all diligence, to saue Craesus, and to conduct him to his presence: Which done, Cyrus demanded of him, Who it was that had perswaded him? Or what selfe reason had conducted him to invade his territory, and to make him of a friend an enemy? To whom he thus answered, It was thy prosperous, and my vnprosperous destinie (the Græcian god flattering therewithall my ambition) that were the inuenters and conductors of Craesus warre against Cyrus.

Cyrus being pierst with Craesus answer, & bewailing his estate, though victorious ouer it, did not only spare his life, but entertained him euer after as a King and his companion, shewing therein a true effect of mercy indeed, Que non causam sed fortunam spectat.

And herein is the reall difference discerned between that behauiour which we call Beneficium latronis, & gratiam Principis: A theefe sometime sparing the life of him which is in his power, but vniustly: A King that giueth breath, and a continuance of being, to him that was the cause and author of his owne euill.

The report made by Xenophon is, That Cyrus did friendly entertaine Craesus at the first sight, not mentioning that which Herodotus deliueis, and is here already set downe, that hee should haue beene burnt alieue. It may very well be, that Xenophon pourtraying (in Cyrus) an heroycall Prince, thought an intent so cruell, fitter to bee forgotten than rehearsed, as too much mis-be seeming a generous nature. And it is very likely, so that necessity of alliance might with-hold Cyrus (had hee beene otherwise vicious) from so cruell a purpose against his grandmothers brother. Howsoever it was, the Moral part of the storie hath giuen much credit and reputation to the report of Herodotus (as to many the like it often doth) and made it passe for currant, though the trust reposed in Craesus afterwards may seeme to argue, that Cyrus did not vse him inhumanely at the first.

For as Herodotus himselfe telleth vs, when Cyrus past with his Armie ouer Araxes into Scythia, he left Craesus to accompanie and aduise his sonne Cambyſes, Gouvernour of the Empire in his absence, with whom he liued all the time of Cyrus, & did afterward follow Cambyſes.

But in this time the races of three of the greatest Kings in that part of the world tooke end; to wit, of the Babylonians, Medians and Lydians; in Balthasar, Cyaxares, and Cresus.

§. V.

How Cyrus wonne Babylon.

After this Lydian warre ensued the great Conquest of Babylon, which gaue vnto Cyrus an Empire so large and mighty, that he was iustly reputed the greatest Monarch then liuing vpon earth. How long time the preparations for this great action tooke vp, it is vncertaine; onely it seemes, that tenne whole yeeres did passe betweene his taking those two Cities of Sardes and Babylon, which neuerthelesse I doe not thinke to haue beene wholly occupied in prouision for the Assyrian warre, but rather to haue beene spent in settling the Estate which hee had already purchased. And heereunto perhaps may be referred that which Ctesias hath in his fragments of a warre made by Cyrus vpon the Scythians, though related as foregoing the victorie obtained against Cresus. He telleth vs, That Cyrus inuaded Scythia, and being victorious ouer that Nation, took Amorges their King prisoner: but being in a second battell ouerthrowne by the wife of Amorges, Sparetha, & therein taken, the one King was deliuered for the other.<sup>20</sup>

Likewise it may be thought, that no small part of those troubles which arose in the lower Asia, grew soone after the departure of the victorious armie, before the Conquest was fully established.

For after Cyrus was returned out of Asia the lesse, many Nations, conquered formerly by Cresus, and now by Cyrus, reuolted from him; against whom he employed Pactias, and then Harpagus, who first reduced the Phocians vnder their former obedience: and then the rest of the Greekes inhabiting Asia the lesse, as the Ionians, Carians, Aolians, and Lydians, who resolutely (according to the strength they had) defended themselves. But in the attempt vpon Babylon it self, it is not to be doubted, that Cyrus employed all his forces, hauing taken order before-hand, that nothing should be able to diuert him, or to raise<sup>30</sup> that siege, and make frustrate the worke vpon which he did set all his rest. And great reason there was, that he should bend all his care and strength vnto the taking of that Citie, which beside the fame and reputation that it held, as being head of an Empire thereon depending, was so strongly fenced with a treble wall of great height, & surrounded with waters vnfordable, so plentifully victualled for many yeeres, that the inhabitants were not onely free from all doubt and feare of their estate, but despised and derided all purposes and power of their besiegers.

The onely hope of the Medes and Persians, who despaired of carrying by assault a Citie so well fortified and manned, was in cutting off all supplies of victuals and other necessities; whereof though the Towne was said to be stored sufficiently for more than<sup>40</sup> twenty yeres, yet might it well be deemed, that in such a world of people as dwelt within those gates, one great want or other would soone appeare, and vanquish the resolution of that vnwarlike multitude. In expecting the successe of this course, the besiegers were likely to endure much trauell, and all in vaine, if they did not keepe streight watch and strong guards vpon all quarters.

This was hard to doe, in regard of the vast circuit of those walls which they were to gird in, with numbers neither great enough, nor of men sufficiently assured vnto their Commander: The consideration whereof ministred vnto the Babylonians matter of good pastime, when they saw the Lydians, Phrygians, Cappadocians, and others, quartered about their Towne to keepe them in, who hauing beene their ancient friends and allies, were<sup>50</sup> more likely to ioyne with them, if occasion were offered, than to vse much diligence on the behalfe of Cyrus, who had, as it were, yesterday laid vpon their neckes the galling yoke of seruitude. Whilest the besieged were pleasing themselves in this deceitfull and vaine gladnesse, that is the ordinarie fore-runner of suddaine calamitie; Cyrus, whom the Ordinance of God made strong, constant, and inuentiue, deuised by so many channels and trenches as were sufficient and capable of Euphrates, and so to draw the same from the walls of Babylon, thereby to make his approach the more facile and assured: which when by the labour of many hands hee had performed, he he stayed the time of his aduantage for the execution: for he had left certaine bankes or heads vncut, betweene the maine riuer which surrounded the Citie, and his owne Trenches.

Now Balthasar, finding neither any want or weakenesse within, nor any possibilitie of approach for his enemies without, prepared an exceeding sumptuous feast, publicke Plaies and other Pastimes, and thereto inuited a thousand of his Princes or Nobilitie, besides his wiues, curtizans, and others of that trade. This he did either to let the besiegers know, that his prouisions were either sufficient, not onely for all needefull vses, but euen for iollitie and excessse: Or because he hoped that his enemies, vnder the burthen of many distresses were well neere broken, or in honour of Bel his most reuerenced Idoll: Or that it was his birth or coronation day: Or for many or all these respects. And he was not contented with such magnificence as no Prince else could equal, but (vsing Daniels words) he lifted himselfe up against the Lord of Heauen: For he and his Princes, wiues and concubines, made carowling cups of the Vessels of God, in contempt of whom he praised his owne puppets, made of Siluer and Gold, of Brasse, Iron, Wood, and Stone, Quanta fuit stultitia in vasibus aureis bibentes, ligneos & lapideos Deos laudare; How great a foolishnesse was it (saith S. Hierome,) drinking in golden Cups, to praise gods of wood and Stone. While Balthasar was in this sort triumphing, and his braines well filled with vapors, hee beheld a hand, which by diuine power wrote on the wall opposite vnto him certaine words so which he vnderstood not: wherewith so great a feare and amazement seized him, as the ioynts of his loynes were loosed, and his knees smote one against the other. Which passion when he had in some part recovered, he cried out for his Caldeans, Astrologians, and Southsayers, promising them great rewards, and the third place of honour in the Kingdome to him that could reade and expound the writing; but it exceeded their Art. In this disturbance and astonishment the Queene hearing what had past, and of the Kings amazement, after reuerence done, vsed this speech: There is a man in thy Kingdome, in whom is the spirit of the holy Gods, and in the dayes of thy father, light, and vnderstanding and wisdom, like the wisdom of the Gods, was found in him, whom the King Nabuchodonosor thy father, the King (I say) thy father made chiefe of the Enchanters, Astrologians, Chaldeans, and Southsayers, because a more excellent spirit, and knowledge, and vnderstanding, &c. were found in him, euen in Daniel, &c. Now let Daniel be called, and he will declare the interpretation.

This Queene, Ioseph takes for the grandmother; Origen and Theodoret for the mother of Balthasar; either of which may be true: for it appeareth, that she was not any of the Kings wiues, because absent from the feast; and being past the age of dancing and bariqueting, she came in vpon the bruit of the miracle, and to comfort the King in his distraction: and whereas Daniel was forgotten and neglected by others both of younger yeeres and times, this old Queene remembred well what hee had done in the daies of Nabuchodonosor, grandfather to this Balthasar, and kept in minde both his religion and diuine gifts.

When Daniel was brought to the Kings presence, who acknowledged those excellent graces wherewith God had enriched him; he prayed him, together with promises of reward and honour, to reade and interpret those words miraculously written; to whom Daniel made answer in a farre different style from that he vsed towards his Grandfather: for the euill which he foretold Nabuchodonosor, he wished that the same might befall his enemies, but to this King (whose neglect of God and vice he hated) he answered in these words, Keepe thy rewards to thy selfe, and giue thy gifts to another, yet will I reade the writing vnto the King, and shew him the interpretation: Which before he had performed, he gaue him first the cause of Gods iust iudgement against him, and the reason of<sup>50</sup> this terrible sentence; whereof the King and all his Wise men were vnterly ignorant: Which being written at large in Daniel, hath this effect: That forgetting Gods goodness to his Father, whom all Nations feared and obeyed; and that for his pride and neglect of those benefites, as hee deprived him of his estate and vnderstanding; so vpon the acknowledgement of Gods infinite power he restored him to both. This King notwithstanding lifted himselfe vp against the same God; and presuming both to abuse those vessels dedicated to holy vses, and neglecting the Lord of all power, praised and worshipped the dead Idols of Gold, Siluer, Brasse, Iron, Stone, and Wood: and therefore those words, from the Oracle of a true God deliuered, (to wit) Mene Tekel, P'phar sin, gaue gave the King knowledge, that God had numbred the time of his Kingdom, and finished it: That he was weighed in the ballance of Gods iustice, and found too light; and that his Empire was diuided and giuen to the Medes and Persians.

The very evening or night of this day, wherein Balthazar feasted and perished, Cyrus either by his espiall, according to Xenophon, or inspired by God himselfe, whose ensigne he followed in this warre, found the time and opportunitie to inuite him: and therefore while the Kings head, and the heads of his Nobilitie were no lesse filled with the vapors of wine, than their hearts with the feare of Gods iudgement, he caused all the banks and heads of his trenches to be opened and cut downe with that diligence, as by them he drew the great Riuer of Euphrates drie for the present, by whose channell running, his 10 armie made their entrance, finding none to disturbe them. All the Towne lay buried (as the Poet saith) in sleepe and wine: such as came in the Persians way, were put to the sword, vnlesse they saved themselves by flight, as some did, who ranne away crying, and filling the streets with an vncertaine tumult.

Such Assyrian Lords as had reuolted from Balthazar, and betaken themselves to the partie of Cyrus, did now conduct a selected companie to the King Palaces, which hauing easily forced, they rushed into the chamber where the King with his Princes were banquetting, slew both him and them without any mercie, who strugled in vaine to keepe those liues which God had newly threatned to take away. And now was the prophetic of Jeremie fulfilled, and that of Esay, two hundred yeeres before this subuersion, who in 20 his seuen and fortieth Chapter, and elsewhere, writeth this destruction so feelingly and liuely, as if he had beene present both at the terrible slaughter there committed, and had seene the great and vnfeared change and calamitie of this great Empire; yea, and had also heard the sorrowes and bewailings of euery suruiuing soule thereunto subiect. His prophesie of this place he beginneth in these words: Come downe, and sit in the dust, O virgine daughter of Babel: sit on the ground, there is no throne, &c. And againe, Sit still and get thee into darkenesse, O daughter of the Chaldeans, for thou shalt no more be called the Ladie of Kingdomes. For though it cannot be doubted, that God vsed Nabuchodonosor and the Chaldeans, to punish the idolatrie of the Judeans, yet Esay teacheth vs in this place, That he did not yet forget, that the execution of his iudgements was mixt with a rigorous extremitie. For (saith Esay) in the person of God, I was wroth with my people, I haue polluted mine inheritance, and giuen them into thine hand: thou didst shew them no mercie, but thou didst lay thy very heauie yoke upon the ancient. I will rise up against them, saith the Lord of Hosts, and will cut off from Babel the name and the remnant, and the sonne and the nephew. And in the thirteenth, Euery one that is found, shall be stricken thorow: and whosoever igneth himselfe, shall fall by the sword, their children also shall be broken in pieces before their eyes, their houses spoiled, and their wines ransied. So as there is no Historian who was either present at this victory of Cyrus, or that receiued the report from others truely as it was, that could better leane the same to posteritie after it happened, than Esay hath done in many places of his prophesies, which were written two hundred yeeres before any thing at 40 tempted.

The greatnesse and magnificence of Babylon, were it not by diuers graue Authors set downe, might seeme altogether fabulous: for besides the reports of Saint Hierome, Solinus, and Orosius, Aristotle in the third of his Politiques, the second Chapter, receiued the report for true, That one part of the Citie knew not that the rest was taken three daies after. Which is not impossible, if the testimonie of Diodorus Siculus may be taken; who findes the compass thereof at three hundred and threescore Stadia or Furlongs, which makes five and fortie miles: the walls whereof had so great a breadth, that sixe chariots might passe in front thereon. And of height, according to Ctesias and Clitarchus, three hundred threescore and five foot, garnished with an hundred and fifty Towers. 50 Strabo in the beginning of his sixteenth Booke of Geographie giues it a greater circuit, adding five and twenty furlongs more to the former compass, reckoning the same at three hundred fourescore and five furlongs, which makes eight and forty mile and one furlong: but finds the wall farre vnder that which Diodore reports: and so doth Curtius measure their thicknesse but at two and thirtie foot, and their height at an hundred cubits; which is also very much: euery cubite containing a foot and halfe of the large measure, though to the whole circuit of the Citie he giues the same with Siculus, and eight furlongs more. Herodotus findes a greater content than Strabo doth, namely, foure hundred dred and fourescore furlongs circle; the thicknesse of the wall he measures at fiftie cubits, and the height at two hundred of the same regall cubit. For entrance it had an hundred gates of Brasse, with posts and hookes to hang them on of the same metall: and therefore did the Prophet Esay rightly intitle Babylon, The Princeesse and glory of Kingdomes. Esay. 47. c. 13.

But when Cyrus had wonne her, hee stript her out of her Princely Robes, and made her a slaue, diuiding not onely all her goodly houses, and her whole Territorie, with all the riches therein contained, among his Souldiers: but bestowing the inhabitants themselves as bondslaves vpon those that had taken possession of their goods.

Touching the reigne of Cyrus, and the time which hee enioyed in rest and pleasure, I can say no more of it, than that it is generally agreed by all Chronologers to haue lasted onely seuen yeeres: in which time he made such Constitutions, as differ little from the Ordinances of all wise Kings that are desirous to establish a Royall power to themselves and their posteritie.

§. VI.

The end of Cyrus.

He last warre, and the end of this great King Cyrus, is diuersly written. Herodotus and Iustine deliuer, That after the Conquest of Asia the lesse, Cyrus inuaded the Massagetes, a very warlike Nation of the Scythians, gouerned by Tomyris their Queene: and that in an encounter betwene the Persians and these Northerne Nomades, Tomyris lost her Armie, and her Son Spargapises, that commanded it: In reuenge whereof, this Queene making new leuies of men of Warre, and following the Warre against Cyrus, in a second battaile beat the Persian Armie, and taking Cyrus prisoner, cut off his head from his body, and cast the same into a bolle of bloud, vsing these words; Thou that hast all thy life time thirsted for bloud, now drinke thy fill, and satiate thy selfe.

It should heereby seeme, that Cyrus knowing the strength and multitude of those frozen Nations, was perswaded to abate their furie by some forcible inuasion and depopulation, because in the time of Cyaxares, father to Astyages, those Scythians inuaded Media and Asia the lesse, and held the same in a seruile subiection eight and twenty yeeres.

This warre which Metasthenes calleth Tomyrique, lasted (saith hee) fixe yeeres, and tooke end at the death of Cyrus.

But in this particular I beleue with Viginer, that this Scythian Warre was rather the same which Cyrus made against the Sacians, before the Conquest of Lydia, according to Ctesias before cited, who calleth Tomyris, Sparetha, though he deliuer the successe of that warre otherwise than Herodotus doth: The rather (saith Viginer) because Strabo in his 50 eleuenth booke reciteth, that Cyrus surprized the Sacians by the same stratageme by which Iustine saith, he defeated the sonne of Tomyris. And the same Ctesias also reporteth, That the last warre which Cyrus made was against Amorreus, King of the Derbici, a Nation (as the rest) of Scythia; whom though he ouercame, yet he then receiued the wound of his death, which he suffered three daies after. Vig. prim. part. Bib. Cte. l. 5. hist. part.

Strabo also affirmeth, That he was buried in his owne Citie of Pasagardes, which himselfe had built, & where his Epitaph was to be read in his time; which is said to haue been this: O vir quicumque es, & vndeunque aduenis, neque enim te aduenturum ignorauit: Ego sum Cyrus qui Persis imperium constitui, pusillum hoc terra quo meum tegitur corpus mihi ne inuides: O thou man, whosoever thou art, or whence soever thou comest; for I was not ignorant that thou shouldest come: I am Cyrus that founded the Persian Empire, doe not enuie unto me this little earth, with which my bodie is covered. Strab. l. 15.

This Tombe was opened by Alexander, as Quintus Curtius reporteth, either vpon hope of treasure, supposed to haue beene buried with him, or vpon desire to honour his dead bodie with certaine ceremonies; in which there was found an olde rotten Target, two Scythian Bowes, and a Sword. The Coffin wherein his bodie lay, Alexander caused to be covered with his owne garment, and a Crowne of gold to be set vpon it. These things well considered, as they giue credit to the reports of Xenophon and Zonaras, so they derogate much from Herodotus, who leaues his bodie in the hands of Tomyris. Xen. pad. 8. Zon. l. 1. c. 20.

And

And surely, had Cyrus lost the Armie of Persia in Scythia, it is not likely, that his sonne would so soone haue transported all his remaining forces into Egypt, so farre off from that quarter: the Scythian Nation then victorious, and bordering Media; neither had Cambyfes beene able in such haste to haue vndertaken and performed so great a Conquest. Wherefore I rather beleuee Xenophon, saying, That Cyrus died aged and in peace: and that finding in himselfe, that he could not long enioy the world, he called vnto him his Nobilitie, with his two sonnes, Cambyfes and Smerdis; or after Xenophon, Tanaoxares; and after a long Oration, wherein he assured himselfe, and taught others, of the immortalitye of the Soule, and of the punishments and rewards following the good and ill deseruing of euery man in this life; he exhorted his sonnes by the strongest arguments to he had, to a perpetuall concord and agreement. Many other things he vttered, which make it probable, that hee receiued the knowledge of the true God from Daniel, when hee gouerned Susa in Persia; and that Cyrus himselfe had read the prophecies of Esa, wherein he was expressly named, and by God (for the deliuerie of his people) preordained. Which act of deliuering the Jewes from their Captiuitie, and of restoring the holy Temple and Citie of Ierusalem, was in true consideration the noblest worke that euer Cyrus performed. For in other actions hee was an instrument of Gods power, vsed for the chastising of many Nations, and the establishing of a Government in those parts of the world, which was not long to continue. But herein he had the grace to be an instrument of Gods goodnesse, and a willing aduancer of his Kingdome vpon earth, which must last for euer, though heauen and earth shall perish.

§. VII.

Of Cyrus his Decree for building the Temple of God in Ierusalem.

Having therefore spoken of his great victories, mentioned by sundry Historians, the glory of all which was a reward of this his seruice done vnto him that was Author of them and of all goodnesse: I hold it meet at length to speake of the Decree made in the first of his Reigne, being perhaps the first that euer hee made, after his possession of the Babylonian Empire: That the captiue Jewes should returne againe into their owne Territorie, and re-build the House of God in Ierusalem, hauing now endured and finished the threescore and tenne yeeres captiuitie, by the Prophets foretold. For the accomplishing whereof, hee gaue order to his Treasurers to furnish them with all things necessarie and wanting. He also restored vnto them five thousand foure hundred threescore and nine Vessels of Gold and Silver, whereof Nabuchodonosor, the grandfather of Balthasar, had formerly robbed the Temple.

The number of the Jewes which returned out of Chaldea vnder their leader Zorobabel, the sonne of Salathiel, an I nephew to King Ieconias, and Iesus or Iosua the sonne of Iofadak, were about fifty thousand; where, as soone as they arriued, they built an Altar to the liuing God, and sacrificed thereon, according to their owne Law, and afterward bethought themselves how to prepare materials for the re-building of the Temple.

But no sooner did the Jewes begin to lay any one stone, than the Samaritans and other idolatrous Nations adioyning, gaue all the impediment they could. So did the Gouernours of those Prouinces vnder Cyrus altogether countenance the disturbers, and in no sort fauoured the Jewes, nor the labours nor purposes they had in hand. And not onely those which were but Prouinciall Lieutenants and other officers of lesse place, but Cambyfes himselfe, who hauing the charge of the whole Empire, while Cyrus was buied otherwise, countermanded the building begun. And whereas some Authors make doubt, that whatsoever Cambyfes did when himselfe had obtained the Empire, yet during the life of Cyrus there was no such impediment or prohibition: They may herein resolute themselves out of *Esdra*s, That by the conspiracies of the neighbouring Nations, the building was hindered all the time of King Cyrus life, &c. And therefore it is true, that the Jewes themselves affirme as it is written in the second of Iohn, That the Temple was 46 yeeres in setting vp; hauing receiued so many hinderances from the first foundation to the second of Darius.

And if we seeke the naturall and politrique causes which moued Cambyfes to withstand his fathers decree, as well while hee gouerned vnder him, as when himselfe became sole and soueraigne Monarch, we shall finde them in that Epistle remembred by *Esdra*s, written by Belemus, Mithridates, and the rest, Presidents and Counsellors in Phenicia, wherein they complaine, that the Jewes were euermore rebellious and troublers of Kings; that their Citie being once built, they would then refuse to pay Tribute, and fall from the obedience of the Empire, as they had formerly done in the times of other Kings.

But that which for that present seemed the most forcible impediment was, that Cambyfes, hauing it in his resolution to inuade Egypt, and that it was a common opinion, That the Jewes were descended of those Nations, because they issued thence vnder Moses, when they conquered Iudea; their Citie being once repaired and fortified, they might returne to their old vomit, and giue the same disturbance to Cambyfes Conquest, which they did to Senacherib, Nabuchodonosor, and other Kings of Babylon. For as it is written in Ezekiel, Ezekiel 29. Egypt was the confidence of the house of Israel.

But it is to be vnderstood, as Codoman and others haue obserued, that Artaxerxes, to whom the Counsellors and Gouernors of Phenicia complained against the Jewes, did not precede, but succcede Darius Hystaspes, as in the sixt and seuenth chapters of *Esdra*s it is made plaine: and also that those Gouernors (whose Epistle sheweth as much) did not withstand the building of the Temple, but the fortifying and inclosing of the Citie, as by the reasons giuen in the said Epistle, and by the Kings answer, it is euident.

Also in the sixt of Ezra, the foureteenth verse, the Kings are named in order as they gouerned, and Artaxerxes written after Darius, as: And they built and finished it (to wit, the Temple) by the appointment of the God of Israel, and by the commandement of Cyrus and Darius, and Artahastate Kings of Persia. Lastly, in the seuenth of Ezra it is written; Now after these things, in the reigne of Artahastate King of Persia: which was as much to say, as after the finishing of the Temple in Darius time. And therefore Artaxerxes in the second of *Esdra*s is there named by anticipation, not in his owne time and place.

And thus much concerning the rebuilding of the Citie and Temple of Ierusalem. Which action though prospered by the hand of God, was very slowly pursued by the men whom it most concerned, but first set on foot by Cyrus. The other ordinances of Cyrus, with his forme and manner of gouernment, are to be found in Xenophon. At his death he bequeathed the Empire vnto his eldest sonne Cambyfes, appointing Smerdis or Tanaoxares his younger sonne to be Satrapa or Lieutenant of Media, Armenia, and Cadusia; and then died, after he had reigned (saith Herodotus) one and thirtie yeeres, or (according to Iustine) but thirtie.

§. VIII.

Of Cyrus his issue: and whether Atossa were his daughter, or (as some thinke) were the same with Queene Hester.

Cyrus* had issue two sonnes, Cambyfes and Smerdis, with three daughters, Atossa, Meroc, and Artystana: Ctesias addeth to these, Amytis, Atossa and Meroc their brother Cambyfes married, Artystana, Darius, Hystaspes obtained; so did he Atossa, Cambyfes being dead: who (as some Writers haue supposed) inflamed both her husbands, Darius, and Xerxes after him, to inuade Greece, to be auenged of the whole Nation for the cruell intent that Aman (whom the old translation calleth a Macedonian) had against the Jewes, though the opinion of Iosephus be more probable, who findes Aman to be an Amalekite. But it is hard to be vnderstood, how Atossa, the daughter of Cyrus, should haue bene Esther, whose Historie seemes rather to appertaine to the time of Artaxerxes Longimanus, than of Darius the sonne of Hystaspes, or of Xerxes. The desire of Atossa to haue Greece brought vnder the yoke of Persia, was partly gounded vpon the honour which thereby she thought her husband might obtaine, partly vpon a feminine humor of getting many braue Dames, Corinthians, Athenians, and others of that Nation to be her bond-women. Wherefore I cannot giue assent to the opinion of Codoman, who vpon the neere sound of the two names, Atossa and Hadassa, (by the latter of which Esther was also called) makes them to haue bene one person. For though it be true, that Esther concerning her parentage a while, might be taken for a great Lady; yet *Codoman*s inference is nothing probable, that she should therefore, and for the great affection which the King bare vnto her, be thought the daughter of Cyrus. Certaine it is, that Esther did at length discouer her Kindred and Nation; whereby if Histories could be kept free from this errour, yet the people, and especially the Nobility, must needs haue vnderstood the truth: who neuertheless did so well know the parentage of Mossa, that for her sake, as being daughter of Cyrus, her sonne Xerxes was preferred to the Kingdome before his elder brother, against whom also he could haue pretended a very weake clayme. But of these things more hereafter in fitter place.

§. I.

Of the number and names of the Persian Kings.

Of the successors of Cyrus, and the continuance of the Persian Empire, there are many opinions; As that of Metaſthenes, who hath numbred the Persian Kings and their times, as followeth.

To which Philo agreeth; which number of yeeres added, make in all an hundred ninete and one. But in this Catalogue Metaſthenes hath left out Cambyſes and Xerxes, and names Artaxerxes Aſſuerus for the immediate ſucceſſor of Cyrus; in place (ſaith Metaſton) of Darius the ſonne of Hyſtaſpes: for Metaſthenes, as Melancthon conieſtured, doth not account Cambyſes in the Catalogue, becauſe his reigne was confounded with that of Cyrus.

There is a ſecond opinion, though ridiculous, of Seder Olam, who finds but foure Persian Kings from the beginning to the end of that Empire.

Genebrard, Schubert, and Beroaldus haue alſo a differing account from the Greekes; whom neuertheleſſe Eufebius and moſt of the Latines follow, and ſo doth Krentzheim, who hath fully answered, and as I take it, refuted all the former Authors varying from that account. For in this ſort doe the Greekes marſhall the Persian Kings with the times of their reignes.

Which numbers, put together, make in all two hundred and thirte.

This account (as I haue ſaid) the moſt Chronologers and the beſt learned approve: Theſe Persian Princes being all warranted by the authority of the Scriptures, as Peucer in his hiſtoricall Animaduerciſions hath gathered the places, finding firſt Cyrus in the ſecond of Chronicles, chap. 36. verſ. 22. 23. Ezra 1. chap. 1. verſ. 1. and often elſewhere.

Secondly Cambyſes in the eleauenth of Daniel, who may indeede be well eſteemed for one of thoſe three Kings in the ſecond verſe named, and ſo the marginall Commentor vpon the Geneua vnderſtands that place; but, vnder correction, miſtakes the matter greatly, when he ſaith in the ſame note, that Darius Hyſtaſpes was an enemy to the people of God, and ſtood againſt them: his great fauour and liberality to the Iewes being elſewhere prooued. Thirdly, is Darius Hyſtaſpes found in Ezra the firſt, c. 4. v. 5. who in the ſixt verſe is alſo named Ahaſuerus.

Fourthly, in the eleauenth of Daniel verſe the ſecond, Xerxes is plainly foretold and deſcribed; and the great warre which he ſhould make againſt the Greekes by Daniel remembred.

Fiftly, Artaxerxes Longimanus in Ezra the fourth, verſe ſeauen, who is alſo called Artaxerxes, c. 4. 1. lib. Ezra. v. 7. and cap. 7. v. 7.

Sixtly, Darius Nothus, Ezra cap. 4. verſe 24. and cap. 5. verſe 6. Mehem, cap. 12. verſe 22.

Seauenthly, Artaxerxes Mnemon in Nehem. c. 2. v. 1. who was father to Artaxerxes Ochus, and Arſames: for Darius the laſt, he was of another Family, the Line of Cyrus the Great ending in Ochus, who deſcended from Xerxes the ſonne of Atoſſa, Cyrus his Daughter, and the iſſue male of Cyrus failing with his owne Sonnes.

But to proceede. Eufebius with the Latines, following the Greekes, apply the beginnings and ends of euery Persian King with their Acts, to ſome certaine Olympiad; As the war of Alyages (Cyrus his maternall Grand-father) and Alyattes (Craſus his father) to the nine and fortieth Olympiad; The beginning of Cyrus reigne to the beginning of the five and fiftieth Olympiad; The taking of Sardis by Cyrus to the eight and fiftieth Olympiad; The inuaſion of Egypt by Cambyſes to the third yeere of the threeſcore and third Olympiad, and ſo of the reſt. Which reference with good agreement betweene ſeueral formes of computation adde the more credit vnto both.

Again, this hiſtoricall demonſtration is confirmed by the Aſtronomical computation of Ptolomie, who refers the death of Alexander the Great, who died the 12. of Nouember, in the beginning of the hundred and fortieth Olympiad, to the foure hundred and foure and twentieth yeere after Nabonaſſar. And the Era of Nabonaſſar began on the fixe and twentieth of Februarie: which conferred with the Olympiad, was in the ninth Moneth of the firſt yeere of the eighth Olympiad; So that whether we follow the accompts of the Olympiads, as doe the Greeke Hiſtorians, or that of Nabonaſſar with Ptolomie, we ſhall finde euery memorable accident to fall out right with each computation.

For Ptolomie reckons the time anſwerable to two hundred and foure and twenty Iulian yeeres, and an hundred and forty dayes from Nabonaſſar, to the ſixteenth of Iulie in the ſeauenth yeere of Cambyſes.

The Greekes, and namely Diodorus Siculus, place the taking of Egypt by Cambyſes in the ſecond or third yeere of the threeſcore and third Olympiad, and the beginning of Cambyſes ſeauenth yeere in the firſt of the threeſcore and fourth Olympiad: which firſt of the threeſcore and fourth Olympiad runs along with part of the two and twentieth of Nabonaſſar. The like agreement is conſequently found about the beginning and end of Cyrus.

Likewiſe the twentieth of Darius, who ſucceeded Cambyſes, is according to Ptolomie the two hundred and fixe and fortieth of Nabonaſſar, which (obſeruing the differences of Nabonaſſars Era and the Olympiad, viz. eight and twentieth yeeres) it agrees with the third of the threeſcore and ninth Olympiad, wherein it is placed by the Greekes. In this Joſephus agrees with the Greekes throughout, ſauiug that he ioyneth Darius Medus, whom Xenophon calleth Cyaxares, with Cyrus, in the deſtruction of Babylon, which is true, and not contrary to the Greeke computation, but may very well ſtand with it.

Laſtly, the diſagreements and confuſed accompts of thoſe that follow the other Catalogue of the Persian Kings formerly rehearſed, doth giue the greater credit to this of the Greekes, Greekes, which being constant in it selfe, accordeth also with the computation of other Historians, and Astronomers, and likewise with the holy Scriptures.

§. II.

Of Cambyſes, and the conquering of Egypt by him.

WE will therefore according to the truth giue the Empire of Persia to Cambyſes, the sonne of Cyrus, though degenerate in all things, ſauing the deſire to increaſe the greatneſſe of his Empire: whereof he was poſſeſt in his Fathers time while Cyrus made warre in the North. Cteſias with others giue him a longer reigne than agreeeth with the Grecian account before receiued.

In the fifth yeere of his ſole reigne, and in the third yeere of the threeſcore and third Olympiad, according to Diodor & Eusebius, he inuaded Egypt, and hauing ouerthrowne the King thereof, Pſammeniticus, he not only cauſed him to be ſlaine, but alſo did put to death all his kindred and dependants, with the moſt of his children.

Herodotus and Cteſias giue for cauſe of this Warre (being no other indeed than the Ambition of Cambyſes) that when he ſent to Amasius King of Egypt, to haue his daughter in marriage, Amasius preſented him with Nitetis the daughter of Apries his predeceſſor, which Cambyſes diſdained.

Howſoeuer it were; true it is, that Cambyſes gathered an Armie fit for ſuch an enterpriſe, and cauſed the ſame to march. But before they entred Egypt, Amasius died, and left Pſammeniticus, whom Cteſias called Amyrteus, his ſucceſſour; who enioyed Egypt after his father (according to the beſt copies of Herodotus) but fixe Moneths, though other Chronologers giue him fixe yeeres.

But how long ſoeuer he held the Crowne, in one battell he loſt it, and was himſelfe taken priſoner.

It is ſaid that Cambyſes following therein the example of Cyrus, did not only ſpare life to the conquered King, but that he alſo truſted him with the gouernment of Egypt; and that vpon ſome reuolt, or ſuſpition thereof, he cauſed him to be ſlaughtered. But the race of this King was not ſo extirpated, if we may beleue Herodotus and Thucydides, but that he left a Sonne called Inarus, who cauſed the Egyptian to reuolt both from Xerxes and Artaxerxes.

That Pſammeniticus was at the firſt entreated gently by Cambyſes, I hold it very improbable, if it be true which is alſo written of him, That he ſo much hated Amasius the King of Egypt, who died before his arriual, that he cauſed his body to be drawne out of the graue, and after diuers indignities vſed, commanded the ſame to be burnt, contrary to the cuſtome both of the Egyptians and Perſians. For the Egyptians vſed to powder their dead bodies with ſalt, and other drugs, to the end the wormes might not deuoure them.

The Perſians durſt not conſume them with fire, which they eſteemed as a God, and therefore feared to feede it with Carrion.

§. III.

The reſt of Cambyſes his acts.

After this victory obtained in Egypt, Cambyſes ſent an Armie into Cyprus, and conſtrained Euſelthon King thereof to acknowledge him, who before held that Iſland of the Egyptians.

While Cambyſes yet buſied himſelfe in Egypt, he ſo much deteſted the Idolary of that Nation, as he cauſed the Images themſelues, with the Temples whererein they were worſhipped, to be toine downe and defaced. This done, he directed a part of his Armie into Lybia, to ouer-terne the Temple of Iupiter Ammon; but the Diuell in defence of his Oratorie raiſed ſuch a tempeſt of Sand, wherewith the greateſt part of that Country is couered, as the Perſians were there with choked and ouerwhelmed.

Norwithſtanding which miſadventure, Herodotus and Seneca report, that diſdaining to be reſiſted, he prepared the reſt of his Army, which himſelfe meant to con duct into thoſe parts, but that finding a beginning of thoſe incommodities, which his firſt ſent troupe had tried, he changed his purpoſe. For though conquering Kings haue power ouer men, yet the Elements doe not obey them, according to that old Engliſh prouerbe, God ſaith the King, Stay, ſaith the Tide.

After

After his returne from the attempt of Ethiopia, hee cauſed Apis the Egyptian Bull, worſhipped by that Nation as God, to be ſlaine: a deed very commendable, had it proceeded from true zeale, and bene executed as in ſeruice of him that onely is, and liueth. But ſoon afterwards, when in a dreame it ſeemed vnto him that Smerdis did ſit in the royall Throne of Perſia (which apparition was verified in Smerdis the Magus) he gaue it in charge to his fauourite Praxaspes, to murder Smerdis his brother. And hauing married his owne ſiſters, contrary to the Perſian Lawes, he committed a moſt cauſeleſſe and moſt deteſtable murder vpon the one of them, called Meroe, then by himſelfe with child, becauſe ſhe bewailed the death of her brother Smerdis. I finde it written of this Cambyſes, Her. p. 89. pp.

That becauſe his predeceſſors obſerued religiously the ordinances of their Empire, hee aſſembled his Iudges, and enquired of them, whether there were any law among the Perſians that did permit the brother to marry his owne ſiſter: it being his owne intent ſo to doe. The Iudges (who had alwaies either lawes or diſtinctions in ſtore to ſatiſfie Kings and times) made anſwere, that there was not any thing written allowing any ſuch coniunction, but they notwithſtanding found it in their cuſtomes, that it was alwaies left to the will of the Perſian Kings to doe what beſt pleaſed themſelues; and ſo, as Naucleus termes it, inuenerunt occaſionem: That is as much to ſay, as the Iudges found a ſhift to pleaſe the King, and to ſecure themſelues. And yet, where it concerned nor the Kings priuate ſatiſfaction, hee cauſed Siſamnus one of his Iudges, and perchance one of thoſe which fauoured his inceſtuous match, to be ſlayed a-lieue, for an vniuſt iudgement giuen, and the ſame his hide to be hung vp ouer the iudgement ſeate. After which beſtowing the fathers Office on his ſonne, hee willed him to remember, that the ſame partialitie deſerued the ſame puniſhment.

Among other his cruelties, that which hee exerciſed againſt the ſonne of his beloved Praxaspes was very ſtrange and vngatefull. For when hee deſired to be truly informed by him what the Perſians thought of his conditions, Praxaspes anſwered, That his vertues were followed with abundant praiſe from all men; onely it was by many obſerued, that he tooke more than vſuall delight in the taſte of Wine. With which taxation inflamed, he vſed this replication: And are the Perſians double-tongued, who alſo tell mee that I haue in all things excelled my Father Cyrus? thou Praxaspes ſhalt then witneſſe, whether in this report they haue done me right: for if at the firſt ſhot I pierce thy ſonnes heart with an arrow, then is it falſe that hath bene ſpoken; but if I miſſe the marke, I am then pleaſed that the ſame be accounted true, and my ſubiects beleueed. This being ſpoken, hee immediately directed an arrow towards the innocent child, who falling downe dead with the ſtroke, Cambyſes commanded his body to be opened, and his heart being broched on the arrow, this monſtrous Tyrant greatly reioycing, ſhewed it to the Father with this ſaying in ſtead of an Epitaph: Now Praxaspes, thou maiſt reſolue thy ſelfe that I haue not loſt my wittes with Wine, but the Perſians theirs, who make ſuch report.

Many other barbarous cruelties he exerciſed, till at the laſt, according to the phraſe of our Law, he became ſelon de ſoy. For when he was informed that Patizites, and Smerdis the Magi, (Cedrenus writeth them Sphendanes and Cimerdus) Miniſters of his domeſtick affaires, taking aduantage of the great reſemblance betwene Smerdis the Kings brother, and Smerdis the Magus, poſſeſt themſelues of the Empire, he made all haſte towards Perſia, and in mounting haſtily on horſebacke, his ſword diſſheathing, pierced his owne thigh, where-with deadly wounded, falling into an ouer-late and remedieleſſe repentance of the ſlaughter which he had executed vpon his owne brother, he ſoone after gaue vp his wicked gholt, when he had reigned eight yeeres, accounting therein thoſe ſeuē Moneths in which the Magi gouerned, while he was abſent.

In Cambyſes the Male line of Cyrus failed. For he had no iſſue either by Atossa or Meroe: yet Zonaras out of Hierome giues him a Daughter called Pantaptes, and a ſon called Orometes, who being drowned in the Riuer Ophites by Antioch, the ſame was afterward in memorie of the Princes death called Orometes.

He built the Citie of Babylon in Egypt, in the place where Latopolis was formerly ſeated, and that of Meroe in the Iſland of Nilus, calling it by the name of his ſiſter Meroe.

§. IIII.

Of the inter-regnum betweene Cambyfes and Darius.

CYRUS and his two sonnes being now dead, and the Kingdome in the possession of one of the Magi, the counterfait of Smerdis, the Princes, or Satrapes, or Provinciall Gouvernours of the Empire (to wit, Otanes, Intaphernes, Gobrias, Megabyfus, Alphatines, Hidarnes, and Darius, who were all descended from Achamenes the first Persian King;) having discovered the fraud of this imposture, ioyned their forces together, surprised and rooted out the Conspirator with his Companions, and assistants. In to which action (saith Iustine) Intaphernes and Alphatines were slaine; but Herodotus otherwise, that they were onely wounded, for he auoweth, that all the seuen Princes were present at the election following.

For the Empire being now without a Gouvernour, these Princes grew into consultation how the same might be ordered from thence forth. Otanes one of the seuen did not fancie any election of Kings, but that the Nobilitie and Cities should confederate, and by iust lawes defend their liberty in equalitie, giuing diuers reasons for his opinion, being as it seemed greatly terrified, by the cruelties of Cambyfes; As first, that it was not safe to giue all power to any one, seeing greatnesse it selfe, euen in good men, doth often infect the minde with many vices, and the libertie and freedome in all things is most apt to insult, and to commit all manner of wicked outrage. Again, that tyrants doe commonly vse the seruices of wicked men, and fauour them most; they vsurp vpon the lawes of their Countrey; take other mens wiues by force, and destroy whom they please without iudgement.

Megabyfus was of another opinion, affirming that the tyrannie of a multitude was thrice more intollerable, than that of one. For the multitude doe all things without iudgement, runne into businesse and affaires with precipitation, like raging and over-bearing floods.

He therefore thought it safest to make election of a few, and those of the best, wisest, and most vertuous; because it is euer found, that excellent Counsailes are euer had from excellent men.

Darius gaue the third iudgement, who perswaded the creation of a King, because euen among few diuturnitie of concord is seldome found; and in great Empires it doth euer happen that the discord of many Rulers hath inforst the election of one Supreme. It were therefore, saith Darius, farre safer to obserue the lawes of our Countrey, by which Kingly gouernment hath bene ordained.

The other foure Princes adhered to Darius, and agreed to continue the same Imperiall gouernment by God established, and made prosperous. And to auoid partialitie, it was accorded, that the morning following these seuen Princes should mount on Horse-backe, and on him the Kingdome should be conferred, whose horse after the Sun-rising should first ney or bray. In the euening after this appointment was made, it is said that Darius consulted with the Master of his horse Oebarus, who in the Suburbs of the Citie where the election was resolu'd of, caused the same Horse, whereon in the morning Darius was mounted, to couer a Mare, who as soone as hee came into the same place was the first horse that brayed. Whereupon the other fixe Princes descended from their horses, and acknowledged Darius for their Lord and King.

Plato in the third of his Lawes affirmeth, that in memorie of the seuen Princes, whereof Darius himselfe was one, that deliuered the Empire from the vsurpation of the Magi, he diuided the whole into seuen gouernments; Herodotus saith, into twenty Satrapies.

§. I.

Of Darius his Linage.

Arius was descended of the ancient Persian Kings, to wit, of the Achamenides, of which, Cyrus the Great was the lineall Successor. For in this sort Herodotus deriues him as before.

Cyrus the first, who had
Telspius, who begat
Ariararnes, who was father of Arfarnes, the father of Hyftaspes, the father of
Darius, surnamed Celes, the father of Xerxes.

Cut. 1. 4.

Hyftaspes accompanied Cyrus the Great, in the warres against the Scythians, at which time Cyrus being made iealous of Darius by a dreame of his owne, caused him to be sent into Persia, others say to be imprisoned, from whence by the death of Cyrus he was deliuered, and made Gouvernour of the Persian Magi. He afterward followed Cambyfes into Egypt; he then ioyned with the rest of the Princes against the Magi, and either by the neyng of his horse, or, as others affirme, by strong hand he obtained the Empire, which he the more assured to himselfe by taking two of Cyrus Daughters, and as many of his Nieces for his wiues.

Hyftaspes, according to * Herodotus, had besides Darius these three sonnes, who were great Commanders in the warre which Darius made in Asia the lesse, Thrace, Macedon, and Greece, Ararnes, Artaphernes, and Artabanus, who dissuaded Xerxes from the second Grecian warre. Hyftaspes had also a Daughter married to Gobrias the Father of Mardanius, who commanded the Armie of Darius in Macedon, and married the Daughter of Darius, Artabanus his Cousin germaine. Reinecius giues to Hyftaspes five sonnes, Darius who succeeded Cambyfes, Artabanus, Artaphernes, Otanes, and Atarnes, with two daughters.

§. II.

Of Darius his Gouernment, and suppressing the rebellion of Babylon.

DArius* deuised equall lawes whereby his subiects might be gouerned, the same being formerly promised by Cyrus. He gaue access to all his subiects, and behaued himselfe so mildly to all men, that many Nations desired and offered themselves to become his Vassals: Onely he layed diuers payments and taxes on the people, which had not bene accustomed in Cyrus time, to the value of foure score thousand five hundred and threescore talents, saith Herodotus.

The warre which Cambyfes made a farre off in Egypt, and the contention betweene the Magi, and the Princes of Persia, for the Empire, gaue heart to the Babylonians to recover their libertie, and to shake off the Persian yoke; whereof Darius being aduertised, he prepared an Armie to recouer that Citie and State reuolted. But finding the same a difficult worke, he vsed the seruice of Zopirus, who for the loue he bare Darius, did cut off his owne Eares and Nose, and with other wounds yet fresh bleeding, he seemed to flye to the Babylonians for succour, to whom he accused the cruelty of Darius: who, for hauing giuen him aduice to giue ouer the siege of their Citie, had in this sort dismembred and deformed him, whereupon the Babylonians gaue him that credit, as they trusted him with the disposition and commandement of their greatest forces: which when Zopirus had obtained, after some small colourable ouerthrowes giuen to the Persians vpon Sal-lies, hee deliuered the Citie into Darius his hands, who had lye before it twentie Moneths.

§ III. Of

§ III.

Of Darius his fauour to the Iewes in building the Temple.

IN the second yeere of Darius, he gaue order that the building of the Temple at Hierusalem should goe on, and commanded that the same should be finished at his owne charge, and out of the reuenues of the Crowne. And whereas the Gouernours of those Prouinces which are situate betweene Euphrates, and the Phenician, and mid-land Sea, (whom Ezra calleth the Captaines beyond the Riuer) had hindered the worke in Cambyfes his time, Darius gaue commandement that they should not thenceforth come neere vnto Ierusalem, to giue any impediment to the building, but that they should with-draw themselves, and get them farre off till all were finished and at an end. In the old Latine it is written, Procul recedite ab illis; with-draw your selues farre from them; In our Englishe, Be ye farre from thence, to wit, from the Citie, and Temple, now in building.

He also made a decree, which concerned his owne Subiects, That whosoever should thenceforth hinder the setting vp of the Temple of God, that his house should be torne downe, and the disturber hanged on a Gallowes made of the timber thereof. He also in the same decree maketh inuocation to God, That hath caused his name to dwell there (to destroy all Kings and People that put their hands to alter, and to destroy this house of God which is in Ierusalem, &c. In foure yeeres after which decree (the Iewes being really furnished with money and all things necessary from Darius) the Temple was in all finished, to wit, in the beginning of the Spring, in the sixth yeere of Darius Hystaspes, and in the two and fortieth after their first returne.

§ IIII.

Of Darius his Scythian Warre.

AFTER the recouery of Babylon he inuaded the Scythians, whose King Iustine calleth Lauchinus; and saith, that Darius vnder-tooke this warre against him, because he refused him his Daughter in marriage. The better to conuoy his Armie into Scythia, he built a Bridge of small Vessels ouer the Riuer Ister or Danubius, and gaue the custody of the same in charge among others of Asia the lesse to the Ionians, and Aolians, among whom was Miltiades, who perswaded the Asian Grecians to breake downe the bridge, to the end Darius might not returne thereby, and if by any other way, then not without great difficultie; but the same was resisted by Hystienus Prince of Milet, a Citie of Ionia, which Darius being a Colonic of the Grecakes, Diodorus calleth Traitors to their Countrey, because they ioyned themselves to Darius. But the Scythians more elegantly rearmed them good slaues, for as much as they would not run away from their Master, but were more mindefull of doing their duties, than of shaking off their bondage, when they were presented with as faire an occasion of liberty as could haue beene desired. For the great Armie of Darius entring the desert Countrey called Bessarabia, found in it neither people to resist them, nor any sustentance to relieue them. For the Scythians werethen, as are the Chrim Tartars, their posteritie, at this day, all horse-men, vsing the Bow and Sword. They were not Plough-men, but Grafiers, driuing their Herds from one place to another, as opportunitie of pasture led them. Standing Townes they had none, but vsed for Houses the Waggones wherein they carried their wives and children. These Waggones they place at euery Station in very good order, making Streets and Lanes in the manner of a great Towne, remouable at their pleasure. Neither hath the Emperour himselfe, called now the great Chrim, any other Citie than such as Agora (as they name it) or Towne of Carts. When as therefore Darius had wearied himselfe, and wasted his prouision in those desolate Regions, wherein he found neither wayes to direct him, victuals to refresh him, nor any houses, fruitfull trees, or liuing creatures, nor any thing at all, which either he himselfe might make vse of, or by destroying it might grieue his enemies; he began to perceiue his owne folly, and the danger into which he had brought him. Yet setting a good face vpon a bad game, he sent braue messages to the Scythians, bidding him to cease his flight, and either to make triall of his valour and fortune in plaine battaile: Or if he acknowledged himselfe the weaker, then to yeelde by by faire meanes, and become his Subiect, giuing him Barthand Water, which the Persians vsed to demand as a signe, that all was yeelded vnto them. To this challenge the Scythian returned an Hieroglyphicall answer; sending a Bird, a Frog, a Mouse, and five Arrowes: which dambe shew Darius interpreting by his owne wish, thought that he did yeelde all the Elements wherein those creatures line, and his weapons withall into his hands. But Gobryas, one of the seauen Princes, who had slaine the Magi, construed their meaning a-right, which was thus; O ye Persians, get ye wings like Birds, for diue vnder the water, or creepe into holes in the earth, for else ye shall not escape our arrowes. And this interpretation was soone verified by the Scythians themselves, who assailed the Persians in a campe, draue the horse-men into the trenches, and vexed the Armie with continuall Alarms day and night, were so fearelesse of this great Monarch, and so little regarded him, that within his hearing, and euen in his sight, they did not forbear the pastime of courting a Hare, which they had started by chance. By this boldnesse of theirs, Darius was so discouraged, that he forooke his Campe by night, making many fires, and leauing all that were sicke and weake behinde him, and so with all speede marched away towards the Riuer Ister. He was pursued hardly by the Scythians who mist him, yet arriving at the Bridge before him, perswaded the Ionians to depart, assuring them that the Persian King should neuer more be able to doe them either good or harme. Which words had certainly bene proued true, had not Hystienus the Milesian preuailed with his people, to attend to the coming of Darius, whom the Scythians did likewise faile to meete, when they returned from Ister to seeke him out.

§ V.

Some actions of the Persians in Europe, after the Scythian Warre.

DARIUS hauing thus escaped out of Scythia, determined the inuasion of Thrace and Macedon, in which Warre he employed Megabazus, who mastered the Paeonians, and transplanted them, and posselt Perinthus, Chalcedon, Bizantium, and other places, being also soone after subiected, and added to the Persian Empire by Ota-mer, the sonne of Syftanes, whom Cambyfes had excoiated for false iudgement. So were the Cities of * Selybria and * Cardia likewise taken in for the Persians, who hauing now reduced vnder his obeyfance the best part of Thrace, did send his Embassadors to Amin- tas King of Macedon adioyning, demanding of him by the Earth and Water, the Sovereignty ouer that Kingdom. Amin- tas doubting his owne strength, entertained the Embassadors with gentle words, and afterward inuited them to a solemne and magnificent feast, the Persians greatly desired that the Macedonian Ladies might be present: which being granted, the Embassadors who were well filled with wine, and presumed vpon their greatnesse, and many victories, began to vse such imbracings, and other lasciuious behaviour towards those Noble Ladies, as Alexander the Kings Sonne, great Grand-father to Alexander the Great, disdaining the Persians barbarous presumption, besought his father to withdraw himselfe from the assembly, continuing notwithstanding all honourable respect towards the Embassadors, whom withall he created that the Ladies might refresh themselves for a while; promising their speedy returne. This being obtained, Alexander caused the like number of well-fauoured yong-men to clothe themselves in the same garments, and to vse the same attires which the Ladies had worn at the feast, giuing them in charge, That when the Persians offered to abuse them, they should forthwith transpierce them with their long kniues, of which they were provided for that purpose, which was accordingly performed. Charge was soone after giuen by Darius for a seuerer reuenge of this murder. But Alexander, somewhat before the death of Amin- tas, gaue his sister Gygis in marriage to Bubaris, a principall Commander of Darius forces on that side, who perswading her husband how helpfull the Alliance of Macedon would proue for the inuasion of Attica intended, so preuailed, as Alexander escaped that tempest, which threatned to fall vpon him very suddenly; the warre of Asia the lesse, called Ionick, falling out at the same time.

§. VI.

The first occasion of the warre which Darius made upon Greece, with a rehearsal of the government in Athens, whence the quarrell grew.

NOW the better to vnderstand the reason and motiues of that great Warre, which followed soone after, betwene the Persians and Grecians, it is necessary to make a short repetition of the state of Athens, which Citie endured the hardest and worst brunt of Darius inuasion on that side the Sea with admirable successe. Neither doe I hold it any impertinency, to be large in vnfoling euery circumstance of so great a business as gaue fire to those wars, which neuer could be thoroughly quenched, vntill in the ruine of this great Persian Monarchie, Persopolis the capitall Citie of the Empire, was at the request of an Athenian Harlot consumed with a flame, as dreadfull as in the pride of their greatnesse, the Persians had raised in Athens.

Now therefore as out of the former bookes it may be gathered, how Athens, and other parts of Greece, were anciently gouerned, the same being already set downe, though scatteringly, & in feuerall times, among other the Contemporarie occurrents of the Easterne Emperors, and the Kings of Iudea; so I thought it very pertinent in this place to remember againe the two last changes in the State of Athens. As for the Lacedemonians, they maintained still their ancient policie vnder Kings, though these also after some fiftene or twenty descents bridled by the Ephori.

Codrus King of the Athenians in the former bookes remembred, who willingly died for the safetie of his people, was therefore so honored by them, as (thinking none worthy to succcede him) they changed their former gouernement from Monarchicall to Princes for tearme of life, of which Medon the sonne of Codrus was the first, after whom they were called Medontide; and of these there were twelue Generations besides Aedon, to wit.

Agasthus.

Archippus, in whose times the Greekes transported themselves into Ionis, after Troy an hundred and fourescore yeeres, according to Eusebius: which migration all other Chronologers (such as follow Eusebius herein excepted) finde in the yeere after Troy fallen one hundred and fortie.

But these goodly ordinances of Solon, were in his owne dayes violated, and for a while almost quite extinguished. For whereas they were framed vnto the practice and maintenance of a popular gouernment; the estate of Athens was very soone changed into a Monarchie by Pisistratus the sonne of Hippocrates: who finding the Citizens distracted into two factions, whereof Megacles and Lycurgus two Citizens of noble Families were become the heads, tooke occasion by their contention and insolencie to raise a third faction more powerfull than the other two, and more plausible, for that he seemed a Protector of the Citizens in generall. Hauing by this means obtained loue and credit, he wounded himselfe, and fained that by malice of his enemies he had like to haue bene slaine for his loue to the good Citizens; he procured a guard for his defence, and with that band of men surprisng the State-house, or Cittadell of Athens, he made himselfe Lord of the Towne, Hegesistratus being then Gouernour. But the Citizens, who in euery change of gouernment had sought to remoue themselves further and further from the forme of a Monarchie, could so ill brooke this vsurpation of Pisistratus, that he was driven for lacke of helpe to flye the Towne, as soone as Megacles and Lycurgus ioyning their forces attempted his expulsion. Yet as the building of his tyranny founded vpon the dissension of the Citizens, was ruined by their good agreement, so was it soone after well reedified by the new breaking out of the old factions. For when Megacles found the power of Lycurgus to grow greater than his owne, he did (as is the vsuall practice of the weaker side) call in the common enemy Pisistratus, to whom he gaue his Daughter in marriage, by which alliance the Family of the Alcmaeonide, whereof Megacles was chiefe, became very powerfull, yet so that Pisistratus by their power was made Master both of them and all the rest. But this agreement held not long; the Alcmaeonide, and especially Megacles being incensed against Pisistratus for his misdemeanor towards his Wife. Wherefore they practised with the Souldiers of the Towne, proceeding in their treason so secretly, and so farre, that Pisistratus vpon the first discouery of their intent, perceiued no other remedy for his affaires, than to with-draw himselfe to Eretria, where he remained cleauely cecres. Whichtime being expired, hauing hired Souldiers out of many parts of Greece, he againe recouered the principality of Athens: after which third obtaining his estate, he gouerned Athens seauenteene yeeres, according to Aristotle, and reigned in all thirty and three yeeres, saith Elianus, but Iustine hath it, foure and thirty, according to the time belike as well before as after his feuerall expulsions. Herodotus giues the Father and Sonne sixe and thirtie yeeres; Aristotle siue and thirtie. But Thucydides affirmeth, that he died very old, leauing for his Successours his two Sonnes Hippias and Hipparchus, who gouerned the Athenians with such moderation, as they rather seemed the lineall successors of a naturall Princethan of a Tyrant. But in the end, and some three yeeres before Hippias was expelled out of Athens, his brother Hipparchus was murdered by Harmodius and Aristogiton. The cause why, and the manner how performed, Thucydides hath written at large. And though Hipparchus were charged with vnaturall last after Harmodius, yet Plato in his Dialogue, intituled Hipparchus, doth greatly magnifie him, affirming that he was a Prince of as many eminent vertues as that Age had any, altogether condemning the murderers and authors of that scandall. Hippias fearing that this enterprise vpon his brother had more and deeper rootes than were apparent, first sought to discouer the further intents of Harmodius and Aristogiton, by a Harlot of theirs called Lemnia: who because she would not reueale her Companions, did cut out her owne tongue. Then did Hippias, the better to strengthen himselfe, enter into a straitamity with Antides, Tyrant of the Citie Lampsacus, whom he knew to be greatly fauoured by Darius, to whose sonne Hypocleus he gaue one of his Daughters in marriage. But some three yeeres after the death of his brother, doubting I know not what strong practice against himselfe, he began to vse the Citizens with great severity, which neither Pisistratus the Father, nor Hippias himselfe had euer exercised, during their vsurpation till this time. And therefore the Athenians fearing lest that this disease might rather increase, than diminish in Hippias, they stirred vp Cleisthenes one of the noblest and best able of their Citie, to practice their deliuey: who calling to his assistance the banished Alcmaeonide, together with an Armie of the Lacedemonians, led by Cleomenes their King, so affrighted Hippias, as by composition he gaue ouer his estate, and the possession of Athens, and from thence imbarke himselfe, tooke land at Sigeum, whence he went to Lampsacus in Mysia gouerned by Antides, who presented him to Darius. He was deuiued of his estate, as Herodotus and Thucydides agree, twenty yeeres before the battell of Marathon: all which time he continued, partly with Antides, at other times with Artaphernes Lieutenant for

Thus farre I haue digressed from Darius, to the end the Reader may conceiue the better the causes and motiues of this warre: whereof the hope that Hippias had to be restored to Athens by the helpe of Darius, which made him sollicite and perswade the Perians to conquer Greece, was one; but not the most vrgent.

§ VII.

Of the Ionian Rebellion, which was the principall cause of the warres ensuing betwene Greece and Persia.

Nother, and a strong motiue to this expedition, was the Ionick warre, breaking out in Asia about the same time. The Colonies transported out of Greece into Asia, which occupied the greatest part of the Sea-coast, hauing enioyed their libertie about 500. yeeres, euen from the Ionick migration, to the time of Cyrus, were by this Lydian King made Tributaries, and afterwards as parcell of his Dominions, weretaken in by Cyrus, and left as hereditary Seruants to the Crowne of Persia.

But as it is the custome of Nations halfe conquered (witnesse Ireland) to rebell againe vpon euery aduantage and opportunity: so did the Ionians, and other Gracians, both in Cyrus his life, and after him, seeke by all meanes possible to free themselves.

At this time they found such men ready to spurre them into Rebellion, as had by the Persian benee giuen vnto them for bridles to hold them in subiection. Euery one of those Townes had a Lord to rule it, whom they (abhorring the gouernment of one man) called their Tyrants. These Lords were very true to the Persian, by whose onely might they held the people in subiection. And this their dutifull affection they had well declared, when, Darius being in great extremity, they vsed all meanes to deliuer him and his Armie (that otherwise had benee lost) out of the Scythians hand. Of this great piece of seruice Histias the tyrant of Miletus expected the chiefe thanks, as hauing benee chiefe Author of their expecting Darius, when the rest, either perswaded by the Scythians, or carried away with their owne desires, were ready to haue abandoned him. But it came so to passe, that Darius being more fearefull of the harme that Histias (being powerfull and crafty) might doe to him in the future, than mindefull of the good which he had already receiued at his hand, found meanes to carry him a-long to Susa, where he detained him with all kinde vsage of a friend, yet kept such good espiall vpon him, as an enemy, he could not start away. Histias had subtilty enough to discouer the Kings purpose, which ill agreed with his owne desires. For he thought it more pleasant, and more honourable to rule as Prince in one faire Citie, hauing a small Territory, than to sit and feast at the great Kingstable, and heare the counsailes by which a large Empire was managed; being himselfe an idle beholder, and enioying with much restraint of liberty, none other pleasures than a priuate man might bestow vpon himselfe.

Wherefore he bethought himselfe of raising of some tumults in the lower Asia, to pacifie which if he might be sent, as one that had great experience and authoritie in those quarters, it would afterwards be in his power to stay at home, and either satisfie the King with excuses, or deale as occasion shall require. Resolving vpon this course, he sent very secret instructions to Aristagoras his kinsman, whom he had left his Deputie at Miletus, aduising him to stirre vp some Rebellion. These directions came seasonably to Aristagoras, who hauing failed in an enterprise vpon the Isle of Naxos, through the false dealing of a Persian his Affociate, stood in feare of disgrace, if not of some further ill that might befall him, as one that that had wasted the Kings treasures to no good purpose.

Therefore he readily embraced the counsaile: and the better to draw the whole Countrey of Ionian into the same course which he determined to run, he abandoned his tyrannie, and did set Miletus at liberty. This plausible beginning wan vnto him the hearts of the Milesians: and his proceeding with other Ionian Tyrants (of whom some he tooke and sold as slaves to their Citizens, others he chased away) caused the whole Nation to be at his command. The Persian fleet, whereof he lately had benee Admirall in the enterprise of Naxos, he had surprised in his first breaking out, together with the principall Officers, Officers, and Capitaines, so that now hee thought himselfe able to deale with the great Kings forces, lying thereabout, either by Land or Sea. But likely it was that the power of all Asia would shortly be vpon his necke, and crush both him and his assistants to pieces, vnlesse hee were able to raise an Armie that might hold the field, which the Ionians alone were insufficient to performe. Therefore he tooke a iourney to Sparta, where hauing assayed in vaine with many arguments, and the offer of fiftie talents, to win to his party Cleomenes King of the Lacedaemonians: hee went from thence to Athens, and with better successe besought the people to lend him their assistance. The Athenian Embassadors which had benee sent to the Persian Kings Lieutenants in the lower Asia, desiring them not to giue countenance to Hippias, now a banished man, and lately their Tyrant, were a while before this returned with ill answers, hauing found very churlish entertainment. So that the cuill which they were to expect in all likelyhood from the Persian, made them willing to begin with him. To which purpose, their consanguinitie with the Ionians, and the persvasions of Aristagoras, drew them on apace, if perhaps his treasure were not helping. Twenty ships the Athenians furnished for this voyage; to which the Eratians furnished five more, in regard of the ancient kindnesse that had passed between the Ionians and them. With these and their owne forces ioyned, the Ionians entered the Riuer Caistrus, which falleth into the Sea by Ephesus: by which aduantage they surprised Sardis when no enemy was heard of or suspected; infomuch, as Artaphernes, who ruled as Vice-roy in those parts, had no other hope of safetie, than by retreating himselfe into the Castle; which the Gracians could not force: from whence he beheld the slaughter of the Citizens, and the Citie flaming.

The Persians at length, mixt with the Burgers, began to encourage them to defence, and recouered the Market place, strengthened by the riuer Pactolus, which ran through it; and borrowing courage from desperation, they both defended themselves, and charged their enemies; who well aduising themselves, made all the haste they could toward the Sea side. But Artaphernes hauing gathered all the strength he could, pursued the Gracians, and found them neere Ephesus; where setting resolutely vpon them, hee slaughtered a great part of their Armie; the rest sauing themselves in Ephesus. In this fight Eualcides, Captaine of the Eratians perished: but his fame and memorie was by that excellent Poet Simonides preferred. After this ouerthrow, the Athenians, which were before sent vnto Aristagoras and to the Ionians, could by no arguments of theirs, no not by their teares, bee perswaded to make any second triall of their fortunes on that side the Sea.

Yet the burning of Sardis made a greater noyse in the world, than the late good successe which the Persians had in one or two skirmishes, could raise. Wherefore the Ionians brauely proceeding, won a great part of Caria; and sending their Fleete into the Hellepont, got Bizantium and other Townes into their hands. Yea, the Cyprians, lately subdued by Cambyses, beganne heereupon to take heart; and entring into confederacie with the Ionians, who were able to giue them ayd by Sea, rebelled against the Persians.

The newes comming to the eare of Darius, filled him with great indignation, and with an extreme hatred of the Athenians, vpon whom he vowed to take sharpe reuenge. As for the Ionians, his contempt of them, and their knowledge of his power, made him to thinke, that they would not haue dared to attempt such things, but by the instigation of those, to whom the ignorance of his great might had afforded the courage to proooke him. This was the maine ground of the Warre commenced by Darius, and pursued by Xerxes against Athens: To which, the sollicitation of Hippias, before remembered, gaue onely some forme and assistance: the businesse, when once it was thus farre on foot, so being like ynough to haue proceeded, though hee had perished ere it were aduanced any further.

Some other occurrents in this Ionian commotion extended the quarrell of Darius against many of the Ilanders, if not against the whole Nation of the Greekes; for all of them gaue to his Rebels free harbour: the Ilanders moreouer did helpe to furnish out a Naue of three hundred and sixtie saile against him. These prouocations did rather breede in him a desire to abate their pride, than any feare of harme that they were like to doe him. For what they had done at Sardis, was but by surprize. In euery fight they were beaten by the Persians, who had not yett lost the fruits of their discipline, wherein wherein Cyrus had trained them, nor all their ancient Captaines. In one sea-fight by the Isle of Cyprus, the Ionians indeede had the vpper hand; but they were Phœnicians, Agyptians, and Cilicians, whom they vanquished: neither was that victory of any vse to them; the Cyprians, in whose aide they came, being vtterly beaten by the Persian Armie at Land, and reduced into their old subiection. So had the Persians likewise by open warre and faire force ouerthrowne the Carians in two battailes, and reclaimed that Nation; as also they had recovered the Townes vpon Hellepont, with some Æolian and Ionian Cities: when Aristagoras with his friends quitting Miletus, fled into Thrace, desirous to seat himselfe in Amphipolis, a Colonie of the Athenians. But the Edonians, on whose Territorie belike he landed, ouerthrew him, & cut his troups in pieces.

About the same time, Histiæus the first mouer of this insurrection came downe into those quarters; who hauing vndertaken the performance of great matters to Darius, was glad to flye from his Lieutenants, by whom his double dealing was detected.

But this euasion preferred him not long. For after many vaine attempts that he made, he was taken in fight by the Persians, and hastily beheaded, lest the King should pardon him vpon remembrance of old good turnes; as it seemes that he would haue done, by the buriall which he commanded to be giuen to his dead body that was crucified, and by his heauie taking of his death.

Histiæus had sought to put himselfe into Miletus; but the Citizens doubting his conditions, chose rather to keepe him out, and make shift for themselves, without his helpe. The strength of their Citie by land, which had in old time withstood the Lydian Kings, and their good Fleet which promised vnto them the liberty of an open Sea, emboldened them to try the vttermost, when very few friends were left vpon that Continent to take their part. But their Nauie was broken as much by threatnings as by force; many of their companions and fellow-rebels forsaking him vpon hope of pardon; and many being danted with the causelesse sight of those that should haue assisted them. Neither was it long before the Towne it selfe being assaulted both by Land and Sea, was taken by force, the Citizens slaine, their wiues and children made slaues, and their goods a bootie to the Persians, whom for fixe yeeres space they had put to so much trouble.

§. VIII.

The warre which Darius made vpon Greece, with the battaile of Marathon, and Darius his death.

His Warre with good successe finished by the Persians, and some attempts made on Europe side with variable successe: Darius obstinate in the enterprise and conquest of Greece (though at first hee pretended to make the Warre but against the Athenians and Eretrians, who ioyntly assisted the Ionians against him, and burnt Sardis in Lydia) did now by his embassadours demand an acknowledgement from them all: among whom, some of them not so well resolved as the rest, submitted themselves; as the Eginets and others. Against these, the Athenians being inflamed, (by the assistance of the Lacedæmonians) after diuers encounters forst them to giue pledges, and to relinquish the party of the Persians. Cleomenes led the Lacedæmonians in this warre, and caused his companion-King Demantus to be deposed: who thereupon fled to Darius, farre the more confident of victory, by reason of these discords, alienations, and ciuill warres among the Greekes. He therefore gaue order to Hippagoras to prepare a Fleete of shippes fit to transport his Armie ouer the Hellepont: the same consisting of an hundred thousand foot, and ten thousand horse. The charge in chiefe of his Armie he committed to Datis, accompanied and assisted by Hippias, the sonne of Pisistratus, expelled out of Athens twenty yeeres before, and by Ariaphernes his brother, Gouverneur of Sardis, and the Sea-coast of Asia the lesse. These Commanders hauing their Companies brought downe to the Sea-side, imbarked themselves in fixe hundred Gallies and other Vessels; and first of all attempted the Islands called Cyclades, which lay in the mid-way betwene Asia the lesse, and Greece. For (obtaining those places) the Persians had then nothing to hinder the transportation of their forces ouer the Ægean Sea: but on the contrary they might alwayes both relieue themselves in their passage, and shrowd themselves from all suddaine tempests and outrage.

To this end they first possessed themselves of Samos, secondly, they attempted Naxos: Which Island, the inhabitants despairing of their owne forces, abandoned. So did the people of Delos, of which Apollo was natue: Which Island Darius did not onely forbear to sacke; but recalling the inhabitants, he gaue order to beautifie the places and Altars of Apollo erected. And hauing recovered these and other Islands, the Persians directed their course for Eretria in Eubœa: for that Citie, (as already hath beene shewed) had assisted the Ionians at the taking and firing of Sardis. In this Island the Persians tooke ground, and besieged Eretria very straitly, and after fixe dayes assault, partly by force, and in part by the treason of Euphabus and Philagius; they tooke it, sackt it, and burnt it to the ground. Thus farre the winds of prosperous fortune filled their sayles. From Eubœa the Persians past their Armie into Attica, conducted and guided by Hippias, late Prince of Athens, and marching towards it, they encamped at Marathon, in the way from the Sea, wher they landed, towards Athens.

The Athenians finding the time arriued, wherein they were to dispute with their owne venues against Fortune, and to call lots for their liberty, for their wiues, their children, and their liues, put themselves in the best order they could to make resistance, and with all sent away with speede to the Lacedæmonians for succour, imploying in that Negotiation one Phidippides, who passing through Arcadia, encountered in the way a familiar Diuell, which he supposed to be Pan, who willed him to assure the Athenians of victory, promising that some one of the gods should be present at the battaile to assist them and defend them against the multitude of their enemies. Phidippides at his returne seeing he could not bring with him any present succours from Sparta, yet he thought it greatly auailing to bring newes from the gods, and promise of assistance from Heauen, which no doubt (though the deuice was somewhat likely to be his owne) yet it greatly encouraged the multitude and common people, who in all ages haue beene more stirred vp with foad Prophecies and other like superstitious fooleries, than by any iust cause or solid reason.

The Athenians being now left to themselves, with one thousand onely of the Plataeans (who hauing beene formerly defended by the Athenians against the Thebans, did in this extremity witness their thankfulness and gratefull disposition) began to dispute, Whether it were most for their aduantage to defend the walles of Athens, or to put themselves into the field with such forces as they had, the same consisting of tenne thousand Athenians, and one thousand of the Plataeans. In the end, and after great diuersity of opinions, Miltiades, who perswaded the triall by battell, prevailed.

The Armies being now in view, and within a mile of each other, the Athenians disposed themselves into three troups: two wings or hornes, as they teame them, and the body of a battaile. The Persians when they perceiued so small a troupe aduancing towards them, thought the Athenians rather disposed of their vnderstanding, than possessed with the resolution whereof they made shew. So inuincible and resistlesse the Persians esteemed their owne numbers to be, and that small troupe of their enemies then in view, rather to be despised than to be fought withall: But in conclusion, the victory being doubtfully ballanced for a while, sometime the vertue of the Grecians, and sometimes the number of the Persians prevailed, the Grecians fighting for all that they had, the Persians for that they needed not, these great forces of Darius were disordered and put in rout; the Athenians following their victory euen to the Sea-shore; where the Persians, so many of them as lost not their wits with their courage, saued themselves in their ships.

The Persian Armie consisted of an hundred thousand foot and ten thousand horse; of which there were slaine in the place fixe thousand three hundred, and of the Grecians an hundred fourescore and twelue. For howsoeuer it came to passe, either by strange visions, which were afterward called Panicterrores, or by some other affright,

it seemeth, that the inuading Armie, after the first encounter, fought with their backs towards their enemy, and lost that number, by Herodotus set downe, in their disorderly retreat, or rather in their flat running away. As for Iustines report, That two hundred thousand of the Persian Armie were slaine, the same hath no apparance nor possibility of truth. In this fight Hippias the perswader of the enterprise was slaine, saith Iustine and Cicero; but Suidas tels vs, That he escaped, and died most miserably in Lemnos.

The greatest honour of this victory was cast vpon Miltiades, who both perswaded the triall by battaile, and behaued himselfe therein answervably to the counsell which he gaue. Themistocles had his first reputation in this fight, being but yong and of the first beard. Those of the Gracians, of marke and commandement, that fell in the first encounter, were Callimachus and Stesileus. It is also said, That Cynergus following the Persians to their embarking, laid hands on one of their Gallies, to haue held it from putting off the shore, and hauing his right hand cut off, he yet offered to arrest it with his left; of which also being deprivied, he tooke hold of it with his teeth. This encounter happened in the first yeere of the threescore and twelfth Olympiad, about the time of the War made by Coriolanus against his fellow-Romans: Alexander the sonne of Aminas being then King of Macedon, and Phanippus then Gouvernor of Athens, according to Plutarch or Hylides after Halicarnassus.

This great fray thus parted, and the Persians returned backe into the lesser Asia, Miltiades fought and obtained an employment against the Islanders of Paros, one of the Cyclades, and passing ouer his Companies in threescore and ten Gallies, after fixe and twentie dayes assault he brake his thigh, in seeking to enter it by the Temple of Ceres, wherewith himselfe being made vnable, and his companies discouraged, he returned to Athens; where those vngratefull Citizens forgetting all his seruices past, and that of all other the most renowned at the battaile of Marathon, did by the perswasion of Xanippus, the father of Pericles (who enuied his fame) cast him into prison, and set on him a fine of fiftie Talents; where his weake and wounded body being not able to endure the one, nor his estate to pay the other, he after a few dayes ended his life.

Which enuie of the better sort to each other, with their priuate Factions, assisted by the vnthankfull and witlesse people, brought them, not many yeeres after, from a victorious and famous Nation, to base subiection and slavery. Miltiades left behinde him one sonne called Cymon, begotten on Hegisipila, daughter of Olorus King of Thrace, who (saith Plutarch) was neither inferior to his father in valour, nor to Themistocles in vnderstanding, but exceeded them both in iustice and good gouernment.

Now Darius taking greater care how to recover his honour, than sorrow for the losse receiued in Greece, gaue order for new leuies of men, and all other warlike prouisions. But the Egyptians reuolting from his obedience (a Kingdome of great strength and reuenuie) greatly distracted his resolution for the reiuasation of Greece. The dissension also among his sonnes, of whom, the yonger being borne after he was King, and by so great a mother as Atossa, disdained to giue place to his elder brother, borne before Darius obtained the Empire, greatly vexed him. And lastly, death, who hath no respect of any mans affaires, gaue end to all his consultations and enterprises, and ioyned him to the earth of his ancestors, about a yeere after the battaile of Marathon, and after that he had reigned fixe and thirty yeeres. He left behinde him fise sonnes, namely Artabanes, borne before he obtained the kingdome, Xerxes who succeeded him, Achemenes gouernor of Egypt, Masistes and Anabignes.

Of Xerxes.

S. I.

The preparation of Xerxes against Greece.

Xerxes received from his father, as hereditarie, a double Warre, one to be made against the Egyptians, which he finished so speedily, that there is nothing remaining in writing how the same was performed: the other against the Gracians; of which it is hard to iudge, whether the preparations were more terrible, or the successe ridiculous. In the consultation for the prosecution of this Warre, which was chiefly bent against the Athenians, the Princes of Persia were diuided in opinion. Mardonius, who had formerly commanded in Thrace and Macedon, vnder Darius, and had also Hystaspes for his grandfather, as Xerxes had, and married Xerxes his sister Artazostres, perswaded by many arguments the European warre. But Artabanus, brother to the late Darius, and vncle to Xerxes, maintained the contrary counsell, laying before Xerxes the lamentable and ridiculous successe of the two late inuasions, which Darius had made contrary to his counsell: The one in person vpon the Scythians, the other by his Lieutenants vpon the Greeks; in each of which Darius left to his enemies both his Armie and his honour.

Hetherefore besought Xerxes to be right well aduised before he did too farre imbarke himselfe in this businesse. For whatsoever vndertaking hath deliberate and sound counsell for conductor, though the successe doe not alwayes answere the probability, yet hath Fortune nothing else thereof to vaunt, than the variableness of his owne nature, which onely the diuine Providence, and not any humane power, can constrain.

But to obliuate was the resolution of Xerxes in prosecution of his former intent, that Artabanus, whether terrified by Visions (as it is written of him) or fearing the Kings hatred, which he made knowne to all those that opposed his desire to this Warre (changing opinion and counsell) assisted the Gracian Expedition with all the power he had.

After the Warre of Egypt was ended, foure yeeres were consumed in describing and gathering an Armie for this inuasion: which being compounded of all Nations subiect to the Persian Empire, consisted of seauenteene hundred thousand foot, and eighty thousand horsemen, besides Chariots, Camels, and other Beasts for Carriage, if we may beleue Herodotus: for of this multitude, Trogus findes the number lesse by seuen hundred thousand footmen.

The Commanders of the seuerall Nations were the Princes of the bloud of Persia, either by marriage in the Kings house, or otherwise: for to these were all commandements of this nature giuen, some few people excepted, who had of their owne leaders.

The charge of the whole Armie was bestowed on Mardonius, the sonne of Gobryas by a sister of Darius, to whom were ioyned some others of Xerxes his neereft kindred, as Generals ouer all; sauing that the charge of ten thousand select Persians, called the immortal Regiment (because if any one of the whole number died, or were slaine, there was another presently chosen in his stead) was giuen to Hydarnes; the eighty thousand horsemen were led by the sonnes of Darius, who commanded the late Armie of Darius in Greece.

The Fleece of Gallies were 2200. and eight, furnished by the Phoenicians, who had Commanders of their owne Nation, and by the Cypriotes, Cilicians, Pamphilians, Lycians, Dorians, Carians, Ionians, Aeolians, and Hellepontines; who were trusted with the furnishing of their owne Vessels, though commanded by the Princes of Persia, as by Ariabignes the sonne of Darius, and others. The rest of the Vessels for transportation were three thousand. There were also certaine Gallies furnished by Artemisia, the daughter of Lygdamis, Princessse of Halicarnassus, and the Islands adioyning, which her selfe commanded. Those Gallies by her prepared and furnished, exceeded all the rest of the Fleet, excepting those of Zidon, in which Xerxes himselfe was embarked.

§. II.

Xerxes Armie entertained by Pythius: his cutting off Mount Athos from the Continent: his bridge of Boates ouer the Hellepont: and the discourse betweene him and Artabanus upon the view of the Armie.

When this world of an Armie was thoroughly furnished, he caused all the Nations of which it was compounded, to make their Rendez-vous and repaire at Sardis in Lydia. And when he had assembled to the number of seuentene hundred thousand foot, as he entred the body of Celanas, he was by one Pythius the Lydian entertained, who out of his Flocks and Heards of Cattell gaue food to Xerxes and his whole Armie. The Feast ended, he also presented him with two thousand Talents of silver, and in Gold foure Millions, wanting seuenthou thousand of the Persian Darici, which make so many of our markes.

The King ouercome with the exceeding liberality of Pythius, did not onely refuse his treasure offered, but commanded that seuen thousand Darici should be giuen him to make vp his foure Millions, of which, so many thousand were wanting when he made the present. But soone after, when Pythius besought him to spare one of his five sonnes from his attendance into Greece (because himselfe was old, and had none whom he could so well trust as his owne sonne) Xerxes most barbarously caused the young man, for whom his father sought exemption, to be sundered into two parts, commanding, that the one halfe of his carkasse should be layed on the right, and the other halfe on the left hand of the common way by which the Armie marched.

Two things he commanded to be done before he came to the Sea-side. The one was a passage for Gallies to be cut behinde Mount Athos, making the same (with the halfe Island or Headland, whereon it stood) to be an entire Island, sundring thereby from the Continent of Thrace five Cities, besides the Mountaine and the Chersonesus or Necke of the Land it selfe: a worke of more ostentation than of vse, and yet an enterprize of no great wonder, the Valley which held it to the Continent hauing but twelue furlongs (which make about a mile and halfe) to cut through, and the ditch being broad enough onely for two Gallies to passe in front. The Cities so seuered from the maine, were Dion, Olophyxus, Acrothoon, Thysus, and Cleone.

He also gaue order, that a Bridge vpon Boats should be made ouer the Hellepont betweene Abidus and Sestos, the Sea there hauing a myle of breadth, wanting an eight part, which after the finishing, was by a Tempest torne asunder and disseuered: wherewith Xerxes being more enraged than discouraged, commanded those to be slaine that were masters of the worke, and caused fixe hundred threescore and foureteene Gallies to be coupled together, thereon to frame a new Bridge; which by the art and industrie of the Phenicians was so well anchored to resist both windes blowing into and from the Euxine Sea, as the same being well boarded and rayled, the whole Armie of seuentene hundred thousand foot, and fourescore thousand Horse, with all the Moyle and Carriages, past ouer it into Europe in seuen dayes and seuen nights, without intermission. This transportation of Armies did Cesar afterward vse. And Caligula that mad Emperour, in imitation of Xerxes his Bridge, did build the like.

The Bridge finished, and the Armie brought neere to the Sea-side, Xerxes tooke a view of all his Troupes, assembled in the Plaines of Abidus, being carried vp, and seated on a place ouer-topping the Land round about it, and the Sea adioyning: and after he had gloried in his owne happinesse, to behold and command so many Nations, and so powerfull an Armie and Fleet, he suddenly (notwithstanding) burst out into teares, moued with this contemplation, That in one hundred yeeres there should not any one suruiue of that marvellous multitude: the cause of which sudden change of passion when he uttered to Artabanus his vncke, Artabanus spake to the King to this effect: That which is more lamentable than the dissolution of this great Troupe within that number of yeeres by the King remembred, is, That the life it selfe which we enioy is yet more miserable than the end thereof: for in those few dayes giuen vs in the world, there there is no man among all these, nor elsewhere, that cuer found himselfe so accompanied with happinesse, but that he oftentimes pleased himselfe better with the desire and hope of death, than of liuing; the incident calamities, diseases, and sorrowes whereto mankind is subiect, being so many and ineuitable, that the shortest life doth oftentimes appeare vnto vs ouer-long; to auoid all which, there is neither refuge nor rest, but in desired death alone.

With this melancholy discourse, Xerxes being not much pleased, prayed Artabanus not to ouer-cast those ioyes which they had now in pursuit with sad remembrances. And holding still a doubtfull conceit, that Artabanus vterly condemned the inuasion of Greece, against which he had formerly giuen many strong reasons, desired him to deale freely with him. Whether he were returned to his first resolution, that the enterprize of Greece could not be prosperous? Or whether, according to the change of minde put into him by his late Vision, he was confident of good success? Artabanus, notwithstanding that he assured himselfe of the Kings resolution to goe on, and dared not by any new Arguments to batter the great purpose it selfe, yet hee told the King, That there were two things which maruellously affrighted him, and which the King should finde, as he feared, to be most aduerser, to wit, the Sea and the Land: The Sea, because it had no where in that part of the world any Port capable of so great a Fleet: in so much, as if any tempest should arise, all the Continent of Greece could hardly receiue them, nor all the Hauens thereof afford them any safety: and therefore when any such shelter shall be wanting vnto them, he prayed him to vnderstand, that in such a case of extremity, men are left to the will and disposition of Fortune, and not Fortune to the will and disposition of men. The Land, besides other incommodities, will be found by so much the more an enemy, by how much the vnfinite desire of man to obtaine more and more thereof, doth leade him forward: for were there no man found to giue resistance, yet the want of meates to feede such an Army, and the Famine, which cannot be preuented, will without any other violence offered dis-inable and consume it. By these Arguments Artabanus hoped to haue diuerted Xerxes, not daring perchance to vter what indeed hee most feared, to wit, the ouerthrow of the Armie it selfe both by Sea and Land, which so soone after followed. These Cautions were exceeding weightie, if Xerxes his obstinacie had not mis-prised them. For to inuade by Sea vpon a perillous Coast, being neither in possession of any Port, nor succoured by any party, may better fit a Prince presuming on his fortune, than enriched with vnderstanding. Such was the enterprize of Philip the second vpon England in the yeere 1588. who had belike neuer heard of this Counsell of Artabanus to Xerxes, or forgotten it.

Now concerning the second point, it was very likely, that Xerxes his Armie, which could not haue in it lesse then two millions of Soules, besides his beasts for Seruice and Carriage, should after a few daies suffer famine, and vsing Machiauels words, Mourir sans couste, die without a knife. For it was impossible for Greece, being a ragged, strait and mountainous Countrey, to yeeld food (besides what serued themselves) for twenty hundred thousand strangers, whom they neuer meant to entertaine, but with the sharpened points of their weapons, destroying withall whatsoever they could not well inclose and defend. Nay, if we may beleue Herodotus, the Armie of Xerxes, being reuiued at Thermopyle, consisted of five millions, two hundred eighty three thousand, two hundred twentie men, besides Laundresses, Harlots and Horles, and was therefore likely to endure a speedy famine.

The effect of Xerxes his answer was, That it was impossible to provide for all things, and that whatsoever should enterprize any great matter, if hee gaue the hearing to all that could be objected of accidentall inconueniences, hee should neuer pursue the same farther, then the dispute and consultation: which if his Predecessors, the Persian Kings, had done, they had neuer growne to that greatnesse, or possesed so many Kingdomes and Nations as now they did; and therefore concluded, That great enterprises were neuer vnderaken without great perils. Which resolution of Xerxes was not to be condemned, if any necessity had enforced him to that warre. But seeing the many Nations newlie conquered, which he already commanded, were more than could bee constrained to obedience any longer than the powerfull prosperity of the Persians endured, and that Greece was separated by the Sea from the rest of Xerxes Dominions (of whose resolution his Father Darius had made a deare experience) the fruit of this warre was answerable to the plantation, and the successe and end agreeable to the weak counsell whereon it was grounded. Furthermore, those millions of men which he transported, and yet in his owne iudgement not sufficient, (for he gathered in marching on, all the strength of Thrace and Macedon) were an argument, that he rather hoped to feare the Greekes by the fame of his numbers, than that he had any confidence in their valour and resolution, whom he conducted. For it is wisely said of those vncountable multitudes: Non vires habet sed pondus, & impedimentum potius sunt quam auxilium; They are great in bulke, but weak in forces, and rather a luggage than an aide.

Besides, as it was impossible to marshall such a world of men in one Armie, so the diuers Nations, speaking diuers languages, bred the same confusion among the Persian to commanders when they came to fight, as it did to the builders of Babel, when they came to worke. Whereas if Xerxes had of his siue millions compounded ten Armies of fiftie thousand chosen souldiers in each, and sent them yeerely into Greece well victualled and furnished, he had either preuailed by the sword, or forced them to forsake their territorie, or brought them into obedience by necessitie and famine, which cannot be resisted. But while Xerxes, resolved to cut downe the bankes of Greece, and to let in a sea of men vpon them, he was deceived both of his owne hopes, and in their hearts whom he employed, and beaten by the Greekes, both by Land and Sea; yea, hee himselfe, conducted by his feare, fled shamefully into Asia. A great part of his Armie was buried in Greece: the remainder whereof, which wintred in Thessalie, and led by Marodonius, who perswaded the enterprize, was in the Summer following vterly defeated, and himselfe slaine.

§. III.

Of the fights at Thermopylae and Artemisium.

After such time as Xerxes had transported the Armie ouer the Hellepont, and landed in Thrace, (leaving the description of his passage alongst that Coast, and how the Riuer of Lissus was drunke drie by his multitudes, and the Lake neere to Pissirus by his cattell, with other accidents in his marches towards Greece) I will speake of the encounters he had, and the shamfull and incredible overthrowes which he receiued. As first at Thermopylae, a narrow passage of halfe an acre of ground, lying betweene the Mountaines which diuide Thessalie from Greece, where sometime the Phocians had raised a wall with gates, which was then for the most part ruined. At this entrance Leonidas, one of the Kings of Sparta, with three hundred Lacedemonians, assisted with one thousand Tegeate and Mantineans, one thousand Arcadians, and other Peloponnesians, to the number of three thousand one hundred in the whole, besides one thousand Phocians, foure hundred Thebans, seuen hundred Thespians, and all the forces (such as they were) of the bordering Locrians, defended the passage two whole dayes together against that huge Armie of the Persians. The valour of the Greekes appeared so excellently in this defence, that in the first dayes fight, Xerxes is said to haue three times leaped out of his Throne, fearing the destruction of his Armie by one handfull of those men, whom not long before he had vterly despised: and when the second dayes attempt vpon the Greekes had proued vaine, he was altogether ignorant how to proceede further, and so might haue continued, had not a run-agate Gracian taught him a secret way, by which part of his Armie might ascend the ledge of Mountaines, and set vpon the backs of those who kept the Straits. But when the most valiant of the Persian Armie had almost inclosed the small forces of the Greekes, then did Leonidas, King of the Lacedemonians, with his three hundred, and seuen hundred Thespians, which were all that abode by him, refuse to quit the place which they had vndertaken to make good, and with admirable courage not onely resist that world of men which charged them on all sides; but issuing out of their strength, made so great a slaughter of their enemies, that they might well be called vanquishers, though all of them were slaine vpon the place. Xerxes hauing lost in this last fight, together with twenty thousand other Souldiers and Captaines, two of his own brethren, began to doubt what inconuenience might befall him by the vertue of such as had not bene present at these battailes, with whom he knew that he shortly was to deale. Especially of the Spartans he stood in great feare, whose manhood had appeared singular in this tryall, which caused him very carefully to enquire what numbers they could bring bring into the field. It is reported of Dieneces the Spartan, that when one thought to haue terrified him by saying, That the flight of the Persian arrowes was so thicke as would hidethe Sunne: he answered thus; It is very good newes: for then shall we fight in the coole shade.

Such notable resolution hauing as freely bene expressed in deedes, as it was vttered in words, caused the Persian to stand in great doubt, when he heard that the Citie of Sparta could arme well-nigh eight thousand men of the like temper, and that the other Lacedemonians, though inferior to those, were very valiant men. Wherefore he asked counsell of Demaratus, a banished King of the Spartans, who had alwayes well aduised and instructed him in the things of Greece, what course were fittest to be taken in his further proceedings. The opinion of Demaratus was, That all the Land-forces would assemble together to defend the Isthmus, that streight necke of ground which ioyneth Peloponnesus to the Continent. For which cause he aduised, That three hundred ships well manned should be sent vnto the Coast of Laconia, to spoyle the Countrey, and to hold the Lacedemonians and their neighbours busied at home; whilest Xerxes at his leisure hauing subdued the rest, might afterward bring his whole power vpon them, who remaining destitute of succour, would be too weak alone to make resistance. To this purpose also the same Demaratus further aduised, that the said Fleet of three hundred ships should seize vpon the Iland then called Cythera, now Cerigo, which lying neere to the Coast of Laconia, might serue as a fit place of Rendez-vous vpon all occasions, either of their owne defence, or endamaging the enemy: whereby that ancient speech of Chilon the Lacedemonian should be verified, that it were better for his Countrey-men to haue that Ile drowned in the sea, than stand so inconueniently as for them it did. What effect this counsell might haue taken, had it bene followed, it is not easie to guesse. But a contrary opinion of Achamenes brother to King Xerxes was preferred as the safer. For the Persian fleet had bin sorely vexed with a grieuous tempest which continued three whole dayes together, wherein were lost vpon the coast of Magnesia foure hundred ships of war, besides other vessels innumerable, accordingly as Artabanus had foreseene, that if any such calamity should ouertake them, there would not be found any Harbor wide enough to giue them succour. Therefore Achamenes perswaded his brother not to disperse his fleet, for if (said he) after the losse of foure hundred ships we shall send away other three hundred to seeke aduentures, then will the Greekes be strong enough by sea to encounter the rest of the Nauie, which holding altogether is inuincible. To this counsell Xerxes yeelded, hoping that his Land-armie and fleet should each of them stand the other in good stead, whilest both held one course, and lay not farre asunder. But herein he was farre deceived; for about the same time that his armie had felt the valour of the Greekes by Land, his Nauie likewise made a sorrowfull prooue of their skill and courage at Sea. The Gracians fleet lay at that time at Artemisium in the straits of Eubaea, where the Persians thinking to incompasse them, sent two hundred sayle about the Iland to fall vpon them behinde, vsing a like stratagem to that which their King did practise against Leonidas in a case not vnlike, but with farre different successe. For that narrow channell of the sea which diuideth Eubaea from the maine, was in the same sort held by a Nauy of two hundred threescore and eleuen sayle against the huge Persian Armada, as the straits of Thermopylae had formerly bene maintained by Leonidas, till he was circumuented, as this Nauie might haue bene, but was not. The departure of those two hundred ships that were sent about the Iland, and the cause of their voyage, was too well knowne in the Persian fleet, and soone enough disclosed to the Greekes, who setting saile by night, met them with a counter-surprise, taking and sinking thirty vessels, enforcing the rest to take the Sea, where being ouertaken with foule weather, they were driuen vpon the rockes and cast all away. Contrariwise, the Nauie of the Greekes was increased by the arrivall of fiftie three Athenian ships, and one Lemnian, which came to their purry in the last fight. As these new forces encouraged the one side: so the feare of Xerxes his displeasure stirred vp the other to redeeme their losse with some notable exploit. Wherefore setting aside their vnfortunate policy, they resolved in plaine fight to repaire their honour, & casting themselves into the forme of a Crescent, thought so to inclose the Greekes, who readily did present them battell at Artemisium.

The fight endured from noone till night, and ended with equall losse to both parts. For though more of the Persian ships were sunke and taken, yet the lesser losse fell altogether gether as heavy vpon the Greekish fleet, which being small could worse beare it. Herein only the Barbarians may seeme to haue had the worse, that they forsooke the place of fight, leauing the wracke and spoyle to the enemy, who neuerthelesse were faine to abandon presently euen the passage which they had vndertaken to defend, both for that many of their ships were sorely cruist in the battaile, and especially because they had receiued aduertisement of the death of Leonidas at Thermopylae. Before they wayed anchors, Themistocles Generall of the Athenians engraue vpon stone at the watering place an exhortation to the Ionians; that either they should reuolt vnto the Greekes, or stand neutrall, which perswasion, he hoped would either take some place with them, or at the least make them suspected by the Persians.

§ IIII.

When Xerxes had passed the straits of Thermopylae, he wasted the countrey of the Phocians, and the regions adioyning: as for the inhabitants, they chose rather to flye, and reserve themselves to a day of battell, than to aduventure their liues into his hands, vpon hope of sauing their wealth, by making proffer vnto him of their seruice. Part of his armie he sent to spoyle the Temple of Delphi; which was exceeding rich by meanes of many offerings that had there beene made by diuers Kings and great personages; of all which riches it was thought that Xerxes had a better Inuentorie than of the goods left in his owne Palace. To make relation of a great affrontment that fell vpon the companies which ariued at the Temple to haue sacked it, and of two Rocks, that breaking from the mount Parnassus, ouerwhelmed many of the Barbarians, it were peradventure somewhat superstitious. Yet Herodotus, who liued not long after, saith, That the broken Rocks remained euen to his memory in the Temple of Minerva, whether they rowled in their fall. And surely this attempt of Xerxes was impious; for seeing he beleued that Apollo was a god, he should not haue dared to entertaine a couetous desire of enriching himselfe by committing sacriledge vpon his Temple. Wherefore it may possibly be true, that licence to chastise his impietie, in such manner as is reported, was granted vnto the Diuell, by that Holy one, who saith, Will a man spoyle his gods? and elsewhere; Has any nation changed their gods, which yet are no gods? Goe to the Iles of Kittim, and behold, and send to Kedar, and take diligent heede, and see whether there be any such thing. Now this impietie of Xerxes was the more inexcusable, for that the Persians alleadged the burning of Cybeles Temple by the Athenians, when they set fire on the Citie of Sardis in Asia, to be the ground and cause of the waste which they made in burning of Citie and Temples in Greece. Whereas indeede, in the enterprise against Delphos, this Vizzor of holy and zealous reuenge falling off, discouered the face of couetousnesse so much the more vglie, by how much the more themselves had professed a detestation of the offence which the Athenians had committed in that kinde by meere mischance.

The remainder of that which Xerxes did, may be expressed briefly thus: He came to Athens, which finding forsaken, he tooke and burnt the Cittadel and temple which was therein. The Cittadel indeede was defended a while by some of more courage than wisdom, who literally interpreting Apolloes Oracle; that Athens should be safe in wooden walls, had fortified that place with boords and Palisadoes: too weake to hold out long, though by their desperate valour so well maintained at the first assault, that they might haue yeelded it vpon tolerable conditions, had they not vainely relied vpon the propheticie: whereof (being somewhat obscure) it was wisely done of Themistocles, to make discretion the interpreter, applying rather the words to the present neede, than fashioning the businesse to words.

§ V.

He Athenians had, before the comming of Xerxes, remoued their wiues and children into Trazene, Egina, and Salamis, not so highly prizing their houses and lands, as their freedom, and the common liberty of Greece. Neuerthelesse, this great zeale, which the Athenians did shew for the generall good of their Countrey, was ill requiried by the other Greekes, who with much labour were hardly intreated to stay for them at Salamis, whilst they remoued their wiues and children out of the Citie. But when the Citie of Athens was taken, it was presently resolued vpon, that they should forsake the Ile of Salamis, and withdraw the fleet to Isthmus: which necke of land they did purpose to fortifie against the Persians, & so to defend Peloponnesus by Land, and Sea, leauing the rest of Greece as indefensible, to the furie of the enemy. So should the Ilands of Salamis and Agina haue beene abandoned, and the Families of the Athenians (which were there bestowed as in places of securitie) haue beene giuen ouer into mercilesse bondage. Against this resolution Themistocles, Admirall of the Athenian fleet, very strongly made opposition; but in vaine. For the Peloponnesians were so possessed with feare of losing their owne, which they would not hazard, that no perswasions could obtaine of them, to regard the estate of their distressed friends and Allies. Many remonstrances Themistocles made vnto them, to allure them to abide the enemy at Salamis; As first in priuate vnto Eurybiades the Lacedemonian, Admirall of the whole fleet; That the selfe-same feare which made them forsake those coasts of Greece, vpon which they then anchored, would afterward (if it found no checke at the first) cause them also to disscue the fleet, and eury one of the Confederates to withdraw himselfe to the defence of his owne Citie and estate: Then to the Councell of Warre which Eurybiades vpon this motion did call together (forbearing to object what want of courage might worke in them hereafter) he shewed that the fight at Isthmus would be in an open Sea, whereas it was more expedient for them, hauing the fewer ships, to determine the matter in the streights; and that, besides the safeguard of Aegina, Megara, and Salamis, they should by abiding, where they then were, sufficiently defend Isthmus, which the Barbarians should not so much as once looke vpon, if the Greekes obtained victorie by sea; which they could not so well hope for elsewhere, as in that present place which gaue him so good aduantage. All this would not serue to retaine the Peloponnesians, of whom one, vnworthy of memorie, vpbraided Themistocles with the losse of Athens, blaming Eurybiades for suffering one to speake in the Councell, that had no Countrey of his owne to inhabite. A base and shamefull obiection it was, to lay as a reproach that losse, which being voluntarily sustained for the common good, was in true estimation by so much the more honourable, by how much it was the greater. But this indignitie did exasperate Themistocles, and put into his mouth a reply so sharpe, as auailed more then all his former perswasions. Hee told them all plainly, That the Athenians wanted not a fairer Citie, than any Nation of Greece could boast of; hauing well-neere two hundred good shippes of Warre, the better part of the Gracian fleet, with which it was easie for them to transport their Families and substance into any part of the World, and settle themselves in a more secure habitation, leauing those to shift as well as they might, who in their extremitie had refused to stand by them. Herewithall he mentioned a towne in Italie belonging of olde to the State of Athens, of which towne hee said an Oracle had foretold, That the Athenians in proesse of time should build it a new, and there (quoth hee) will we plant our selues, leauing vnto you a sorrowfull remembrance of my words, and of your owne vnthankfulnesse. The Peloponnesians hearing thus much, began to enter into better consideration of the Athenians, whose affaires depended not, as they well perceiued, vpon so weake termes, that they should be driuen to crouch to others; but rather were such, as might inforce the rest to yeeld to them, and condescend euen to the vttermost of their owne demands.

For the Athenians, when they first embraced that Heroicall resolution of leauing their grounds and houses to fire and ruine, if necessity should inforce them so farre, for the preservation of their liberty, did employ the most of their priuate wealth, and all the common treasure, in building a great Nauie. By these meanes they hoped (which accordingly fell out) that no such calamity should befall them by Land, as might not well be counterpoised by great aduantages at sea: Knowing well, that a strong fleet would either procure victorie at home, or a secure passage to any other Countrey. The other States of Greece held it sufficient, if building a few new ships, they did somewhat amend their Nauie. Wherby it came to passe, that, had they been vanquished, they could not haue expected any other fortune than either present death, or perpetual slauerie; neither could they hope to be victorious without the assistance of the Athenians, whose forces by sea did equall all theirs together; the whole consisting of more than three hundred and fourescore bottomes. Wherefore these Peloponnesians beginning to suspect their owne condition, which would haue stood vpon desperate points, if the fleet of Athens had forsaken them; were soone perswaded, by the greater feare of such a bad euent, to forget the lesser, which they had conceiued of the Persians: and laying aside their insolent brauery, they yeelded to that most profitable counsaile of abiding at Salamis.

§. VI.

*How the Persians consulted about giving battaile: and how Themistocles by policie held the 10
Greekes to their resolution; with the victorie at Salamis thereupon ensuing.*

IN the meane season the Persians had entred into consultation, whether it were conuenient to offer battell to the Greekes, or no. The rest of the Captaines giuing such aduice as they thought would best please the King their Master, had soone agreed vpon the fight: but Artemisia Queen of Halicarnassus, who followed Xerxes to this warre in person, was of contrary opinion. Her counsell was, that the King himselfe directly should march toward Peloponnesus, whereby it would come to passe, that the Greeke Nauie (vnable otherwise to continue long at Salamis for want of prouision) should presently be disscuered, and euery one seeking to preserve his owne Citie and goods, they should, being diuided, proue vnable to resist him, who had won so far vpon them when they held together. And as the profit will be great in forbearing to giue battell; so on the other side, the danger will be more (saide she) which wee shall vndergoe, than any need requireth vs to aduenture vpon; and the losse in case it fall vpon vs, greater than the profit of the victory which we desire. For if we compell the enemies to flie, it is more than they would haue done, wee sitting still: but if they, as better Sea-men than ours, put vs to the worst, the iourney to Peloponnesus is vtterly dashed, and many that now declare for vs, will soone reuolt vnto the Greekes. Mardonius, whom Xerxes had sent for that purpose to the fleet, related vnto his Master the common consent of the other Captaines, and withall this disagreeing opinion of Artemisia. The King well pleased with her aduice, yet resolved vpon following the more generall, but farre-worse counsaile of the rest; which would questionlesse haue bene the same which Artemisia gaue, had not feare and flatterie made all the Captaines vtter that, as out of their owne iudgement, which they thought to bee most conformable to their Princes determination. So it was indeede that Xerxes had entertained a vaine perswasion of much good, that his owne preference vpon the shore to behold the conflict, would worke among the Souldiers. Therefore hee incamped vpon the Sea-side, pitching his owne Tent on the mount Agaleus, which is opposite vnto the Ile of Salamis, whence at ease he might safely view all which might happen in that action, hauing Scribes about him to write downe the acts and behauiour of euery Capitaine. The neere approach of the Barbarians, together with the newes of that timorous diligence, which their Countymen shewed in fortifying the Isthmus, and of a Persian Armie, marching a pace thither; did now againe so terrifie and amaze the Peloponnesians, that no intreatie, nor contestation would suffice to hold them together. For they thought it meere madnesse to fight for a Countrey already lost, when they rather should endeouour to saue that which remained vnconquered; propounding chiefly to themselves what misery would befall them, if losing the victory, they should be driuen into Salamis, thereto be shut vp, and besieged round in a poore desolate Iland.

Hereupon they resolved forth-with to set saile for Isthmus: which had presently bene done, if the wisdom of Themistocles had not prevented it. For he perceiuing what a violent feare had stopp'd vp their eares against all good counsaile, did practise another course, and forth-with labour to prevent the execution of this vnwholesome decree; not suffering the very houre of performance to finde him busie in wrangling alteration. As soone as the Councell brake vp, he dispatched secretly a trustie Gentleman to the Persian Captaines, informing them truly of the intended flight, and exhorting them to send part of their Nauie about the Iland, which incompassing the Greekes, might prevent their escape; giuing them withall a false hope of his assistance. The Persians no sooner heard than beleueed these good newes, well knowing that the victorie was their owne assured, assured, if the Athenian fleet ioyned with them; which they might easily hope, considering what abilitie their Master had to recompence for so doing, both the Captaines with rich rewards, and the People with restitution of their Citie, and Territories. By these meanes it fell out, that when the Greekes very early in the morning were about to waigh Anchor, they found themselves inclosed round with Persians, who had laboured hard all that night, sending many of their ships about the Ile of Salamis, to charge the ennemie in reare, and landing many of their men in the Ile of Psittalea, which lyeth ouer-against Salamis, to saue such of their owne, and kill such of the Grecian partie, as by any misfortune, should be cast vpon the shore. Thus did meere necessitie enforce the Grecians to vndertake the battaile in the Straights of Salamis, where they obtained a memorable victorie, stemming the formost of their enemies, and chasing the rest, who falling foule one vpon another, could neither conueniently fight nor flie. I doe not finde any particular occurrences in this great battaile to be much remarkable. Sure it is, that the Scribes of Xerxes had a wearisome taske of writing downe many disasters that befell the Persian fleet, which ill acquitted it selfe that day, doing no one piece of seruice worthy the presence of their King, or the registring of his Notaries. As for the Greekes, they might well seeme to haue wrought out that victorie with equall courage, were it not that the principall honour of that day was ascribed to those of Agina, and to the Athenians, of whom it is recorded, That when the Barbarians did flie towards Phalerus, where the Land-armie of Xerxes lay, the ships of Agina hauing possessed the Straights, did sinke or take them, whilst the Athenians did valiantly giue charge vpon those that kept the Sea, and made any countenance of resisting.

§. VII.

Of things following after the battaile of Salamis: and of the flight of Xerxes.

AFter this victory, the Greekes intending by way of scrutiny, to determine which of the Captaines had best merited of them, in all this great seruice; euery Capitaine, being ambitious of that honour, did in the first place write downe his owne name, but in the second place as best deseruing next vnto himselfe, almost euery Suffrage did concur vpon Themistocles. Thus priuate affection yeelded vnto vertue, as soone as her owne turne was serued. The Persian King, as not amazed with this calamitie, began to make new preparation for continuance of warre; but in such fashion, that they which were best acquainted with his temper, might easily discerne his faint heart, through his painted lookes. Especially Mardonius, Author of the Warre, beganne to cast a warie eye vpon his Master, fearing lest his counsell should be rewarded according to the event. Wherefore purposing rather to aduenture his life in pursuite of the victorie, than to cast it away by vnder-going his Princes indignation; hee aduised the King to leaue vnto him three hundred thousand men, with which forces hee promised to reduce all Greece vnder the subiection of the Persian Scepter. Heerewithall he forgot not to sooth Xerxes with many faire words; telling him, that the cowardise of those Aegyptians, Phenicians, and Cilicians, with others of the like mettall, nothing better than slaves, who had so ill behaved themselves in the late Sea-seruice, did not concerne his honour, who had alwaies bene victorious, and had already subdued the better part of Greece, yea taken Athens it selfe, against which the Warre was principally intended. These words found very good acceptance in the Kings eare, who presently betooke himselfe to his iourney homewards, making the more haste, for that he vnderstood, how the Greekes had a purpose to faile to Hellepont, and there to breake downe his bridge, and intercept his passage. True it was that the Greekes had no such intent, but rather wished his hasty departure, knowing that hee would leaue his Armie not so strong, as it should haue bene, had he in person remained with it. And for this cause did Eurybiades giue counsell, that by no meanes they should attempt the breaking of that bridge, lest necessitie should enforce the Persians to take more courage, and rather to fight like men, than die like beasts. Wherefore Themistocles did, vnder pretence of friendship, send a false aduertisement vnto this timorous Prince, aduising him to conuay himselfe into Asia with all speed, before his bridge were dissolued: which counsell Xerxes took very kindly, and hastily followed, as before is shewed. Whether it were so that he found the bridge whole, and thereby repassed into Asia; or whether it were torne in sunder by tempests, and and hetherby driuen to imbarke himselfe in some obscure vessell, it is not greatly marvellous, though the Greekes did most willingly embrace the later of these reports. Howsoever it were, this flight of his did well ease the Countrey; that was thereby disburdened of that huge throng of people, which, as Locusts, had before overwhelmed it.

§. VIII.

The negotiations betweene Mardonius and the Athenians, as also betweene the Athenians and Lacedæmonians; after the flight of Xerxes.

Mardonius with his three hundred thousand had withdrawne himselfe into Thessalie, whence he sent Alexander, the sonne of Amyntas King of Macedon, as Embassador to the Athenians, with promise of large amends for all their losses received; and of extending their Territories as farre as their owne desires; allowing them to retain their libertie and lawes, if they would make peace with Xerxes, and assist him in that Warre.

The Athenians had now reentred their Citie, but not as yet brought backe their wives and children; for as much as they well perceived that the place could not be secure, till the Armie of Mardonius were broken and defeated. Wherefore the Lacedæmonians, understanding what faire conditions this Embassador would propound, were perplexed with very great feare, lest he should finde good and ready acceptance. Hereupon, they likewise very speedily dispatched their Embassadors for Athens, who arriving before the Macedonian had audience, vied the best of their perswasion to retain the Athenians firm. They alledged, that neither Xerxes nor Darius had any pretence of Warre against the rest of Greece, but had onely threatned the subversion of Athens, till they and all their Confederates arming themselves in defence of that Citie, were drawne into the quarrell, wherein the Athenians without much crueltie of injustice could not leave them. Wee know, said they, that yee have endured great calamities, losing the fruit of the grounds, and being driuen to forsake the Towne, the houses whereof be ruined, and vsnit for your habitation; in regard whereof, we undertake to maintaine as our owne, your wives and children amongst vs, as long as the warre shall continue, hoping that yee, who have alwaies procured libertie to others, will not now goe about to bring all Greece into slavery and bondage. As for the Barbarians, their promises are large, but their words and oaths are of no assurance. It was needlesse to vse many arguments to the Athenians, who gave answer to Alexander in presence of the Spartan Embassadors; That whilst the Sunne continued his course, they would be enemies to Xerxes, regarding neither gold nor any riches, with which hee might seeke to make purchase of their libertie. Concerning the maintenance of their wives and children, it was a burden which they promised to sustaine themselves, onely desiring the Lacedæmonians, that with all speed they would cause their Armie to march, for as much as it was not like, that Mardonius would long sit still in Thessalie, having once received such a pe-remptorie answer. In this their opinion of Mardonius his readinesse to invade Attica, they found themselves nothing deceived. For hee, as soone as Alexander had returned their obstinate purpose of resistance, did forthwith leade his Armie towards them, and their Citie: they having now the second time quitted it, and conveyed themselves into places of more securitie abroad in the Countrey, where they expected the arrivall of their Confederates. From Athens he sent his Agent vnto them with instructions, not only to perswade them to acceptance of the conditions before to them propounded, but with great promises to allure the principall of them to his partie. His hope was that either the people, wearied with forsaking their houses so often, would be desirous to preserve them from fire, & to have those which were already laid waste, reedified at the Kings charges: Or if this affection took no place with them, but that needs they would relye upon their old Confederates, whose succors did very slowly advance forwards, yet perhaps the Leaders might be wonne with great rewards, to draw them to this purpose; all which projects if they should faile, the destruction of Athens would be a good meane to please his Master, King Xerxes, who must thereby needes understand that Mardonius kept his ground, and feared not to confront the whole power of Greece, in the strongest part of their owne Countrey. But his expectation was beguiled in all these. For the Athenians so little regarded his offers, that when one Lycidas, or (as Demosthenes calls him)

Cyrillus, advised the Senate to accept the conditions, and propounded them to the people; all the Senators, & as many as abiding without the Counsaile-house heard what hee had said, immediately set vpon him, and stoned him to death; not examining whether it were feare or money, that had moued him to utter such a vile sentence. Yea, the women of Athens, in the Ile of Salamis, hearing of his bad counsaile, and bad end, assembling together, did enter his house there, and put his wife and children to the like execution. All this brauerie notwithstanding, when they perceyued the slacknesse of the Peloponnesians in giuing them aide, they were faine to betake themselves to Salamis againe, the old place of their securitie. Remaining there, and seeing little forwardnes in those whom it most concerned to assist them, they sent very seuerer messages to Sparta, complaining of their slacknes, & threatening withall, to take such course as might stand best with their own good, seeing that the common estate of all was so little regarded. These messengers were at the first entertained with dilatorie answers, which euery day grew colder, when as the Peloponnesian Wall, builded a-thwart the Isthmus, was almost finished. But as the Lacedæmonians waxed carelesse & dull, so the Athenians hotely pressed them to a quick resolution, giuing them plainly to vnderstand, that if they should hold on in those dilatory courses, it would not be long ere the city of Athens took a new course, that should little please them. All this while the Persian fleet lay vpon the coast of Asia, not daring to draw neerer vnto Greece, as being now too weake at Sea. Likewise the Greekish Nauie continued to itselfe within the Harbours vpon Europe side; both to doe seruice where need should require at home; and withall to shunne the danger which might haue befallen any part of it, that being distracted from the rest, had aduentured ouer-farre. So mutuall feare preserved in quiet the Islands lying in the midst of the Aegean Seas. But it was well and seasonably obserued by a Counsellor of Sparta, that the wall vpon Isthmus would serue to little purpose for the defence of Peloponnesus, if once the Athenians gave care to Mardonius: considering that many dores would be opened into that Demie-Iland, as soone as the Enemy should by winning the friendship of Athens, become the Master of the Seas about it. The Lacedæmonians vpon this admonition, making better perusal of their owne dangers, were very careful to giue satisfaction to the Athenian Embassadors, who not brooking their delays, were vpon point of taking leaue, yea as it seemed, of renouncing their alliance. Wherefore dispatching away five thousand Spartans in the euening, vnder conduct of Pausanias, they gave audience the next day to the Embassadors, whose complaints they answered with vehement protestations of their readinesse; deeply swearing that the Armie of Sparta was already farre vpon the iourney; and giuing them leaue to take vp other five thousand Lacedæmonians, out of the Region adioyning, to follow after them.

The Athenians, though distasting such want of grauitie, in a matter so important, were neuertheless contented with the finall conclusion; and leuying the number appointed of Lacedæmonian Souldiers, made what haste they could to incampe in Attica. The other Grecians were nothing slacke in sending forth Companies, whose neere approach caused Mardonius to forsake Attica as a rough Countrey, and therefore of much disadvantage to Horse, wherein consisted the best of his power. Before his departure hee burnt the Citie of Athens, beating downe the walls of it, and ruining all that had formerly escaped the fury of Warre.

It were too long a rehearfall to shew all that happened in many skirmishes betwene the Greekes and him, in the Countrey of Bootia, which Mardonius had chosen to be the seate of that Warre. Much time was spent before the quarrell was decided by the triall of one maine battell: for both parties did stand vpon their guard, each expecting when the other should assaile them.

The Army of Mardonius contained about three hundred thousand, which were by him cholen out of Xerxes his Armie, to whom were adioyned the forces of Thebes, Macedonia, Thessalie, and other parts of Greece, that now siding with the Persian, furnished his Campe with fiftie thousand men. Against these the Lacedæmonians, Athenians, and their Confederates, had leauied an Armie of one hundred and tenn thousand, of which forty thousand and were weightily armed, the rest were onely assistants to these forty thousand, being armed more slightly, as rather to make excursions and give chase, than to sustaine any strong charges.

These two Armies hauing eleuen daies confronted one the other, without performing any memorable piece of seruice, Mardonius, whose victuals beganne to faile, resolved to begin the fray. The Greekes were promised victorie by an Oracle, if they fought in the Land of the Athenians, and in the plaine of Ceres and Proserpina, making praier vnto certaine gods, Demi-gods, and Nymphes. But it was hard to find the certaine place which the Oracle designed. For the plaine of Ceres was indeed in the Territorie of Athens; but there was also an olde Temple of Ceres and Proserpina, neere vnto the place where they lay at that time encamped, as likewise the memorialls of those Nymphes, and Demi-gods, were in the same place, vpon Mount Citheron, and the ground serued well for foot-men against horse; onely the Land belonged vnto the Platians, and not vnto the Athenians.

Whilest the Greekes were perplexed about the interpretation of this doubtfull Oracle, the Platians, to make all cleere, did freely bestow their land on that side the Towne vpon the Athenians.

This magnificence of the Platians caused Alexander the Great, many ages after, to redifie their Citie, which was ruined in the Peloponnesian warres.

All things being ready for battaile; the Lacedemonian Generall thought it most meet, that the Athenians should stand opposite that day to the Medes and Persians, whom they had formerly vanquished at Marathon; and that he, with his Spartans, should entertaine the Thebans and other Greekes which followed Mardonius, as better acquainted with their fight, and hauing beaten them often-times before. This being agreed vpon, the Athenians changed place with the Lacedemonians; which Mardonius vnderstanding (whether fearing the Athenians, of whose valour the Medes and Persians had felt heavy proofe, or desiring to encounter the Spartans, as thinking them the brauest Souldiers in Greece) he did also change the order of his battaile, and oppose himselfe to Pausanias. All the Greekes might well perceiue how the Enemie did shift his wings, and Pausanias thereupon returned to his former Station; which Mardonius noting, did also the like. So one whole day was spent in changing to and fro. Some attempt the Persians made that day with their Archers on horse-back, who did so molest the Greekes at their watering place, that they were faine to enter into consultation of retiring; because they could not without much losse to themselves, and none to the enemie, lie neere to that fountaine which did serue all the Campe. Hauing therefore concluded among themselves to dislodge; and part of the Armie being sent away before day-light: Mardonius perceiued their departure in the morning, and thereupon being encouraged by their flight, (which to him seemed to proceed out of mere cowardise) he charged them in the reare with great violence. It may well be recorded as a notable example of patient valour, That the Lacedemonians being ouer-taken by the enemies horse, and ouerwhelmed with great flights of Arrows, did quietly sit still, not making any resistance or defence, till the Sacrifices for victory were happily ended, though many of them were hurt and slaine, and some of especiall make lost, before any signe of good successe appeared in the entrailes.

But as soone as Pausanias had found in the Sacrifice those tokens, which the superstition of that Age and Countrie accounted fortunate; hee gaue the Signall of battaile: and thereupon the Souldiers, who till then did sit vpon the ground, as was their manner, arose altogether, and with excellent courage receiued the charge of the Barbarians, that came thronging vpon them without any feare of such notable resistance. The rest of the Greece Armie that was in march, being reuoked by Pausanias, came in a pace to succour the Lacedemonians: onely that part of the Armie which was led by the Athenians, could not arriue vnto the place of the great battaile, because the Thebans, and other Greekes confederated with the Persians, gaue them checke by the way. Neuerthelesse, the Spartans with other their Assistants, did so well acquite themselves, that the Persians were vanquished, and Mardonius with many thousands more slaine in the field; the rest fledde into the Campe, which they had fortified with wooden walls, and there defended themselves with such courage as desperate necessity inforced them vnto, holding out the longer, because the Lacedemonians were not acquainted with the manner of assaulting Fortresse, and Walls. In the meane time the Athenians hauing found strong opposition of the Thebans and Thessalians, did with much labor and courage obtaine victorie, which hauing not long pursued, they came to helpe the Lacedemonians, whom they found wearily busied in assaulting the Campe, with more valour than skill. Wherefore they themselves vnder-took it, and in short space forced a passage through the Wall, at which breach first, and then on all sides, the Greekes entred with such furie, and iust desire of vengeance, that of three hundred thousand they are said not to haue left three thousand aliue, excepting those who fledde away with Artabazus; when as the Persian Armie first fell to rout.

If the execution were so great, as is reported, an especiall cause of it was the foolish retreat, or rather flight into the Campe. For though it were so, that the place was well fortified, and the number of those who cast themselves into it greater than any of the Assailants; yet they being of severall Nations and Languages, and hauing lost their Generall with other principall Commanders, it was impossible that they in such a terrour and astonishment should make good that peece of ground, lying in the heart of an Enemie Countrie, against an Armie of men, farre more valiant than themselves, and enflamed with present victorie. Therefore the same wall which for a few houres had preserved their liues, by holding out the Enemie, did now impale them, and leaue them to the slaughtering furie of vnpittifull Victors. Artabazus fled into Thrace, telling the people of Thessalie, and other Countries in his way, that he was sent by Mardonius vpon some piece of seruice: For he well knew, that had they vnderstood any thing of that great diffiniture, all places would haue bene hostile vnto him, and fought with his ruine to purchase fauour of the vanquishers. Therefore making so large marches, that many of his Souldiers being feeble were left behinde and lost, he came to Byzantium, whence hee shipped his men ouer into Asia. Such was the end of the vaine-glorious expedition, vnderaken by Xerxes against the Greekes, vpon hope of honour, and Conquest, though forcing otherwise, accordingly as Artabazus had fore-scene, and rather worse, for as much as it began the quarrell, which neuer ended, before the ruine of the Persian Empire was effected by that Nation of the Greekes, despised and fought to haue bene brought into slavery. Hereby it may seeme, that the vision appearing to Xerxes, was from God himselfe, who had formerly disposed of those things, ordaining the subuersion of the Persian Monarchie by the Greekes, who, thus prouoked, entred into greater consideration of their owne strength, and the weaknesse of their Enemies.

§. X.

The battaile of Mycale, with a strange accident that fell out in the beginning of it: and examples of the like.

THE same day on which the battaile was fought at Platæa, there was another battaile fought at Mycale, a Promontorie, or Head-land in Asia, where the Persian fleet rode.

Leuctichides the Spartan, with Xantippus the Athenian, Admirals of the Greece Nauie, at the request of some Ilanders & Ionians, did saile into those parts, to deliuer the Samians, & procure the Ionians to reuolt from the Persian. Xerxes himselfe at this time lay at Sardis, a Citie in Lydia, not farre from the Sea-side; hauing left three score thousand vnder the command of Tigranes, for defence of Ionian and the Sea-coast. Therefore when Artayntes and Itiramires, Admiralls of the Persian fleet; vnderstood that the Greekes bent their course towards them; they did forth-with draw their ships a-ground, fortifying with Palisades & otherwise, as much ground as was needfull for the encamping of all their Land & Sea-forces. Leuctichides at his arriuall, perceiuing that they meant to keepe within their strength, & resolving to force them out of it, rowed with his Gally close aboard the shore and called vpon the Ionians (who more for feare then good will were encamped among the Persians) exhorting them in the Greece tongue to remember liberty, & vse the faire occasion which they now had to recouer it. Herein he did imitate Themistocles, who had done the like at Eubæa, trusting that either these persuasions would preuaile, or if the Persians did happen to vnderstand them, that it would breed some ialousie in them, causing them to fight in feare of their owne companions. It need not seeme strange, that this very same stratageme, which little or nothing auailed Themistocles, did now very happily succede. For Xerxes being in his full strength, it was a matter of much difficultie, to perswade those Inhabitants of Asia to reuolt; who now, in his declining estate, gaue a willing care to the sweet sound of libertie. The Persians likewise, who in their former brauerie, little regarded and lesse feared any treason to be contriued by their subiects, were now so warie, that from the Samiens which were amongst them, they tooke away their armes; the Milesiens whom they did suspect, but would not seeme to mistrust, they placed farre from them, as it were for defence of the streight passages of Mycale; pretending that these Milesiens did best of all others know those places. But these deuices little auailed them. For the Samiens perceiuing that they were held as Traitors, took courage in the heat of the fight, and laying hold vpon such weapons as came to hand, assailed the Persians manfully within the Campe; which example the Ionians presently followed, being very glad to haue found some that durst beginne. It is said that while the Greekes were yet in a march towards the Enemies campe, a rumour suddenly ranne in the Armie, that Mardonius was ouerthrowne in Greece; which (though perhaps it was giuen out by the Captaines to encourage the Souldiers) was very true. For the battaile of Plataea was fought in the morning, and this of Mycale in the euening of the same day.

The like report of that great battaile, wherein Paulus Amyilius ouerthrew Perseus the last king of Macedon, was brought to Rome in foure daies, as Liuius with others doe record. And Plutarch hath many other examples of this kinde. As that of the battaile by the Riuer Sagra in Italie, which was heard of the same day in Peloponnesus: That of the battell against the Tarquiniens and the Latines, presently noyed at Rome: And (which is most remarkable) the victory obtained against Lucius Antonius, who was Rebelle to Domitian the Emperour. This Lucius Antonius being Lieutenant of the higher Germanie, had corrupted his Armie with gifts and promises, drawing the barbarous people to follow him, with great hope to make himselfe Emperour; which newes much troubling the Citie of Rome, with feare of a dangerous Warre; it was sodainly reported that Antonius was slaine, and his Armie defeated.

Hereupon many did offer sacrifice to the gods, and shew all manner of publike ioy, as in such cases was accustomed. But when better inquirie was made, and the Author of these tidings could not bee found; the Emperour Domitian betooke himselfe to his journey against the Rebelle; and being now with his Armie in march, hee received aduertisement by Poste, of the Victorie obtained, and the death of Antonius: whereupon remembring the rumour noised before in Rome, of the selfe-same victorie, hee found that the report and victory were borne vpon one day, though twentie thousand furlongs (which make about fife and twenty hundred miles) a-funder. It is truly said of Plutarch, that this last example giues credit vnto many the like. And indeed it were very strange, if among so many rumours, begotten by forgerie or mistakings, and fostered by credulous imagination, there should not bee found (as happens in dreames) among many thousand vaine and friuolous) a few precisely true. Howbeit wee may finde, that God himselfe doth sometimes vse to terrifie those who presume vpon their owne strength, by these light meanes of tumultuous noyses; as hee raised the siege of Samaritan, by causing a sound of Horses and Chariots to affright the Aramites; and as hee threatened Senacherib, saying: Behold, I will send a blast vpon him, and hee shall heare a noyse, and returne to his owne Land. Wherefore it may well haue beene true, that God was pleased by such a meane as this, to animate the Greekes; who (as Herodotus notes) went towards the Enemies with heavy hearts, being in great feare, lest their owne aduenture should by no meanes fall out well; considering in what danger they had left their owne Countrie of Greece, which was ready to be subdued by Mardonius whilst they went wandering to seeke out enemies a-farre-off, vpon the coast of Asia. But the fame of the battaile fought at Plataea being noyed among them; every man desired that his owne valor in the present fight, might be some helpe to work out the full deliuerance of Greece. In this alacritie of spirit, they diuided themselves into two Battalians, whereof the Athemians ledde the one, by the way of the plaine, directly towards the enemies campe; the Lacedemonians conducted the other, by the Mountaines and streight passages, to winne the higher ground. The Athemians did first set vpon the Campe (ere the Lacedemonians could arriue on the other part) and being desirous to get all the honor of

of the day to themselves, did so forcibly assault it, that they brake way through the Palissadoes and Gabions, and made themselves Masters of the place, slaying all that could not saue themselves by flight. In this fight the Samiens did good seruice; as is formerly mentioned.

But the Milesiens, who vpon the like ialousie, were placed by the Persians on the tops of Mycale, to defend the passages, did now (as if they had been set of purpose to keep them from running away) put as many to the sword as fell into their hands, letting none escape, except very few, that fled through by-pathes. The Lacedemonians that day did little seruice, for the businesse was dispatched ere they came in: Onely they broke such companies as retired in whole troopes; making them flee disperfed in very much disorder, whereby the Milesiens were enabled to doe the greater execution vpon them. This was the last fight of that huge Armie leauied against Greece, which was now vtterly broken, and had no means left to make offensive Warre.

§. XI.

Of the barbarous qualities of Xerxes: with a transition from the Persian affaires to matters of Greece, which from this time grew more worthy of regard.

Erxes lay at Sardis, not farre from the place of this battaile; but little minde had he to reuenge either this or other his great losses, being wholly giuen ouer to the loue of his Brothers Wife: with whom hee could not preuaile by intreatie, nor would obtaine his desire by force, because he respected much his Brother her husband, he thought it best to make a match betweene his owne Sonne Darius, and the Daughter of this Woman; hoping by that meane to finde occasion of such familiaritie as might worke out his desire. But whether it were so, that the chastity of the Mother did still reiect him, or the beauty of her Daughter allure him; he soone after fell in loue with his owne Sonnes wife, being a vicious Prince, and as ill able to gouerne himselfe in peace, as to guide his Armie in War. This yong Lady hauing once desired the King to giue her the Garment which he then wore, being wrought by his owne Wife; she caused the Queene thereby to perceiue her husbands conuersation with her, which she imputed not so much to the beauty of her Daughter-in-law, as to the cunning of the Mother, against whom thereupon she conceiued extreame hatred. Therefore at a Royall feast, wherein the custome was that the King should grant their request, she craued that the Wife of Masistes, her husbands brother, the yong Ladies Mother, might be giuen in to her disposition. The barbarous King, who might either haue reformed the abuse of such a custome, or haue deluded the importunate cruelty of his Wife, by threatening her selfe with the like, to whatsoeuer she should inflict vpon the innocent Lady, granted the request; and sending for his brother, perswaded him to put away the Wife which he had, and take one of his Daughters in her stead. Hereby it seemes, that he vnderstood how villainously that poore Lady should be intreated, whom he knew to be vertuous, and whom himselfe had loued. Masistes refused to put her away; alleading his owne loue, her deseruings, and their common Children, one of which was married to the Kings Sonne, as reasons important to moue him to keepe her. But in most wicked manner Xerxes reuiled him; saying, That he now should neither keepe the Wife which he had, nor haue his Daughter whom he had promised vnto him. Masistes was much grieved with these words, but much more, when he returned home, he found his Wife most butcherly mangled by the Queene Amestris, who had caused her Nose, Lips, Eares, and Tongue to be cut off, and her Breasts in like manner, which were cast vnto Dogs. Masistes enraged with this villany, took his way with his children, and some Friends, towards Bactria, of which Prouince he was Gouernor, intending to rebelle & auenge himselfe. But Xerxes vnderstanding his purpose, caused an Armie to be leuied, which cut him off by the way, putting him and all his Companie to the sword. Such was the Tyrannicall condition of the Persian Government; and such are generally the effects of Luxury, when it is ioyned with absolute power.

Yet of Xerxes it is noted, that he was a Prince of much vertue. And therefore Alexander the Great, finding an Image of his ouerthrowne, and lying vpon the ground, said, That he doubted, whether in regard of his vertue, he should againe erect it, or, for the mischief done by him to Greece, should let it lye. But surely whatsoeuer his other other good qualities were; he was foolish, and was a coward, and consequently mer-cilesse.

Therefore we may firmly believe, that the vertue of Cyrus was very great, vpon which the foundation of the Persian Empire was so surely laid, that all the wickednesse and vanities of Xerxes, and other worse Princes, could not ouerthrow it, vntill it was broken by a vertue almost equall to that which did establish it. In wars against the Agyptians, the fortune of Xerxes did continue, as at the first it had bene very good; but against the generall estate of Greece, neither he, nor any of his posterity, did euer make offensive warre, but received many losses in Asia, to which the last at Mysale serued but as an introduction; teaching the Greekes, and especially the Athenians, that the Persian was no better Souldier at his owne doores, than in a foraine Countrey: whereof good trial was made forth-with, and much better prooue as soone as the affaires of Athens were quickly settled and assured.

From this time forward I will therefore pursue the Historie of Greece, taking in the matters of Persia, as also the estate of other Countries, collaterally, when the order of time shall permit them. True it is, that the Persian estate continued in her greauesse, many ages following, in such wise that the knowne parts of the World had no other Kingdome, representing the Maiestie of a great Empire.

But this greatnesse depended onely vpon the riches and power that had formerly bene acquired, yielding few actions or none that were worthy of remembrance, except touching some Tragedies of the Court, and examples of that excessive Luxurie, where-with both it, and all, or the most of Empires that euer were, haue bene enured, made vniuersall, and (as it were) fattened for the hungry swords of poore and hardy Enemies. Hereby it came to passe, that Xerxes and his successours were faine to defend their Crownes with money and base policies; very seldome or neuer (vnlesse it were with great aduantage) daring to aduenture the trial of plaine battaile with that little Nation of Greece, which would soone haue ruined the foundations laid by Cyrus, had not priuate malice and ielousie vrged euery Citie to enuie the height of her neighbours wals, and thereby diuerted the swords of the Greekes into their owne bowels, which after the departure of Xerxes began very well, and might better haue continued, to hew out the way of conquest, on the side of Asia.

CHAP. VII.

Of things that passed in Greece from the end of the Persian Warre, to the beginning of the Peloponnesian.

How Athens was rebuilt and fortified.

After that the Medes and Persians had received their last blow, and were viterly beaten at Mysale: Leotichides, who then commanded the Grecian Armie, leaving the pursuit of the warre to the Athenians, assisted by the revolted Iones, returned with the Lacedemonians and other Peloponnesians to Sparta and other places, out of which they had bene leaued. The Athenians in the meane while besieged Sestos, a Citie on the strait of the Hellespont, betwene which and Abydos, Xerxes had lately fastned his Bridge of Boats: where the inhabitants, desperate of succour, did not long dispute the defence thereof, but quitted it to the Greekes, who entertained themselves the Winter following on that side the Hellespont. In the Spring they drew homeward, and hauing left their wiues and children, since the inuasion of Attica, and the abandoning of Athens, in diuers Islands, and at Troezen, they now found them out, and returned with them to their owne places.

And though the most part of all their houses in Athens were burnt and broken downe, and

and the wals of the Citie ouer-turned, yet they resolved first on their common defence, and to fortifie their Citie, before they cared to couer themselves, their wiues and children, with any priuate buildings: Whereof the Lacedemonians being aduertised, and misliking the fortifying of Athens, both in respect that their owne Citie of Sparta was vnwalled, as also because the Athenians were growne more powerfull by Sea, than either themselves, or any other State of Greece, they dispatched messengers to the Athenians to dissuade them; not acknowledging any priuate mislike or ielousie, but pretending that if the Persians should returne to inuade Greece a third time, the Athenians being in no better state to defend themselves than heretofore, the same would serue to receiue their enemies, and to be made a Seate for the Warre, as Thebes had lately bene. To this the Athenians promised to giue them satisfaction by their own Embassadors very speedily. But being resolved to goe on with their workes by the aduice of Themistocles, they held the Lacedemonians in hope of the contrary, till they had raised their wals to that height, as they cared not for their mislikes, nor doubted their disturbance; and therefore (to gaine time) they dispatched Themistocles towards Lacedamon, giuing him for excuse, that hee could not deliuer the Athenians resolutions, till the arriual of his fellow-Commissioners, who were of purpose retarded. But after a while, the Lacedemonians expectation being conuerted into ielousie (for by the arriual of diuers persons out of Attica, they were told for certaine, That the wals of Athens were speedily growne vp beyond expectation) Themistocles prayed them not to beleue reports and vaine ramors, but that they would be pleased to send some of their owne trustie Citizens to Athens, from whose relation they might resolve themselves, and determine accordingly. Which request being granted, and Commissioners sent, Themistocles dispatched one of his owne, by whom he aduised the Athenians, first to entertaine the Lacedemonians with some such discourse as might retaine them a few dayes, and in conclusion to hold them among them, till himselfe and the other Athenian Embassadors, then at Sparta, had their liberty also to returne. Which done, and being also assured by his associates and Aristides, that Athens was already defensible on all parts, Themistocles demanding audience, made the Lacedemonians know, That it was true that the wals of Athens were now raised to that height, as the Athenians doubted not the defence of their Citie; praying the Lacedemonians to beleue, That whensoever it pleased them to treat with the Athenians, they would know them for such, as right well vnderstood what appertained to a Common-weale and their owne safety, without direction and aduice from any other: That they had in the warre of Xerxes abandoned their Citie, and committed themselves to the wooden wals of their shippes, from the resolution of their owne counsels and courage, and not there-to taught or perswaded by others: and finally, in all that perillous warre against the Persians they found their owne iudgements and the execution thereof in nothing inferior, or lesse fortunate, than that of any other Nation, State, or Commonweale among the Greekes; And therefore concluded, that they determined to be Masters and Iudges of their owne affaires, and thought it good reason, that either all the Cities confedered within Greece should be left open, or else that the wals of Athens should be finished and maintained.

The Lacedemonians finding the time vnfit for quarrell, dissembled their mislike, both of the fortifying of Athens, and of the diuision, and so suffered the Athenians to depart, and received backe from them their owne Embassadors.

The wals of Athens finished, they also fortified the Port Pireus, by which they might vnder couert imbarke themselves vpon all occasions.

§. II.

The beginning of the Athenian greatnesse, and prosperous warres made by that State vpon the Persian.

The Athenians hauing settled things in good order at home, prepared thirty Gallies for the pursuit of the warre against the Persians, to which the Lacedemonians added other twenty, and with this Fleet, strengthened by the rest of the Cities of Greece confederated, they set sayle for Cyprus, vnder the conduct of Pausanias the Lacedemonian; where after their landing hauing possesed themselves of many principall places, they imbarked the Armie againe, and tooke land in Thrace, recouering from the the Perſians by force the Citie Bizantium, now Conſtantinople: from whence Pauſanias, behauing himſelfe more like a Tyrant than a Captaine, eſpecially towards the Ionians lately reuolted from Xerxes, was called backe by the Councell of Lacedæmon, and not onely accuſed of many inſolent behauiors, but of intelligence with the Medes, and Treason againſt his Countrey. In his ſtead they employed Dacres, who either gaue the ſame cauſe of offence; or elſe the Athenians, who affected the firſt commandement in that warre, praſtiſed the ſouldiors to complaine; though indeede the wife and vertuous behauior of Ariſtides, Generall of the Athenian forces, a man of rare and incomparable ſincerity, had beene able to make a good Commander ſeeme ill in compariſon of himſelfe; and therefore was much more auailable, in rendring thoſe deteſted, whoſe vices afforded little matter of excuſe. Howſoeuer it were, the Lacedæmonians being no leſſe wearied of the warre, than the Athenians were eage to purſue it, the one obtained their eaſe, and the other the execution and honor which they deſired: for all the Greekes (thoſe of Peloponneſus excepted) willingly ſubiected themſelues to the commandement of the Athenians, which was both the beginning of their greatneſſe in that preſent age, and of their ruine in the next ſucceeding. For the charge of the warre being now committed vnto them, they began to rate the confederated Citie, they appointed receiuiers and Treasurers, and began to leuie money, according to their diſcretion, for the maintenance of the generall defence of Greece, and for the recouering of thoſe places on Europe ſide, in Aſia the leſſe, and the Iſlands, from the Perſians. This tribute (the firſt that was euer payed by the Greekes) amounted to foure hundred and threeſcore Talents; which was raiſed eaſily by the honeſt care of that iuſt man Ariſtides, to whoſe diſcretion all the confederates referred themſelues, and no one man found occaſion to complaine of him. But as the vertue of Ariſtides, and other worthy Citizens, brought vnto the Athenians great commoditie; ſo the deſire which they conceived of encreaſing their commoditie, corrupted their vertue, and robbing them of the generall loue, which had made them powerfull, abandoned their Citie to the defence of her treaſure, which with her in the next age periſhed. For it was not long ere theſe foure hundred and threeſcore Talents were rayſed to fixe hundred, nor long after that, ere their couetous Tyrannie had conuerted their followers into ſlaues, and extorted from them yeerely thirteene hundred Talents. The Iſle of Delos was at the firſt appointed for the Treasuſe-houſe wherein theſe ſummes were layd vp, and where, at the generall Aſſembly, the Captaines of thoſe forces, ſent by the confederates, were for ſome ſake called to conſultation. But the Athenians, who were ſtronger by ſea than all Greece beſides, had lockt vp the common treaſure in an Iſland, vnder their owne protection, from whence they might tranſport it at their pleaſure, as afterward they did.

The generall Commander in this Warre was Cimon, the ſonne of Miltiades, who firſt tooke Eion, vpon the Riuer Strimon; then the Iſle of Sciros, inhabited by the Dolopes: they maſtered the Carſij, & brought into ſeruitude the Naxij, contrary to the forme of the confederacy: So did the other the inhabitants of Greece, if at any time they failed of their contribution, or diſobeyed their commandements; taking vpon them and vſurping a kinde of ſoueraigne authority ouer the reſt: which they exerciſed the more aſſuredly, becauſe they were now become Lords of the Sea, and could not be reſiſted. For many of the confederated Citie and Nations, wearie of the warre in their owne perſons, and giuen vp altogether to their eaſe, made choiſe rather to pay their parts in money, than either in men of warre, or in ſhips; leauing the prouiſion of both to the Athenians. Hereby the one grew weake in all their Sea-defences, and in the exerciſe of the Warres; the other greatly ſtrengthened their Nauie and their experiences, being alwayes armed and employed in honourable Seruices, at the coſt of thoſe, who hauing liſted them into their Saddles, were now enforced to become their footmen. Yet was the Tribute-money, leuied vpon theſe their confederates, employed ſo well by the Athenians at the firſt (as ill proceedings are often founded vpon good beginnings) that no great cauſe of repining was giuen. For they rigged out a great Fleet of Gallies, very well manned, wherewith Cimon the Admirall ſcouring the Aſiaticke Seas, tooke in the Citie of Phælis; which hauing formerly pretended neutrality, and reſuſed to relieue, or any way aſſiſt the Greekes, were enforced to pay ten Talents for a fine, and ſo to become followers of the Athenians, paying yeerely contribution.

From thence he ſet ſayle for the Riuer Eurymedon in Pamphylia, where the Perſian Fleet

Fleet, being of fixe hundred ſayle, or (according to the moſt ſpring report) three hundred and fiftie, and hauing a great Land-Armie, encamped vpon the ſhoare; all which forces hauing beene prouiſed for aduancing the Kings affaires in Greece, were vtterly defeated in one day, and two hundred ſhips taken by the Athenians, the reſt being broken to pieces, or ſunke, ere euer they had ſworn in the Greekiſh Seas. Cimon hauing in one day obtained two great victories, the one by the Sea, and the other by Land, was very ſoone preſented with a third. For foureſcore ſayle of Phœnicians (who were the beſt of all Sea-men, vnder the Perſian command) thinking to haue ioyned themſelues with the Fleet before deſtroyed, arriued vpon the ſame Coaſt, ignorant of what had paſſed, and fearing nothing leſſe than what enſued. Vpon the firſt notice of their approach, Cimon weighed anchor, and meeting them at an head-land, called Hydra, did ſo amaze them, that they onely ſought to run themſelues on ground; by which meane preſeruing few of their men, they loſt all their ſhips. Theſe loſſes did ſo breake the courage of the Perſian, that, omitting all hope of preuailing vpon Greece, he condeſcended to whatſoeuer Articles it pleaſed the Athenians to propound, granting liberty vnto all the Greekes inhabiting Aſia; and further couenanting, That none of his ſhips of War ſhould ſayle to the Weſtward of the Iſles, called Cyaneæ and Chelidonia.

This was the moſt honourable peace that euer the Greekes made; neither did they in effect, after this time, make any warre that redounded to the profit or glory of the whole Nation, till ſuch time as, vnder Alexander, they ouerthrew the Empire of Perſia, in which war, few, or perhaps none of them, had any place of great command, but ſerued altogether vnder the Macedonians.

§. III.

The death of Xerxes by the treaſon of Artabanus.

BEſides theſe loſſes, which could not eaſily haue beene repaired, the troubles of the Empire were at this time ſuch, as gaue iuſt cauſe to the Perſian of ſeeking peace vpon any termes not altogether intolerable. For Artabanus, the vnckle of Xerxes, perceiving, that the King his maſter did eaſily take ſmall occaſions to ſhed the blood of ſuch, as in kindred or place were neere vnto him, began to repoſe leſſe hope of a ſtatue in remaining faithfull, than of obtaining the Soueraigntie, by deſtroying a Prince that was ſo hated for his cruelty, and deſpiſed for his cowardice and miſfortunes. Hauing conceived this Treason, he found meanes to execute it by Mithridates an Eunuch, in ſuch cloſe manner, that (as if he himſelfe had beene innocent) he accuſed Darius the ſonne of Xerxes, and cauſed him to ſuffer death as a Parricide. Whether it be true, that by this great wickedneſſe he got the Kingdom; and held it ſeaſen months; or whether intending the like euill to Artaxerxes the ſonne of Xerxes, he was by him preuened and ſurpriſed, it were hard to affirme any certainty. But all Writers agree vpon this, That taken he was, and with his whole familie put to death by extreame torments, according to the ſentence, whereof the truth is more ancient than the Verſe:

*Raro antecedentem ſceleſtum

Seldome the villaine, though much haſte he make,
Lame-footed Vengeance failes to ouer-take.

§. IIII.

The baniſhment of *Themisto*cles: His flight to Artaxerxes newly reigning in Perſia; & his death.

ARTAXERXES being eſta bliſhed in his Kingdome, and hauing ſo compounded with the Athenians, as the preſent neceſſity of his affaires required, began to conceiue new hopes of better fortune againſt the Greekes, than he or his predeceſſors had euer hitherto found. For the people of Athens, when the Perſians were chaſed out of Greece, did ſo highly value their owne merits in that ſeruiſe, that they not onely thought it fit for themſelues to become the Commanders ouer many Townes and Iſlands of the Greekes, but euen within their owne wals, they would admit none other forme of Government than merely Democraticall. Hercin they were ſo inſolent, that no integrity nor good desert was able to preserve the estate of any such as had borne great office, longer than, by flattering the rascall multitude, he was contented to frame all his words and deeds to their good liking.

This their intolerable demeanour much offended Themistocles; who, though in former times he had layed the foundations of his greatness vpon popularitie, yet now presuming vpon his good seruices done to the State, he thought that with great reason they might grant him the liberty to checke their inordinate proceedings. But contrariwise, they were so highly offended with his often rehearsing the benefits which they had receiued from him, that they layed vpon him the punishment of Ostracisme, whereby he was banished for ten yeeres, as a man ouer-burthensome to the Common-wealth.

Before the time of his returne was halfe expired, a new accusation was brought against him by the Lacedemonians, who charged him of consulting with Pausanias, about betraying the whole Countrey of Greece vnto Xerxes. Hereupon Themistocles finding no place of security against the malice of two such mighty Cities, was driuen, after many troublesome flights, and dangerous remouings, to aduenture himselfe into Persia, where he found Artaxerxes newly seled, & was by him very honourably entertained. But the great hope which Artaxerxes had conceiued of aduancing his affaires by the counsell and assistance of Themistocles, proued altogether fruitlesse. For when the Athenians, in fauour of Inarus the Lybian, (who infested Egypt, causing it to rebell against the Persian) had sent a Fleet to Sea, landing an Armie in Egypt, and scowring those Easterne Seas, to the great hindrance of Artaxerxes, and (for ought that I can vnderstand) to the manifest breach of that peace, which to their great honour they had concluded with Xerxes; then did the King send his Letters to Themistocles, requiring him to make good the hopes which he had giuen, of assuring the Persian estate against the Greekes.

But whether Themistocles perceiued much vnlikeliness of good successe, in leading a great Armie of dastardly Persians against the warlike people of Greece; or else (as in fauour of his vertue it is more commonly reported) the loue of his Countrey would not permit him to seeke honour by the ruine of it: sure it is, that being appointed by Artaxerxes to vndertake the conduct of great forces against the Athenians, he decided the great conflict betweene thankfulness to his well-deseruing Prince; and naturall affection to his own ill-deseruing people, by finishing his life with a cup of poyson.

§. V.

How the Athenians, breaking the peace, which to their great honour they had made with the Persian, were shamefully beaten in Egypt.

THEN was Artaxerxes driuen to vse the seruice of his owne Capitaines in the Egyptian warre, wherein it appeared well, That a iust cause is a good defence against a strong enemy. An Athenian Fleet of two hundred saile strong was sent forth vnder Cimon, to take in the Isle of Cyprus: which conquest seemed easie both to make and to maintaine, the Persian being vtterly broken at Sea, and thereby vnable to relieue the Island. Now although it were so, that a peace had bene concluded, which was likely to haue bene kept sincerely by the Persian, who had made so good proofe of the Gracian valour, that he was nothing desirous to build any ships of Warre (without which the Greekes could receiue no harme from him) where of if any one should be found sayling towards Greece, the peace was immediately broken, and if not, his whole estate, yet all the Sea-coast (no small part of his Dominions) exposed to the waste of an enemy too far ouermatching him. Yet whether the Athenians were in doubt, lest the league which in his own worser fortunes he had made with them, he would breake in theirs; and therefore sought to get such assurance into their hands, as might vtterly disable him from attempting ought against them; or whether the increase of their reuenues & power, by adding that rich and great Island to their Empire, caused them to measure honour by profit; they thought it the wisest way, to take whilst they might, whatsoeuer they were able to get and hold, and he vnable to defend.

The Isle of Cyprus lying in the bottome of the streights betweene Cilicia, Syria and Egypt, is very fitly seated for any Prince of State, that being mighty at Sea, doth either seeke to enrich himselfe by trade with those Countreies, or to infest one or more of them them when they are his enemies. And this being the purpose of the Athenians, their Ambition which had already deuoured, in conceit, this Island, was on the sodaine well-nigh choaked with a greater morfell, to smatch at which, they let Cyprus alone, which they might easily haue swallowed and digested. For Inarus King of the Lybians confining Egypt, hauing found how greatly the Countrey was exhausted by the late warres, and how weakly defended by very slender Persian Garrisons, conceiued rightly, that if such small forces as the Satrapa or Viceroy could make on the sodaine of his owne Gardes, or leue out of the ordinary Garrisons, were by him defeated, the naturals of the Countrey, not long since oppressed by Cambyses, and after a reuolt very lately subdued by Xerxes, would soone breake faith with him who had no other title to that kingdom than a good sword. Further, he perswaded himselfe that the people vnable to defend themselves against the Persian without his assistance; would easily be drawne to accept him, the author of their deliuerance for King. Neither did this hope deceiue him. For hauing taken and cruelly slaine Achamenes the Viceroy; diuers Cities forth declared themselves for him, and proclaiming him King, shewed the most of their endeavour for prosecution of the warre. But he considering his owne weakness, and that the meanes of the Egyptians his adherents were not answerable to their desires, perceiued well, that to resist the power of Artaxerxes, farre greater forces than his and theirs were to be procured, at what price soeuer he obtained them. Therefore hearing of the great Athenian fleet, and knowing well the vertue of the Souldiers therein imbarqued; he inuited the Commanders to share with him the kingdom of Egypt, as a farre greater reward of their aduenture, than such an addition as that of Cyprus could be to their estate. Whether he or they (if things had wholly sorted according to their expectation) would haue bene contented with an equall share, and not haue fallen out in the partition, were perhaps a diuination vnecessary. He was possessed of the peoples loue, they were of most power: But the issue of those affaires was such as left them nothing to communicate but misfortunes, which they shared somewhat equally.

Yet had the beginnings of their enterprise very good and hopeful successe: For they entered the Land as farre as to Memphis, the principall Citie; and of the Citie it selfe they took two parts: to the third part, which was called the White wall, they laid such hard sieges; that neither those forces of the Persians, which then were in Egypt, were strong enough to remoue them; neither could Artaxerxes well deuise what meanes to vse for the recovery of that which was lost, or for the preservation of the remainder. The least of his hope was by setting the Lacedemonians vpon Athens, to enforce the Athenians to looke homewards to their owne defence. This was the first time that the Persian sought to procure the assistance of the Greekes one against the other, by stirring them vp with gold to the entertainment of priuate quarrels, for the good of their common enemy. To this purpose he sent Megabazus to Sparta with much Treasure; who, after great expence, finding that the Lacedemonians were nothing forward in imploying their whole force against the Athenians, whom in many conflicts of great importance they had found to be their matches, notwithstanding the absence of their Armie in Egypt; he thought it his wisest way to imploy the rest of his mony and meanes to their reliefe, who had now the space of fixe yeeres defended his masters right in Egypt. Therefore he hastily dispatched another of his name, the sonne of Zopyrus, who arriving in Egypt, was first encountered by the reuolted people; ouer whom he obtained victory, which made him master of the Countrey, whilst the Athenians lay busied about Memphis the great Citie.

It cannot be doubted, that long abode in a strange ayre, and want of supply, had much offended the Athenians: sure it is, that when Megabazus, hauing reduced the Countrey to obedience, attempted the Citie it selfe, whether his former successe had amended the courage of the Persians, or want of necessities made the Athenians inferior to themselves, he chased them out of Memphis, and pursued them so neere, as they were foor to fortifie themselves in the Isle of Prosopites, where Megabazus, after eighteen moneths siege, turning away one part of the Riuer by diuers Trenches, assailed the Athenians without impediment of waters, tooke their Gallies, and put all to the sword, save a few that saved themselves by flight into Lybia; the same entertainment had fiftie other Gallies which they sent to the succour of the first two hundred.

Mendes is an Island in the mouth of Nilus, between the out-let called Busriscus and Diolen. But the branch of Nilus, called Mendesium, runneth into the Sea by the Citie Parnephyssu.

hundred. For those Athenians hauing heard nothing that their Fleete and Armie was consumed, entred by the branch of Nilus, called Mendesium, and fell vna-ware among the Phenician Gallies and the Persian Armie; so as the Persians recouered all Egypt, but that part held by Amyrteus, and Inarus the King of Lybia, being by them taken and hanged. This was the end of the Athenians sixe yeeres warre in Egypt, and the reward of their vanitie and indiscretion to vndertake many enterprises at once.

§. V.

Of other Warres made by the Athenians for the most part with good successe, about the same time.

NOW withstanding these ouerthrowes in Egypt, yet the Athenians in their home warres waded through many difficulties, and held the reputation of their forces against the Lacedemonians, Corinthians, and others, rather to their advantage in anotherwise. For as they were beaten neere vnto Halia by the Corinthians and Epidaurians; so they obtained two great victories soone after; the one ouer the Peloponnesians, neere vnto Cecryphalia; the other ouer the Aginets, neere vnto Agina; where they sunke and carried away threescore and ten Gallies of their Enemies. Furthermore, they landed their forces on the suddaine, and besieged Agina, from whence they could not be moued, notwithstanding that the Corinthians, to diuert them, invaded Megara; where, after a great fight, with equall losse, the Corinthians, when they returned againe to set vp their Trobie, as Victors in the former battaile, were vterly broken and slaughtered by the Athenian Garrisons and Megarians, to their great losse and dishonour.

Againe, as the Athenians were discomfited neere to Tanagra, by the Lacedemonians, who returned from the succour of the Dorians against the Phocians (at which time the Thessalian horse-men turned from their Allies the Athenians, and fought against them) so about threescore dayes after, the Athenians entred Boetia vnder the conduct of Myrmides, where beating that Nation, they wan Phocis on the gulfes Oeteus, and euened the wals of Tanagra, to the ground. Finally, they enforced Agina to render vpon most base conditions; as to beat downe the wals of their Citie, and to giue them hostages for Tribute; the siege whereof they had continued, notwithstanding all their other brabbles and attempts elsewhere. Besides these victories they sackt and spoiled many places vpon the Sea-coast of Peloponnesus, belonging to the Lacedemonians; wan vpon the Corinthians, and ouerthrew the Sicyonians that came to their succour. These were the vndertakings of the Athenians, and their Allies, during the time of those sixe yeeres that a part of their forces made warre in Egypt. In the end whereof they attempted Thessalie, perswaded thereunto by Orestes, but were resisted by the King Pharsalus, who had chased Orestes out of his Dominions. They also landed in Sicyonia, and had victory ouer those that resisted, after which they made truce with the Peloponnesians for five yeeres, and sent Cimon into Cyprus with two hundred ships; but they were againe allured by Amyrteus one of the race of their former Kings, who held the Marish and Wooddie parts of Egypt from the Persians, to whom they sent sixtie of their ships. The rest of their Armie failing in their enterprise of Cyprus, and their fortunate and victorious Leader Cimon dying there, as they coasted the Island, incountred a fleet of the Phenicians and Cilicians, ouer both which Nations they returned victorious into Greece: as also those returned safe which were sent into Egypt.

§. VII.

Of Artaxerxes Longimanus, that he was Ahasuerus the husband of Queene Hester.

THESE Egyptian troubles being ended, the reigne of Artaxerxes continued peaceable, whereof the length is by some restrained into twenty yeeres, but the more and better Authors giue him fortie, some allow vnto him foure and forty. He

He was a Prince of much humanity, and noted for many examples of gentlenesse. His fauour was exceeding great to the Jewes, as appeareth by the Histories of *Esdra*s and Nehemias, which fell in his time.

To proue that this was the King who gaue countenance and aide to that great worke of building the Temple, it were a needeleffe trauaile; considering that all the late Diuines haue taken very much paine, to shew that those two Prophets were licensed by him, and succoured in that building, in such sort as appeares in their writings.

This was likewise that King Ahasuerus who married Hester. Whereof if it be needefull to giue prooffe, it may suffice; That Ahasuerus liued in Susa, reigning from India to Ethiopia, and therefore must haue beene a Persian; That he liued in peace, as appeares by the circumstances of the Historie, and vsed the counsaile of the seuen Princes, the authority of which Princes began vnder Darius, the sonne of Hystaspes; wherefore he could be neither Cyrus nor Cambyses.

The continuall Warres which exercised King Darius the sonne of Hystaspes, together with the certainty of his marriages with sundry wiue, from none of whom he was diuorced, but left his first wife Atossa, the daughter of Cyrus, aliue in great honour, the being mother to Xerxes the succeeding King; doe manifestly prouue that Hester was not his. Whereunto is added by Philo the Jew, That at the perswasion of Mardocheus, Ioiachim the high Priest the sonne of Iesua, caused the feast of Purim to be instituted in memory of that deliuerance. Now the time of Ioiachim was in the reigne of Artaxerxes, at the comming of *Esdra*s, and Nehemias: Iesua his father dying about the end of Darius.

The same continuance of warres, with other his furious and tragicall loues, wherewith Xerxes did consume such little time, as he had free from warre, are enough to proue, that the storie of Hester pertained not vnto the time of Xerxes, who liued but one and twentie yeeres, whereas the two and thirtieth of Ahasuerus or Artaxastus is expressed by Nehemias. Againe, it is well knowne, that Xerxes in the seauenth yeere of his reigne (wherin this marriage must haue beene celebrated) came not neere to Susa. Of the Princes that succeeded Artaxerxes Longimanus, to proue that none of them could be Ahasuerus, it is enough to say, that Mardocheus hauing beene carried from Ierusalem captiue, with Iechonia, by Nebuchadnezzar, was vnlikely to haue liued vntill their times.

But of this Artaxerxes it is true, that he liued in Susa, reigned from India to Ethiopia, liued in peace, was contemporarie with Ioiachim the high Priest: and further he had happily by his Lieutenants reclaimed the rebellious Egyptians in that seauenth yeere of his reigne; which good fortune might well giue occasion to such a Royall feast, as is described in the beginning of Hester. This is the summe of the arguments, brought to proue the age of Hesters storie by the learned and diligent Krentzhemius, who addes the authorities of Iosephus, affirming the same, and of Philo, giuing to Mardocheus eightene yeeres more than Isaac the Patriarch liued, namely, one hundred fourescore and eightene yeeres in all, which expire in the five and thirtieth yeere of this Artaxerxes, if we suppose him to haue beene carried away captiue, being a Boy of ten yeeres old.

§. VIII.

BUT it is fitt that we now returne to the affaires of the Greekes, who from this time forward, more vehemently prosecuting their ciuill warres, suffered the Persians for many ages to rest in peace: this Egyptian expedition being come to nought. Soone after this, the Lacedemonians vnderooke the warre called, Sacred, recouered the Temple and Ile of Delphos, and deliuered both to the inhabitants; but the Athenians regained the same, and gaue it in charge to the Phocians. In the meane while the banished Boetians reentred their owne Land, and mastred two of their owne Townes posselt by the Athenians, which they soone recouered againe from them; but in their returne towards Athens, the Boetians, Eubaeans, and Locrians, (Nations oppressed by the Athenians) set vpon them with such resolution, as the Athenians were in that fight all slaine or taken, taken, wherby the Bæotians recovered their former liberty, restoring to the Athenians their prisoners. The Ilanders of Eubæa tooke such courage vpon this, that they reuolted wholly from the Athenians, whom when Pericles intended to reconquer, he was aduertised that the Megarians, (who first left the Lacedæmonians, & submitted themselves to Athen) being now weary of their yoke, had slaine the Athenians Garrisons, and ioyned themselves with the Corinthians, Sicyonians, & Epidaurians. These newes hastened Pericles homeward with all possible speede; but ere he could recouer Attica, the Peloponnesians, led by Philoanax, the sonne of Pausanias, had invaded it, pillaged, and burnt many parts thereof; after whose returne Pericles went on with his first intent and recovered Eubæa. Finally the Athenians began to treat of peace with the Peloponnesians, and yeelded to deliuer vp all the places which they held in the Country of Peloponnesus: and this truce was made for thirty yeeres.

After sixe of these yeeres were expired, the Athenians (sauouring the Mylefians against the Samians) invaded Samos by Pericles; and after many repulses, and some great losses, both by Sea and Land, the Citizens were forced to yeelde themselves vpon most lamentable conditions, Namely, to deliuer vp all their ships, to breake downe their owne wals, to pay the charge of the war, and to restore whatsoever had beene taken by themselves, or by their practice, from the Athenians. In the necke of which followed that long and cruell Peloponnesian Warre, whereof I haue gathered this briefe following: the same contention taking beginning fiftie yeeres after the flight of Xerxes out of Greece. But because there was no Citie thereof, which either in the beginning of this warre, or in the continuance of it, was not drawne into the quarrell: I hold it convenient now at the first to shew briefly the estate of the Countrey at that time, and especially the condition of those two great Cities, Athen and Sparta, vpon which all the rest had most dependance.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Peloponnesian Warre.

§. I.

Vpon what termes the two principall Cities of Greece, Athen and Sparta, stood, at the beginning of the Peloponnesian Warre.

Greece was neuer vnited vnder the gouernement of any one Prince or Estate, vntill Philip of Macedon, and after him Alexander, brought them rather to a Vnion and League against the Persian, whereof they were Captaines, than into any absolute subiection. For euery Estate held their owne, and were gouerned by Lawes farre different, and by their owne Magistrates, notwithstanding the power of the Macedonians, to whom they did yeelde obedience no otherwise than as to such, who were (perforce) their leaders in the Persian warre (deemed the Generall quarrell of Greece) and tooke the profit and honour of the victory, to their owne vse and increase of greatness. But the Kings which afterwards reigned in Macedonia, did so farre enlarge their authority, that all Greece was by them brought vnder such obedience, as differed little from seruitude; very few excepted, who could hardly, sometimes with armes, and sometimes with gifts, preferue their liberty; of whom the Lacedæmonians and Athenians were chiefe: which two people deserued best the plague of tyranny, hauing first giuen occasion thereunto, by their great ambition, which wearied and weakened all the Countrey by perpetuall Warre. For vntill these two Cities of Athen and Sparta distracted all Greece, drawing euery State into the quarrell, on the one or other side, and so gaue beginning to the Peloponnesian warre (the effects whereof in true estimation ceased not, before the time that Philip had ouer-mastred all, forasmuch as euery conclusion conclusion of one war afforded henceforth matter of some new distraction of the whole Countrey) the warres, commenced betweene one Citie of Greece and an other, were neither great, nor of long continuance. All controuersies were soone decided, either by the authority of the Amphictiones, who were the generall Councell of Greece; or by the power of the Lacedæmonians, whose aide was commonly held as good as the assurance of victorie.

These Lacedæmonians had liued about foure hundred yeeres vnder one forme of Gouernment, when the Peloponnesian warre began. Their education was onely to practise states of Armes; wherein they so excelled, that a very few of them were thought equall to very great numbers of any other people. They were poore, and cared not much for wealth; euery one had an equall portion of the common field, which sufficed to maintaine him in such manner as they vsed. For brauery they had none, and curious building or apparell they regarded not. Their diet was simple, their feasts and ordinary meales being in common Halls, where all fared alike. They vsed money of yron, whereof they could not be couctous nor great hoarders. Briefely, they liued Vtopian-like, saue that they vsed no other occupation than Warre, placing all their felicitie in the glory of their valour. Hereby it came to passe that in all enterprises, whereof they were partakers, the leading and high command was granted to them, and all Greece followed their conduct. But the Athenians were in all points contrary to this. For they sought wealth, and measured the honours of their victories by the profit; they vsed mercenarie Souldiers in their warres, and exacted great tribute of their Subiects, which were for the most part Ilanders, compelled to obey them, because the Athenian fleet was great.

As in forme of policy, and in course of life, so in conditions naturall, the difference betweene these two people was very much. The Athenians were eager and violent, suddaine in their conclusions, and as hastie in the execution: The Lacedæmonians very slow in their deliberations, full of grauitie, but very resolute, and such as would in cold blood performe what the Athenians did vsually in flagrant. Whereby it came to passe, that the Lacedæmonians had all the Estates of Greece depending vpon them, as on men firme and assured, that sought honor & not riches; whereas the Athenians were followed by such as obeyed them perforce, being held in straight subiection. But the Signorie of the Athenians was nothing huge, vntill such time as the Persian Xerxes had invaded Greece, pretending onely a quarrell to Athen: For then the Citizens perceiuing well, that the Towne of Athen could not be defended against his great Armie of seuentene hundred thousand men, bestowed all their wealth vpon a Nauie, & (assisted by the other Grecians) ouerthrew the fleet of Xerxes, whose Land-forces were soone after discomfited by them, and the Greekes, who all serued vnder conduct of the Spartans. After these victories, the Athenians being now very mighty in fleet, reduced all the Ilands of the Greekish Seas vnder their obedience; imposing vpon them a hard tribute, for maintenance (as they pretended) of warre against the Persian; though indeede they employed their forces chiefly, to the conquest of such Ilands, and haue Townes, of their owne Countreimen, as stood out against them. All which was casily suffered by the Lacedæmonians, who were In-landers, and men that delighted not in expeditions to be made farre from home. But afterwards perceiuing the power of the Athenians to grow great, they held them in much ielousie, and were very apt to quarrell with them; but much more willing to breed contention betweene them and other Estates. Wherefore at such time as the Thebans would haue oppressed the Plataeans, when they of Plataea repaired to Sparta for succour, they found there no other aide, than this aduice, That they should seeke helpe at Athen. Hereby it was thought, that the Athenians should be intangled in a long and tedious Warre, with their neighbours of Thebes. But it proved otherwise; for their force was now so great, that all such occasions did onely serue to increase their honour and puissance.

§. II.

How Sparta and Athen entred into warre.

Notwithstanding many Estates of Greece were very ill affected to Athen, because that Citie grew very insolent vpon suddaine prosperitie, and maintaining the weaker Townes against the stronger, incoached apace vpon their Neighbours, taking their dependants from them. Especially the Corinthians were much enraged, because the people of the Iland Corcyra, their Colonie which had rebelled against them, and given them a great overthrow by Sea, was by the Athenians (who desired to increase their fleet by adioyning that of Corcyra vnto it) taken into protection, and the Corinthians thereby impeached of that reuenge which else they would haue taken. Now howsoeuer it were so, that these dealings of the Athenians were not directly against the conditions of peace agreed vpon among the Greekes, yet were the complaints made at Sparta so vehement, that (though with much a-doe) they concluded to redresse by warre the iniuries done to their Allies.

First therefore seeking religious pretences, they required the Athenians to expiate certaine offences committed against the gods; whereto hauing for answer, That they themselves should expiate other the like offences, committed in Sparta; they began to deale plainly, and required that the people of some Townes, oppressed by the estate of Athen; should be set at liberty; and that a decree made against those of Megara; whereby they were forbidden to enter any Port of the Athenians, should be reuerled. This last point they so earnestly presse, that if they might obtaine it, they promised to abstain from their purpose of making Warre.

This they desired, not as a matter of any great importance (for it was a trifle) but onely that by seeming to haue obtained somewhat, they might preferre their reputation without entering into a warre, which threatened them with greater difficulties apparent, than they were very willing to vnder-goe.

But the Athenians would yeelde to nothing; for it was their whole desire that all Greece should take notice, how farre they were from feare of any other Citie. Hereupon they prepared on both sides very strongly, all that was needfull to the Warre; wherein the Lacedemonians were Superiour, both in number and quality, being assisted by most of the Cities in Greece; and hauing the generall fauour, as men that pretended to set at liberty such as were oppressed: but the Athenians did as farre exceede them in all provisions of Money, Shipping, Engines, and absolute power of command among their Subjects; which they held; and afterward found of greater vse in such neede, than the willing readinesse of friends, who soone grow weary, and are not easily assembled.

§. III.

The beginning of the Peloponnesian warre.

THe first and second yeeres expedition was very grieuous to the Citie of Athen. For the fields were wasted, the Trees cut downe; the Countie people driven to flye, with Wiues, Children, and Cattle, into the Towne; whereby a most furious pestilence grew in the Citie, such as before they had neuer felt, nor heard of. Hereunto was added the reuolt of the Mytilenians, in the Ile of Lesbos, & the siege of Plataea their confederated Citie, which they durst not aduenture to raise, besides some small overthrowes receiued. The Lacedemonians assembling as great forces as they could raise out of Peloponnesus, did in the beginning of Summer enter the Countie of Attica, and therein abide, vntill victuals began to faile, wasting and destroying all things roundabout: The Gouvernours of the Athenians would not suffer the people to issue into the field against them; for they knew the valour of their Enemies; but vsed to send a fleet into Peloponnesus, which wasted as fast all the Sea-coast of their Enemies, whilst they were making warre in Attica. So the Peloponnesians being the stronger by Land, wan the Towne of Plataea, which wanted rescue; the Athenians likewise being more mighty by Sea, did subdue Mytilene which had rebelled, but could not bee succoured from Sparta. By these proceedings in that warre, the Lacedemonians beganne to perceiue how vnfit they were to deale with such enemies. For after that Attica was thoroughly wasted, it lay not greatly in their power to doe any offence equall to such harme as they themselves might, and did receiue. Their Confederates beganne to set forward very slowly in their expeditions into Attica; perceiuing well that Athen was plentifully relieued with all necessaries, which came by the Sea from the Ilands that were subiect vnto that Estate; and therefore these inuaders tooke but small pleasure in beholding the walls of that mighty Citie, or in wasting a forsaken field, which was to them a patterne of the calamities, with which their owne Territorie was the whilst afflicted. Wherefore they began began to set their care to build a strong Naue, wherein they had little good succeffe, being easily vanquished by the Athenians, who both had more and better ships, and were so skilfull in Sea-fights, that a few Vessels of theirs durst vndertake a great number of the Peloponnesians.

§. IIII.

Of the great losse which the Spartans receiued at Pylus.

AMong other losses which the Spartans had felt by Sea; they receiued at Pylus a verie sore blow, that compelled them to sue for peace. A fleet of Athenian ships bound for Corcyra, waiting in that passage, as their manner was, the coast of Laconia, and all the halfe Ile of Peloponnesus, was by contrarie windes detained at Pylus; which is a ragged Promontorie, ioyning to the maine, by a strange necke of Land. Before it there lies a small barren Iland of lesse than two miles compasse, and within that a creeke, which is a good harbour for ships, the force of weather being borne off by the head Land and Isle. This Promontorie the Athenians fortified, as well as in haste they might; and what was wanting in their artificiall fortification, was supplied by the natural strength and site of the place. By holding this piece of ground, and hauen, they in reason expected many aduantages against their enemies. For the Countie adioyning was inhabited by the Messenians, who in ancient times had held very strong and cruell warre with Sparta; and (though quite subdued) they were held in streight subiection; yet was not the olde hatred so extinguished, that by the neere neighbourhood and assistance of the Athenians, it might not be reuiued. Furthermore it was thought, that many ill-willers to the Lacedemonians, and as many of her bond-slaves as could escape from them, would repaire to Pylus, and from thence make daily excursions into Laconia, which was not farre off: Or if other hopes failed, yet would the benefit of this hauen, lying almost in the mid-way betweene them and Corcyra, make them able to sur-round all Peloponnesus, and waste it at their pleasure. The newes of these doings at Pylus drew the Peloponnesians thither in all haste out of Attica, which they had entred a few daies before with their whole Armie: but now they brought not onely their Land-forces, but all their Naue, to recouer this peece, which how bad a neighbour it might proue in time, they well foresaw, little fearing the grieuous losse at hand, which they there in few daies receiued. For when they in vaine made a generall assault on all sides, both by Sea and Land; finding that small Garrison which the Athenians had left, very resolute in the defence: they occupied the hauen, placing foure hundred and twenty choice men all of them, Citizens of Sparta, in the Iland before mentioned, at each end whereof is a channell, that leades into the Port; but so narrow, that onely two ships in front could enter betweene the Isle and Pylus; likewise but seuen or eight shippes could enter at once by the further channell, betweene the Iland and the Main. Hauing thus taken order to shut vp this new Towne by Sea, they sent part of their fleet to fetch wood, and other stuffe, wherewith to fortifie round about, and blocke vp the peece on all sides. But in the meane season, the Athenian fleet, hearing of their danger that were left at Pylus, returned thither, and with great courage entring the hauen, did breake and sinke many of their Enemies vessels; tooke five, and so inforced the residue to runne themselves a-ground.

Now was the Towne secure, and the Spartans abiding in the Iland as good as lost. Wherefore the Magistrates were sent from Sparta to the campe (as was their custome in great dangers) to aduise what were best for the publike safety; who when they did perceiue that there was no other way to rescue their Citizens out of the Isle, then by composition with their enemies, they agreed to entreat with the Athenians about peace, taking truce in the meane while with the Captaines at Pylus. The conditions of the truce were, That the Lacedemonians should deliuer vp all the ships which were in the coast, and that they should attempt nothing against the Town, nor the Athenians against the campe: That a certaine quantitie of Bread, Wine, and Flesh, should be daily carried into the Isle, but that no ships should passe into the Iland secretly: That the Athenians should carry the Lacedemonian Embassadors to Athen, there to treat of peace, and should bring them backe, at whose returne the truce should end, which if in the meane time it were broken in any one point, should be held vtterly void in all: That when the truce was expired, the Athenians

Athenians should restore the Peloponnesian ships, in as good case as they received them. The Embassadors comming to Athens, were of opinion, that as they themselves had begun the warre, so might they end it when they pleased. Wherefore they told the Athenians how great an honour it was that the Lacedemonians did sue to them for peace, advising them to make an end of warre, whilst with such reputation they might. But they found all contrarie to their expectation: For instead of concluding vpon euentemes, or desiring of meet recompence for losse sustained, the Athenians demanded certaine Cities to be restored to them, which had beene taken from them by the Lacedemonians long before this warre beganne, refusing likewise to continue the treaty of peace, vnlesse the Spartans which were in the Isle, were first rendred vnto them as prisoners. Thus were the Embassadors returned without effect, at which time the truce being ended, it was desired from the Athenian Captaines, that they should, according to their couenant, restore the ships, which had beene put into their hands. Whereto answer was made, that the condition of the truce was, That if any one article were broken, all should be held void; now (said the Athenians) yee haue assaulted our Garrisons, and thereby are wee acquitted of our promise to restore the ships. This and the like friuolous allegations which they made, were but meere shifts; yet profit so far ouer-weighed honour, that better answer none could be got. Then were the Lacedemonians driuen to vse many hard meanes, for conuincing of victuals into the Isle; which finally was taken by force, and the men that were in it carried prisoners to Athens, where it was decreed that when the Peloponnesians next invaded Attica, these prisoners should all be slaine. Whether fearing the death of these men, or withheld by the troubles, which (according to the Athenians hope) fell vpon them; the Lacedemonians were so farre from waisting Attica, that they suffered their owne Countrey to be continually ouer-runne, both by the Athenians, who landed on all parts of their coast, and by those which issued out of Pylus; which became the Rendezuous of all that were ill-affected vnto them.

§. V.

How the Lacedemonians hardly, and to their great disadvantage, obtained a peace, that was not well kept.

Herefore they indeuoured greatly to obtain peace; which the Athenians would not harken vnto. For they were so puffed vp with continuance of good successe, that hauing sent a few bands of men into Sicilie, to hold vp a faction there, and make what profit they might of the Sicilians quarrels; when afterward they heard that the differences in that Isle were taken away, and their bands returned without eyther gaine or losse, they banished the Captaines, as if it had beene meerey through their default, that the Ile of Sicilie was not conquered; which (besides the longer distance) was in power to offend others, or defend it selfe, no whit inferiour vnto Peloponnesus. Yet was this their ouer-weening much abated shortly after, by some disasters received, especially in Thrace, where in a battaile which they lost at Amphipolis, Cleon and Brasidas, Generalls of the Athenian and Lacedemonian forces, were both slaine; which two had most beene aduerfaries to the peace. As the Athenians by their losses were taught moderation; so the Lacedemonians, who not onely felt the like wounds, but through the great Naue which they had receiued at Pylus, were faine to proceed lamely in the warre, against such as, through commoditie of their good fleet, had all aduantage that could be found in expedition, were feruently desirous to conclude the business, ere Fortune by any new fauour should reuieue the insolence, which was at this time well mortified in their Enemies. Neither was it onely a consideration of their present estate, that vrged them to bring the treaty of peace to a good and speedy effect; but other dangers hanging ouer their heads, and ready to fall on them, which vnlesse they compounded with the Athenians, they knew not how to auoid. The estate of Argos, which had ancient enmity with them, was now, after a truce of thirty yeeres well-nigh expired, ready to take the benefit of their present troubles, by ioyning with those who alone found them worke enough. Argos was a rich and strong Citie, which though inferiour to Sparta in valour, yet was not so vnwarlike, nor held such ill correspondence with the neighbouring Estates, that the Lacedemonians could euer farre preuaile vpon it, when they had little else to doe. This

This was a thing that in the beginning of this Warre had not beene regarded. For it was then thought, that by waisting the Territorie of Athens with sword and fire, the quarrell should easily and in short time haue beene ended, whereby not onely the Athenians should haue beene brought to good order, but the Corinthians and others, for whose sake the war was vnder-taken, haue been so firmly knit to the Lacedemonians, that they should for loue of them haue abandoned the Argives, to their own fortunes. But now the vanitie of those hopes appeared, in that the Athenians abounding in ready money, and meanes to raise more, were able to secure themselves by a strong fleet from any great harme, that the Peloponnesians wanting wherewith to maintaine a Naue, could doe vnto them; yea as Masters of the Sea; to weary them out, as in effect already they had done. As for the Confederates of Sparta, they could now endure neither warre nor peace; their daily traualles, and many losses had so wearied and incensed them. Wherefore the Lacedemonians were glad to vse the occasion, which the inclination of their enemies did then afford, of making a small peace, which with much adoe they procured, as seemed equall and easie; but was indeed impossible to be performed, and therefore all their traualle was little effectuall.

The restitution of prisoners and places taken being agreed vpon; it fell out by lot, that the Lacedemonians should restore first. These had wonne more townes vpon the continent from the Athenians, than the Athenians had from them; but what they had wonne, they had not wonne absolutely. For they had restored some Townes to such of their Allies, from whom the State of Athens had taken them; some, and those the most, they had set at liberty (as reason required) which had opened their gates vnto them, as to their friends and deliuerers, and not compelled them to breake in as Enemies. Now concerning the Townes which were not in their owne hands, but had beene rendred vnto their Confederates, the Spartans found meanes to giue some satisfaction, by permitting the Athenians to retaine others, which they had gotten in the Warre; as for the rest, they promised more then afterwards they could performe. The Cities which they had taken into protection, could not endure to heare of being abandoned, neither would they by any meanes yeeld themselves into the hands of their old Lords the Athenians, whom they had offended by reuoking, notwithstanding whatsoever articles were drawne, and concluded, for their securitie, and betterance in time to come. This dull performance of conditions on the side of the Spartans, made the Athenians become as backward in doing those things which on their part were required; so that restoring onely the prisoners which they had, they deferred the rest, vntill such time as they might receiue the full satisfaction, according to the agreement. But before such time as these difficulties brake out into matter of open quarrell, the Lacedemonians entred into a more streight alliance with the Athenians; making a league offensive and defensive with them. Heereunto they were moued by the backwardnesse of the Argives, who being (as they thought) likely to haue sued for peace at their hands, as soone as things were once compounded betweene Athens and Sparta; did shew themselves plainly vnwilling to giue care to any such motion. Thinking therefore, that by cutting from Argos all hope of Athenian succour, they should make sure worke, the Spartans regarded not the affections of other States, whom they had either bound vnto them by well-deseruing in the late warre, or found so troublefome, that their enmity (if perhaps they durst let it appeare) was little worse than friendship. It bred great ialousie in all the Cities of Greece, to perceiue such a coniunction between two so powerfull Signiories: especially one clause threatening euery one, that was any thing apt to feare, with a secret intent that might be harboured in their proud conceits, of subduing the whole Countrey, and taking each what they could lay hold on. For besides the other articles, it was agreed, That they might by mutual consent adde new conditions, or alter the old at their owne pleasures. This impression wrought so strongly in the Corinthians, Thebans, and other ancient Confederates of Sparta, that the hate which they had borne to the Athenians their professed enemies, was violently thrown vpon the Lacedemonians their vniust friends: whereby it came to passe, that they who had lately borne chiefe sway in Greece, might haue beene abandoned to the discretion of their Enemies, as already in effect they were, had the Enemies wisely vied the aduantage.

§. VI.

Of the negotiations, and practices, held betweene many States of Greece, by occasion of the peace that was concluded.

His admiration wherein all Greece held the valour of Sparta as vnresistable, and able to make way through all impediments, had been so excessive, that when by some sinister accidents, that City was compelled to take and seeke peace, vpon termes not sounding very honourable, this common opinion was not onely abated, but (as happens vsually in things extreame) was changed into much contempt. For it was neuer thought that any Lacedæmonians would haue endured to lay downe his weapons, and yeeld himselfe prisoner, nor that any misfortune should haue beene so great, as should haue drawne that Citie to relieue it selfe otherwise then by force of Armes. But when once it had appeared that many of their Citizens, among whom were some of especial marke, being ouer-laid by enemies, in the Iland before Pylus, had rather chosen to liue in captiuitie, than to die in fight, and that Pylus it selfe, sticking as a thorne in the foot of Laconia, had bred such anguish in that Estate, as vnterly wearying the accustomed Spartan resolution, had made it sit downe, and seeke to refresh it selfe by dishonourable ease: then did not onely the Corinthians and Thebans begin to conceiue basely of those men which were vertuous, though vnfortunate; but other lesser Cities ioyning with these in the same opinion, did cast their eyes vpon the rich and great Citie of Argos, of whose ability to do much, they conceiued a strong beleefe, because of long time it had done nothing. Such is the base condition, which through foolish enuie is become almost naturall in the greater part of mankind. We curiously search into their vices, in whom, had they kept some distance, we should haue discerned only the vertues; and comparing iniuriously our best parts with their worst, are iustly plagued with a false opinion of that good in strangers which we know to be wanting in our selues.

The first that published their dislike of Sparta were the Corinthians, at whose vehement entreaty (though moued rather by enuy at the greatnesse of Athens daily encreasing) the Lacedæmonians had entred into the present Warre. But these Corinthians did onely mur-30 mure at the peace, alleading as grieuances, that some townes of theirs were left in the Athenians hands. The Mantineans, who during the time of Warre, had procured some part of the Arcadians to become their followers, and forsake their dependency vpon the State of Sparta, did more freely and readily discouer themselves; feare of reuenge to come, working more effectually, than indignation at things already past. The Argiues feeling the gale of prosperous Fortune that began to fill their sailes, prepared themselves to take as much of it as they could stand vnder; giuing for that purpose vnto twelue of their Citizens, a full & absolute commission to make alliance between them & any free Cities of Greece (Athens and Sparta excepted) without any further trouble of propounding e-40 uery particular businesse to the multitude. When the gates of Argos were set thus open to all commers; the Mantineans began to leade the way, and many Cities of Peloponnesus following them entred into this new confederacy; some incited by private respects, others thinking it the wisest way to doe as the most did. What inconuenience might arise vnto them by these courses, the Lacedæmonians easily discerned, and therefore sent Embassadors to stop the matter at Corinth, where they well perceived that the mischief had beene hatched. These Embassadors found in the Corinthians a very rough disposition, with a grauity expressing the opinion which they had conceiued of their present aduantage ouer Sparta. They had caused all Cities which had not entred yet into alliance with Argos, to send their Agents to them, in whose presence they gae audience to the Lacedæmonians; the purport of whose Embassie was this: That the Corinthians, 50 without breach of their oath, could not forsake the alliance, which they had long since made with Sparta; and that reason did as well binde them to hold themselves contented with the peace lately made, as religion enforced them to continue in their ancient confederacy, forasmuch as it had been agreed between the Spartans and their associates, that the consent of the greater part, (which had yeelded vnto peace with Athens) should binde the lesser number to performe what was concluded, if no Diuine impediment withstood them. Hereunto the Corinthians made answer, that the Spartans had first begun to doe them open wrong, in concluding the warre wherein they had lost many places, without prouision of restitution; and that the very clause, alledged by the Embassadors, did acquire them from any necessity of subscribing to the late peace, forasmuch as they had sworn vnto those people whom they perswaded to rebell against Athens, that they would neuer abandon them, nor willingly suffer them to fall againe into the tyrannous hands of the Athenians. Wherefore they held themselves bound both in reason & religion to vse all meanes of vpholding those, whom by common consent they had taken into protection; for that an oath was no lesse to be accounted a Diuine impediment, than were pestilence, tempest, or any the like accident, hindering the performance of things vnderaken. As for the alliance with Argos, they said that they would doe as they should finde cause. 10 Having dismissed the Embassadors with this answer, they made haste to ioyn themselves with Argos, and caused other States to doe the like; so that Sparta & Athens were in a manner left to themselves, the Thebans and Megarians being also vpon the point to haue entred into this new confederacie. But as the affections were diuers, which caused this hasty confluence of sudden friends to Argos, it so likewise came to passe that the friendship it selfe, such as it was, had much diuersitie both of sinceritie and of continuance. For some there were that hated or feared the Lacedæmonians: as the Mantineans and Eleans: these did firmly betake themselves to the Argiues, in whom they knew the same affection to be inueterate; others did onely hate the peace concluded; and these would rather haue followed the Spartans than the Argiues in war, yet rather the Argiues 20 in war than the Lacedæmonians in peace. Of this number were the Corinthians, who knowing that the Thebans were affected like vnto themselves, dealt with them to enter into the societie of the Argiues, as they had done: but the different formes of government, vsed in Thebes and Argos, caused the Thebans to hold rather with Sparta, that was ruled by the principall men, than to incur the danger of innouation, by joyning with such as committed the whole rule to the multitude.

This businesse hauing ill succeeded, the Corinthians began to bethinke themselves of their owne danger, who had not so much as any truce with Athens, and yet were vnprepared for warre. They sought therefore to come to some temporary agreement with the Athenians, and hardly obtained it. For the Athenians, who had dealt with all Greece at 30 one time, did not greatly care to come to any appointment with one Citie that had shewed against them more stomacke then force; but gaue them to vnderstand that they might be safe enough from them, if they would claime the benefit of that alliance, which Athens had lately made with Sparta & her dependants, yet finally they granted vnto these Corinthians (which were loth to acknowledge themselves dependants of Sparta) the truce that they desired; but into priuate confederacie they would not admit them, it being an article of the league between them and the Spartans, That the one should not make peace nor warre without the other.

Herein, as in many other passages, may cleerely be seene the great aduantage which absolute Lords haue as well in peace as in warre, ouer such as are serued by voluntaries. 40 We shall hardly finde any Signiorie, that hath beene so constantly followed as Sparta was by so many States, and some of them little inferiour to it selfe, being all as free: whereas contrariwise, the Athenians had lately, and by compulsiue meanes gotten their Dominion, wherein they demeaned themselves as Tyrants. But in performance of conditions agreed vpon, the Athenians were able to make their words good, by excluding any State out of their Confederacie, and giuing vp such places as were agreed vpon: of which the Lacedæmonians could doe neither the one nor the other. For such Townes as their old Allies had gotten by their meanes in the late warre, could not be restored without their consent, which had them in present possession; and particularly the Towne of Panactæ, which the Thebans held, could by no meanes be obtained from them by the Lacedæmonians (who earnestly desired it, that by restitution thereof vnto the Athenians, as earnestly demanding it, themselves might recouer Pylus) vnlesse that they would agree to make a priuate alliance with Thebes; which thereupon they were constrained to doe, though knowing it to bee contrarie to the last agreement betweene them and Athens.

The Lacedæmonians hauing broken one article of the league made betweene them and the Athenians, that by so doing they might enable themselves to the performance of another, were shamefully disappointed of their hopes by the Thebans, who did not giue vp the Towne of Panactæ, till first they had vtterly demolished it, and made it of no worth to the the Athenians. This was fought to haue beene excused by the Lacedæmonian Embassadors, who comming to Athens (whither they had sent home all prisoners that had been detained at Thebes) hoping with gentle words to salue the matter; saying, That from henceforth noemie to Athens should nestle in Panaſte, for it was destroyed. But these Embassadors had not to deale with tame fooles. For the Athenians told them in plaine termes, That of three principall conditions agreed vpon in their late League, they had not performed any one, but vsed such base collusion as stood not with their honour; hauing made priuate alliance with the Thebans; hauing destroyed a Towne that they should haue restored; and not hauing forced their dependants by Warre, to make good the Couenants of the late concluded peace. Hereupon they dismissed the Embassadors with rough words, meaning with as rough deeds to anger those that sent them.

There were at that time, both in Athens and Sparta, many that were ill-contented with the peace: among whom were the Ephori, chosen for that yere, in Sparta; and Alcibiades a powerfull yong Gentleman in Athens. But the Ephori, though desiring to renew the warre, yet wished that first they might get from the Athenians as much as wasto be rendered to them by Couenant, especially Pylus that had so sorely troubled them. Alcibiades, whose Nobilitie, riches, & fauor, with the people, made him desire warre, as the meanes, whereby himselfe might procure some honourable employment; vsed all meanes to set the quarrell on foot, whilst the Athenians had yet both aduantage enough, as not hauing rendered ought saue their prisoners, and pretence enough to vse that aduantage of breakeing the peace, by reason that the Lacedæmonians (though indeed against their wills) had broken all couenants with them. Now the State of Athens had fully determined to retain Pylus, and to performe nothing that the Lacedæmonians should, and might require; vntill they had first, without any longer halting, fulfilled all articles whereto they were bound, euen to the vtmost point. This was enough to make them sweate, who hauing already done the most that they could, had as yet got nothing in recompence, except the delivery of their Citizens, which were prisoners. But Alcibiades wishing a speedy beginning of open warre, sent priuily to the Argiues, and gaue them to vnderstand how fitly the time serued for them to affociate themselves with Athens, which was enough to giue them securitie against all Enemies.

The Argiues vpon the first confluence of many Estates vnto their societie, had embraced great hopes of working wonders, as if they should haue had the conduct of all Greece against the Athenians, robbing Sparta of that honour, as hauing ill vsed it, and thereby leauing their old enemies in case of much contempt and disabilitie. But these suddain apprehensions of vaine ioy, were suddainly changed into as vaine feare; which ill agreed with the great opinion that had lately beene conceiued of Argos. For when the Thebans had refused their alliance; when the Corinthians had sought securitie from Athens; and when a false rumour was noysed abroad, Athens, Thebes, and Sparta, were come to a full agreement vpon all points of difference; then began the Argiues to let fall their crests, and sue for peace vnto the Lacedæmonians, who needing it as much as they, or more, yet held their grauity, and were not ouer-hastie to accept it. At this time; and in this perturbation, the message of Alcibiades came very welcome to the Argiues, which were not now consulting how to become the chiefe of all others, but how to saue themselves. Wherefore they sent away presently to Athens, their owne Embassadors, accompanied with the Mantineans and Eleans, to make a league offensive, and defensive, betweene their Estates and the Athenians.

Of this businesse the Lacedæmonians knew not what to thinke: for well they saw, that such a combination tended to their great hurt, and therefore were desirous to preuent it; but to keepe the loue of the Athenians, the new Ephori thought that more was already done, than stood with their honour, or profit; others held it the wisest way, hauing done so much, not to sticke vpon a little more, but rather by giuing full satisfaction, to retaine the friendship of that State, which was more to be valued then all the rest of Greece. This resolution preuailing, they sent away such of their Citizens as were best affected to the peace, who comming to Athens, with full commission to make an end of all controuersies, did earnestly labour in the Councell-house, to make the truth of things appeare, saying; that their Confederacie with the Thebans had tended to none other end than the recovery of Panaſte: concerning which Towne, or any other businesse, that it much grieued ued the Lacedæmonians, to see things fall out in such wise as might giue to the Athenians cause of displeasure; but that all should be done which in reason might be required for making matters euen betweene them; to which purpose they shewed that themselves had absolute commission. Wherefore they desired that Pylus might be restored to them, and especially for the present, that the negotiation with the Argiues might be called aside. Fauourable audience was giuen to this proposition, the rather because they which promised amends, had power to make their words good. But all this faire likelihood of good agreement was dashed on the suddaine, by the practice of Alcibiades, who, secretly dealing with the Lacedæmonian Embassadors, perswaded them well of his friendship towards their Citie, and aduised them to take all care that their absolute power to conclude what they pleased in the name of Sparta, might not be knowne to the Communitie of Athens, lest the insolent multitude should thereupon grow peremptorie and yeeld to nothing, vnlesse they could draw them to vnreasonable conditions. The Embassadors beleued him, and fashioned their tale in the assembly of the people, as he had aduised them. Hereupon the same Alcibiades taking presently the aduantage, which their double dealing afforded, inueighed openly against them, as men of no sinceritie, that were come to Athens for no other purpose, than to hinder the people from strengthening themselves with friends, meaning to draw the Argiues and their Adherents to their owne alliance, as (contrary to their owne Oath) already they had the Thebans. The people of Athens, to whom a pleasing errand would very hardly haue satisfied, or brought into a good opinion of the Lacedæmonians, (whose honest meanings had so ill beene seconded with good performance) were now so much incensed with the double dealing of the Embassadors, and the strong perswasions of Alcibiades, that little wanted of concluding the league with Argos. Yet for the present so farre did Nicias, an honourable Citizen, and great friend to the peace, preuaile with them, that the businesse was put off; vnill hee himselfe with other Embassadors might fetch a better answer from Sparta.

It may also seeme a great wonder, how so poore a trick of Alcibiades was able to carrie a matter of so great importance, when the Spartan Embassadors might haue cast the load vpon his owne shoulders, by discovering the truth: But the grauitie which was vially found in the Lacedæmonians, hindered them (perhaps) from playing their game handsomely against so nimble a witte; and they might well haue been thought vntrusty men, had they professed themselves such as would say and vn-say for their most aduantage.

Nicias and his Companions had a sower message to deliuer at Sparta, being peremptorily to require performance of all conditions, and among the rest, that the Lacedæmonians should take the paines to rebuild Panaſte, and should immediately renounce their Alliance made with the Thebans; letting them vnderstand that otherwise the Athenians, without further delay, would enter into confederacie with the Argiues, and their adherents. The Ephori at Sparta had no minde to forsake the Thebans, assured friends to their State; but wrought so hard, that the anger of the Athenians was sufficed to breake out what way it could; which to mitigate, they would doe no more, than onely (at the request of Nicias their honourable friend, who would not seeme to haue effected nothing) sweare a-new to keepe the Articles of the league betweene him and Athens. Immediately therefore vpon returne of the Embassadors, a new league was made betweene the Athenians, Argiues, Mantineans, and Eleans, with very ample provision for holding the same common friends and enemies; wherein, though the Lacedæmonians were passed ouer with silence, yet was it manifest that the whole intent of this confederacy did bend it selfe chiefly against them, as in short while after was proued by effect.

At this time the Lacedæmonians were in ill case, who hauing restored all that they could vnto the Athenians, and procured others to doe the like, had themselves recovered nothing of their owne (prisoners excepted) for default of restoring all that they should. But that which did most of all disable them, was the losse of reputation, which they had not more impaired in the late Warre by misfortunes, than in sundrie passages betweene them and the Athenians: to procure and keepe whose Amitie, they had left sundrie of their olde friends to shift for themselves. Contrariwise the Athenians, by the treatie of peace, had recovered the most part of that which they lost in warre;

all their gettings they had retained, and were strengthened by the access of new Confederates.

§. VII.

How the peace betweene Athens and Sparta was ill kept, though not openly broken.

IT was not long ere the Argives and their fellowes had found business where, with to set the Athenians on worke, and make vse of this coniunction. For presuming vpon the strength of their side, they began to meddle with the Epidaurians, whom it concerned the State of Sparta to defend. So, many acts of hostilitie were committed, wherein Athens and Sparta did (as principals) infect each the other, but came in collaterally, as to the aid of their severall friends.

By these occasions the Corinthians, Boeotians, Phocians, Locrans, and other people of Greece, began a new to range themselves vnder the Lacedemonians, and follow their enignes. One victorie which the Lacedemonians obtained by their meere valour in a set battaile, neere to Mantineia, against the Argive side, helped well to repaire their decayed reputation, though otherwise it yielded them no great profit. The ciuill dissension arising shortly after within Argos it selfe, betweene the principall Citizens and the Commons, had almost throwne downe the whole frame of the new combination. For the chiefe Citizens getting the vpper hand, made a league with Sparta, wherein they proceeded so farre as to renounce the amity of the Athenians in expresse words, and forced the Mantineans to the like. But in short space of time the multitude prevailing, reuered all this, and hauing chased away their ambitious Nobilitie, applied themselves to the Athenians as closely as before.

Beside these vprores in Peloponnesus, many affaies were made to raise vp troubles in all parts of Greece, and likewise in Macedon, to the Athenians; whose forces and readines for execution, preuented some things, reuenged other, and required all with some prosperous attempts. Finally, the Athenians wanting matter of quarrell; and the Lacedemonians growing wearie, they began to be quiet, retaining still that enmitie in their hearts, which they had sufficiently discovered in effects, though not yet breaking out into termes of open warre.

§. VIII.

The Athenians sending two Fleetes to sacke Siracuse, are put to flight, and utterly defeated.

DVring this intermission of open warre, the Athenians re-entertained their hopes of subduing Sicily, whither they sent a fleet so mighty as neuer was set forth by Greece in any Age before or after.

This fleet was very well manned, and furnished with all necessaries to so great an expedition. All which came to nought, partly by the factions in Athens, whence Alcibiades Author of that voyage, and one of the Generalls of their fleet, was driuen to banish himselfe, for feare of such iudgement, as else he was like to haue vndergone, among the incensed people; partly by the inuasion which the Lacedemonians made vpon Attica, whilst the forces of that State were so farre from home. Hereunto was added the aid of the King of Persia, who supplied the Peloponnesians with money.

Neyther was the successe of things in Sicily such, as without helpe from Athens, could giue any likelihood of a good end in that warre. For although in the beginning, the enterprise had so well succeeded, that they besieged Siracuse, the chiefe Citie of all the Island, and one of the fairest Townes which the Greekes inhabited, obtaing the better in sundry battailes by Land and Sea; yet when the Towne was relieved with strong aide from Peloponnesus, it came to passe that the Athenians were put to the worse on all sides, in such wise that their fleet was shut vp into the haven of Siracuse, and could not issue out.

As the Athenian affaies went very ill in Sicily, so did they at home stand vpon hard terms, for that the Lacedemonians, who had bene formerly accustomed to make wearisome yeerely iournies into Attica, which hauing pilld and foraged, they returned home; did now by counsell of Alcibiades, (who seeking reuenge vpon his owne Citizens was fled vnto them) fortifie the Towne of Declea, which was neere to Athens, whence they ceased not with daily excursions to harrie all the Countrie round about, and sometimes giue alarme vnto the Citie it selfe. In these extremities, the peruerser obstinacie of the Athenians was very strange; who leauing at their backs, and at their owne doores, an enemie little lesse mighty than themselves, did yet send forth another fleet into Sicily, in inuade a people no lesse puissant, which had neuer offended them.

It often happens, that prosperous euent makes foolish counsaile seem wiser than it was, which came to passe many times among the Athenians, whose vaine conceits Pallas was said to turne vnto the best. But where vnfound aduice, finding badde prooffe, is obstinately pursued, neither Pallas nor Fortune can be iustly blamed for a miserable issue. This second fleet of the Athenians, which better might haue serued to conuay home the former that was defeated; after some attempts made to small purpose against the Siracusans, was finally (together with the other part of the Naue, which was there before) quite vanquished, and bard vp into the haven of Siracuse, whereby the campe of the Athenians, utterly deprived of all benefit by Sea, either for succour or departure, was driuen to breake vp, and sie away by Land; in which fight they were ouer-taken, routed, and quite ouerthrowne in such wise that scarce any man escaped.

This mischiefe well deserued fell vpon the Athenians, who had wickedly condemned into exile Sophocles and Phidodorus Generalls, formerly sent into that Ile, pretending that they had taken mony for making peace in Sicily, whereas indeed there was not any meanes or possibilitie to haue made warre. Heereby it came to passe, that Nicias, who had the chiefe command in this vnhappy enterprise, did rather choofe to hazard the ruine of his Countrie by the losse of that Armie, wherein consisted little lesse then all the power of Athens; than to aduenture his owne estate, his life, and his honour vpon the tongues of shamelesse accusers, and the sentence of Iudges before his triall resolu'd to condemne him, by retiring from Syracuse, when wisdom and necessitie required it. For (said hee) they shall giue sentence vpon vs, who know not the reason of our doings, nor would giue care to any that would speake in our behalfe, but altogether harken to suspicious and vaine rumors that shall be brought against vs; yea these our Souldiers who now are so desirous to returne in safety, will in our danger be well contented to frame their tales to the pleasure of the lewd and insolent multitude.

This resolution of Nicias, though it cannot be commended (for it is the part of an honest and valiant man to doe what reason willerth, not what opinion expecteth; & to measure honour or dishonour by the assurance of his well-informed conscience, rather than by the malicious report & censure of others) yet it may be excused; since he had before his eyes the iniustice of his people, and had well vnderstood that a wicked sentence is infinitely worse than a wicked fact, as being held a president and patterne, whereby oppression beginning vpon one, is extended as warrantable vpon all. Therefore his feare of wrongfull condemnation was such, as a constant man could not easily haue ouer-mastered; but when afterwards the Armie, hauing no other expectation of safetie than the faint hope of a secret flight, he was so terrified with an Eclipse of the Moone, happening when they were about to dislodge, that he would not consent to haue the campe break vp till seuen and twentie daies were past. His timorousnesse was euen as foolish and ridiculous, as the issue of it was lamentable. For he should not haue thought that the power of the Heauens, and the course of Nature, would be as vniust as his Athenians, or might pretend lesse euill to the slothfull, than to such as did their best. Neither doe I thinke that any Astrologer can allege this Eclipse, as either a cause or prognostication of that Armes destruction, otherwise than as the follie of men did, by application, turne it to their owne confusion. Had C. Cassius the Roman, he, who slew Iulius Caesar, imitated this superstition of Nicias, he had surely found the same fortune in a case very like. But when, hee retrying, the broken remainder of Crassus his Armie defeated by the Parthian Archers, was aduised, vpon such an accident as this, to continue where he then was, till the Sunne were past the signe of Scorpio; he made answere that hee stood not in such feare of Scorpio, as of Sagittarius. So aduenturing rather to abide the frowning of the Heauens, than the neerer danger of Enemies vpon earth, he made such a safe and honourable retrait, as did both shew his noble resolution, and giue a faire example to that good rule,

Thus we see that God, who ordinarily workes by a concatenation of meanes, deprives the Governours of vnderstanding, when he intends euill to the multitude; and that the wickednesse of vniust men is the readie meane to weaken the vertue of those who might haue done them good.

Of the troubles where-into the State of Athens fell, after the great losse of the Fleet, and Army, in Sicilia.

Helloffe of this Armie was the ruine of the Athenian Dominion, and may bee well accompted a very little lesse calamitie to that Estate, than was the subuersion of the walls, when the Citie about seuen yeeres after was taken by Lysander. For now began the subjects of the Athenian Estate to rebell, of whom, some they reduced vnder their obedience; others held out; some for feare of greater inconuenience were set at libertie, promising onely to be their good friends, as formerly they had been their Subjects; others hauing a kinde of libertie offered by the Athenians, were not therewith contented, but obtained a true and perfect libertie by force. Among these troubles it fell out very vnseasonably, that the principall men of Athens being wearied with the peoples insolencie, tooke vpon them to change the forme of that Estate, and bring the gouernment into the hands of a few. To which purpose conspiring with the Captaines which were abroad, they caused them to set vp the forme of an Aristocratie in the Townes of their Confederates; and in the meane time, some that were most likelie to withstand this inuouation, being slaine at Athens, the Commonaltie were so dismayed, that none durst speake against the Conspirators, whose number they knew not, but enerie man was afraid of his neighbour, lest he should be a member of the league. In this generall feare the Maiestie of Athens was vsurped by foure hundred men, who obseruing in shew the ancient forme of proceeding, did cause all matters to be propounded vnto the people, and concluded vpon by the greater part of voices: but the things propounded were onely such as were first allowed in priuate among themselves; neither had the Commonaltie any other libertie, than onely to approue and giue consent: for whosoever presumed any further, was quickly dispatched out of the way, and no inquite made of the murder. By these meanes were many Decrees made, all tending to the establishment of this new Authoritie, which neuertheless endured not long. For the Fleet and Armie which then was in the Isle of Samos, did altogether detest these dealings of the foure hundred vsurpers, and held them as Enemies; whereupon they reuoked Alcibiades out of banishment, and by his assistance procured that the supplies which the Persian King had promised to the Lacedemonians, were by Tissaphernes his Lieutenant, made vnprofitable, through the slow and bad performance. Alcibiades had at the first bene very well entertained in Sparta, whilst his seruice done vnto that State was not growne to be the object of enuie. But when it appeared that in Counsaile and good performance he so farre excelled all the Lacedemonians, that all their good success was ascribed to his wit and valour, then were all the principall Citizens wearied of his vertue; especially Agis one of their Kings, whose wife had so farre yeilded her self to the loue of this Athenian, that among her inward friends she could not forbear to call her yong child by his name. Hereupon order was taken, that Alcibiades should be killed out of the way. But he discovering the Spartan trechery, conueighed himselfe vnto Tissaphernes, whom he so bewitched with his great beauty, sweet conuersation, and sound wit, that he soone became the Master of that barbarous Vice-royes affections, who had free power to dispose the great Kings Treasures and forces in those parts. Then began he to aduise Tissaphernes, not so farre forth to assist the Lacedemonians, that they should quite ouerthrow the State of Athens, but rather to helpe the weaker side, and let them one consume another, whereby all should fall at length into the hands of the Persian. By this counsaile he made way to other practices, wherein by strength of his reputation (as the onely fauourite of so great a Potentate) he played his owne game, procuring his restitution. At length his banishment being repealed by the Armie, but not by the Citizens (who then were oppressed by the foure hundred) hee laboured greatly to reconcile reconcile the Souldiers to the Governours; or at least to diuert their heat another way, and turne it vpon the common Enemie. Some of the foure hundred approued his motion, as being wearie of the tyrannic wherof they were partakers, partly because they saw it could not long endure, and partly for that themselves, being lesse regarded by the rest of their companions, than stood with their good liking, sought to acquit themselves of it as honestly as they might. But the most of that Faction laboured to obtaine peace of the Lacedemonians, desiring chiefly to maintaine both their owne authoritie & the greatness of their Citie, if they might: but if this could not be, they did rather wish to preserve their owne power, or safetie at least, than the good Estate of the Common-wealth. Therefore they made sundry ouertures of peace to the Lacedemonians, desiring to compound in as good termes as they might; and affirming that they were fitter to be trusted than the wauering multitude; especially considering that the Citie of Sparta was gouerned by an Aristocratie, to which forme they had now reduced Athens. All these passages betwene the foure hundred (or the most and chiefe of them) and the Lacedemonians, were kept as secret as might be. For the Citie of Athens, hoping without any great cause, to repaire their losses, was not inclined to make composition, from which vpon iuster ground the enemy was much more auerse, trusting well that the discord of the Athenians (not vnknowne abroad) might yeeld some faire opportunitie to the destruction of it selfe, which in effect (though not then presently) came to passe. And vpon this hope King Agis did sometimes bring his forces from Decelea to Athens, where doing no good, he receiued some finall losses. Likewise the Nauie of Peloponnesus made shew of attempting the Citie, but seeing no likelihood of success, they bent their course from thence to other places, where they obtained victories, which in the better Fortune of the Athenians might more lightly haue bene regarded, than in this their decayed estate. Yet it seemes, without any disparagement to their wisdom, they should rather haue forborne to present vnto the Citie, or to the Countries neere adioyning, any terror of the warre. For the disension within the walls might soon haue done more good than could be receiued from the Fleet or Armie without, which indeed gaue occasion to see the Citizens at vnitie, though it lasted not very long. The foure hundred, by meanes of these troubles, were faine to resigne their authoritie, which they could not now hold, when the people hauing taken armes to repell forraigne enemies, would not lay them downe, till they had freed themselves from such as oppressed the State at home. Yet was not this alteration of gouernment a full restitution of the soueraigne command vnto the people, or whole body of the Citie, but onely to siue thousand; which company the foure hundred (when their authoritie beganne) had pretended to take vnto them as assistants: herein seeming to doe little wrong or none to the Commonalty, who seldome assembled in greater number. But now when the highest power was come indeed into the hands of so many, it was soon agreed that Alcibiades and his Companions should be recalled from exile, and that the Armie at Samos should be requested to vndertake the gouernment: which was forthwith reformed according to the Souldiers desire.

His establishment of things in the Citie, was accompanied with some good success in the warres. For the Lacedemonians were about the same time ouerthrowne at Sea, in a great battaile, by the Athenian fleet, which had remained at Samos, to which Alcibiades afterwards ioyning such forces as he could raise, obtained many victories. Before the Towne of Abydos, his arriual with eigheteen shippes, gaue the honour of a great battaile to the Athenians; he ouerthrew and utterly destroyed the fleet of the Lacedemonians, commanded by Mindarus, tooke the Townes of Cyzicus, and Perinthus, made the Selymbrians ransom their Citie, and fortified Chrysopolis. Hereupon letters were sent to Sparta, which the Athenians, intercepting, found to containe the distresse of the Armie in these few words: All is lost; Mindarus is slaine; the Souldiers want victuals; we know not what to doe.

Shortly after this, Alcibiades ouerthrew the Lacedemonians in fight by Land at Chalcedon, took Selymbria, besieged and won Byzantium, now called Constantinople, which euen in those dayes was a goodly, rich, and very strong Citie. Heereupon he returned home with very great welcome, and was made high Admirall of all the Nauie.

But this his honour continued not long; for it was taken from him, and hee driuen to banish himselfe againe; onely because his Lieutenant, contrary to the expresse command of Alcibiades, fighting with the enemies in his absence, had lost a great part of the fleet.

The second banishment of Alcibiades was to the Athenians more harmefull than the first; and the losse which thereupon they receiued, was (though more heauie to them, yet) lesse to be pittied of others, than that which ensued vpon his former exile. For whereas at the first, hee had sought reuenge vpon his owne Citie; now, as inured to aduersitie, he rather pittied their furie, who in time of such danger had cast out him that should haue repaired their weake estate, than sought by procuring or beholding the calamitie of his people, to comfort himselfe after iniurie receiued. Before they, who were instituted in the place of Alcibiades, arrived at the fleet, he presented battaile to Lysander the Lacedemonian Admirall, who was not so confident vpon his former victorie, as to undertake Alcibiades himselfe, bringing ships more in number (notwithstanding the former losse of fifteene) than his enemies had, and better ordered than they had beene vnder his Lieutenant. But when the decree of the people was published in the Nauie, then did Alcibiades with-draw himselfe to a Towne vpon Hellespont, called Bizante, where he had built a Castle.

§. XI.

The battaile at Arginuse, and condemnation of the victorious Athenian Captaines by the people.

After this time, the Athenians receiuing many losses and discomfitures, were driuen to flee into the Hauen of Mytelene, where they were streightly besieged both by Land and Sea. For the raising of this siege necessity inforced them to man all their Vessells, and to put the vttermost of their forces into the hazzard of one battaile. This battaile was fought at Arginuse, where Callicratidas, Admirall of the Lacedemonians, losing the honour of the day, preserved his owne reputation by dying valiantly in the fight. It might well haue beene expected, that the tenne Captaines, who ioynly had command in chiefe ouer the Athenian fleet, should for that good daies service, and so happie a victorie, haue receiued great honour of their Citizens. But contrariwise they were forth-with called home, and accused, as if wilfully they had suffered many of the Citizens, whose ships were broken and sunke, to be cast away, when by appointing some Vessells to take them vp, they might haue saued them from being drowned. Hereto the Captaines readily made a very iust answer, That they pursuing the victory, had left part of the fleet, vnder sufficient men, to saue those that were wrackt; which if it were not well accomplished, it was, because a tempest arising about the end of the fight, had hindred the performance of that, and other their intendments. This excuse auailed not: For a lewd fellow was brought forth, who said, That hee himselfe escaping in a meale-tubbe, had beene intreated by those who were in perill of drowning, to desire of the people reuenge of their deaths vpon the Captaines. It was very strange, that vpon such an accusation maintained with so slender euidence, men that had well deserved of their Countrey should be ouerthrowne. But their enemies had so incensed the rascall multitude, that no man durst absolue them, saue onely Socrates the wise and vertuous Philosopher, whose voice in this iudgement was not regarded. Sixe of them were put to death, of whom one had hardly escaped drowning, and was with much adoë relieved by other vessels in the storme: but the Captaines which were absent escaped; for when the furie of the people was ouer-past, this iudgement was reuerfed, and the accusers called into question for hauing deceived and peruerfed the Citizens. Thus the Athenians went about to free themselves from the infamie of iniustice; but the diuine iustice was not a-sleepe, nor would be so deluded.

§. XII.

§. XII.

The battaile at Agos-Potamos, wherein the whole State of Athens was ruined; with the end of the Peloponnesian warre.

The Peloponnesian fleet vnder Lysander, the yeere next following, hauing scowred the Aegean Seas, entred Hellespont, where (landing Souldiers) it besieged and took the Town of Lampsacus. Hereupon all the Nauie of Athens, being an hundred and fourescore saile, made thither in haste, but finding Lampsacus taken before their coming, they put in at Sestos, where hauing refreshed themselves, they sailed to the Riuer called Agos-Potamos, which is (as we might name it) Goates-Brooke, or the Riuer of the Goates, being on the Continent, opposite to Lampsacus: & there they cast Anchors, not one whole league off from Lysander, who rode at Lampsacus in the harbour. The next day after their arrivall they presented fight vnto the Peloponnesians, who refused it, whereupon the Athenians returned again to Agos-Potamos, & thus they continued fife daies, brauing euery day the Enemy, and returning to their owne harbour when it drew towards euening.

The Castle of Alcibiades was not far from the Nauie, and his power in those places was such as might haue greatly auailed his Countreymen, if they could haue made vse of it. For he had waged Mercenaries, and making warre in his owne name vpon some people of the Thracians, had gathered much wealth; and obtained much reputation among them. He perceiuing the disorderly course of the Athenian Commanders, repaired vnto them, and shewed what great inconuenience might grow, if they did not soone force-see and preuent it. For they lay in a roade subiect to euery weather, neither neere enough to any Towne where they might furnish themselves with necessaries, nor so farre off as had beene more expedient. Sestos was the next Market-Towne; thither both Souldiers and Marriners resorted, flocking away from the Nauie euery day, as soone as they were returned from brauing the Enemy. Therefore Alcibiades willed them either to lie at Sestos, which was not farre off, or at least to consider how neere their enemy was, whose feare proceeded rather from obedience to their Generall, than from any cowardise. This admonition was so farre despised, that some of the Commanders willed him to meddle with his owne matters, and to remember that his authoritie was out of date. Had it not been for these opprobrious words, he could (as he told his familiars) haue compelled the Lacedemonians, either to fight vpon vnequall termes, or vtterly to quit their Fleet. And like enough it was that he might so haue done by transporting the light-armed Thracians his Confederates, and others his Followers ouer the Streights, who assaulting the Peloponnesians by Land, would either haue compelled them to put to Sea, or else to leaue their ships to the mercy of the Athenians. But finding their acceptance of his good counsaile no better than hath beene rehearsed, he left them to their fortune, which how euill it would be he did prognosticate.

Lysander all this while defending himselfe by the aduantage of his Hauen, was not carelesse in looking into the demcanour of the Athenians. When they departed, his manner was to send forth some of his swiftest Vessels after them, who obseruing their doings, related vnto him what they had seene. Therefore vnderstanding in what carelesse fashion they romed vp & downe the Countrey, he kept all his men a-boord after their departure, & the fift day gaue especiall charge to his Scouts, That when they perceiued the Athenians disembarking, as their custome was, and walking towards Sestos, they should forthwith returne, and hang vp a brazen shield in the Prow, as a token for him to weigh Anchor.

The Scouts performed their charge, and Lysander being in a readinesse, made all speede that strength of Oares could giue, to Agos-Potamos, where he found very few of his enemies a-boord their Ships, not many neere them, and all in great confusion vpon the news of his approach.

Insomuch that the greatest industry which the Athenians then shewed, was in the escape of eight or nine ships, which knowing how much that losse imported, gaue ouer Athens as desperate, and made a long flight vnto the Ile of Cyprus; all the rest were taken, and such of the Souldiers as came in to the rescue cut in pieces. Thus was the war which had lasted seven and twenty yeers, with variable success, concluded in one houre, & the glory of Athens in such wise eclipsed, that she neuer afterward shone in her perfect light.

Immediately vpon this victory Lysander, hauing taken such Townes as readily did yeeld yeelde vpon the first fame of his exploit, set sayle for Athens, and ioyning his forces with those of Agis & Pausanias, Kings of Sparta, summoned the Citie; which finding too stubborn to yeeld, and too strong to be won on the sudden, he put forth againe to Sea, and rather by terror than violence, compelling all the Ilands, and such Townes of the Ionians, as had formerly held of the Athenians, to submit themselves to Sparta, he did thereby cut off all prouision of victuals, and other necessities, from the Citie, & enforced the people by meere famine to yeeld to these conditions: That the long wals, leading from the Town to the Port, should be throwne down; That all Cities subiect to their Estate, should be set at liberty; That the Athenians should be Masters onely of their owne Territories, and the fields adioyning to their Towne; And that they should keep no more than twelue to Ships; That they should hold as Friends or Enemies, the same, whom the Lacedemonians did, and follow the Lacedemonians as Leaders in the Warres.

These articles being agreed vpon, the wals were throwne downe with great reioicing of those who had borne displeasure to Athens; and not without some consultation of destroying the Citie, and laying waste the Land about it. Which aduice, although it was not entertained, yet were thirty Gouvernors, or rather cruell Tyrants, appointed ouer the people, who recompensed their former insolency and iniustice ouer their Captaines, by oppressing them with all base and intolerable slavery.

The onely small hope then remaining to the Athenians, was, that Alcibiades might perhaps repaire what their owne folly had ruined. But the thirty Tyrants perceiving this, aduertised the Lacedemonians thereof, who contriued, and (as now domineering in euery quarter) soone effected his suddaine death.

Such end had the Peloponnesian Warre. After which the Lacedemonians abusing the reputation, and great power, which therein they had obtained, grew very odious to Greece, and by Combination of many Cities against them, were dispossessed of their high authority, euen in that very Age, in which they had subdued Athens. The greatest foile that they tooke was of the Thebans, led by Eparinondas, vnder whom Philip of Macedon, father to Alexander the Great, had the best of his education. By these Thebans, the Citie of Sparta (besides other great losses receiued) was sundry times in danger of being taken. But these haughty attempts of the Thebans came finally to nothing, for the feuerall Estates and Signories of Greece, were growne so ialous one of anothers greatness, that the Lacedemonians, Athenians, Argians, and Thebans, which were the mightiest, associating themselves with the weaker party, did so counterpoize the stronger, that no one Citie could extend the limits of her iurisdiction so farre as might make her terrible to her Neighbours. And thus all parts of the Countrey remained rather euenly ballanced, than well agreeing, till such time as Philip, and after him Alexander, Kings of Macedon, (whose forefathers had bene dependants, and followers, yea almost meere Vassals to the Estates of Athens and Sparta) found meanes, by making vse of their factions, to bring them all into seruitude, from which they neuer could be free, till the Romans presenting them with a shew of liberty, did themselves indeede become their Masters.

CHAP. IX.

Of matters concurring with the Peloponnesian Warre, or shortly following it.

§. I.

How the affaires of Persia stood in these times.

During the times of this Peloponnesian Warre, and those other lesse expeditions foregoing it, Artaxerxes Longimanus, hauing peaceably enioyed a long reigne ouer the Persians, left it by his death either to Darius, who was called Darius Nothus, or the Bastard, whom the Greeke Historians (lightly passing ouer Xerxes the second, and Sogdianus, as Vsurpers, and for their short reigne little to be regarded) place next vnto them, or to Xerxes the second, who, and his brother Sogdianus after him (seeming to haue bene the the sonnes of Hester) held the Kingdome but one yeere betweene them, the yonger succeeding his elder brother. It is not my purpose (as I haue said before) to pursue the History of the Persians from henceforth, by rehearfall of all the particulars, otherwise than as they shall be incident to the affaires of Greece. It may therefore suffice to say, That Xerxes the second, being a vicious Prince, did perish after a moneth or two, if not by surfeit, then by treachery of his as riotous brother Sogdianus. Likewise of Sogdianus it is found, that being as ill as his brother, and more cruell, he slew vniuistly Bagozarius a principall Eunuch, and would haue done as much to his brother Darius the Bastard, had not he foreseene it, and by raising a stronger Armie than this hated King Sogdianus could leaue, seized at once vpon the King and Kingdome. Darius hauing slaine his brother, held the Empire nineteene yeeres. Amirtaus of Sais an Egyptian rebelled against him, and hauing partly slaine, partly chased out of the Land the Persian Garrisons, allied himselfe so firmly with the Greekes, that by their aide he maintained the Kingdome, and deliuered it ouer to his posterity, who (notwithstanding the furie of their ciuill Warres) maintained it against the Persian, all the dayes of this Darius, and of his son Artaxerxes Mnemon. Likewise Amorges, a subiect of his owne and of the Royall blood, being Lieutenant of Caria, rebelled against him; confederating himselfe with the Athenians. But the great calamity, before spoken of, which fell vpon the Athenians in Sicil, hauing put new life into the Spartans, and giuen courage to the Ilanders and others, subiect to the State of Athens, to shake off the yoke of their long continued bondage: It fell out well for Darius, that the Lacedemonians being destitute of money, wherewith to defray the charge of a great Naue, without which it was impossible to aduance the warre against the State of Athens, that remained powerful by Sea, were driuen to craue his assistance, which he granted vnto them, first vpon what conditions best pleased himselfe, though afterwards the articles of the league betweene him and them were set downe in more precise termes, wherein it was concluded, That he and they should make warre ioyntly vpon the Athenians, and vpon all that should rebell from either of them, and (which was highly to the Kings honour and profit) that all the Cities of Asia, which had formerly bene his, or his Predecessours, should returne to his obedience. By this Treatie, and the warre ensuing (of which I haue already spoken) he recouered all that his Grand-father and Father had lost in Asia. Likewise by assistance of the Lacedemonians he got Amorges a-lieue into his hands, who was taken in the Citie of Iasus; the Athenians wanting either force or courage to succour him Neuertheless Egypt still held out against him; the cause whereof cannot be the employment of the Persian forces on the parts of Greece: for he abounded in men, of whom he had enough for all occasions, but they wanted manhood, which caused him to fight with gold, which effected for him by Souldiers of other Nations, and his naturall enemies, what the valour of his owne Subiects was insufficient to performe. Darius had in marriage Parysatis his owne sister, who bare vnto him (besides other children) Artaxerxes called Mnemon, that is to say, the Mindefull, or the Rememberer, who succeeded him in the Kingdome; and Cyrus the yonger, a Prince of singular vertue, and accounted by all that knew him, the most excellent man that cuer Persia bred after Cyrus the Great. But the old King Darius, intending to leaue vnto his elder sonne Artaxerxes the inheritance of that great Empire, did cast a ialous eye vpon the doings of yong Cyrus, who being Lieutenant of the lower Asia, tooke more vpon him than befit a Subiect: for which cause his father sent for him, with intent to haue taken some very sharpe course with him, had not his owne death preuented the comming of his yonger sonne, and placed the elder in his Throne. Of the warre betweene these brethren, and summarily of Artaxerxes, we shall haue occasion to speake somewhat in more conuenient place.

§. II.

How the thirty Tyrants got their Dominion in Athens.

Hold it in this place very conuenient to shew the proceedings of the Greekes, after the subuersion of the wals of Athens, which gaue end to that war called the Peloponnesian warre, but could not free the vnhappy Countrey of Greece from ciuill broiles. The thirtie Gouvernours, commonly called the thirtie Tyrants of Athens, were chosen at the first by the people to compile a body of their Law, and make a collection of such such ancient Statutes, as were meet to be put in practice: the condition of the Citie standing as it did in that so sodaine alteration. To this charge was annexed the supreme authority, either as a recompence of their labours, or because the necessity of the times did so require it, wherein the Law being vncertain, it was fit that such men should giue iudgement in particular causes, to whose iudgement the Lawes themselves, by which the Citie was to be ordered, were become subiect. But these thirty hauing so great power in their hands, were more carefull to hold it, than to deferue it, by faithfull execution of that which was committed to them in trust.

Therefore apprehending such troublesome fellowes, as were odious to the Citie, though not punishable therefore by law, they condemned them to death; which proceeding was by all men highly approued, who considered their lewd conditions, but did not without bethinke themselves, how easie a thing it would be vnto these thirty men, to take away the liues of Innocents, by calling them perturbors of the peace, or what else they listed, when condemnation without due triall and prooffe had beene once well allowed. Hauing thus plausibly entred into a wicked course of government, they thought it best to fortifie themselves with a sure guard, ere they brake out into those disorders, which they must needs commit for the establishing of their authority. Wherefore dispatching two of their owne company to Sparta, they informed the Lacedemonians, that it was the full intent of the thirty, to keepe the City free from all rebellious motions, to which purpose it behooued them to cut off such as were seditious; and therefore desired the Lacedemonians to send them a Garrison, which they promised at their owne cost to maintaine. This motion was well approued, and a guard sent, the Captaine of which was so well entertained by the thirty, that none of their misdeedes could want his high commendations at Sparta. Hereupon the Tyrants began to take heart, and looking no more after base and detested persons, inuaded the principall men of the Citie, sending armed men from House to House, who drew out such as were of great reputation, and likely, or able to make any head against this wicked forme of government: whereby there was such effusion of blood, as to Theramenes (one of the thirty) seemed very horrible, and vnable to escape vengeance. His dislike of their proceedings being openly discovered, caused his fellowes to bethinke themselves, and prouide for their owne security, and his destruction, lest he should make himselfe a Captaine of the discontented (which were almost the whole Citie) and redeeme his owne peace with their ruine. Wherefore they selected three thousand of the Citizens, whom they thought meetest, and gaue vnto them some part of publike authority, the rest they disarmed; and hauing thus increased their owne strength, and weakened their opposites, they began afresh to shed the blood, not onely of their priuate enemies, but of such whose money, or goods, might enrich them, and enable them for the payment of their guard. And to this purpose they concluded, that euery one of them should name one man, vpon whose goods he should seize, putting the owner to death. But when Theramenes vttered his detestation of so wicked intent, then did Critias, who of all the thirty was most tyrannicall, accuse him to the Councell, as a treacherous man, and (whereas one maine priuiledge of the three thousand was, that none of them should suffer death at the appointment of the thirty, but haue the accustomed triall) he took vpon him to strike out of that number the name of Theramenes, and so reduced him vnder the triall and sentence of that order. It was well alleadged by Theramenes, that his name was not more easie to be blotted out of the Catalogue, than any other mans; vpon which consideration, he aduised them all to conceiue no otherwise of his case, than as of their owne, who were liable to the same forme of proceeding: but euery man choosing rather to preferue his owne life by silence, than presently to draw vpon himselfe the danger, which as yet concerned him little, and perhaps would neuer come neere him) the Tyrants interpreting silence as consent, condemned him forthwith, and compelled him to drinke poyson.

§. III.

The conspiracie against the thirty Tyrants, and their deposing.

FTER the death of Theramenes, the thirty began to vse such outrage, as excelled their former villanies. For hauing three thousand (as they thought) firme vnto them, they robbed all others without feare or shame, despoiling them of lands and goods, and caused them to flye into banishment, for safeguard of their liues. This flight of the Citizens procured their liberty, and the generall good of the City. For the banished Citizens, who were fled to Thebes, entred into consultation, and resolved to hazard their liues in setting free the Citie of Athens. The very thought of such a practice had beene treason at home, which had no other danger abroad, than might be found in the execution. Seuentie men, or thereabout, were the first vndertakers, who with their Capitaine Thrasylbulus tooke Phyla, a place of strength in the Territorie of Athens. No sooner did the thirty heare of their exploit, than they sought meanes to preuent further danger, assembling the three thousand, and their Lacedemonian guard, with which force they attempted Phyla, but were with some losse of their men repelled. Finding the place too strong to be taken by assault, they intended to besiege it; which purpose came to nought by meanes of snow that fell, and other stormie weather, against which they had not made prouision. Retiring therefore to the Citie, which about all they were to make good, they left the most of their guard; and two companies of Horse, to wearie out them which lay in Phyla, with a flying siege. But it was not long ere the followers of Thrasylbulus were increased from seuentie to seuen hundred, which aduantaged to giue charge vpon those guards, of whom they cut off about an hundred and twenty. These small, but prosperous beginnings, added more to the number of those in Phyla, who now with a thousand men got entrance into Piræus, the suburbe of Athens, lying on the Port. Before their coming, the thirty had resolved to fortifie the Towne of Eleusine, to their owne vse, whereinto they might make an easie retreat, and saue themselves from any sudden perill. It may well seeme strange, that whereas their barbarous manner of gouernment had brought them into such danger, they were so far from seeking to obtaine mens goodwill, that contrariwise, to assure themselves of Eleusine, they got all of the place who could beare armes into their hands by a traine, and wickedly (though vnder forme of iustice) murdered them all. But Sceleribus tutum per scelera est iter, the mischiefs which they had already done were such, as left them no hope of going backward, nor any other apparant likelihood of safety, than by extending their cruelty vnto all, seeing few or none were left, whom they could trust. When Thrasylbulus and his fellowes, who as yet were teanned conspirators, had taken the Piræus, then were the three thousand armed againe by the Tyrants, and brought to assault it; but in this enterprise Thrasylbulus had the better, and repelled his enemies, of whom although there were slaine to the number of seuentie onely, yet the victory seemed the greater, because Critias, and one other of the thirty, perished in that fight. The death of Critias, and the stout defence of Piræus, together with some exhortations vsed by Thrasylbulus to the Citizens, wrought such effect, that the thirty were deposed. Neuertheless there were so many of the three thousand, who hauing communicated with the thirty in their misdeeds, feared to be called to a sharpe account, that no peace, nor quiet forme of gouernment could be established. For Embassadors were sent to Sparta, who crauing aide against Thrasylbulus, and his followers, had favourable audience, and a power sent to their assistance, both by Land and Sea, vnder the conduct of Lysander, and his Brother, whom Pausanias the Spartan King did follow, raising an Armie of the Cities confederate with the Lacedemonians. And here appeared first the ialousie, wherein some people held the State of Sparta. The Boeotians, and Corinthians, who in the late warres had beene the most bitter enemies to Athens, refused to follow Pausanias in this expedition; alleging that it stood not with their oathes, to make war against that people, who had not hitherto broken any one article of the league: but fearing, indeede, lest the Lacedemonians should annexe the Territorie of Athens to their owne Demaines. It is not to be doubted, that Pausanias tooke this answere in good part. For it was not his purpose to destroy those against whom he went, but onely to crosse the proceedings of Lysander, whom he enuid. Therefore hauing in some small skirmishes against them of Thrasylbulus his party, made a shew of war, finally wrought such meanes, that all things were composed quietly: the thirty men, & such others, as were like to giue cause of tumults, being sent to Sparta. The remainder of that tyrannicall faction, hauing withdrawn themselves to Eleusine, were shortly after found to attempt some inuolution, whereupon the whole City rising against them, tooke their Captains, as they were coming to Parlie, & slew them: which done, to auoid further inconuenience, a law was made, that all iniuries past should be forgottē, & no man called into question for wrongs committed. By which order, wisely made, & carefully obserued, the City returned to her former quietnes.

and

CHAP. X.

Of the expedition of Cyrus the yonger.

§. I.

The grounds of Cyrus his attempt against his brother.

THE matters of Greece standing vpon such tearmes, that no one to Esteate durst oppose it selfe against that of Lacedemon; young Cyrus, brother to Artaxerxes, King of Persia; having in his thers life time very carefully prosecuted the warre against Athens, did send his messengers to Sparta, requesting that their loue might appeare no lesse to him, than that which hee had shewed towards them in their dangerous war against the Athenians. To this request, being generally the Lacedemonians gave a suitable answere, commanding their Admirall to performe vnto Cyrus all seruice that he should require of him. If Cyrus had plainly discovered himselfe, and the Lacedemonians bent their whole power to his assistance, very like it is, that either the Kingdome of Persia should haue bene the recompence of his deserts; or that he perishing in battaile, as after he did, the subuersion of that Empire had forthwith ensued. But it pleased God, rather to shew vnto the Greekes the wayes, which vnder the Macedonian Ensignes, the victorious foot-steps of their posterity should measure; and opening vnto them the riches, and withall the weakenesse of the Persian, to kindle in them both desire and hope of that conquest, which he referred to another generation; than to giue into their hands that mighty Kingdome, whose houre was not yet come. The loue which Parysatis, the Queen-Mother of Persia bare vnto Cyrus her yonger sonne, being seconded by the earnest fauour of the people, and ready desires of many principall men, had moued this yong Prince, in his fathers old age, to aspire after the succession. But being sent for by his Father (as hath before bene shewed) whose meaning was to curbe this ambitious youth; he found his elder brother Artaxerxes established so surely by the old Kings fauor, that it were not safe to attempt any meanes of displanting him, by whose disfauour, himselfe might easily lose the place of a Viceroy, which he held in Asia the lesse, and hardly be able to maintaine his owne life. The neereft neighbour to Cyrus of all the Kings Deputies in the lower Asia, was Tissaphernes, a man compounded of cowardise, trechery, craft, and all vices which customably branch out of these. This man accompanied Cyrus to his Father, yfing by the way all faire shewes of friendship, as to a Prince, for whom it might well be thought, that Queene Parysatis had obtained the inheritance of that mighty Empire. And it was very true, that Parysatis had vsed the best of her endeuour to that purpose, alleading that (which in former ages had bin much auailable to Xerxes, in the like disceptation with his elder brother) Artaxerxes was borne whilest his father was a priuate man, but Cyrus, when he was a crowned King. All which not sufficing, when the most that could be obtained for Cyrus, was the pardon of some presumptuous demeanour, and confirmation of his place in Lydia, and the parts adioyning: then did this Tissaphernes discover his nature, and accuse his friend Cyrus to the new King Artaxerxes, of a dangerous treason intended against his person. Vpon this accusation, whether true or false, very easily beleueed, Cyrus was arrested, and by the most vehement intreaty of his Mother very hardly deliuered, and sent backe into his owne Prouince.

§. II.

The preparations of Cyrus, and his first entrie into the warre.

THE forme of gouernement which the Persian Lieutenants vsed in their seuerall Prouinces, was in many points almost Regall. For they made War and Peace, as they thought it meete, not onely for the Kings behoofe, but for their owne reputation; vially indeede with the Kings enemies, yet sometimes one with another: which was the more easily tolerated, because their owne heads were held onely at at the Kings pleasure, which caused them to frame all their doings to his will, whatsoeuer it were, or they could coniecture it to be. Cyrus therefore being settled in Lydia, began to consider with himselfe, the interest that he had in the Kingdome; the small assurance of his brothers loue, held onely by his Mothers intercession; the disgrace endured by his late imprisonment; and the meanes which he had by loue of his owne people, and that good neighbourhood of the Lacedemonians, whom he had bound vnto him, to obtaine the Crowne for himselfe. Neither was it expedient that he should long sit idle, as waighting till occasion should present it selfe: but rather enterprise somewhat whilest yet his Mother liued, who could procure a good interpretation to all his actions, if they were no worse than onely questionable. Hereupon he first began to quarrell with Tissaphernes, and seized vpon many Townes of his iurisdiction, annexing them to his owne Prouince, which displeased not Artaxerxes at all, who (besides that he was of condition somewhat simple) being truly paid by Cyrus the accustomed Tributes out of those places, was well contented to see his brothers hot spirit exercised in priuate quarrels. But Tissaphernes, whose base conditions were hated, and cowardize despised, although he durst not adventure to take armes against Cyrus, yet perceiuing that the Milesiens were about to giue vp themselves into the hands of that yong Prince, as many other Townes of the Ionians had done, thought by terror to preserve his reputation, and keepe the Towne in his owne hands. Wherefore he slew many, and many he banished, who flying to Cyrus, were gently entertained, as bringing faire occasion to take armes, which was no small part of his desire. In leuying Souldiers he vsed great policie; for he tooke not onely the men of his owne Prouince, or of the Countreys adioyning, whose liues were ready at his will; but secretly he furnished some Gracian Captaines with money, who being very good men of warre, entertained Souldiers therewith, some of them warring in Thrace, others in Thessalie, others elsewhere in Greece; but all of them ready to crosse the Seas, at the first call of Cyrus, till which time they had secret instructions to prolong their seuerall warres, that the Souldiers might be held in continuall exercise, and ready in armes vpon the sudden. Cyrus hauing sent a power of men to besiege Miletus, forthwith summoned these bands of the Greekes, who very readily came ouer to his assistance, being thirtie thousand very firme Souldiers, and able to make head (which is almost incredible) against the whole power of Artaxerxes. With this Armie, and that which he had leuiued before, he could very easily haue forced Miletus, and chased away Tissaphernes out of Asia the lesse: but his purpose was not so to lose time in small matters, that was to be employed in the accomplishment of higher designes. Pretending therefore that the Pisidians, a people of Asia the lesse, not subiect to the Persian, had inuaded his Territorie, he raised the siege of Miletus, and with all speede marched Eastward, leauing Tissaphernes much amazed, who had no leisure to reioyce that Cyrus had left him to himselfe, when he considered, that so great an Army, and so strong, was neuer leuiued against the Routers of Pisidia, but rather against the great King his Master. For which cause taking a band of sixe hundred horse, he posted away to carry tidings to the Court, of this great preparation.

§. III.

How Cyrus tooke his journey into the higher Asia, and came vp close to his Brother.

THE tumult which his comming brought was very great, and great the exclamations of the Queene Statira, against Parysatis, the Queen-Mother, whom she called the Author and occasioner of the war. But whilest the King in great feare was arming the high Countreys in his defence, the danger fasted vpon him very fast. For Cyrus made great marches, hauing his number much increased, by the repaire of his Countrymen, though most strengthened by the access of seuen hundred Greekes, and of other foure hundred of the same Nation, who revolted vnto him from the King. How terrible the Greekes were to the Barbarians, he found by triall in a Muster, which (to please the Queene of Cilicia, who had brought him aide) he made in Phrygia; where the Greekes by his direction making offer of a charge vpon the rest of his Armie, which contained a hundred thousand men, the whole Campe (not perceiuing that this was but a brauery) fled a-maine, the victuallers and baggagers forsaking their cabbins, and running all away for very feare. This was to Cyrus a ioyfull spectacle, who knew very well, that his brother was followed by men of the same temper, and the more vnlikely to make resistance, because they were prest to the warre against their will and dispositions, whereas his Armie was drawne along by meere affection and good will. Neuerthelesse he found it a very hard matter to perswade the Greekes to passe the Riuer of Euphrates. For the very length of the way which they had troden, wearied them with the conceit of the tedious returne. Therefore he was driuen, being yet in Cilicia, to seeke excuses, telling them, that Abrocomas, one of the Kings principall Captaines, & his owne great enemy, lay by the Riuer, against whom he requested them to assist him. By such deuices, and excessive promise of reward, he brought them to Euphrates, where some of the Greekes considering, That who so passed the Riuer first, should haue the most thanks, and might safely returne if the rest should refuse to follow them; they entred the Foords, whereby were all finally perswaded to doe as some had begun, and being allured by great hopes, they resolu'd to seeke out Artaxerxes, wherefoeuer he was to be found. The King in the meane time hauing raised an armie of nine hundred thousand men, was not so confident vpon this huge multitude, as to aduventure them in triall of a plaine battaile. Abrocomas, who with three hundred thousand men, had vnder-taken to make good the Streights of Syria, which were very narrow, and fortified with a strong wall, and other defences of nature, and art, which made the place to seeme impregnable, had quitted the passage, and retired himselfe toward the Kings forces, not daring to looke Cyrus in the face, who despairing to finde any way by Land, had procured the Lacedamonian fleet, by the benefit whereof to haue transported his Armie. I doe not finde that this cowardlike of Abrocomas, or of his Souldiers, who arrived not at the Campe, till fise dayes were past after the battaile, receiued either punishment, or disgrace; for they, toward whom he with-drew himselfe, were all made of the same mettall.

Therefore Artaxerxes was vpon the point of retiring to the vttermost bounds of his Kingdome, vntill by Teribazus, one of his Capitaines, he was perswaded not to abandon so many goodly Prouinces to the Enemy, who would thereby haue gathered addition of strength, and (which in the sharpe disputation of Title to a Kingdome is most auailable) would haue growne superior in reputation. By such aduice, the King resolu'd vpon meeting with his brother, who now began to be secure, being fully perswaded, that Artaxerxes would neuer dare to abide him in the field. For the King hauing cast vp a Trench of almost fortie miles in length, about thirtie foote broad, and eigheteen foote deepe, intended there to haue encamped: but his courage failing him, he abandoned that place, thinking nothing so safe, as to be farre distant from his enemies.

§. IIII.

The battaile betwene Cyrus and Artaxerxes.

His Armie of Cyrus hauing overcome many difficulties of euill wayes, and scarcity of victuals, was much encouraged by perceiuing this great feare of Artaxerxes, and being past this trench, marched carelesly in great disorder, hauing bestowed their Armes in Carts, and vpon Beasts of carriage; when on the sudden one of their Vaunt-currors, brought newes of the Kings approach. Hereupon with great tumult they armed themselves, and had ranged their battailes in good order vpon the side of the Riuer Euphrates, where they waited for the comming of their enemies, whom they saw not till it was after-noon. But when they saw the cloud of dust raised by the feete of that huge multitude, which the King drew after him, and perceiued by their neere approach how well they were marshalled, comming on very orderly in silence, whereas it had bene expected, that rushing violently with loud clamours, they should haue spent all their force vpon the first brunt; and when it appeared that the fronts of the two Armies were so vnequall in distent, being all embattailed in one body and square, that Cyrus taking his place (as was the Persian manner) in the midst of his owne, did not with the corner, and vntoost point thereof, reach to the halfe breadth of Artaxerxes his battaile, who carried a front proportionable to his number, exceeding nine times that of Cyrus: then did the Greekes begin to distrust their owne manhood, which was not accustomed to make proofe of it selfe, vpon such excessive oddes. It was almost incredible, that so great an Armie should be so easily chased. Neuerthelesse, it quickly appeared, that these Persians, hauing learned (contrary to their custome) to giue charge vpon their enemies with silence, had not learned (for it was contrary to their nature) to receiue a strong charge with courage. Vpon the very first offer of on-set, made by the Greekes, all that beastly rabble of cowards fled amaine, without abiding the stroke, or staying till they were within reach of a Dart. The Chariots armed with hookes and litches (whereof Artaxerxes had two hundred, and Cyrus not twenty) did small hurt that day, because the driuers of them leaping downe, fled away on foot. This base demeanour of his enemies gaue so much confidence to Cyrus, and his Followers, that such as were about him forth-with adored him as King. And certainly, the Title had bene assured vnto him that day, had not he sought how to declare himselfe worthy of it, ere yet he had obtained it. For, perceiuing that Artaxerxes, who found that part of the field which lay before him void, was about to encompass the Greekes, and to set vpon them in the reare, he aduanced with sixe hundred Horse, and gaue so valiant a charge vpon a Squadron of sixe thousand, which lay before the King, that he brake it, slaying the Captaine thereof, Artagesis, with his owne hands, and putting all the rest to flight. Hereupon his whole company of sixe hundred, very few excepted, began to follow the chase, leauing Cyrus too ill attended, who perceiuing where the King stood in troupe, vncertaine whether to fight, or leaue the field, could not containe himselfe, but said; I see the man: and presently with a small handfull of men about him ran vpon his brother, whom he strake through the Gurace, and wounded in the brest. Hauing giuen this stroke, which was his last, he receiued immediately the fatal blow, which gaue period at once to his ambition and life, being wounded vnder the eye with a dart, throwne by a base fellow, where-with astonied, he fell dead from his horse, or so hurt, that it was vnpossible to haue recovered him, though all which were with him, did their best for his safetie; not caring afterwards for their owne liues, when once they perceiued that Cyrus their Master was slaine. Artaxerxes caused the head and right hand of his brother to be forthwith stricken off, and shewed to his people, who now pursuing them, fled apace, calling vpon the name of Cyrus, and desiring him to pardon them. But when this great accident had breathed new courage into the Kings troupes, and utterly dismaied such Persian Capitaines, as were now, euen in their owne eyes, no better than rebels; it was not long ere the Campe of Cyrus was taken, being quite abandoned, from whence Artaxerxes making all speede, arrived quickly at the quarter of the Greekes, which was about three miles from the place where Cyrus fell. There he met with Tissaphernes, who hauing made way through the battaile of the Greekes, was ready now to ioyne with his Master in spoiling their Tents. Had not the newes, which Artaxerxes brought with him of his brothers death, bene sufficient to counteruaile all disasters receiued, the exploit of Tissaphernes in breaking through the Greekes would haue yeelded little comfort. For Tissaphernes had not slaine any one man of the Greekes, but contrariwise, when he gaue vpon them, they opening their battaile, draue him with great slaughter through them, in such wise, that he rather escaped as out of an hard passage, than forced his way through the Squadron of the Greekes. Hercof the King being informed by him, and that the Greekes, as Masters of the field, gaue chase to all that came in their sight; they ranged their Companies into good order, and followed after these Greekes, intending to set vpon them in the reare. But these good Souldiers perceiuing the Kings approach, turned their faces, and made head against him; who not intending to seeke honour with danger of his life, wheeled about and fled, being pursued vnto a certaine Village, that lay vnder a Hill, on the top whereof he made a stand, rather in a brauery, than with purpose to attempt vpon these bold fellows any further. For he knew well that his brothers death had secured his estate, whom he would seeme to haue slaine with his owne hand, thinking that fact alone sufficient to giue reputation to his valour; and this reputation he thought that he might now preferre well enough, shewing a manly looke; halfe a mile off. On the top of this Hill therefore he aduanced his Standard, a golden Eagle displayed on the top of a Spere. This ensigne might haue encouraged his people, had not some of the Greekes espied it, who not meaning that he should abide so neere them, with all their power marched toward him. The King discouering their approach, fled vpon the spurre; so that none remained in the place of battaile, saue onely the Greekes, who had lost that day not one man, nor taken any other harme, than that one of them was hurt with an arrow. Much they wondred that they heard no newes of Cyrus, but thinking that he was pursuing the Armie, they thought it was fittest for them, having that day done enough, to returne to their quarter, and take their Supper, to which they had good appetite, because the expectation of the Kings comming had given them no leisure to dine.

§. V.

The hard estate of the Greekes after the fight; and how Artaxerxes in vaine sought to haue made them yeelde vnto him.

IT was now about the setting of the Sunne, and they bringing home darke night with them, found their Campe spoiled, little, or nothing being left, that might serue for foode: so that wanting victuals to satisfie their hunger, they refreshed their weary bodies with sleepe. In the meane season Artaxerxes returning to his Campe, which he entred by Torch-light, could not enioy the pleasure of his good fortune entire, because he perceived that the basenesse of his people, and weakenesse of his Empire, was now plainly discovered to the Greekes: which gaue him assurance, that if any of these who had beheld the shamefull demeanor of his Armie, should liue to carry tidings home, it would not be long, ere with greater forces they disputed with him for his whole Signorie. Wherefore he resolved, to try all meanes, whereby he might bring them to destruction, and not let one escape to carry tidings of that which he had seene: to which purpose he sent them a braue message the next morning; Charging them to deliuer vp their Armes, and come to his Gates, to awaite there vpon his Mercie. It seemes that he was in good hope to haue found their high courages broken, vpon report of his brothers death: but he was greatly deceiued in that thought. For the Greekes being aduertised that morning from Arius, a principall Commander vnder Cyrus, that his Master being slaine, he had retired himselfe to the place of their last encamping, about eight miles from them, whence intending to returne into Ionia, his meaning was to dislodge the next day, awaiting for them so long if they would ioyne with him, but resolving to stay no longer: they sent answer backe to Arius, that hauing beaten the King out of the field, and finding none that durst resist them, they would place Arius himselfe in the Kings Throne, if he would ioyne with them; and pursue the victory. Before they received any reply to this answer, the Messengers of Artaxerxes arriued at the Campe, whose errand seemed to the Captaines very insolent: One told them, that it was not for the Vanquishers to yeelde their Weapons; another, that he would dye ere he yeelded to such a motion; a third asked, whether the King, as hauing the victory, required their Weapons; if so, why did he not fetch them? or, whether he desired them in way of friendship, for then would they first know, with what courtesie he meant to requite their kindnesse. To this question Phalimus a Gracian, waiting vpon Tissaphernes, answered; That the King hauing slaine Cyrus, knew no man that could pretend any Title to his Kingdome, in the midst whereof he held them fast enclosed with great Rivers, being able to bring against them such numbers of men, as they wanted strength to kill if they would hold vp their throats, for which cause he accounted them his prisoners. These words, to them, who knew themselves to be free, were nothing pleasant. Therefore, one told Phalimus, that hauing nothing left, but their Armes and Valour, whilst they kept their Armes, their Valour would be seruiceable; but should they yeelde them, it was to be doubted, that their bodies would not long remaine their owne. Hereat Phalimus laughed, saying; This young man did seeme a Philosopher, and made a pretty speech; but that his deepe speculation shewed his wits to be very shallow, if he thought with his Armes and Valour, to preuaile against the great King. It seemes that Phalimus being a Courtier, and employed in a businesse of importance, thought himselfe too profound a States-man, to be chektr in his Embassage by a bookish discourser. But his wisdom here failed him. For whatsoeuer he himselfe was (of whom no more is knowne than that he brought an vn honest message to his owne Countreinen, perfwading them basely to surrender their Weapons, and Lives, to the mercilesse Barbarians) this young Scholler by him despised, was that great Xenophon, who, when all the principall Commanders were surprised by treacherie of the Persians, being a priuate Gentleman, and hauing neuer seene the warres before, vnder-tooke the conduct of the Armie, which he brought safe into Greece, freeing it from all those, and from greater dangers than Phalimus could propound. Some there were who promised to be faithfull to the King, as they had beene to Cyrus, offering their their seruice in Egypt, where they thought Artaxerxes might haue vse of them. But the finall answer was, That without Weapons they could neither doe the King good as Friends, nor defend themselves from him as Enemies. Hereupon Phalimus deliuered the Kings further pleasure, which was to grant them Truce, whilst they abode where they then were, denouncing Warre if they stirred thence; Whereunto he required their answer. Clearchus the Generall told him, they liked it. How (saith Phalimus) must I vnderstand you? as choosing peace if we stay, or otherwise warre, said Clearchus. But whether warre or peace? quoth this politike Embassadour. To whom Clearchus (not willing to acquaint him with their purpose,) Let our doings tell you; and so dismissed him, no willer than he came. All that day the Greekes were faine to feede vpon their Horses, Ases, and other Beasts, which they rosted with arrowes, darts, and wooden targets, throwne away by the Enemies.

§. VI.

How the Greekes began to returne home-wards.

IT night they tooke their way towards Arius, to whom they came at mid-night, being forsaken by foure hundred foot, and forty horse, all Thracians, who fled ouer to the King, by whom how they were entertained, I doe not finde. Like enough it is that they were cut in pieces; for had they beene kindly vsed, it may well be thought that some of them should haue accompanied Tissaphernes, and serued as Stales to draw in the rest. Arius being of too base a temper, and birth, to thinke vpon seeking the Kingdome for himselfe, with such assistance as might haue giuen it vnto Cyrus, was very well pleased to make couenant with them for mutuall assistance vnto the last: Whereunto both parts hauing sworne, he aduised them to take another way homeward, which should be somewhat longer, yet safer and fitter to relieue them with victuals; than that by which they came. The next day, hauing made a wearisome march, & tired the Soldiers, they found the Kings Armie which had coasted them, lodged in certaine Villages, where they purposed themselves to haue encamped: towards which Clearchus made directly, because he would not seeme by declining them to shew feare, or weakenesse. That the Kings men were contented to remoue, and giue place to their betters, it cannot be strange to any that hath considered their former behauiour; Nor strange, that the Gracians being weary and hungry, and lying among enemies in an vnknown Country, should be very fearefull: but it is almost past beliefe, that the noise which was heard of these poore men, calling one to another tumultuously, as the present condition enforced them to doe, should make the Persians flie out of their Campe, and so affright the great King, that instead of demanding their Armes, he should craue peace of them. The next day very early, came messengers from Artaxerxes, desiring free acceffe for Embassadours, to entertaine of peace. Were it not that such particulars doe best open the quality of the persons, by whom things were managed, I should hold it fitter, to run ouer the generall passages of those times, than to dwell among circumstances. But surely it is a point very remarkable, That when Clearchus had willed the Messengers to bid the King prepare for bataille, because the Greekes (as he said) wanting whereupon to dine, could not endure to heare of truce till their bellies were full; Artaxerxes dissembling the indignity, was contented sweetly to swallow downe this pill, sending them guides, who conducted them to a place where was plenty of victuals to relieue them.

§. VII.

Itherto the Greekes, relying vpon their owne vertue, had rather aduanced their affaires, than brought themselves into any straights or tearmes of disadvantage. But now came vnto them the subtle Foxe Tissaphernes, who circumuening the chiefe Commanders by fine sleights, did mischieuously entrappe them, to the extreme danger of the Armie. He told them, that his Prouince, lying neere vnto Greece, had caused him greatly to desire, that their deliuerance might be wrought by his procurement; knowing well that in time to come, both they, and their Countreinen at home, would not be vnthankfull for such a benefit. Herewithall he forgot not to rehearse the great seruice that he had done to his Master, being the first that aduertised him of Cyrus his intent, and hauing not onely brought him a good strength of men, but in the day of battaile shewed his face to the Greekes, when all others turned their backs: that he, together with the King, did enter their Campe, and gaue chase to the Barbarians that stood on the part of Cyrus. All this (quoth he) did I alledge to the King, entreating that he would giue me leaue to conduct you safe into Greece, in which suite I haue good hope to speede, if you will send a milde answer to him, who hath willed me to aske you, for what cause ye haue borne Armes against him. The Captaines hearing this, were contented to giue gentle words, which Tissaphernes relating to the King, procured (though very hardly as he said) that peace should be granted: the conditions whereof were; That they should passe freely through all the Kings Dominions, paying for that they tooke, and committing no spoile: yet that it should be lawful for them to take victuals by force, in any place that refused to afford them an open Market. Hereupon both parties hauing sworn, the League was concluded, and Tissaphernes returning to the King to take leaue, and end all businesse, came vnto them againe after twenty dayes, and then they set forward. This interim of twenty dayes, which Tissaphernes did spend at the Court, ministered great occasion of mistrust to his new Confederates. For besides his long absence, which alone sufficed to breede doubt, the Brethren, and Kindred of Arius, repairing daily to him, and other Persians to his Souldiers, did worke him and them forth assurance of pardon, and other allurements, that he daily grew more strange to the Greekes, than formerly he had beene. This caused many to aduise Clearchus, rather to passe forward as well as he might, than to relye vpon couenants, and sit still whilst the King layed snares to entrappe them. But he on the contrary perswaded them, to rest contented whilst they were well, and not to cast themselues againe into those difficulties, out of which they were newly freed by the late Treatie; reciting withall their owne wants, and the Kings meanes, but especially the Oathes mutually giuen and taken, wherewith he saw no reason why the enemy should haue clogged himselfe if he meant mischief, hauing power enough to doe them harme by a faire and open Warre.

Tissaphernes was a very honourable man (if honour may be valued by greatnesse and place in Court) which caused his Oath to be the more esteemed; for as much as no enforcement, or base respect, was like to haue drawne it from him. But his fallhood was such, both in substance and in successe, as may fitly expound that saying, which proceeded from the fountaine of Truth, I hate a rich mans lyar. A lyar may finde excuse when it growes out of feare: for that passion hath his originall from weakenesse. But when Power, which is a Character of the Almighty, shall be made the supporter of vntruth, the fallhood is most abominable; for the offender, like proud Lucifer, aduancing his owne strength against the diuine Iustice, doth commit that sinne with an high hand, which commonly produceth lamentable effects, and is followed with sure vengeance. It was not long ere Tissaphernes found meanes to destroy all the Captaines, whom he subtilly got into his power by a traine; making the Generall Clearchus himselfe the meane to draw in all the rest. The businesse was contriued thus: Hauing trauailed some dayes together in such wise, that the Persians did not encampe with the Greekes, who were very zealous of the great familiarity, appearing betwene Tissaphernes, and Arius; Clearchus thought it convenient to roote out of Tissaphernes his braines all causes of distrust, whereof many had growne in that short time. To which purpose obtaining priuate conference with him, he rehearsed the oath of Confederacie, which had past betwene them, shewing how religiously he would keepe it, and repeating the benefits, which the Greekes did receiue by the helpe of Tissaphernes, he promised that their loue should appeare to him not vnfrankly, if he would make vse of their seruice against the Mysians or Pisidians, who were accustomed to infect his Prouince, or against the Egyptians, who were then Rebels to the great King. For which cause he desired him, that whereas all diuine and humane respects had linked them together, he would not giue place to any close accusation or suspicion, whereby might grow sudden inconuenience to either of them, vpon no iust ground. The faithlesse Persian was very much delighted with this speech, which ministered faire occasion to the execution of his purpose. Therefore he told Clearchus, that all this was by him wisely considered, wishing him further to call to minde how many waies he could haue vsed to bring them to confusion, without perill to himselfe, especially by by burning the country, through which they were to passe, whereby they must needs haue perished by meere famine. For which cause he said that it had beene great folly, to seeke by periturie, odious to God and Man, the destruction of such as were already in his hands: But the truth was, that his owne loue to them had moued him to worke their safety, not onely for those ends which Clearchus had recounted, of pleasures that might redound to himselfe, and the King, by their assistance: but for that hee might by their friendship, hope to obtaine what Cyrus had willed. Finally, he inuicid the credulous General to Supper, and sent him away so well assured of his good will, that he promised to bring all the Captaines with him to the same place, where, in presence of them all, Tissaphernes likewise promised to tell openly, which of them had by secret information sought to raise dissension betwene them. Clearchus himselfe being thus deceived, with great importunitie drew all the chiefe Commanders, and many of the inferiour Leaders, to repaire with him to the Campe of Tissaphernes, whither followed them, about two hundred of the common Souldiers as it had been to some common Faire. But being there arrived, Clearchus with other the five principall Coronels, were called into the Tent, the rest staying without, wherethey had not waited long ere a signe was giuen, vpon which they within were apprehended, and the residue slaine. Forthwith certaine bands of Persian Horse-men scoured the field, killing as many Greekes as they met, and riding vp to the very Campe of the Gracians, who wondred much at the tumult, whereof they knew not the cause, till one, escaping forely wounded, informed them of all that had beene done. Heereupon the Greekes tooke Armes in haste, thinking that the enemy would forthwith haue assailed their Campe. Anon they might perceiue the Embassadors of Tissaphernes, among whom were his owne brother, and Arius, followed with three hundred Horse, who called for the principall men in the Armie, saying, that they brought a message from the King, which Arius deliuered to this effect: That Clearchus hauing broken his faith, and the league made, was iustly rewarded with death; that Menon and Proxenus, two other of the five Coronels, for detecting his treacherie, were highly honored: and finally, that the King required them to surrender their Arms, which were due to him, as hauing belonged vnto his seruant Cyrus. When some altercation had followed vpon this message, Xenophon told the Embassadors, that if Clearchus had in such sort offended, it was well that he was in such sort punished: but hee willed them to send backe Menon and Proxenus, whom they had so greatly honoured, that by then, as by common friends to both Nations, the Greekes might be aduised how to answer the Persian. Hereunto the Embassadors knew not how to frame any reply, and therefore departed without speaking one word more. Clearchus, and the other foure were sent to Artaxerxes, by whose commandement their heads were stricken off. I hold it not amisse to prevent the order of time, annexing to this perfidiousnesse of Tissaphernes, the reward which he afterward receiued. He saw his Prouince waited by the Greekes, against whom receiuing from his Master conuenient aid of men and money, he did so ill manage his affaires, that neither subtiltie, nor periturie (to which he failed not to haue recourse) auailed him; finally, the King was ialous of his cunning head, and sent a new Lieutenant into those parts, who tooke it from his shoulders. Such was the recompence of his treacherie, which made him so mistrusted at home, that the seruice which he could not doe, he was thought vpon priuate ends to neglect; and so hated abroad, that he knew not which way to flee from the stroke, all the word being shut against him. But now let vs returne to the prosperitie, wherein hee triumphed without great cause, hauing betrayed brauer men than himselfe, and intending to bring the like mischief vpon the whole Armie.

§. VIII.

How Xenophon distressed the Greekes, and in despite of Tissaphernes went off safely.

Great was the heavinesse of the Souldiers, being now left destitute of Leaders, and no lesse their feare of the cuill hanging ouer their heads, which they knew not well how to auoid. Among the rest, Xenophon, whose learning supplied his want of experience, finding the deepe sadnesse of the whole Armie to be such as hindered them from taking any course of preventing the danger at hand, began to aduise the under-Officers of Proxenus his companies, whose familiar friend he had beene, to be-think themselves of some meane, whereby their safety might be wrought, and the Souldiers encouraged: setting before their eyes whatsoeuer might serue for to giue them hope, and about all, perswading them in no wise to yeeld to the mercy of their barbarous enemies.

Hereupon they desired him to take vpon him the charge of that Regiment; and so together with him, the same night calling vp such as were remaining of any account, they made choice of the fittest men to succeed in the places of those who were slaine, or taken. This being done, and order set downe for disburdening the Armie of all superfluous impediments, they easily comforted themselves for the losse of Tissaphernes his assistance, to hoping to take victuals by force better cheape than he had beene wont to sell them; To which purpose they intended to take vp their lodging two or three miles further, among some plentifull Villages, and so to proceed, marching towards the heads of those great Riuer, which lay in their way, and to passe them where they were foordable. Many attempts were made vpon them by Tissaphernes, whom they, seruing all on foot, were not able to requite for the harme which they receiued by the Persian Archers, who shot at a farther distance than the Greekes could reach. For this cause did Xenophon provide slings, wherewith hee ouer-reached the enemy, and finding some Horses fit for seruice, that were employed among the carriages, he set men vpon them, training likewise his Archers to shoot compass, who had been accustomed to the point blanke. By these meanes did he beare off the Persians who assailed him, and sometimes gaue them chase with that band of fittie Horse, which being well backt with a firme bodie of footmen, and seconded with troupes of the light-armed-shot & slingers, compelled the enemy to lie a-loof. Tissaphernes not daring to come to handie-gripes with these resolute men, did possesse the tops of Mountaines, and places of aduantage, by which they were to passe. But finally, when their valour made way through all such difficulties, he betooke himselfe to that course, which was indeed the surest, of burning the Countrey. With great sorrow did the Greekes behold the Villages on fire, and thereby all hope of victuals cut off. Some aduised to defend the Countrey, as granted by the enemy himselfe to be theirs; others to make more fires, if so perhaps the Persians might be affrighted to doe that which was the desire of such as made passage in hostile manner; But these were faint comforts. The best counsaile was, that being neere vnto the Carduchi, a people enemy to the Persian, they should enter into their Countrey, passing ouer some high mountaines which lay betwene them. This cause they followed, which could not haue auailed them, if Tissaphernes had begun sooner to cut off their victuals, rather then to seeke to force, or to circumuent them by his fine wit.

The difficulties which the Greeke Armie found in passing through the Land of the Carduchi.

Entring vpon the Land of the Carduchi, they were encountred with many difficulties of waies, but much more afflicted by the fierce Inhabitants, who, accustomed by force to defend themselves against the huge Armies of the Persians, were no way inferiour to the Greekes in daring, but only in the Art of Warre. They were very light of foot, skilfull Archers; and vsed the Sling well; which weapons in that mountainous Countrey were of much vse against these poore traouellers, afflicting them in seuen daies which they spent in that passage, farre more than all the power of the great King had done. Betwene the Territorie of these Carduchi, and the parts of Armenia confining them, ranne Centrites a great Riuer, vpon which the Greekes rested themselves one day, reioicing that they had so well escaped these dangers, and hoping that the remainder would prooue easie. But the next morning they saw certaine troupes of Horse, that lay to forbid their passage. These were leauied by the Kings deputies in those parts; Tissaphernes and his Companies hauing taken their way towards Ionia. The Riuer was broad and deepe, so that it was not possible for such as would enter it, to make resistance against those which kept the opposite bankes. To increase these dangers the Carduchi following vpon them, lay on the side of a Mountaine, within lesse than a mile of the water. But it was their good hap to discouer a Foord, by which the greater number of them passing ouer, did easily chase away the Subiects of the Persian, and then sending backe the most expedite men, gaue succour to the Reare-ward, against which the Carduchi being slightly armed, could not on plaine ground make resistance hand to hand. These Carduchi seeme to haue inhabited the Mountaines of Niphates, which are not farre from the Spring of Tygris; though Ptolomie place them far more to the East vpon the Riuer of Cyrrus in Media, wherein he differs much from Xenophon, whose relation being grounded vpon his owne knowledge, doth best in this case deserue credit. Of the Riuer Centrites (as of many other Riuer, Townes, and Places, mentioned by Xenophon) I will not labour to make a coniecture, which may endure the seuerity of a Criticke. For Ptolomie, and the whole Nation of Geographers, adde small light to this expedition: onely of this last, I thinke it the same which falleth into Tygris, not much about Artaxagarta springing out of Niphates, and running by the Towne of Sardena in Gordene, a Prouince of Armenia the Great, wherein the Greekes hauing passed Centrites did arrive.

§. X.

How Teribazus Governour of Armenia, seeking to entrap the Greekes with termes of fained peace, was disappointed and shamefully beaten.

The Armie finding in Armenia good prouision, marched without any disturbance about fittie or threecore miles to the heads of the Riuer Tygris, and passing ouer them, traualled as farre further without resistance, till they were encountred by Teribazus at the Riuer Teleboa, which Xenophon commends as a goodly water, though small, but Ptolomie and others omit it. Teribazus gouerned that Countrey for the Persian, and was in great fauor with Artaxerxes, whose Court may seeme to haue been a Schoole where the Art of fallshood was taught as wisdom. He desired peace of the Greekes, which was made vpon this condition, that they should take what they pleased, but not burne downe the Townes and Villages in their way. As soone as he had made this league, he leauied an Armie, and besetting the Streights of certaine Mountaines which they were to passe, hoped well to make such benefit of their security, as might giue him the commendation of being no lesse craftily dishonest than Tissaphernes. Yet his cunning failed of successe. For a great snow fell, which caused the Greekes to make many fires, and scatter themselves abroad in the Villages. Teribazus also made many fires, and some of his men wandred about seeking reliefe. By the fires he was discovered, and by a Souldier of his that was taken prisoner, the whole plot was reuealed. Hereupon the Greekes, taking this captiue with them for a guide, sought him out, and comming vpon his Campe, did so affright him, that before the whole Armie could arriue there, the shout which was raised by the Vaunt-currors, chased him away. They tooke his Pavilion, wherein besides many slaues, that were Artificers of voluptuousnesse, very rich furniture was left by the treacherous coward, who returned no more to challenge it. From hence the Armie went Northward, and passing Euphrates, not farre below the springs thereof, traualled with much difficulty through deepe snow, being followed aloofe by the enemy, who durst not approach them, but did cut off such as they found stragling behinde. The Inhabitants of the Countrey, through which they marched, had their wintering houles vnder ground, wherein was found great plentie of victuals, and of cattails, which likewise did winter in the same Cellars with the owners. Hauing refreshed themselves in those parts, and taken sufficient ease after the miserable iourney, which had consumed many of them with extreme cold; they departed, leading with them many bond-slaues, and taking away (besides other Horses and Cattails) some Cols that were bred vp for the great King.

§. XI.

The passage of the Armie to Trabizonde, through the Countreies bordering vpon the Riuer of Phasis, and other obscure Nations.

Without impediment they came to the Riuer Phasis, neere whereunto the people called Phasiens Taochi, and Chalybes were seated. These Nations ioyned together, and occupying the tops of a ledge of Mountaines, which the Greekes were were

were to passe, made countenance of warre: but some companies being sent by night to feize vpon a place of equall height to that whereon the enemies lay, making good the piece of ground which they had taken, secured the ascent of the rest; which caused these people to flye, euery one retyring to the defence of his owne. The first vpon whose Countre the Greekes did enter were the Turchi, who conuaying all their prouision of victuals into strong holds, brought the Armie into much want, vntill with hard labour one place was forced, wherein great store of cattails were taken; the people, to auoide captiuitie, threw themselves head-long downe the rockes, the very women throwing downe first their owne children, and then casting themselves vpon them. Here was taken a great bootie of Cattails, which serued to feede them, traouiling through the land of the Chalybes, of whom they got nothing but stroakes. The Chalybes were a very stout Nation, well armed at all points, and exceeding fierce. They encountered the Greekes hand to hand, killing as many as they tooke prisoners, and cutting off their heads, which they carried away, singing and dancing, to the great griefe of their companions liuing; who were glad, when after seauen dayes journey they escaped from those continuall skirmishes, wherewith they had bene vexed by these Barbarians. Hence traouiling through a good corne Countre, inhabited by an obscure Nation called the Scythini, they came to a rich Towne, the Lord whereof, and of the Region adioyning, vied them friendly, and promised to guide them to a Mountaine, whence they might discouer the Euxine-Sea. From Gymnias (which was the name of his Towne) he led them through the Territorie of his enemies, desiring them to waste it with sword and fire. After five dayes march, they came to a Mountaine called Teches, being (as I thinke) a part of the Mountaines called Moschici, whence their guide shewed them the Sea; towards which they bent their course, and passing friendly through the Region of the Macrones, (with whom by means of an interpreter, found among themselves, who borne in that place had bene sold into Greece, they made a good peace) they arrived in the Land of Colchos, wherein stands the Citie of * Trabizond, called then Trapezus, a Colonie of the Greekes. The Colchi entertaining them with hostilitie, were requited with the like; for the Armie hauing now good leisure to repose themselves among their friends the Trapezuntians, did spoile the Countre thirte dayes together, forbearing onely the Borderers vpon Trabizonde, at the Citizens request.

* Trabizond a Colonie of the Greekes, situate in the bottome of the Euxine-Sea.

§. XII.

How the Armie began at Trabizond to provide a Fleet, wherewith to returne home by Sea: how it came into the Territorie of Sinope, and there prosecuted the same purpose.

HAuing now found an Hauen Towne, the Souldiers were desirous to take shipping, & change their tedious Land-iournies into an easie Navigation. To which purpose Cherisophus a Lacedemonian, one of the principall Commanders, promised by means of Anaxibius the Lacedemonian Admirall, who was his friend, that he would prouide Vessels to imbarke them. Hauing thus concluded, they likewise tooke order for the staying of such ships as should passe that way, meaning to vse them for their navigation. Left all this prouision should be found insufficient for the transportation of the whole Armie, Xenophon perswaded the Cities adioyning to cleare the wayes, and make an easie passage for them by Land; whereunto the Souldiers were vterly unwilling to giue eare, being desirous to returne by Sea; but the Countre fearing what inconuenience might grow by their long stay, did readily condescend to Xenophons request. Two ships they borrowed of the Trapezuntians, which they manned and sent to Sea: the one of them sailed directly into Greece, forsaking their Companions, who had put them in trust to bring ships into the Port of Trabizonde: the other tooke Merchants and passengers, whose goods were safely kept for the owners, but the Vessels were staid to increase the fleet. After long abode, when victuals began to faile, by reason that all the Land of the Colchi, neere vnto the Campe was already quite wasted, they were faine to imbarke their sicke men, with the women, children, and such of the baggage as might best be spared, in those few ships which they had already prouided. The rest of the Armie tooke their way by Land to Cerasus, a Greece Towne, where the fleet likewise arrived. Here the Armie being mustered, was found to consist of eight thousand and six hundred men. From hence they passed through the Countre of the * Mosynaci, who were divided into factions. The stronger partie, despising their friendship, caused them to ioyne them with the weaker, whom they left Masters of all.

The next place of their abode was Colyera, a Greece Towne likewise, and a Colonie of the Sinopians, as Trapezus and Cerasus were; but the entertainment which here they found was very churlish, hauing neither an open Market afforded to them, nor the sicke men that were among them admitted into any house. Heereupon the Souldiers entered the Towne by force, and (committing no outrage) bestowed those which were sicke in convenient lodgings, taking into their owne hands the custody of the Gates. Prouision for the Armie they made by strong hand, partly out of the Territorie of the Paphlagonians, partly out of the Lands belonging to the Towne. These newes were welcome to Sinope, whence Embassadours were sent to the Camp, who complaining of these dealings, and threatening to ioyne with the Paphlagonians, if redresse could not otherwise be had, were roundly answered by Xenophon, That meer necessity had enforced the Army to reach those of Colyera good manners in so bad a methode; letting them know, that he feared not to deale with them and the Paphlagonians at once; though perhaps the Paphlagonians would be glad to take Sinope it selfe, to which, if cause were giuen, they would lend assistance. Vpon this answer the Embassadours grew better aduised, promising all friendship that the State of Sinope could shew, and commanding the Towne of Colyera to relieue the Souldiers as well as they might. Further, they promised to assist them with shipping, letting them vnderstand how difficult the passage by Land would proue, in regard of the many and great Riuers, as Thermodon, Iris, Halys, and Parthenius, which crossed their way. This good counsaile, and the faire promises accompanying it, were kindly accepted by the Armie, which well perceiued, that the City of Sinope would spare for no cost, to be freed from such a neighbourhood. It was therefore decreed that they would passe the rest of the way by Sea; provided that if there should want such number of Vessels as might serue to imbarke euery one of them, then would they not put from the shore.

Colyera a Port-Towne in the same Region.

Sinope a Port-Towne in Leucosyria, a Colonie of the Mysians.

§. XIII.

Of dissension which arose in the Armie; and how it was imbarked.

In the danger of enemies, and miseries of weather and wants, had kept the companie in firmenitie; which now beganne to dissolve and to thaw, by the neighbouring aire of Greece, warming their heads with priuate respects to their severall ends and purposes. Whilest they, who were sent as Agents from the Campe, remained at Sinope; Xenophon considering the strength and valour of his men, and the opportunitye of the coast whereon they lay, thought it would be an honourable worke to build a City in those parts, which were soone like to proue great and wealthie, in regard both of their owne puissance, and of the great repaire of the Greekes into that quarter. For this cause he made sacrifice, according to the superstition of his time and Countre, diminishing of his successe by the entrailes of beasts. The Sooth-sayer whom he employed had received a great reward of Cyrus, for coniecturing aright, that Artaxerxes would not giue battaile in ten daies: he therefore, hauing preferred his money carefully, was desirous to be soone at home, that hee might freely enioy his gettings. By him the purpose of Xenophon was divulged, which was interpreted according to the diuersitie of mens opinions; some approving the motion, but the greater part reiecting it. They of Sinope and Heraclea, being informed of this consultation, were sore afraid, lest the pouertie of the Souldiers, who had not wherewith to maintaine themselves at home, should giue successe to the proiect. Which to preuent, they promised to supply the Armie with a sufficient fleet, and likewise offered money to some of the Capitaines, who thereupon undertooke to giue the Souldiers pay, if they would presently set saile for Greece. One of these Capitaines being a banished man, desired them to follow him into Troas; another offered to leade them into Cherronesus. Xenophon who desired onely the common good, was pleased greatly with these propositions, and protested openly that hee would haue them to set forward, and hold together in any case, punishing him as a traitor that should forsake the Armie, before such time as they were arrived at their iournies end. Silanus the Sooth-sayer, who had vttered Xenophons purpose, was heereby staid from outrunning his fellowes, and driuen to abide with his wealth among poore men, longer than stood stood with his good liking. Also the other Captaines were much troubled and afraid, when they perceived, that ships were prepared sufficient for their Navigation, but that the money promised to them, and by them to the Souldiers, came not. For the people of Sinope, and Heraclea, knowing that the Armie was now resolved for the voyage, and that Xenophon, whom they feared, had perswaded them to this resolution, thought it the wisest way to furnish them with a Naue whilst they were in good readinesse to depart, but to keepe the money to themselves. The Captaines therefore who being disappointed by these Townes, found themselves in great danger of their men, whom they had deceived with faire hopes, repented much of their faire offers, and signifying as much to Xenophon, prayed him to make proposition to the Armie, of taking the ships, and saying to Phasis, where they might seize vpon Lands, and plant themselves in such wise as should stand best with their good liking. But finding him cold in the businesse, they began to worke the principall of their owne followers, hoping by them to draw in all the rest. These newes becoming publike, bred a suspicion of Xenophon, as if he had won the rest of the Captaines to his purpose, and meant now to carry the Army quite another way from their owne home. Wherefore assembling the Companies, he gaue them satisfaction, and withall complained of some disorders which he caused them to redresse: A generall inquisition was likewise made of offences committed since the death of Cyrus; which being punished, all things were in quiet. Shortly after came Embassadors from Corylas, Lord of the Paphlagonians, who sending presents desired peace of the Greeks: the Embassadors were friendly entertained, and peace concluded, which needed not to haue beene sought, for that the Greeks hauing now their fleet in a readinesse, did soone weigh Anchors, and set saile for Harmene the Port of Sinope, whither Cherisophus came, bringing with him a few Gallies from the Admiral Anaxibius, who promised to giue the Army pay as soone as they came into the parts of Greece.

§. XIII.

Another great dissension and distraction of the Armie. How the mutiners were beaten by the Barbarians, and rescued by Xenophon.

HHe neuer that they approached to Greece, the greater was their desire to make provision for themselves, that they might not returne home empty-handed. Wherefore trusting well that if the charge of the Armie were absolutely committed to one sufficient man, he might the more conueniently procure the good of them all, they determined to make Xenophon sole Commander of all; in whose fauour as well the Captaines as the common Souldiers were very earnest and violent. But he, either fearing to displease the Lacedaemonians, who were ialous of him already (being incensed by that fugitiue who forsooke the Army at Trabizond, flying with one of their two ships) or moved by some tokens appearing to him in the entrails that threatned ill successe to his gouernment, procured with vehement contention, that this honour was laied vpon Cherisophus a Lacedaemonian. It seemes that Xenophon, considering the vexation incident to the conduct of a voluntary Armie, wanting pay, did wisely in yeelding to such tokens as forbad him to accept it: especially, knowing so well their desire, which was by right or by wrong to get wealth wherefoeuer it might be found, without all regard of Friend or Foe. Cherisophus had bene Generall but fixe or seauen dayes, when he was deposed, for hauing bene vnwilling to rob the Towne of Heraclea which had sent presents to the Campe, and bene very beneficiall vnto them in lending ships for their transportation. Two daies they had sailed by the coast of Asia, when being past those great Riues, which would haue giuen impediment to their iourney by Land, they touched at Heraclea, where consulting how to take their way onwards: whether by Land or Sea, one seditious man began to put them in minde of seeking to get somewhat for themselves, telling them that all their provision would be spent in three dayes, and that being now come out of the enemies Countrie, victuals and other necessaries could not be had without money; for which cause he gaue aduice to send messengers into the Towne of Heraclea, giuing the Citizens to vnderstand what their wants were, and demanding of them three thousand pieces of money, called Cyzicens, which summe amounteth to two thousand and five hundred pound sterling, or thereabout. This motion was greatly applauded, and the sum raised to ten thousand Cyzicens at least: which to require, they thought Cherisophus, as being Generall, the fittest man; others had more desire to send Xenophon: but in vaine, for they both refused it, and renounced the action as dishonest. Left therefore either of these should faile in managing the businesse which agreed not with his disposition, others of more impudency and lesse discretion were sent, who in such wise deliuered their insolent message; that the Citizens taking time to deliberate vpon their request, brought what they could out of the fields into the Towne, and shutting the Gates, did forthwith man the walls. When the Souldiers perceived themselves to be disappointed of their rauencous purpose, they fell to mutiny, saying, That their Leaders had betrayed them: and being for the more part of them Arcadians and Acheans, they forsooke immediately Cherisophus and Xenophon, choosing new Leaders out of their owne number. About foure thousand and five hundred they were, all heauily armed, who electing ten Captaines, sailed into the Port of Calphas, which is in the mid-way betwene Heraclea and Bizantium, with purpose to assaile the Bythinians on the suddaine. With Cherisophus there abode two thousand and one hundred, of whom one thousand and foure hundred were armed weightily: Xenophon had two thousand foot, three hundred whereof were lightly armed, and fortie horse, which small band had done good seruice already, and could not haue bene spared now. Cherisophus had agreed with Cleander Gouverneur of Bizantium, to meet him at the mouth of the River Calphas, whither Cleander promised to bring some Gallies to conuey him ouer into Greece, for which cause he tooke his way thither by Land, leauing to Xenophon such shipping as he had; who passing some part of the way by Sea, landed vpon the Confines of Heraclea, and Thracia Asiatica, intending to make a cut through the mid-land-Countrie to the Propont. The Mutiners, who had landed at Calphas by night, with purpose to take spoiles in Bythinia, diuided themselves into ten Companies, euery Captaine leading his owne Regiment into some Village, five or fixe miles from the Sea, in the greater Townes were two Regiments quartered; and so was that part of the countrie surprised on the suddaine, and sacked all at one time. The place of Rendezous was an high peece of ground, where some of them arriued, finding no disturbance; others, not without much trouble and danger, two Companies were broken and defeated, onely eight men escaped, the rest were all put to the sword. For the Thracians which had slipt at first out of the Souldiers hands, did raise the Countrie, & finding the Greeks laden with bootie, took the aduantage of their disorder, cutting in pieces those two Regiments: which done, they attempted the rest, encompassing the hill wheron they encamped. One great aduantage the Thracians had, that being all light armed, they could at pleasure make retrait from these Arcadians & Acheans: who wanting the assistance of horse, & hauing neither Archers nor Slingers among them, were driuen to stand mecrely vpon their defence, bearing off with greater danger, & many wounds received, the Darts and Arrows of the Barbarians, till finally they were driuen from their watering place, and enforced to craue parly. Whatsoeuer the articles of composition were, the Thracians yeelded to all; but pledges for assurance they would giue none, without which the Greeks well knew, that all promises of such people, especially so incensed, were nothing worth. In the meane time Xenophon holding his way quietly through the In-land Region, did enquire of some Trauailers whether they knew ought of any Gracia Army, passing along those parts: & receiuing by them true information of the desperate case into which these Gallars had foolishly throwne themselves, he marched directly towards the place where they lay, taking with him for guides them who gaue him the intelligence. His horse-men he sent before to discover, & to scowre the wayes; the light-armed foot-men took the hill tops on either hand, all of them setting fire on whatsoeuer they found combustible; whereby the whole Countrie seemed to be on a light flame, to the great terror of the enemies, who thought that some huge Armie had approached. That night he encamped on a hill, within five mile of the Arcadians, encreasing still the number of his fires, which he caused hastily to be quenched soone after Supper. The enemies perceiuing this, thought certainly that he would haue fallen vpon them in the darke, which caused them in all haste to dislodge. Early in the next morning Xenophon comming thither in very good order, to haue giuen bataille, found that his deuice, to affright the Thracians, had taken full effect; but he marvelled that the Greeks were also departed, concerning whom he learned by enquiry, that they remoued at break of day, and perceived by signes that they had taken the way to the Port of Calphas, in which iourney he ouertooke them. They embraced Him, and His, with great ioy: Confessing that they themselves had thought the same which the enemies did, looking that he should haue come by night; wherein finding themselves deceived, they were affraid lest he had forsaken them, and therefore hastened away, to ouertake him, and ioyned with him. So they arriued at the Hauens of Calpas, where it was decreed, That whosoever from thenceforth made any motion to disioyne the Armie, should suffer death.

§. XV.

Of diuers pieces of seruice done by Xenophon, and how the Armie returned into Greece. The occasions of the Warre betwene the Lacedemonians and the Persian.

THE Hauens of Calpas lay vnder a goodly head-land, that was very strong, and abounding with all kinde of Graine and Fruits, except Oliues. There was also Timber for building and shipping, and a very conuenient sea for a great Citie. All which commodities, that might haue allured the Souldiers to stay there, and to plant, caused them to haste away, fearing lest Xenophon should finde some deuice to haue sciled himselfe and them in that place. For the greater part of them had good meanes to liue at home; neither did they so much for hope of gaine follow Cyrus in that Warre, as in regard of his Honour, and the loue which they bare vnto him: the poorer sort were such as left their Parents, Wiues, and Children, to whom (though failing of the riches which they had hoped to purchase) they were now desirous to returne. But whether it were so that Xenophon found aduantage by their owne superstition, to make them stay, which they greatly suspected; or whether the signes appearing in the entrails, did indeede forbid their departure: so long they were enforced to abide in the place till vicinals failed; neither would the Captaines lead them forth to forrage the Countrey, vntill the Sacrifices should promise good successe. Cherisophus was dead of an Ague, and his ships were gone, being returned to the Heracleans, of whom they were borrowed. His followers were ioyned to the rest of the Armie, which the greater it was, the more prouision it needed, and the sooner felt want. For which cause, he that was chosen Coronell into the place of Cherisophus, would needes aduventure to gratifie the Souldiers with the spoile of some Villages that stood neere at hand; in which enterprise he found ill successe, the whole Countrey lying in waite to entrap him, and an Armie of Horse being sent by Pharnabazus the Satrapa, or Vice-roy of Phrygia, to the assistance of these Bythinian Thracians, which troupes falling vpon the Greekes that were scattered abroad in seeking bootie, slew siue hundred of them, and chased the rest to a certaine Mountaine there by. The newes of this ouerthrow comming to Xenophon, he led forth a part of the Armie to the rescue of those that were sicke, and brought them safe to the Campe; vpon which the Bythinians made an offer that night, and breaking a Corps du garde, slew some, pursuing the rest to the very Tents. This new courage of the enemy, together with the present condition of the Armie, so disheartened and vnfurnished of necessities, caused the Greekes to remoue their Campe to a place of more strength; which hauing intrenched, and committed to the defence of such as were least able to endure trauaile, Xenophon with the firmest and best able men went forth, both to burie those which were lately slaine, and to abate the pride of the Thracians, and their assistants. In this iourney his demeanour was very honourable. For hauing giuen buriall to the dead, the Enemy was discovered, lying on the tops of the Hills adioyning, to whom (notwithstanding that the way was very rough, and troublesome, so that some thought it a matter of too great danger, to leaue at their backs a wood scarce passeable) he marched directly, telling his men plainly, that he had rather follow the enemy with halfe the number, than turne his back to them with twice as many; and letting them further know, that if they did not charge the Barbarians, he would not faile with the greater resolution to pursue them, from whom if they could safely retire to the campe, yet what should they doe there, wanting victuals to sustaine them in the place, and ships, to carrie them away? Wherefore he willed them rather to fight well that day, hauing eaten their dinners, than another day fasting; and not to regard the vn easie returne, which might serue to stay Cowards from running away, but to wish vnto the Enemy a faire and easie way, by which he might flye from them. These perswasions were followed with so valiant execution, that both Persians and Bythinians being chased out of the field, abandoned the Countrey forthwith, remouing their Families, and leauing all that could not sodainly be conueighed away, to the discretion of the Greekes, who at good leisure gathered the harvest of these bad Neighbours fields. This was the last fight which they had on the side of Asia. For they were not onely suffered quietly to enioy the spoile of the Countrey, but when the opinion grew common in those parts, that it was the intent of Xenophon to plant a Colonie on the Port of Calpas, Embassadors were sent from the Neighbour people, to desire friendship, and make offer of their best assistance. But the Souldiers had no minde to stay. Wherefore entering further into Bythinia, they tooke a great bootie, which they carried away to Chrysopolis, a Citie neere vnto Chalcedon, where they sold it. Pharnabazus, Lieutenant in Phrygia to Artaxerxes, did greatly feare, lest their long stay in that Countrey might breede in them a desire to visite his Prouince, where they might haue found great wealth, and little power to guard it. Therefore he sent to the Lacedemonian Admirall, entreating him with much instance and large promises to waite them ouer into Europe; to whom Anaxibius the Admirall condescending, promised to giue the Souldiers pay, as soone as they arriued at Bizantium. So were they carried out of Asia at the intreatie of the Persian, who in the height of his pride had thought them so surely imprisoned with mighty Riuers, that he not onely denied to permit their quiet departure, but willed them to surrender their Armes into his hands, and so to yeeld their liues to his discretion. How discourteously they were intreated by Anaxibius, and how to requite his iniurious dealings, they seized vpon Bizantium, which by Xenophon persuasion they forbore to sacke, I hold it superfluous to relate. For the residue of their doings appertaine little to the generall course of things. But this expedition, as in all ages it was glorious, so did it both discouer the secrets of Asia, and stirre vp the Greekes to thinke vpon greater enterprises, than euer their forefathers had vndertaken. Likewise it was the onely remarkable action which the time afforded. For the Roman warres did hitherto extend no further than to the next neighbouring Townes of Italie; and in Greece all things were quiet, the Lacedemonians ruling insolently, but without disturbance. True it is, that the seedes of the Warre shortly following, which the Lacedemonians made vpon Artaxerxes, were already sowne, before these companies returned out of the high Countreies of Asia. For the Townes of Ionia, which had sided with young Cyrus against Tissaphernes, if not against the great King, prepared to rebell; which they thought safer, than to fall into the hands of Tissaphernes, who was now appointed Lieutenant, both of his old Prouince, and of all that had belonged to Cyrus. Wherefore the Ionians besought the Lacedemonians to send them aide, whereby to recouer their libertie, and obtained their request. For a power was sent ouer, vnder conduct of Thimbro a Spartan, who bestowed his men in such Townes as had already reuolted, to secure the Cities and their Fields, but not to make any offensive Warre.

CHAP. XI.

Of the affaires of Greece, whilest they were managed by the Lacedemonians.

§. I.

THE Lacedemonians did well perceiue in how ill part Artaxerxes tooke their fauour shewed vnto his brother, and yet were timorous in beginning an open warre against him, thinking it sufficient to take care that no aduantage might slip, which could serue to strengthen their Estate, by finding the Persian worke beyond the Sea. But when Xenophon his Armie had reuealed the basenesse of those effeminate Asiaticques, and rehearsed the many victories which they themselves had gotten, vpon terms of extreame disaduantage; then was all Greece filled with desire of vnder-taking vpon this huge vnweildie Empire, thinking it no hard matter for the ioyned forces forces of that whole Nation, to hew out the way to Susa, whereof one handfull had opened the passage to Babylon, and further, finding no power that was able to giue them resistance, in all that long iourney of foure and thirty thousand two hundred and fifty five furlongs, spent in going and returning, which make of English miles about foure thousand two hundred foure score and one, a very painefull march of one yeere and three moneths. Neuerthelesse the ciuill distraction wherewith Greece was miserably torne, and especially that hot fire of the Theban Warre, which, kindled with Persian gold, brake forth sodainly into a great flame, drew backe out of Asia the power of the Lacedaemonians, to the defence of their owne Estate; leauing it questionable, whether Agessilaus, hauing both the same, and farre greater forces, could haue wrought proportionable effects. Sure it is, that in the whole space of two yeeres, which he spent in Asia, his decdes procured more commendation of magnanimity and faire behauiour, than of stout courage, and great, or profitable atchieuements. For how highly so euer it pleased Xenophon, who was his friend, and follower in this, and in other warres, to extoll his vertue, his exploits being onely a few incursions into the Countries lying neere the Sea, carrying no proportion to Xenophons owne iourney, which I know not whether any Age hath paralleled: the famous retreat of Canon the Briton with fixe thousand men from Aquileia, to his owne Countrie, through all the breadth of Italie, and length of France, in despite of the Emperor Theodosius, being rather like it than equall. But of Agessilaus and his wars in Asia and Greece, we shall speake more in due place.

§. II.

The prosperous beginnings of the warre in Asia.

Thimbro receiuing Xenophons men, began to take in Townes, and to entertaine all such as were willing to reuolt from the Persian, who were many, and some of them such, as had beene highly beholding to the King; who seeme to haue had no other cause of discontent, than that they were to liue vnder the gouernement of Tissaphernes, whom all others did as vehemently hate as the King his Master did loue him. The managing of the warre begun by Thimbro, was for his oppressions taken out of his hands, and committed to Dercyllidas a Spartan, who behaued himselfe as a good man of Warre, and a wise Commander. For whereas the rule of the low-Countries of Asia was diuided betwene Pharnabazus and Tissaphernes, who did ill agree, Pharnabazus being the worthier man, but the other by his Princes fauour the greater, and hauing the chiefe command in those warres against the Greekes; Dercyllidas who did beare a priuate hatred to Pharnabazus (knowing well that Tissaphernes was of a mischieuous nature, and would not be sorry to see his Coriuall thoroughly beaten, though to the Kings losse) made an appointment with Tissaphernes, and forthwith entred Æolis, which was vnder the iurisdiction of Pharnabazus, which Prouince in few dayes, he brought into his owne power.

That Countrie of Æolis had about the same time suffered a violent alteration, which gaue easie successe to the attempts of Dercyllidas. Zenis a Dardanian had beene Deputie to Pharnabazus in those parts, after whose death his wife Mania procured his Office, wherein she behaued her selfe so well, that she not onely was beloued of the people vnder her gouernement: but enlarged her Territorie, by the conquest of certaine Townes adioyning, and sundry times gaue assistance to Pharnabazus in his warres against the Mysians and Persians. For she had in pay some Companies of Greekes, whose valour by her good vsage did her great seruice. But somewhat before the arriual of Dercyllidas in those parts, a Sonne-in-law of hers, called Midias, whom she trusted and loued much, being blinded with ambition, found meanes to fustle her, and kill her sonne of seauenteene yeeres old, which done, he seized vpon two of her principall Townes, wherein her treasure lay, hoping to haue beene admitted into possession of her whole estate. Being denied entrance by her Souldiers, that lay in Garrison, he sent Messengers with presents to Pharnabazus, desiring him to make him Gouernour in the place of Mania. His presents were not onely reiected by Pharnabazus, but reuenge of his foule treason threatned, whereby the wicked villaine was driuen into tearmes of almost vtter desperation. In the meane time came Dercyllidas, to whom the Townes of Mania, that held against Midias, did quickly open their Gates. One onely Towne stood out foure dayes (against the will will of the Citizens, who were couetous of liberty) the Gouernour struing in vaine to haue kept it to the vse of Pharnabazus. Now remained onely two Cities, Gergethe and Scepsis, which the Traitor held, who fearing all men, as being loued of none, sent Embassadors to Dercyllidas, desiring leave to speake with him, and pledges for his securitie: vpon the deliery of which he issued out of Scepsis, and comming into the Campe, made offer to ioyne with the Greekes vpon such conditions, as might seeme reasonable. But he was plainly told by Dercyllidas, that other condition there was none, than to set the Citizens freely at liberty. And presently vpon these words they marched toward Scepsis. When Midias perceiued that it was in vaine to strue against the Armie, and the Towne-men, who were all of one minde; he quietly went along with Dercyllidas, who remaining but a few houres in the Citie, did a sacrifice to Minerva, and then leading away the Garrison of Midias, he left the Citie free, and departed toward Gergethe. Midias did not forsake his Companie, but followed him, earnestly intreating that he might be suffered to retaine Gergethe: but comming to the Gates, he was bidden to command his Souldiers that they should be opened, for (quoth Dercyllidas) I must here likewise doe a sacrifice to Minerva. The Traitor, not daring to make deniall, caused his Mercenaries to open the Gates, whereby Dercyllidas, taking possession of the place, tendred pay to the Garrison, who did not refuse to serue vnder his Ensignes. This done, all the goods of Mania were seized vpon, as belonging to one that had beene subiect to Pharnabazus, who was enemy to the Greekes: and so the murderous wretch was sent away naked, not knowing in what part of the World he might finde any place to hide his detested head. Dercyllidas, hauing in eight dayes taken nine Cities, purposed for the ease of his Confederates to winter in Bythinia, to which end he tooke Truce with Pharnabazus, who had not any desire of Warre. That Winter, and the Sommer ensuing, the Truce being recontinued held; in which time, besides the wasting of Bythinia, the necke of Land ioyning Cherronea to the Main, was fortified, being foure or five miles in breadth, by which meanes cleauen Towns with much good Land belonging to them, were freed from the incursions of the wilde Thracians; and made fit and able to victuall the Campe. Likewise the Citie of Atarne was taken, which was of great strength, and very well stored with provision. After this, Dercyllidas had command from Sparta, to diuert the warre into Caria, where was the seate of Tissaphernes; for that hereby it was thought not vnease to recouer all the Townes of Ionis; Pharax the Admirall of the fleet (which was a yeerly Office) being appointed to ioyne with him. Though it was manifest that Tissaphernes had neglected Pharnabazus in time of necessity, yet was he not in his owne danger requited with the like. For Pharnabazus hauing respect to the Kings seruice, came to assist his priuate enemy Tissaphernes, and so passing into Caria, they thrust Garisons into all places of strength; which done, they marched towards Ionis, hoping to finde the Townes ill manned for resistance. As these Persians were desirous to keepe the warre from their owne doores, so was Dercyllidas willing to free his Confederates the Ionians from the spoile and danger of the warre, by transferring it into Caria. For which cause he passed the Riuer of Meander, and not looking to haue bin so soone encountered, marched carelessly through the Countrie: when on the very sodaine the whole Armie of Tissaphernes and Pharnabazus was discovered, consisting of Persians, Carians, and some Mercenary Greekes, who were all marsh illd in very good order to present battaile. The oddes was too apparent, both in numbers of men, and in readinesse, as also in aduantage of ground: for the Persian had a great multitude of Horse, the Greeke very few and feeble, being to fight in an open plaine. Therefore all the Ionians, together with the Islanders and others, of such places as bordered vpon the Kings Dominions, did either betake themselves to present flight; or abiding a while for shame, did plainly discover by their looks, that they meant not to be more bold than wise. Onely Dercyllidas with his Peloponnesians regarding their honour, prepared to endure the fight: which must needs haue brought them to destruction, if the counsaile of Pharnabazus had beene followed, who perceiuing the opportunitie of so great a victory, was not willing to let it slip. But Tissaphernes, who naturally was a coward, seeing that countenance of resistance was made, began to consider what strange defence the Souldiers of Xenophon had shewed, and thinking that all the Greekes were of the like resolution, held it the wisest way to craue parley; the conclusion of which was, That a truce should be made, so last untill Tissaphernes might receiue answer from the King, and Dercyllidas from Sparta, concerning the demands propounded in the Treatie, which were on the one part, that all the Greekes in Asia might enioy their owne libertie and lawes; but contrariwise on the other side, that the Lacedemonians should depart Asia, and leaue the Townes to the Kings pleasure. This Treatie was of none effect; onely it serued to free the Greekes from the present danger, and to gaine time vnto Tissaphernes, who desired to auoide the warre by procrastination, which he durst not aduenture to finish by triall of a battaile.

§. III.

How the Lacedemonians tooke reuenge vpon the Eleans for old displeasure. The discontents of the Corinthians and Thebans, conceived against the State of Sparta.

IN the meane season the Lacedemonians, who found none able to withstand them in Greece, beganne to call the Eleans to accompt for some disgraces receiued by them during the late warres, when leisure was wanting to the requitall of such pettie iniuries. These Eleans being Presidents of the Olympique games, had set a fine vpon the Citie of Sparta, for Non-payment of which, they forbad them to come to the solemnitie, and publicly whipt one of them, that was of note, for presuming to contend against their decree. Likewise they hindred Agis King of Sparta, from doing sacrifice to Iupiter; and in all points vsed great contempt toward the Spartans, who now had no businesse that could hinder them from taking reuenge: and therefore sent a peremptorie message to the Eleans, commanding them to set at libertie the Citie which they held in subiection. This was the vsuall pretence which they made the ground of all their warres: though little they cared for the libertie of such Townes, which they caused afterwards to become followers, and little better than meere Vassals of the Lacedemonians. In their late warres with Athens, the strong opposition which they found, caused this goodly Title of libertie to worke very slowly: but hauing now to doe with a State of great spirit and small force, it gaue present successe to their desires. Two yeeres together they sent an Armie into the Countrey of the Eleans: the first yeere an earthquake (held in those times a prodigious signe, and which did alwayes forbid the prosecution of any enterprise in hand) caused them to retire: the second yeere, all the Townes of the Eleans did hastily reuolt, and the Citie it selfe was driuen to submission; consenting both to suffer their old subiects freely to enioy their libertie, and to haue her owne wals throwne downe. Onely the Presidenship of the Olympian games was left vnto them, which, it was not to be doubted that they would in time comming vse modestly, finding themselves to stand at the mercy of Sparta. In this expedition all the Greekes were assistant to the Lacedemonians, excepting the Corinthians and Baotians, whose aide hauing beene of as much importance in the late Peloponnesian Warre, as the force of Sparta it selfe, they could not smoothe their dislike of their vnequall diuision following the victory; which gaue to Sparta the command of all Greece; to Thebes, and Corinth, onely security against Athens, but such a security as was worse than the danger. For when the equall greatnesse of two mighty Estates did counterpoise each the other, it was in the power of these Neutrall Common-weales to adhere to either, as the condition of their affaires required; but when to reuenge iniuries, they had by mortall hatred prosecuted the warre to extremitie, leauing the one Citie naked of power and friends, the other mightily encreased in both; it was then (if not necessary to obey the greatnesse which themselves had made, yet) foolish and dangerous to prouoke it. Neuerthelesse, it was not the purpose of the Spartans to take occasion of any quarrell, which they could not finish at pleasure, till such time as they had by victory or composition made some good end with the Persian, toward whom they bent all their care and forces.

§. III.

§. IIII.

The passage of Agesilaus into Asia. His warre with Tissaphernes. How Tissaphernes was put to death; and the warre diuerted into another Prouince, through perswasion and gifts of Tithraustes his successour. How carelesse the Persian Lieutenants were of the Kings good.

Agesilaus newly made King of Sparta, was desirous to haue the honour of the victory, which not without cause, he expected vpon those of Asia; and therefore procuring a great Armie to ioine with that of Dercyllides, he tooke his way in great pompe to Aulis in Baotia, a Hauen, lying opposite to the Iland of Eubaea, in which place Agamemnon (leading the power of all Greece to the warre against Troy, many Ages before) had embarked his men. In imitation of Agamemnon he meant also to doe sacrifice in Aulis, which the Thebans, Lords of that Countrey, would not permit, but saying that the performance of such ceremonies in that place, belonged vnto their Officers; they were so vnable to conceale their malice, that sending some Companies of horse, they threw downe his sacrifice from the Altar. It was not then conuenient time for Agesilaus to entangle himselfe and his Countrey in a new warre; therefore waiting better opportunitie of reuenge, he quietly swallowed the contumelie, and followed his maine intentment. Hauing landed his men at Ephesus, he was entertained by Tissaphernes with a Treatie of peace, wherein Agesilaus peremptorily requiring that the Persian should restore to libertie all the Greek Townes in Asia, was promised that the King, being first informed of his demand, should send answer to his good liking, if he would in the meane while make truce. Truce was therefore made, which Tissaphernes had sought, onely to win time of making prouision for the warre, and getting supply of men and money from Artaxerxes, whilst Agesilaus was busie in settling the estates of his confederate Citie on that side of the Sea. The end of this long vacation from warre was at the comming downe of these forces which Artaxerxes had sent: at what time Agesilaus receiued a plaine message from Tissaphernes, that either he must forth-with depart out of Asia, or make good his abode by strong hand. Agesilaus returning word, that he was glad to heare that his enemies had by periurie deserved vengeance from Heauen, prepared to invade them; and sending word to all the Townes which lay betwene him and Caria, that they should provide victuals and other necessities for his Armie, did easily make Tissaphernes beleue, that his intent was to invade that Prouince wherein Tissaphernes dwelt, and which was vsit for Horse, in which part of his forces the Persian had most confidence. Therefore Tissaphernes bestowing all his Companies of foot in Caria, entred with his horse into the plaines of Maander, hoping thereby to stop the passage of a heauie foot-Armie, not suffering them to passe into that Countrey which was fittest for their seruice. But the Greekes left him waiting there in vaine, and marched directly into Phrygia, where they tooke great spoyle without resistance, till such time as the Horse-men of Pharnabazus met him, who in a small skirmish hauing the better of the Greekes, were the occasion that Agesilaus returned to Ephesus. Although in this last fight onely twelue men were lost, yet Agesilaus perceiuing by that triall how hard it would be to preuaile, and hold the mastery of the field, without a greater strength of Horse, tooke all possible care to encrease that part of his forces. By which means hauing enabled himselfe, whilst winter lasted he entred vpon the Countrey of Tissaphernes, as soone as the season of the yeere would permit, and not onely tooke a great bootie, but finding the Horse-men of Tissaphernes in the plaines of Maander, without assistance of their infanterie, he gaue them battaile, and had a great victory, taking their Campe in which he found great riches. The blame of this losse fell heauie vpon Tissaphernes, who either vpon cowardise had absented himselfe from the battaile, or following some other businesse, was then at Sardes. For which cause his Master hauing him in distrust, and thinking that peace might be the sooner had, which he much desired, if the man, so odious to the whole Nation of the Greekes, were taken out of the way, he sent into those parts Tithraustes a Persian, to cut off the head of Tissaphernes, and succede him in the gouernment. Such was the end of this base and cowardly Politician, who little caring to offend Heauen, when by periurie he could aduance his purposes on Earth, failed at the last through too much ouer-weening of his owne wisdom, euen in that part of cunning, wherein he thought himselfe most perfect; for supposing, that by his great skill in subtil negotiation he should one way or other circumvent the Greekes, and make them wearie of Asia; he did not seeke to finish the warre, and according to his Masters wish, bring all things speedily to quiet, but rather to temporize, till he might finde some opportunitie of making such end as best might stand with the Kings honour and his owne. Wherein it seemes that he much mistooke his Princes disposition, who though he had highly rewarded him for the aide which he did bring in his time of danger, yet would he much more gladly haue taken it, if he could haue found such meanes whereby the danger it selfe might haue bene auoided: as not loosing to haue warre, whilest by any conditions (honourable or not) he might obtaine peace. And this appeared well by the course which Tithraustes tooke at his first possession of the low Countries. For he sent Embassadors to Agefilas, in very friendly sort, letting him know, that the man who had bene Author of the warre, was now taken out of the way; and that it was the Kings pleasure to let the Greekes enjoy their owne lawes and libertie, vpon condition, that they should pay him the tribute accustomed, and the Armie be forthwith dismissed. The answer to this proposition, was by Agefilas referred to the Council of Sparta; in the meane season he was content to transferre the warre into the Province of Pharnabazus, at the request of Tithraustes, who bought his departure with thirtie Talents.

This was a strange manner of Warre, both on the offensive and on the defensive part. For Agefilas hauing entertained great hopes of vanquishing the great King, was contented to forbear his severall Provinces, at the entreatie of the Lieutenants: and those Lieutenants being employed by the King to maintaine his Estates against all enemies (wherein if they failed, they knew that their heads might easily be taken from their shoulders) were little offended at any losse that fell on their next Neighbour-Princes, which were subiect likewise to the same Crowne of Persia, so long as their owne gouernement could be preferred free from waste and danger. The cause of this disorder on the Persian side, I can ascribe to nothing so deferuently, as to the corrupted estate of the Court, wherein Eunuches, Concubines, and ministers of pleasure, were able by partiall construction to countenance, or disgrace, the actions of such as had the managing of things abroad; and to that foolish manner of the Kings (which was so vsuall that it might be called a rule) to reward or punish the Provinciall Gouernour, according to the benefit or losse, which the Countrey given in charge vnto each of them, receiued, during the time of his rule. Whereby it came to passe, that as euery one was desirous to make his owne Territorie yeeld a large increase to the Kings treasure; so no man was carefull to assist his borders, if losse or danger might thereby grow to himselfe and his; but sat still as an idle beholder, when perhaps by ioyning their forces, it had not bene vncasie to recompence the spoile of one Countrey, by conquering another, or defending a third from fate greater miseries.

§. V.

The Warre and Treatie betweene Agefilas and Pharnabazus.

Agefilas hauing thus compounded with Tithraustes, entred Phrygia, burning and wasting the Countrey without resistance. He tooke the Palace of Pharnabazus, and by his Lieutenant draue him out of his Campe. These actions, together with his honourable behauiour, which added much to their lustre, were more glorious then profitable. For he did not win Cities and Places of strength, which might haue increased his power, and giuen assurance to the rest of his proceedings: but purchased fame and high reputation, by which he drew vnto him some that were discontented and stood vpon bad termes with the great King, whom he lost againe as easily, by means of some slight iniurie done to them by his vnder-Captaines. Pharnabazus did not enclose himselfe in any Towne for feare of being besieged, but kept the field, lying as neere as he could safely to the enemies, with whom it was not his purpose to fight, but to make some good end by composition, which he found not vncasie to doe. For the pleasures, by him formerly done to the State of Sparta, in the times of their most necessity, had bene so great, that when he (obtaining parley) did set before their eyes his bounty towards them, and his loue (which had bene such, that besides many other hazards of his person, he had for the rescue of their fleet when it was driuen to runne a-shore at Abydos, adventured to ride into the Seas as farre as he could finde any ground, and fight on horsebacke against the Athenians) together with his faith which had neuer bene violated in word or deede: they knew not how to excuse their ingratitude, other wise then by telling him, That hauing warre with his Master, they were inforced, against their will, to offend him. Agefilas did make a faire offer to him, that if he would reuolt from the King to them; they would maintaine him against the Persian, and establish him free Prince of the Countrey wherein he was at that time onely Deputie to Artaxerxes. But Pharnabazus told him plainly, That if the King his Master did put him in trust to make war against them, he would not faile to doe the best that he could as their enemy: if the charge were taken out of his hand, and he commanded to obey an other, he would then shift side, and betake himselfe to their alliance. The issue of this parley was, That the Armie should no longer abide in Phrygia, nor againe returne into it, whilest employment could be found elsewhere. The excuse made by Agefilas, and the withdrawing of his forces out of those parts, were not sufficient to appease Pharnabazus, whom he had not inuaded for want of more necessary businesse else where; but because his Countrey would yeeld great bootie; and for the hire of thirtie Talents. By this meanes the Lacedaemonians changed an honourable Friend into a hot Enemy, who afterwards required their vnthankfulnesse with full reuenge.

§. VI.

The great commotions raised in Greece by the Thebans and others, that were hyred with gold from the Persian.

IN the meane while Tithraustes, perceiuing that Agefilas meant nothing lesse then to returne into Greece, and let Artaxerxes rest quietly in Asia, tooke a wife for a course whereby the Citie of Sparta was not onely driuen to looke to her owne, and gine ouer her great hopes of subuerting the Empire, but was beaten out of all that had bene gotten by many late victories, and saw her Dominion restrained vnto the narrow bounds of her owne Territorie. He sent into Greece fiftie talents of siluer, to be employed in raising warre against the Lacedaemonians; which treasure was, by the subtil practice of him that was put in trust with it, in such wise dispersed, among the principall men of the Thebans, Argiues, and Corinthians, that all those Estates hauing formerly borne secret hate to that of Sparta, were now desirous of nothing so much as of open warre. And lest this great heate of the incensed multitude should, for want of present exercise, begin to faint, and vanish away in idle words, occasion was found out to thrust the Lacedaemonians into Armes, that they themselves might seeme Authors of the quarrell. Some land there was in the tenure of the Locrians, to which the Thebans had in former time laid claime; but the Phocians either hauing the better title, or finding the greater fauour, had it adiudged vnto them, and receiued yeerely money for it. This money the Locrians were either hired or perswaded to pay now to the Thebans, who readily accepted it. The Phocians not meaning so to lose their Rent, made a distresse by strong hand, recouering a great deale more than their owne; which the Thebans (as in protection of their new Tenants) requited with an inuasion made vpon Phocis, wasting that Countrey in the manner of open war. Such were the beginnings of professed hostilitie betweene Thebes & Sparta, & the first breaking out of their close enmitie, that had long time, though hardly, bene concealed. For when the Phocian Embassadors came to Sparta, complaining of the violence done by the Thebans, and requesting succour, they had very fauourable audience, & ready consent to their suite, it being the manner of the Lacedaemonians, to deferre the acknowledgement of iniuries receiued, vntill occasion of reuenge were offered, and then to discover their indignation in cold blood. At this time they had very good opportunitie to worke their owne wils, hauing no other war to disturbe them in Greece, and hearing out of Asia no newes, that could offend or trouble them. Wherefore they sent Lysander to raise all the Countries about Phocis, and with such forces as he could leaue, to attend the coming of Pausanias King of Sparta (for Sparta, as hath bene shewed before, had two Kings) who should follow him with the strength of Peloponnesus. Lysander did as he was appointed, and being of great reputation in those parts, he drew the Orchomenians to reuolt from Thebes. Pausanias likewise raised all Peloponnesus, except the Corinthians, (who refused to assist him in that enterprife) meaning to ioyne with Lysander, & make a speedy end of the warre. The consideration of so great a danger, approaching so swiftly, caused the Thebans to seeke what helpe they could abroad, for as much as their owne strength was farre too little to make resistance against such mighty preparations. It was not vnknowne to them, that many followers of the Lacedemonians were otherwise affected in heart than they durst vtter in countenance; but the good wishes of such people were little available, considering that the most which could be expected from them, was, that they should doe as little hurt as they could: by which manner of tergiversation, the Corinthians did at that present cast themselves into the displeasure of the Spartans, to the no great benefit of Thebes. Wherefore it was thought the safest course, to procure the assistance of some Estate that might presently declare it selfe on their side, which would cause many others to follow the example, and make their partie strong. To this end they sent Embassadors to Athens, excusing old offences, as either not committed by publike allowance, or done in time of the generall warre, and recompensed with friendship largely shewne in their refusal of assisting Pausanias, when he came in behalfe of the thirty Tyrants, against the good Citizens of Athens. In regard of which, and for their owne Honour sake, they requested them of aide in the present warre, offering to doe the best that they could for the restoring of Athens to her former Estate and Dignitie. Thrasybulus and his Friends, who persecuted by the thirtie, had bene well entertained at Thebes, procured now the Citie to make a large requitall of the courtesie which they had received. For it was decreed, that the State of Athens should not onely refuse to aide the Lacedemonians in this Warre; but that it should assit the Thebans, and engage it selfe in their cause. Whilest Pausanias lay still, waiting the arriuall of his Confederates, Lyfander being desirous to doe somewhat that might aduance the businesse in hand, came to Halitus, where, though Pausanias did not meet him, as had bene appointed, yet he attempted the Towne, and was slaine in fight by the Thebans, who came hastily to the rescue. As this victory did encourage the Thebans, so the comming of Pausanias with his great Armie did againe amaze them, with presentation of extreame danger; but their spirits were soone reuiued by the strong succour which was brought from Athens, in consideration of which, and of the late battaile, Pausanias durst not hazard a new fight with them, but receiuing the bodies of those that were slaine, by composition, departed out of their Territorie; for which, either cowardise or indiscretion, he was at his returne to Sparta condemned as a Traitor, and driuen to flee into Tegea, where he ended his daies in banishment.

§. VII.

How Agefilas was called out of Asia to helpe his Countrie. A victorie of the Spartans. Conon the Athenian, assisted by Pharnabazus, overcomes the Lacedemonian fleet; recouers the masterie of the Seas; and rebuilds the wals of Athens.

His good successe, and the confederacie made with Athens, gaue such reputation to the Thebans, that the Argives, Corinthians, Eubceans, Locrians, and Acarnanes, did forthwith side with them, and raising a strong Armie, determined to giue battaile to the Lacedemonians as neere as they might, to their owne doores; Considering that the force of Sparta it selfe was not great, but grew more and more by the adiunction of their Confederates. The Magistrates of Sparta perceiving the danger, sent for Agefilas, who readily obeyed them, and promising his friends in Asia to returne speedily to their assistance, passed the Streights of Hellefpoint into Europe. In the meane time the Cities of the new league had giuen battaile to the Lacedemonians, and the remainder of their Associates, but with ill successe. For when the right-wing of each part had gotten the better hand, the Argives and Thebans returning from the chase in some disorder, were broken and defeated by the Lacedemonians, who meeting them in good order, won from them the Honour which they had gotten, by forcing the left wing of the Lacedemonians, and made the victory of that day entirely their owne. The report of this battaile meeting Agefilas at Amphipolis, were by him sent ouer into Asia, wherein it is not likely that they brought much comfort vnto his friend, who had since his departure scene the Spartan fleet beaten, and Lyfander the Admirall slaine. The same man, whose endeavour had brought the Athenians into order, by aduancing the Sea-forces of the Lacedemonians with money, and all manner of supplies, was now the occasion that the power power of Athens grew strong at Sea, when the City was despoiled of her olde reputation, & scarcely able to maintaine an Army by Land for her defence. Pharnabazus considering how much it imported the King his Master, to haue the Greeks diuided into such factions, as might vtterly disable them from vnder-taking abroad, thought it the safest way for himselfe, during these broyles, to take such order, that he should not need any more, to seeke peace by entreaty and commemoration of old benefits, at their hands, who vnproouoked had sold his loue for thirty Talents. To which purpose he furnished Conon the Athenian with eight ships, who had escaped, when the fleet of Athens was surprized by Lyfander at Ægos-Potamos; giuing him the command of a great Navy, wherewith he requited the losse receiued at Ægos-Potamos, by repaying the Lacedemonians with the like destruction of their fleet at Cnidus. After this victory Conon sailed to Athens, bringing with him, partly as the liberality of Pharnabazus, partly as the fruit of his victory, so strong a Navy, and so much golde, as encouraged the Athenians to rebuild their walles, and thinke more hopefully vpon recouering the Signiory which they had lost.

§. VIII.

Offundry small victories gotten on each part. The Lacedemonians lose all in Asia; The Athenians recover some part of their old Dominion.

Neither Euerthelesse the Lacedemonians, by many victories at Land, maintained for some yeeres the honour of their Estate, endangered very greatly by this losse at Sea. For Agefilas obtained the better with his horse-men from the Thessilians, who were accounted the best riders in Greece: He wasted Boeotia, and fought a great battaile at Coronea against the Thebans, and their Allies, whom hee cuer-threw; and by his Marshall Gylis forraged the Countrey of Locris: which done, hee returned home.

The gaine of these victories was not great, and the reputation of them was, by many losses, much defaced. For the Thebans did in the battaile of Coronea vanquish the Orcho-menians, who stood opposite vnto them, and retired vnbroken to Mount Helicon, opening way perforce when Agefilas charged them in the returne from the pursuite. Likewise Gylis was slaine with a great part of his Army by the Locrians; and some other exploits by the Lacedemonians performed against the Corinthians, were repayed with quall damage receiued in the parts adioyning; many Townes being easily taken, and as easily recouered. The variety of which enterfeats was such, that the Thebans themselves were drawne by the losse of the haue of Corinth, to sue for peace, but could not get audience, till such time as the newes came of a great victory obtained by Iphicrates, General of the Athenian-forces at Lechaum; whereupon the Theban Embassadors being sent for, and willed to doe their message, required onely in scorn, to haue a safe conduct giuen them, that they might enter into Corinth. From this time forward the Warre was made for a while onely by incursions, wherein the Acheans, confederates of Sparta, felt most losse, their whole state being endangered by the Acarnanians, who held with the contrary side, vntill Agefilas repayed these inuaders with equall, or greater calamities, brought vpon their owne Lands, which did so afflict the Acarnanes, that they were driuen to sue for peace. But the affaires at Sea were of most consequence, vpon which the successe of all depended. For when the Towns of Asia perceived, that the Lacedemonians were not onely intangled in an hard warre at home, but almost disabled to passe the Seas, hauing lost their fleet at Cnidus; they soone gaue care to Pharnabazus, who promised to allow that they should vse their owne lawes, if they would expell the Spartan Gubernours. Onely the City of Abidus did stand firme, wherein Dercyllidas lay, who did his best to contain all the Townes about Hellefpoint, in the alliance of the Lacedemonians; which he could not doe, because the Athenian fleet vnder Thrasybulus tooke in Byzantium, Chalcedon, and other places thereabout, reducing the Ile of Lesbos to their ancient acknowledgement of Athens.

The base conditions offered vnto the Persian by the Lacedemonian. Of sundry fights and other passages in the warre. The peace of Antalcidas.

ABout this time the Spartans began to perceiue how vneasie a thing it would be, to maintaine the warre against men as good as themselves, assisted with the treasures of Persia: wherefore they craued peace of Artaxerxes, most basely offering, not onely to renounce the Greekes inhabiting Asia, and to leaue them to the Kings disposition, but wihall to set the Ilanders, and euery Towne in Greece, as well the little as the great, at full and absolute liberty whereby they said that all the principall Estates of their Countrie would be so weakened, that no one, nor all of them should be able to stir against the great King. And sure it was, that the power of the Countrie being so broken and rent into many small pieces, could neither haue disquieted the Persian, by an offensive warre, nor haue made any good defence against him, but would haue left it easie for him in continuance of time, to haue taken the Cities one after another, till he had made himselfe Master of all. The Spartans were not ignorant of this, but were so carried with enuie, that perceiuing how the dominion of the Seas was like to returne to Athens, they chose rather to giue all from themselves and others, and make all a-like weak, than to permit that any of their owne Nation should grow stronger than themselves, who so lately had commanded all. Yet this great offer was not at the first accepted, both in regard that the other Estates of Greece, who had in the Kings behalfe ioynd together against the Lacedemonians, did by their seuerall Embassadors oppose themselves vnto it, and for that it was thought safest for Artaxerxes, rather to weaken the Lacedemonians yet more, than by interposing himselfe to bring friends and foes on the suddaine to an equality. Especially Struthas, whom Artaxerxes had sent as his Lieutenant into the low Countries, did seeke to repay the harme done by Agésilas in those parts: which his intent appearing plaine, and all hope of the peace being thereby cut off; Thimbro was sent into Asia to make warre vpon Struthas, and others were appointed to other places, whereby the warre, being scattered about, all the Iles and Townes on the firme Land grew almost to the manner of piracie and robbrie, affording many skirmishes, but few great actions worthy of remembrance, Thimbro was slaine by Struthas, & in his place Diphridas was sent, who demeaned himselfe more warily. Dircyllidas was removed from his charge at Abydos, because he had not impeached Thrasylbulus in his enterprises about Hellepont; Anaxibius, who succeeded him, was surprised and slaine in a skirmish by Iphicrates the Athenian. Thrasylbulus, departing from Lesbos toward Rhodes, was slaine by the way at Aspendus. The Citie of Rhodes had long before ioynd with the Lacedemonians, who erected there (as was their manner) an Aristocratie, or the Government of a few the principall Citizens; whereas contrariwise the Athenians were accustomed to put the Soueraigntie into the hands of the people, each of them seeking to assure themselves, by erecting in the Towne of their Confederates a Government like vnto their owne: which doing (where more especiall cause did not hinder) caused the Nobilitie to fauour Sparta, and the Commons to encline to Athens. The people of Agina roused vpon the coast of Attica, which caused the Athenians to land an Armie in Agina, and besiege their Towne: but this siege being raised by the assistance of the Lacedemonian fleet, the Ilanders began a-new to molest Attica, which caused the Athenians to man their ships againe, that returned bearen, hauing lost foure of thirteene. The losse of these ships was soone recompensed by a victorie which Chabrias the Athenian Generall had in Agina, whereupon the Ilanders were faine to keepe home, and leaue to the Athenians the Seas free. It may well seeme strange that the Citie of Athens, hauing but newly raised her wals, hauing not by any fortunate and important battaile secured her estate from dangers by land, but onely depending vpon the assistance of such Confederates, as carried vnto different ends, had often discovered themselves irresolute in the common cause; would send a fleet and an Armie to Cyprus, in defence of Euagoras, when the mastery of the Seas was so ill assured, that an Iland lying in the eye of Pyræus, had abilitie to vex the coast of Attica. But as the ouer-weaning of that Citie did cause it vsually to embrace more then it could compass, so the insolency and shamelesse iniustice of the people, had now bred in the chiefe Commanders, a desire to keepe themselves farre out of fight, and to seeke employments at such distance distance as might secure them from the eyes of the enuious, & from publike iudgements, out of which, few or none escaped. For which cause Timotheus did passe away much part of his time in the Ile of Lesbos; Iphicrates in Thrace; and Chabrias now did carry away into Cyprus a greater force than his Countrie well could haue spared: with which he returned not when the businesse in Cyprus came to an end, but sought new aduentures in Egypt; whereby arose neither thanks to himselfe, nor profit to his Citie, though honour both to him and it. The Athenians being thus carelesse of things at hand, had a notable blow giuen vnto them, shortly after that Chabrias was gone to Cyprus, euen within their owne Hauens. For Telesias, a Lacedemonian, being made Gouverneur of Agina; conceived a strong hope of surprizing the Naue of Athens, as it lay in Piræus; thinking a-right that it was an harder matter to encounter with ten ships prepared for the fight, than with twenty lying in harbour, whose Mariners were asleepe in their Cabbins, or drinking in Tauernes. Wherefore he sailed by night into the mouth of the Port, which entering at the breake of day, hee found (according to his expectation) most of the men on shore, and few or none left aboard to make resistance: by which meanes hee tooke many ships laden with merchandizes, many fisher-men, passengers, and other Vessells, also three or foure Gallies; hauing sunke or broken, and made vnseruicicable, as many of the rest as the time would suffer. About this time Pharnabazus, the Lieutenant of Phrygia, had one of the Kings Daughters giuen to him in marriage, with whom hee liued about the Court; and many Officers that fauoured the Lacedemonians were placed in the lower Asia; by whose assistance the fleet of Sparta grew victorious about Hellepont; in such wise, that perhaps they should not haue needed the peace, which they themselves procured by Antalcidas, from the great King, the conditions whereof were such as are mentioned before, giuing freedom to all the Cities of Greece; and diuiding the Countrie into as many seuerall States as were petty Boroughes in it. Thus Artaxerxes hauing bought his owne peace with money, did likewise by his money become Arbitrator and decider of Controuersies betwene the Greekes, disposing of their businesse in such wise as stood best with his owne good. The tenor of Artaxerxes his decree was, That all Asia and Cyprus should be his owne; the Iles of Lemnos, Imbros, and Scirus be subject to Athens; all other Greece Townes, as well the little as the great, be set at liberty; and that whosoever should refuse this peace, vpon them the approouers of it should make warre, the King assisting them by Land and Sea, with men, and ships, and treasure. The Athenians were so discouraged by their losses at Sea; the Lacedemonians by reuolt of their Confederates, and the necessity of maintaining many Garrisons, for which they wanted money; and other States by the miseries of the warre, whereof they saw no end; that all (excepting the Thebans) did consent vnto these Articles. This was called the peace of Antalcidas: whereof the Lacedemonians taking vpon themselves the execution, did not onely compell the Argines to depart out of Corinth (which vnder pretence of defending they held by Garrisons, lately thrust into it, not as Patrons, but as Lords) and the Thebans to leaue Boeotia free, of which Province Thebes had alwaies held the government: the Thebans themselves being also comprehended vnder the name of the Boeotians; but caused the Mantineans to throw downe their owne Citie, and to dwell in Villages: alleaging that they had formerly bene accustomed so to doe, though purposing indeed to chastise them, as hauing bene ill affected to Sparta in the late Warre. By these courtesies the Lacedemonians did hope that all the small Townes in Greece would, when occasion should require it, willingly follow them in their warres, as Authors of their libertie; and that the great Cities hauing lost all their dependants, would bee vnable to make opposition.

§. X.

The warre which the Lacedemonians made vpon Olynthus. They take Thebes by treason; and Olynthus by famine.

Amongst these Warres, which ended without either victory or profit, consumed the riches and power of Greece, the Citie of Olynthus in Thrace was growne so mighty, that shee did not onely command her Neighbour Townes, but was also become terrible to places farre remooued, and to Sparta it selfe: Great part of Macedonia, together with Pella, the principall Citie of that Kingdome, was taken by the Olynthians.

Olynthians, who following the vsuall pretence of the Lacedemonians, to set at libertie the places ouer which King Amintas did tyrannize, had almost now driuen him out of his Dominions, and taken all to themselves. The Citizens of Acanthus and of Apollonia, being neereft vnto the danger of those inroaching neighbours, acquainted the Lacedemonians with their feare, affirming that this Dominion of the Olynthians would be too strong for all Greece, if continuance of time should giue it reputation, which onely it wanted: wherefore they requested assistance, but in such termes as did found of compulsion: protesting that either they must warre vpon Olynthus, or become subject vnto her, and fight in her defence. Heereupon was made a hastie leuie of men, two thousand being presently sent away, with promise to be seconded by a greater Armie. Whilest these two thousand gaue such beginning to the warre, as agreed with their small number, the body of the Armie following them, surprized the Cittadell of Thebes, which was betrayed into the hand of Phæbidas the Lacedemonian, by some of the Magistrates, who sought to strengthen their faction by the slauerie of their Country. The Thebans were ill affected to Sparta, but had not in any one point violated the peace lately made between them, which caused the Lacedemonians to doubt whether this act of Phæbidas were more worthy of reward or of punishment; In conclusion, profit so farre ouer-weighed honestie, that the deede was approoued, many principall Citizens of Thebes condemned to death, many driuen into banishment, and the Traitors rewarded with the gouernment of the Citie: by whose authoritie, and the force of the Garrison, the Thebans were compelled to serue the Lacedemonians, in all, and more than all that they could require. This accessse of power hauing strengthened the Lacedemonians, caused them to entertaine the greater forces about Olynthus, which (notwithstanding the losse of one great battaile, and some other disasters) they compelled at length by famine to render it selfe vnto their obedience.

§. XI.

AFTER this Olynthian Warre, which endured almost three yeeres, it seemed that no Estate in Greece was able to make head against that of Sparta: but it was not long ere the Thebans found a meane to shake off their yoke, and gaue both example and meane to others to do the like. One of the banished men found by conference with a Scribe of the Theban Magistrates, comming to Athens, that the tyrannie wherewith his Countrie was oppressed, pleased him no better then it did those who for feare of it were fledde from home. Whereupon a plot was layd betwene these two, that soone found very good successe, being managed thus. Seauen of the banished men forsooke Athens priuily, and entred by night into the fields of Thebes; where spending the next day secretly, they came late in the euening to the Gates like husband-men returned from worke, and so passed vndiscovered vnto the house of Charon, whom Phylidas the Scribe had drawne into the conspiracie. The day following, a solemane feast being then held in the Citie, Phylidas promised the Gouernours, who were insolent and lustfull men, that he would conueigh vnto them that night the most beautifull Dames of the Towne, with whom they should take their pleasure. Hauing cheared them with such hope, and plentie of good wine, he told them when the time of performance (which they vrged) came, that hee could not make good his promise, vnlesse they would dismishe their followers, because the Gentlewomen, who attended without a Chamber, would not endure that any of the seruants should see their faces. Vpon this occasion the attendants were dismissed, and the Conspirators, attired like Ladies and their Maides, brought into the place; who taking aduantage of the Gouernours loose behauiour, slew them all vpon the sodaine with Daggers, which they brought hidden vnder their garments. Then presently casting off their disguise, they went to other places, where feigning themselves to come to the Gouernours vpon businessse, they got admittance, and likewise slew those which were of the Lacedemonian faction. By the like deuice they brake into the prison; slew the Gaoler; and set at liberty such as they thought meet, and being followed by these desperate men, proclaimed libertie, making the death of the Tyrants known. The Captaine of the Castle hearing the sodaine Proclamation, thought the Rebels to bee stronger then indeede they were: the Citizens contrariwise mistrusted, that it was a praa practice to discover such, as would be forward vpon occasion of reuolting. But as soon as day-light reuealed the plaine truth, all the people tooke armes & besieged the Castle, sending hastily to Athens for succour. The Garrison also sent for aide vnto the Townes adioyning, whence a few broken troups comming to the rescue, were defeated on the way by the horse-men of Thebes. On the other side the banished Thebans did not onely make speed to assist their Countymen, but procured some Athenians to ioine with them, and thereby came so strong into the Citie, that the Castle was yeelded, more through feare than any necessitie, vpon condition that the Souldiers might quietly depart with their Armes; for which composition the Captaine at his returne to Sparta was put to death. When the newes of the doings at Thebes, and the successe arrived at Sparta, an Armie was raised forth-with, and all things prepared as earnestly for the recouering of that Citie, as if some part of their ancient inheritance had bene taken from the Lacedemonians, and not a Towne perfidiously vsurped by them, restored to her owne libertie. Leontidas, one of the Kings, was sent on this expedition, who hauing wearied his followers, with a toilesome Winters journey, returned home without any good or harme done; leauing Sphodrias, with part of his Armie, at Thespies, to infest the Thebans; who doing them some displeasures, made large amends by a foolish attempt vpon the Hauens of Athens, which failing to take, he wasted the Countrie adioyning, and draue away Cattell, causing by this outrage the Athenians to enter with all their power into the Warre, out of which they were before very carefully seeking how they might possibly with-draw themselves.

CHAP. XII.

Of the flourishing estate of Thebes, from the battaile of Leuctra, to the battaile of Mantinea.

§. I.

How Thebes and Athens ioined together against Sparta. How the Athenians made peace for themselves, and others, out of which the Thebans were excluded. The battaile of Leuctra, and beginning of the Theban greatnesse.

THE Lacedemonians were men of great resolution, and of much grauitie in all their proceedings, but one dishonourable rule they held, That all respects withstanding the commoditie of Sparta were to be neglected; the practice of which doctrine, euen by the best and wisest of them, did greatly blemish that Estate: but when it was put in execution by insufficient ouer-weening men, it selfe dome failed to bring vpon them in stead of profit vniustly expected, both shame and losse. And so it befell them in these enterprises of Phæbidas, vpon the Castle of Thebes, and Sphodrias vpon the Piræus. For, howsoeuer Agessilas did spoyle the Countrie about Thebes, in which hee spent two Summers, yet the diligence of the Thebans repaired all, who by the good successe of some attempts, grew stronger than they were at the first.

The Athenians likewise began to looke abroad, sayling to the Isle of Corcyra, where they ordered things at their pleasure, and hauing in some fights at Sea preuailed, began as in the Peloponnesian Warre, to surround Peloponnesus with a Nauie; afflicting so the Lacedemonians, that had not the Thebans by their insolencie wearied their friends, and caused them to seeke for peace, it had bene very likely that the end of this warre, should haue soone come to a good end, which neuerthelesse, being prosecuted by the Thebans (who opposed at once both these two great Estates) lest the City of Sparta as much dejected, as the beginning found it proud and tyrannous. But the Athenians perceiving how Thebes encroached every day vpon her weake Neighbours, not sparing such as had bene dependants vpon Athens, and finding themselves, whilest engaged in such a warre, vnable to relieue their complaining friends, resolved to settle the affaires of of Greece, by renewing that forme of peace which Antalcidas had brought from the Persian. Wherefore they sent Messengers to Thebes, peremptorily signifying, That it was their intent to finish the Warre; to which purpose they willed the Thebans to send Embassadors along with them to Sparta; who readily condescended, fearing otherwise that they should be left out of the Treaty of peace: which came to passe, being so wrought by the couragious wisdom of Epaminondas, who vnderstood farre better than his Countymen, what was to be feared or hoped. In this Treatie the Lacedemonians and Athenians did soone agree; but when the Thebans offered to swaere to the Articles in the name of the Boeotians; Agésilas required them to swaere in their owne name, and to leaue the Boeotians free, whom they had lately reduced vnder their obedience. Whereunto Epaminondas made answer, That the City of Sparta should giue example to Thebes by setting the Lacedemonians free; for that the Signorie of Boeotia did by as good right appertaine to the Thebans, as that of Laconia to the Spartans. This was well and truly spoken; but was heard with no patience: For Agésilas bearing a vehement hatred vnto those of Thebes, by whom he was drawne backe out of Asia into Greece, and disappointed of all the glory which he had hoped to achieue by the Persian war, did now passionately vrge that point of setting the Boeotians at libertie, & finding it as obstinately refused, hee dashed the name of the Thebans out of the league. At the same time Cleombrotus the other King of Sparta lay in Phocia, who receiued command from the Gouernours of Sparta forthwith to enter vpon the Land of the Thebans with all his power, which hee did, and was there slaine at Leuctra, and with him the flowre of his Armie. This battaile of Leuctra, being one of the most famous that euer were fought betweene the Greekes, was not so notable for any circumstance fore-going it, or for the managing of the fight it selfe, as for the death of the King, and many Citizens of Sparta, but especially, for that after this battell (betweene which and the conclusion of the generall peacethere passed but twentie daies) the Lacedemonians were neuer able to recover the strength and reputation which had formerlie made them redoubted farre and neere; whereas contrariwise the Thebans, whose greatest ambition had in former times confined it selfe vnto the little Region of Boeotia, did now begin to vndertake the leading and command of many People and Estates, in such wise, that soone after they brought an Armie of threecore and ten thousand strong vnto the Gates of Sparta. So much do the afflictions of an hard warre, valiantly endured, aduance the affaires of the distressed, and guide them into the way of Conquest, by stiffening that resolution with a manly temper, which wealth and ease had through luxurie, retchlesnes, and many other vices or vanities, made rustie and effeminate.

§. II.

How the Athenians tooke vpon them to maintaine the peace of Greece. New troubles hence arising. Epaminondas inuadeth and wasteth the Territorie of Lacedemon.

THe Athenians, refusing to take aduantage of this ouerthrow fallen vpon their old Enemies, and new Confederates the Lacedemonians, did neuertheless finely giue them to vnderstand, that their Dominion was expired, and therefore their pride might well be laid away. For taking vpon themselves the maintenance of the peace lately concluded, which Agésilas (perhaps of purpose to make benefit of quarrells that might arise) had left vnperfect, they assembled the Deputies of all the Estates confederated at Athens; where the generall libertie of all Townes, as well small as great, was ratified, vnder the stile Of the Athenians, and their Associates. Hereupon began fresh garboiles. The Mantineans, claiming power by this decreeto order their affaires at their owne pleasure, did (as it were) in despite of the Spartans, who had enforced them to raze their towne, recdifie it, and allie themselves with such of the Arcadians as stood worst affected to Sparta. The Arcadians, a strong Nation, consisting of many Cities, were distracted with factions; some desiring to hold good correspondency with the Lacedemonians; some to weaken & keepe them low; yet all pretending other ends. The Lacedemonians durst not giue impachment to the Mantineans; nor take vpon them to correct their ill-willers among the Arcadians, till such time as the factions brake out into violence, and each part called in forraigne helpe. Then was an Army sent from Sparta, as it were in defence of the people of Tegæa, against the Mantineans, but indeed against them both. Agésilas had the leading of it, but effected nothing. The Thebans had by this time subdued the the Phocians, and were become head of the Locrians, Acarnanians, Eubœans, and many others; with the power of which Countreies they entred Peloponnesus in fauour of the Arcadians, who had, vpon expectation of their coming, abstained from giuing battaile to Agésilas. The Armie of the Spartans being dismissed, and Epaminondas ioyned with the Arcadians; the Region of Laconia was inuaded & spoyled: a thing so strange, that no Oracle could haue found beliefe if any had foretold it. Almost 600. yeeres were spent, since the Dorians, vnder the posteritie of Hercules, had seized vpon Laconia, in all which time the sound of an enemies trumpet was not heard in that Countreie: Ten yeeres were not fully past, since all Greece was at the deuotion of the Spartans: but now the Region to which neither Xerxes with his huge Armie could once looke vpon, nor the mighty forces of Athens, and other enemy-States had dared to set foot on, sauing by stealth, was all on a light fire, the very smoke whereof the women of Sparta were ashamed to behold. All which indignitie notwithstanding, the Lacedemonians did not issue out of Sparta to fight, but sought how to preferue the Towne, setting at libertie as many of their Helotes or Slaues as were willing to beare Armes in defence of the State, & somewhat pittifully entreated the Athenians to giue them succour. From Corinth & some Towns of Peloponnesus they receiued speedy assistance; the Athenians came forward more slowly, so that Epaminondas returned without battell, hauing re-built the Citie of Messene, and peopled it a-new by calling home the ancient inhabitants, whom the Lacedemonians many yeeres before had chased away to other Countreies, possesing their Territories themselves.

§. III.

The Composition betweene Athens and Sparta for command in warre against the Thebans; who againe inuade and spoyle Peloponnesus. The unfortunate presumption of the Arcadians.

THIS iourne therefore vtterly defaced the reputation of the Spartans, in such wise, that they did no longer demand the conduct of the Army, which was to be raised, nor any manner of precedence: but sending Embassadors from Sparta, and from all the Cities which held league with it, vnto Athens, they offered to yeeld the Admirallie to the Athenians, requesting that they themselves might be Generalls by Land. This had bene a composition well agreeing with the situation and qualitie of those two Cities; but it was reiected, because the Mariners and others that were to be employed at Sea, were men of no marke or estimation, in regard of those companies of horse and foot, whereof the Land-Armie was compounded, who being all Gentlemen or Citizens of Athens, were to haue serued vnder the Lacedemonians. Wherefore it was agreed that the Authority should be diuided by time, the Athenians ruling siue daies, the Lacedemonians other siue, and so successiue that each of them should haue command of all, both by Land and by Sea. It is manifest, that in this conclusion vaine ambition was more regarded than the common profit, which must of necessity be very slowly aduanced, where consultation, resolution, and performance are so often to change hands. This appeared by a second inuasion of Peloponnesus, wherein the Thebans found their enemies so unable to impeach them, that hauing fortified Isfimus from Sea to Sea, as in former times they had done against Xerxes, they were driuen out of their strength by Epaminondas, who foraged the Country without resistance. But as the Articles of this league betweene Athens and Sparta did, by diuiding the conduct in such maner, disable the focitie, and make it insufficient to those ends for which it was concluded; so the example of it wrought their good, by filling the enemies heads with the like vanitie. For the Arcadians considering their owne numbers which they brought into the field, and hauing found by many trials that their people were not inferiour to others in strength of body, in courage, or in good Souldiership, thought it good reason that they should in like manner share the gouernment, with their friends the Thebans; and not alwaies continue followers of others, by increasing whose greatnesse they should strengthen their owne yoke. Hereupon they beganne to demean themselves very insolently, whereby they grew hateful to their Neighbors, and suspected of the Thebans in an ill time. For a motion of generall peace hauing bene made (which tooke not effect, because the Citie of Messene was not abandoned to the Lacedemonians) the next enterprize of the Spartans and their friends was vpon these Arcadians, who relying too much vpon their owne worth, were were ouerthrowne in a great battaile, their calamitie being as pleasing to their Confederates, as to their Enemies.

§. IIII.

The great growth of the Theban Estate. Embassages of the Greekes to the Persian; with the reasons why he most fauoured the Thebans. Troubles in the Persian Empire. The fruitlesse issue of the Embassages.

THE Thebans especially reioyced at the Arcadians misfortune, considering, that, without their aide, the successe of all enterprises proued so ill; whereas they themselves had by their owne power accomplished very well whatsoeuer they took in hand, and were become not onely victorious ouer the Lacedemonians, but patrons ouer the Thessalonians, and moderatours of the great quarrels that had risen in Macedonia; where compounding the differences about that Kingdome, as pleased them best, they carried Philip the Sonne of Amyntas, and Father of Alexander the Great, as an Hostage vnto Thebes. Hauing therefore obtained such reputation, that little seemed wanting to make them absolute Commanders of all Greece, they sought meanes of alliance with the Persian King, to whom they sent Embassadour the great and famous Capitaine Pelopidas, whose reputation drew Artaxerxes to grant vnto the Thebans all that they desired; whereof two especiall points were, That Messene should remaine free from the Lacedemonians, and that the Athenians should forbear to send their ships of Warre to Sea; onely the latter of these two was somewhat qualified with reference to further aduice. The other States of Greece did also send their Embassadours at the same time, of whom few or none receiued much contentment. For the King hauing found by long experience, how farre it concerned him to maintaine a sure partie in Greece, did vpon many weightie considerations resolue, to binde the Thebans firmly vnto him; iustly expecting, that their greatnesse should be on that side his owne securitie. The Athenians had bene ancient enemies to his Crowne; and hauing turned the profit of their victories vpon the Persian to the purchase of a great Estate in Greece, maintained their Signorie in such puissant manner, that (sundry grieuous misfortunes notwithstanding) they had endured a terrible warre, wherein the Lacedemonians being followed by most of the Greekes, and supplied with treasure, and all sorts of aide by Darius Noshus, were not able to vanquish them, till their owne indiscretion brought them on their knees. The Lacedemonians being victorious ouer Athens, had no sooner established their Dominion at home, than they undertooke the conquest of Asia, from which though by the commotion raised in Greece with Persian gold, they were called backe, yet hauing renewed their power, and settled things in Greece, it was not vnlkely, that they should vpon the next aduantage haue pursued the same enterprife, had not they bene empeached by this Theban Warre. But the Thebans contrariwise had alwayes discouered a good affection to the Crowne of Persia. They had sided with Xerxes in his inuasion of Greece; with Darius and the Lacedemonians against Athens: And finally, hauing offered much contumelie to Agesilaus when he put to Sea, they drew him home by making warre on the Confederates of Sparta. Besides all these their good desertings, they were no Sea-men, and therefore vnlkely to looke abroad; whereupon if perchance they should haue any desire, yet were they disabled by the want of good haue townes, which they could not seize vpon without open breach of that peace, whereof they intended to become the Executors, giuing liberty to all Cities that had at any time bene free. Wherefore Artaxerxes did wholly condescend vnto their requests of Pelopidas, as farre forth as he might without giuing open defiance to the rest of Greece; and by that meane he purchased his owne quiet, being neuer afterward molested by that Nation in the lower Asia. The ill meane which the Greekes had to disturbe Artaxerxes, was very beneficiall to the Estate of Persia shortly after these times, in that great rebellion of all the Maritime Provinces. For had then the affaires of Greece bene so composed, that any one Citie might without empeachment of the rest haue transported an Armie, to assist the reuolting Satraps, or Viceroyes of Caria, Phrygia, Lydia, Mysia, Lycia, Pisidia, Pamphilia, Cilicia, Syria, and Phoenicia; humane reason can hardly finde the meane, by which the Empire could haue bene preserved from that ruine, which the diuine Counsell had deferred vnto the dayes of Alexander. But this great conspiracie of so many large and wealthy Provinces, wanting ting a firme body of good and hardy Souldiers, was in short space discaused and vanished like a mist, without effect: these effeminate Asiaticques wearied quickly with the troubles and dangers incident to warre, forsaking the common cause, and each man struing to be the first, that by treason to his company should both redeeme the former treason to his Prince, and purchase withall his owne promotion with encrease of riches. Of this commotion, which in course of time followed some actions not as yet related, I haue rather chosen to make short mention in this place, than hereafter to interrupt the Narration of things more important, but for that it was like a sudden storme, rashly commenced, idly followed, and foolishly layed downe, hauing made a great noise without effect, and hauing small reference to any other action regardible; as also because in the whole reigne of Artaxerxes, from the warre of Cyrus, to the inuasion of Egypte, I finde nothing (this insurrection, and a fruitlesse iourney against the Cadusians excepted) worthy of any mention; much lesse of digression from the course of the businesse in Greece. All, or the most of his time passed away so quietly, that he enioyed the pleasures which an Empire so great and wealthy could afford vnto so absolute a Lord, with little disturbance. The troubles which he found were onely or chiefly Domestickall; growing out of the hatred which Parsatis the Queene-Mother bare vnto his wife Statira, and to such as had bene the greatest enemies to her sonne Cyrus, or gloried in his death: vpon whom, when by poyson and mischieuous practices she had satisfied her feminine appetite of reuenge; thenceforth she wholly applyed her selfe to the Kings disposition, cherishing in him the lewd desire of marrying his owne Daughter, and filling him with the perdition, which Princes, not endued with an especiall grace, doe readily entertaine: That his owne will was the supreme law of his subiect, and the rule by which all things were to be measured and adiudged to be good or euill. In this imagine happinesse Pelopidas, and the other Embassadours of Greece, both found and left him; but left him by so much more assured than they found him, by how much the conclusion of his Treatie with them, being altogether to his owne aduantage, did seeme to promise, if not the perpetuities, a long endurance of the same felicity to him and his, or (at the least) a full security of danger from Greece, whence onely could any danger be feared. But such foundations of eternitie laied by mortall men in this transitory world, like the Tower of Babel, are either shaken from heauen, or made vaine and vnprofitable, ere the frame can be raised to full height, by confusion of tongues among the builders. Hereof was found a good example in the Thebans, and other Estates of Greece that had sent Embassadours to the Persian. For whereas it had bene concluded, that all Townes, as well the little as the great, should be set at liberty, and the Thebans made Protectors of this common peace, who thereby should become the Iudges of all controuersies that might arise, and Leaders in warre of all that would enter into this Confederacy, the Kings letters being solemnly published at Thebes, in the presence of Embassadours, drawne thither from all parts of Greece, when an oath was required for obseruation of the forme of peace therein set downe, a dilatorie answer was made by the Embassadours, who said, that they were sent to heare the articles, not to swear vnto them. Hereby the Thebans were driuen to send vnto each of the Cities to require the Oath; But in vaine. For when the Corinthians had boldly refused it, saying, That they did not neede it; others tooke courage by their example to doe the like, disappointing the Thebans of their glorious hopes, to whom this negotiation with Artaxerxes gaue neither addition nor confirmation of greatnesse, but left them as it found them to relie vpon their owne swords.

§. V.

How all Greece was diuided, betweene the Athenians and Lacedemonians, on the one side, and Thebans on the other. Of the great tumults rising in Arcadia.

THE condition of things in Greece at that time did stand thus. Athens and Sparta, which in former times had commanded all that Nation, and each vpon the enuie of the others greatnesse drawne all their followers into a cruell intestine warre, by which the whole Countrey, and especially the Estate of these two Cities, was brought very low, did now conioyne their forces against the Thebans, who sought to make themselves Lords of all. The Eleans, Corinthians, and Achaians, followed the party of these ancient governing Cities; either for the old reputation of them, & benefits receiued, or in dislike dislike of those, who by strong hand were ready to become Rulers, to which authority they could not suddenly aspire without some iniurie and much enuie. The Citie of Thebes abounding with men, whom necessitie had made warlike, & many victories in few yeeres had filled with great spirits; and being so mighty in dependants, that she had reduced all the continent of Greece without Peloponnesus (the Region of Attica, and very little part beside excepted) vnder such acknowledgement, as wanted not much of meere Vassallage, did hope to bring all Peloponnesus to the like obedience, wherein already she had set good footing by her coniunction with the States of Argos, and of Arcadia. The Argives had bene alwayes bad Neighbours to the Spartans, to whom they thought themselves in ancient Nobilitie Superiours, but were farre vnder them in valour, hauing bene often beaten out of the field by them, and put in danger of losing all: which caused them to suspect and enuie nothing more than the greatnesse and honour of Sparta, taking truce with her when she was at rest, and had leisure to bend her whole force against them; but firmly ioyning with her enemies whensoever they found her entangled in a difficult Warre. As the Argives were, in hatred of Sparta, sure friends of Thebes, so the Arcadians, transported with a great opinion of their owne worthinesse, had formerly renounced and prouoked against them their old Confederates and Leaders, the Lacedemonians, and were now become very doubtfull adherents to the Thebans. In which regard it was thought conuenient by Epaminondas, and the State of Thebes, to send an Armie into Peloponnesus, before such time as these wauering friends should fall further off, and become either Neutrall, or, which was to be feared open enemies. And surely great cause there was to suspect the worst of them, considering that without consent of the Thebans, they had made peace with Athens, which was very strange, & seemed no lesse to the Athenians themselves, who holding a firme league with Sparta at the same time when the Arcadians treated with them, did neuertheless accept this new Confederacy, not relinquishing the old, because they found that, howsoever these Arcadians were enemies to the Lacedemonians, they should hereby be drawne somewhat further from their alliance with Thebes, which without them was vnlikely to inuade Peloponnesus with a strong Armie. But this did rather hasten, than by any means stay, the comming of Epaminondas; who finding the way somewhat more cleare for him (because the Citie of Gorinth, which lay vpon the Isthmus, and had bene aduerse to Thebes, was now, by miseries of this grieuous warre, driuen to become Neutrall) tooke occasion hereby, and by some disorders among the Arcadians, to visit Peloponnesus with an Armie, consisting of all the power of Thebes. A great tumult had risen in Arcadia about consecrated money; which many principall men among them had laied hands on, vnder pretence of employing it to publike vses. In compounding the differences growne vpon this occasion, such, as had least will to render account of the money which had come into their hands, procured the Captaine of some Theban Souldiers, lying in Tegea, to take prisoners many of their Countymen, as people desirous of innouation. This was done: but the uproare thereby caused was so great, that the prisoners were forth-with enlarged, and the Arcadians, who had in great numbers taken Armes, with much a-doe scarce pacified. When complaint of the Captaines proceedings came to Thebes, Epaminondas turned all the blame vpon them, who had made the peace with Athens, letting them know that he would be shortly among them, to iudge of their fidelity, by the assistance which they should giue him, in that warre, which he intended to make in Peloponnesus. These Lordly words did greatly amaze the Arcadians; who needing not the aide of so mighty a power as he drew a-long with him, did vehemently suspect that great preparation to be made against themselves. Hereupon such of them as had before sought meanes to settle the affaires of their Countrey, by drawing things to some good conclusion of peace, did now forth-with send to Athens for helpe, and withall dispatched some of the principall among them as Embassadors to Sparta, by whom they offered themselves to the common defence of Peloponnesus, now ready to be inuaded. This Embassage brought much comfort to the Lacedemonians, who feared nothing more than the comming of Epaminondas, against whom they well knew, that all their forces, and best prouisions, would be no more than very hardly sufficient. Forbearing therefore to dispute about prerogatives, they (who had bene accustomed vnto such a supremacie, as they would in no wise communicate with the powerfull Citie of Athens, till other hope of securing their owne Estate could not be thought vpon) did now very gently yeelde to the Arcadians, that the the command of the Army in chiefe, should be giuen, for the time, to that Citie, in whose Territorie it lay.

§. VI.

A terrible inuasion of Peloponnesus by Epaminondas.

Erraine it is, that the condition of things did at that time require a very firme consent, and vniforme care of the common safetie. For beside the great forces raised out of the other parts of Greece, the Argives and Messenians, prepared with all their strength to ioyne with Epaminondas; who hauing lien a while at Nemee, to intercept the Athenians, receiued there intelligence, that the Armie comming from Athens would passe by Sea, whereupon he dislodged, and came to Tegea, which Citie, and the most of all Arcadia besides, forthwith declared themselves his. The common opinion was, that the first attempt of the Thebans, would be vpon such of the Arcadians as had revolted; which caused the Lacedemonian Captaines to fortifie Mantineea with all diligence, and to send for Agefilas to Sparta, that he bringing with him all that small force of able men which remained in the Towne, they might be strong enough to abide Epaminondas there. But Epaminondas held so good espiall vpon his Enemies, that had not an vnknowne fellow brought hasty aduertisement of his purpose to Agefilas, who was then well onward in the way to Mantineea, the Citie of Sparta had suddenly bene taken. For thither with all speede and secrecie did the Thebans march, who had surely carried the Citie, notwithstanding any defence that could haue bene made by that handfull of men remaining within it; but that Agefilas in all flying haste got into it with his Companies, whom the Armie of his Confederates followed thither to the rescue as fast as it was able. The arriual of the Lacedemonians and their friends, as it cut off all hope from Epaminondas of taking Sparta, so it presented him with a faire aduantage vpon Mantineea. It was the time of Haruest, which made it very likely, that the Mantineans, finding the warre to be carried from their wals into another quarter, would vse the commoditie of that vacation, by fetching in their corne, and turning out their cattell into their fields, whilest no enemy was neere that might empeach them. Wherefore he turned away from Sparta to Mantineea, sending his horse-men before him, to seize vpon all that might be found without the Citie. The Mantineans (according to the expectation of Epaminondas) were scattered abroad in the Countrey; farre more intent vpon their haruest-businesse, than vpon the warre, whereof they were secure, as thinking themselves out of distance. By which presumption it fell out, that great numbers of them, and all their Cattell, being vnable to recover the Towne, were in a desperate case; and the Towne it selfe in no great likelihood of holding out, when the enemy should haue taken all their prouision of victuals with so many of the people, as had not ouer-deerly bene redeemed, by that Citie returning to societie with Thebes. But at the same time, the Athenians comming to the succour of their Confederates, whom they thought to haue found at Mantineea, were very earnestly entreated by the Citizens to rescue their goods, and people, from the danger whereinto they were fallen, if it were possible by any couragious aduerture to deliuer those who otherwise were giuen as lost. The Thebans were knowne at that time to be the best Souldiers of all the Greekes, and the commendation of good horsemanship had alwayes bene giuen to the Thessalians, as excelling in that qualitie all other Nations; yet the regard of honour so wrought vpon the Athenians, that for the reputation of their Citie, which had entred into this warre, vpon no necessitie of her owne, but only in desire of relieuing her distressed friends, they issued forth of Mantineea, not abiding so long as to refresh themselves, or their horses with meate, and giuing a lustie charge vpon the enemy, who as brauely receiued them, after a long and hot fight, they remained masters of the field, giuing by this victory a safe and easie retreat to all that were without the wals. The whole power of the Boeotians arrived in the place soone after this battaile, whom the Lacedemonians and their Assistants were not farre behinde.

§. VII.

Epaminondas, considering that his Commission was almost now expired, and that his attempts of surprising Sparta and Mantinea, having failed, the impression of terrour which his name had wrought in the Peloponnesians, would soone vanish, vnlesse by some notable act he should abate their courage in their first growth, and leaue some memorable character of his expedition; resolved to giue them battaile, whereby he reasonably hoped both to settle the doubtfull affections of his owne Associates, and to leaue the Spartans as weake in spirit and abilitie, as he found them, if not wholly to bring them into subiection. Having therefore warned his men to prepare for that battaile, wherein victory should be rewarded with Lordship of all Greece; and finding the alacritie of his Souldiers to be such as promised the accomplishment of his owne desire; he made shew of declining the enemy, and intrenching himselfe in a place of more aduantage, that so by taking from them all expectation of fighting that day, he might allay the heate of their valour, and afterward strike their senses with amazement, when he should come vpon them vnexpected. This opinion deceived him not. For with very much tumult, as in so great and sodaine a danger, the enemy ran to Armes, necessity enforcing their resolution, and the consequence of that dayes seruice vrging them to doe as well as they might. The Theban Armie consisted of thirty thousand foot, and three thousand horse; the Lacedemonians and their friends were short of this number, both in horse and in foot, by a third part. The Mantineans (because the warre was in their Countie) stood in the right wing, and with them the Lacedemonians: the Athenians had the left wing; the Achaans, Eleans, and others of lesse account, filled the body of the Armie. The Thebans stood in the left wing of their owne battaile, oppositeto the Lacedemonians, hauing by them the Arcadians; the Eubceans, Locrians, Sicyonians, Messenians, and Thessalians with others, compounding the maine battaile; the Argiues held the right wing; the horse-men on each part were placed in the flanks, one ly a troupe of the Eleans were in reare. Before the footmen could ioyn, the encounter of the horse on both sides was very rough, wherein finally the Thebans preuailed, notwithstanding the valiant resistance of the Athenians: who not yeelding to the enemy either in courage or skill, were ouer-laid with numbers, and so beaten vpon by Thessalian slings, that they were driuen to forsake the place, and leaue their infanterie naked. But this retreat was the lesse disgracefull, because they kept themselves together, and did not fall backe vpon their owne foot-men; but finding the Theban horse to haue giuen them ouer, and withall discouering some Companies of foot, which had bene sent about by Epaminondas, to charge their battaile in the reare, they brake vpon them, routed them, and hewed them all in peeces. In the meane season the battaile of the Athenians had not onely to doe with the Argiues, but was hardly pressed by the Theban Horsemen, in such wise that it began to open, and was ready to turne backe, when the Elean Squadron of Horse came vp to the reliefe of it, and restored all on that part. With farre greater violence did the Lacedemonians and Thebans meete, these contending for Dominion, the other for the maintenance of their ancient honour, so that equall courage and equall losse on both sides made the hope and appearance of victory to either equally doubtfull: vnlesse perhaps the Lacedemonians being very firme abiders, might seeme the more likely to preuaile, as hauing borne the first brunt and furie of the on-set, which was not hitherto remitted; and being framed by Discipline, as it were by Nature, to excell in patience, whereof the Thebans, by practice of a few yeeres, cannot be thought to haue gotten a habite so sure and generall. But Epaminondas perceiving the obstinate stiffnesse of the Enemies to be such, as neither the bad successe of their owne horse, nor all the force of the Boeotian Armie, could abate so farre, as to make them giue one foote of ground: taking a choise Companie of the most able men, whom he cast into the forme of a Wedge, or Diamond, by the aduantage of that figure against a Squadron, and by his owne exceeding vertue, accompanied with the great strength and resolution of them which followed him, did open their ranks, and cleaue the whole battaile in despite of all resistance. Thus was the honour of that day won by the Thebans, who who may iustly be said to haue carried the victory, seeing that they remained Masters of the ground whereon the battaile was fought, hauing driuen the Enemy to lodge farther off. For that which was alleaged by the Athenians, as a token that the victory was partly theirs, the slaughter of those Mercenaries vpon whom they lighted by chance in their owne flight, finding them behinde their Armie, and the retaining of their dead bodies; it was a Ceremonie regardable onely among the Greekes, and serued merely for ostentation, shewing that by the fight they had obtained somewhat, which the Enemy could not get from them otherwise than by request. But the Thebans arrived at the generall immediate end of battaile; none daring to abide them in the field: whereof a manifest confession is expressed from them, who forsake the place which they had chosen or accepted, as indifferent for triall of their abilitie and prowesse. This was the last worke of the incomparable vertue of Epaminondas, who being in the head of that Warlike troupe of men, which broke the Lacedemonian Squadron, and forced it to giue backe in disaray, was furiously charged on the sodaine, by a desperate Company of the Spartans, who all at once threw their Darts at him alone; whereby receiuing many wounds, he neuertheless with a singular courage maintained the fight, vsing against the Enemies many of their Darts, which he drew out of his owne body; till at length by a Spartan, called Anticrates, he receiued so violent a stroke with a Dart, that the wood of it brake, leaving the yron and a peece of the tronchion in his brest. Hereupon he sunke downe, and was soone conuighed out of the fight by his friends; hauing by his fall somewhat animated the Spartans (who faine would haue got his body,) but much more inflamed with reuengefull indignation, the Thebans, who raging at this heauie mischance did with great slaughter compell their disordered enemies to leaue the field; though long they followed not the chase, being wearied more with the sadnesse of this disaster, than with all the trauaile of the day. Epaminondas being brought into his Tent, was told by the Physicians, That when the head of the Dart should be drawne out of his body, he must needs dye. Hearing this, he called for his shield, which to haue lost, was held a great dishonour: It was brought vnto him. He bad them tell him which part had the victory; answere was made, that the Boeotians had won the field. Then said he, It is faire time for me to dye, and withall sent for Lolidas, and Diophantes, two principall men of Warre, that were both slaine; which being told him, Hee aduised the Thebans to make Peace, whilst with aduantage they might, for that they had none left that was able to discharge the office of a Generall. Herewithall he willed, that the head of the weapon should be drawne out of his body; comforting his friends that lamented his death, and want of issue, by telling them, that the victories of Leuctra and Mantinea were two faire Daughters, in whom his memory should liue.

So died Epaminondas, the worthiest man that euer was bred in that Nation of Greece, and hardly to be matched in any Age or Countie: for he equalled all others in the severall vertues, which in each of them were singular. His Iustice, and Sincerity, his Temperance, Wisedome, and high Magnanimity, were no way inferior to his Militarie vertue; in euery part whereof he so excelled, that he could not properly be called a Warriour, a Valiant, a Politique, a Bountifull, or an Industrious, and a Proud Captain. Neither was his priuate Conuersation vnanswerable to those high parts, which gaue him praise abroad. For he was Graue, and yet very Affable and Curteous; resolute in publique businesse, but in his owne particular casse, and of much mildnesse: a lover of his People, bearing with mens infirmities, wittie and pleasant in speech, farre from insolence, Master of his owne affections, and furnished with all qualities, that might be desired. To these Graces were added great abilitie of bodie, much Eloquence, & very deepe knowledge in all parts of Philosophy and Learning, wherewith his minde being enlightened, rested not in the sweetnesse of Contemplation, but brake forth into such effects as gaue vnto Thebes, which had euer more been an vnderling, a dreadfull reputation among all people adjoining, and the highest command in Greece.

§. VIII.

Of the peace concluded in Greece after the battaile of Mantinea. The voyage of Agesilaus into Egypt. His death, and qualities; with an examination of the comparison made betweene him and Pompey the Roman.

His battaile of Mantinea was the greatest that had euer beene fought in that Countrey betweene the Naturals; and the last. For at Marathon, and Plataea, the populous Armies of the barbarous Nations gaue rather a great fame, than a hard triall to the Græcian valour; neither were the practice of Armes and Art Militarie, so perfect in the beginnings of the Peloponnesian Warre, as long continuance and daily exercise had now made them. The times following produced no actions of worth or moment, those excepted which were vnderaken against forraine enemies, prouing for the most part vnfortunate. But in this last fight all Greece was interessed, which neuer had more able Souldiers, and braue Commanders, nor euer contended for victory with greater care of the successe, or more obstinate resolution. All which notwithstanding the issue being such as hath bene related, it was found best for euery particular Estate, that a generall peace should be established, euery one retaining what he presently had, and none being forced to depend vpon another. The Messenians were by name comprised in this new league, which caused the Lacedæmonians not to enter into it. Their standing out hindred not the rest from proceeding to conclusion, considering that Sparta was now too weake to offend her Neighbours, and therefore might well be allowed to shew that anger in ceremonies, which had no power to declare it selfe in execution. This peace, as it gaue some breath and refreshing to all the Countrey, so to the Cities of Athens and Sparta it afforded leifure to seeke after wealth by forraine employment in Egypt, whither Agesilaus was sent with some small forces to assist, or indeede, as a Mercenarie, to serue vnder Tachos King of Egypt in his warre vpon Syria. Chabrias the Athenian, who had before commanded vnder Acoris King of Egypt, went now as a voluntary, with such forces as he could raise, by entreatie, and offer of good pay, to the same seruice. These Egyptian Kings descended from Amyriæus of Sais, who rebelled against Darius Nothus, hauing retained the Countrey, notwithstanding all intestine dissensions, and forraine inuasions, during three Generations of their owne race, were so well acquainted with the valour of the Greekes, that by their helpe (easily procured with gold) they conceiued great hope, not onely to assure themselves, but to become Lords of the Provinces adioyning, which were held by the Persian. What the issue of this great enterprise might haue bene, had it not fallen by Domestickall rebellion, it is vncertaine. But very likely it is, that the rebellion it selfe had soone come to nothing, if Agesilaus had not proued a false Traitor, ioyning with Nectanebus, who rose against his Prince, and helping the Rebelle with that Armie which the money of Tachos had waged. This fallhood Agesilaus excused, as tending to the good of his owne Countrey; though it seeme rather, that he grudged because the King tooke vpon himselfe the Conduct of the Armie, vsing his seruice onely as Lieutenant, who had made full accompt of being appointed the Generall. How soeuer it came to passe, Tachos being shamefully betrayed by them, in whom he had reposed his chiefe confidence, fled vnto the Persian, who vpon his submission gaue him gentle entertainment; and Nectanebus (who seemes to haue bene the Nephew of Tachos) reigned in his stead. At the same time the Citizens of Mendes had set vpon another King, to whom all, or most of the Egyptians yeelded their obedience. But Agesilaus fighting with him in places of aduantage, preuailed so farre, that he left Nectanebus in quiet possession of the Kingdom; who in recompence of his treason to the former King Tachos, and good seruice done to himselfe, rewarded him with two hundred and thirtie Talents of siluer, with which bootie sailed homewards, he died by the way. He was a Prince very temperate, and valiant, and a good Leader in Warre, free from couetousnesse, and not reproached with any blemish of lust; which praises are the lesse admirable in him, for that the discipline of Sparta was such as did endue euery one of the Citizens (not carried away by the violent streame of an ill nature) with all, or the chiefe, of these good qualities. He was neuerthelessse very arrogant, peruerse, vniust and vaine-glorious, measuring all things by his owne will, and obstinately prosecuting those courtes, whose ends were beyond hope. The expedition of Xenophon had filled him him with an opinion, that by his hand the Empire of Persia should be ouerthrowne, with which conceit being transported, and finding his proceedings interrupted by the Thebans and their Allies, he did euer after beare such hatred vnto Thebes, as compelled that Estate by meere necessity to grow war-like, and able, to the vtter dishonour of Sparta, and the irreparable losse of all her former greatnesse. The commendations given to him by Xenophon his good friend, haue caused Plutarch to lay his name in the ballance against Pompey the Great; whose actions (the soleme grauity of carriage excepted) are very disproportionable. Yet we may truely say, That as Pompey made great warres vnder sundry Climates, and in all the Prouinces of the Roman Empire, exceeding in the multitude of imployments all that were before him; so Agesilaus had at one time or other, some quarrell with euery Towne in Greece, had made a Warre in Asia, and medled in the businesse of the Egyptians, in which variety he went beyond all his Predecessours: yet not winning any Countreies, as Pompey did many, but obtaining large wages, which Pompey neuer tooke. Herein also they are very like: Each of them was the last great Captaine which his Nation brought forth in time of liberty, and each of them ruined the liberty of his Countrey by his owne Lordly wilfulnesse. We may therefore well say, Similia magis omnia quam paria; The resemblance was neerer then the equality. Indeed the freedome of Rome was lost with Pompey, falling into the hands of Cæsar, whom he had enforced to take Armes; yet the Roman Empire stood, the forme of Gouvernement onely being changed: But the liberty of Greece, or of Sparta it selfe, was not forsaied vnto the Thebans, whom Agesilaus had compelled to enter into a victorious warre; yet the Signiorie, and ancient renowne of Sparta was presently lost; and the freedome of all Greece being wounded in this Theban warre, and after much blood lost, ill healed by the peace ensuing, did very soone, vpon the death of Agesilaus, giue vp the Ghost, and the Lordship of the whole Countrey was seized by Philip King of Macedon, whose actions are now on foot, and more to be regarded than the Contemporarie passages of things, in any other Nation.

INTREATING OF THE TIMES FROM THE reigne of PHILIP of MACEDON, to the establishing of that Kingdome, in the race of ANTIGONVS.

THE FOVRTH BOOKE.

CHAP. I.

Of Philip the Father of Alexander the Great, King of Macedon.

§. I.

What Kings reigned in Macedon before Philip.

The Greekes, of whom we have already made large discourse, not as yet wearied with intestine Warre, nor made wise by their vaine contention for superiority, doe still as in former times, continue the inuasion and vastation of each other.

Against Xerxes, the greatest Monarch of that part of the World, their defended their libertie, with as happy success as euer Nation had, and with no lesse honour, than hath euer been acquired by deeds of Armes. And hauing had a tryall and experience, more then fortunate, against those Nations, they so little regarded what might come fro them, who had so often forfeited the reputation of their forces, as whatsoeuer could be spared from their owne distraction at home, they transported ouer the Hellepont, as sufficient, to entertaine and busie them withall.

But, as it commonly falleth out with euery man of mark in the world, that they vnderfall, and perish, by the hands and harmes which they least feare; so fared it at this time with the Greekes. For of Philip of Macedon (of whom we are now to speake) they had so little regard, as they grew euen then more violent in deuouring each other, when the fast-growing greatnesse of such a Neighbour-King, should, in regard of their owne safeties, haue serued them for a strong argument of vnion and accord. But the glory of their Persian victories, wherewith they were pampred and made proud, taught them to neglect all Nations but themselves, and the rather to value at little the power and purposes of the Macedonians, because those Kings and States, which sate neerer them than they did, had in the time of Amyntas, the Father of Philip, so much weakened them, and wonne vpon them, that they were not (as the Gracians perswaded themselves) in any one age, likely to recouer their owne, much lesse to worke any wonders against their borderers. And, indeed, it was not in their Philosophie to consider, That all great alterations are storme-like, suddaine, and violent; and that it is then ouer-late to repaire the decayed and broken banks, when great Riuers are once swollen, fast-running, and inriaged. No, the Greekes did rather imploy themselves, in breking downe those defences, which stood betweene them and this inuasion, than seeke to rampare and re-enforce their owne fields, which by the Leuell of reason they might haue found to haue lien vnder it. It was therefore well concluded by Orosius: Gracia Ciuitates imperare singule cupiant, imperium omnes perdidit; The Cities of Greece lost their commaund, by strining each of them to commaund all.

The Kingdome of Macedon, so called of Macedon, the sonne of Osrus, or, as other Authors affirme, of Iupiter and Ethra, is the next Region towards the North which bordereth Greece; It hath to the East, the Aegean Sea; it is bounded on the North and North-west by the Thracians and Illyrians; and on the South and South-west, by the Thes- salie and Epirus. Their Kings were of the family of Temenus, of the race of Hercules, and by nation Argues; who are listed as followeth. About some sixe yeates after the translation of the Assyrian Empire, Arbaces then gouerning Media; Caranus of Argos, commanded by an Oracle, to leade a Colonie into Macedon, departed thence with many people, and as he was marching through that Country, the weather being raynie and tempestuous, he espied a great heard of Goats, which fled the storme as fast as they could, hasting them to their knowne place of couert. Whereupon Caranus, calling to minde, that he had also by another Oracle bene directed, to follow the first troupe of beasts, that should eyther leade him, or flie before him; He pursued these Goates to the Gates of Edessa, and being vndiscovered by the Inhabitants, by reason of the darkenesse of the aire, he entred their Citie without resistance, and posselt it. Soone after this, by the ouerthrow of Cisse- us, Caranus became Lord of the rest of Macedon, and held it eight and twentie yeeres. Cenus succeeded Caranus; and reigned twelue yeeres. Tyrimas followed Cenus, and ruled eight and twentie yeeres.

Perdiccas the first, the sonne of Tyrimas, gouerned one and fiftie yeeres: a Prince, for his great valour, and many other vertues, much renowned. Solinus, Plinie, Iustine, Eusebius, Theophilus, Antiochenus, and others affirme, that he appoynted a place of buriall for himselfe, and for all the Kings of Macedon his Successours, at Age: assuring them, that the Kingdome should so long continue in his line and race, as they continued to lay vp their bodies in that Sepulchre; wherein it is said, that because Alexander the great failed, therefore the posteritie of the Temenide failed in him: a thing rather deuised after the effect, as I conceiue, then fore-told by Perdiccas.

Argus succeeded vnto Perdiccas, and ruled eight and twentie yeeres.

Philip the first, his successour, reigned eight and twentie yeeres.

Europus followed Philip, and gouerned six and twentie yeeres: in whose infancie the Illyrians inuaded Macedon, and hauing obtained a great victorie, they pursued the same to the great danger of that State. Whereupon the Macedonians, gathering new forces, and resoluing either to recouer their former losse, or to lose at once both their Kingdome and their King, they carried him with them in his Cradle into the field, and returned victorious; for they were either confident that their nation could not be beaten (their King being present); or rather they perswaded themselves that there was no man so void of honour and compassion, as to abandon their naturall Lord, being an infant, and no way (but by the hands of his seruants) able to defend himselfe from destruction. The like is reported by Aimonius of Clotarius the sonne of Fredegunda.

Alcetas succeeded Europus, and ruled nine and twentie yeeres.

Amyntas the first succeeded Alcetas, and reigned fiftie yeeres; He liued at such time as Darius Hystaspes, after his vnprosperous returne out of Scythia, sent Megabazus with an Armie into Europe, who in Xerxes name required Amyntas to acknowledge him for his Supreme Lord, by yeelding vnto him Earth and Water. But his Embassadors, as you haue heard before, were, for their insolent behaitour towards the Macedonian Ladies, slaine by the direction of Alexander, who was the sonne of Amyntas, and his Successour.

Alexander, surnamed the Rich, the sonne of Amyntas, gouerned Macedon three and fortie yeeres. He did not onely appease the wrath of Megabazus, for the slaughter of the Persian Embassadours, by giuing Gygea his Sister, to Bubares of the bloud of Persia, but by that match hee grew so great in Xerxes grace, as hee obtained all that Region betwene the Mountaines of Olympus and Hemus, to be vnto the Kingdome of Macedon. Yet could not these benefites buy his affection from the Greekes. For Xerxes being returned into Asia, and Mardonius made Generall of the Persian Armie, Alexander acquainted the Greekes with all his intents and purposes against them. He had three sonnes, Perdiccas, Alcetas, and Philip.

Perdiccas the second, the sonne of Alexander, liued in the time of the Peloponnesian Warre, and reigned in all eight and twentie yeeres. The Warres which he made were not much remarkable: the storie of them is found here and there by pieces in Thucydides his first six bookes. He left behind him two sonnes; Perdiccas, who was very yong, and Archelaus, who was base borne.

Perdiccas the third, being deliuered to the custody and care of Archelaus, was at seuen yeeres of age cast into a Well and drowned by his false Guardian: who excusing this fact to Cleopatra the mother of the young King, said, That the child in following a Goose hastily, fell thereinto by misaduenture. But Archelaus stayed not here: for hauing thus dispatched his brother, he slew both his Vncle Alcetas the sonne of Alexander the Rich, and Alexander the sonne of this Alcetas his Cousen Germaine, & enioyed the Kingdome of Macedon himselfe foure and twentie yeeres.

This Archelaus, of whom both Plato and Aristotle make mention, though he made himselfe King by wicked murder, yet he performed many things greatly to the profit of his Nation. It is said, That he sought by all meanes to draw Socrates vnto him, and that he greatly loued and honored Eurypides the Tragedian. He had two sons, Archelaus and Orestes.

Archelaus the second succeeded his Father, and hauing reigned seuen yeeres, hee was slaine in hunting, either by chance, or of purpose by Craeus.

Orestes his younger sonne was committed to the education of Eropus, of the royall bloud of Macedon, and had the same measure which Archelaus had measured to his Pupill, for Eropus murdered him and vsurped the Kingdome, which hee held some fixe yeeres: the same who denied passage to Agefilaus King of Sparta, who desired after his returne from the Asian expedition, to passe by the way of Macedon into Greece.

This Vsurper left three sonnes, Pausanias, Argæus, and Alexander. Pausanias succeeded his father Eropus, and hauing reigned one yeere, hee was drinen out by Amyntas the son of Philip, the son of the first Perdiccas, the son of Alexander the Rich, which Philip was then preferred, when Archelaus the Bastard slew his brother Perdiccas, his Vncle Alcetas, and his sonne Alexander. This Amyntas reigned (though very vnquietly) foure and twentie yeeres, for he was not only infested by Pausanias, assisted by the Thracians, and by his brother Argæus, encouraged by the Illyrians; and by the said Argæus, for two yeeres dispossest of Macedon: but on the other side, the Olynthians, his Neighbors neare the Egean Sea, made themselves for a while Masters of Pella, the chiefe Citie of Macedon.

Amyntas the second had by his Wife Eurydice the Illyrian, three Sonnes; Alexander the second, Perdiccas the third, and Philip the second, Father of Alexander the Great; and one Daughter called Euryone or Exione: Hee had also by his second Wife Gygea, three Sonnes; Archelaus, Argæus, and Menelaus, afterward slaine by their brother Philip: He had more by a Concubine, Ptolomie, surnamed Alorites, of the Citie Alorus, wherein he was borne.

Alexander the second reigned not much aboue one yeere, in which time he was inuaded by Pausanias, the sonne of Eropus, but defended by Iphicrates the Athenian, while hee was at that time about Amphipolis. He was also constrained (for the payment of a great summe of mony) to leaue his yongest brother Philip in Hostage with the Illyrians, who had subiected his father Amyntas to the payment of tribute. After this, Alexander, being inuited by the Aleuada against Alexander the Tyrant of Pheres in Thessaly, hauing redeemed his brother Philip; to draw the Thebans to his assistance, entred into confederacie with Pelopidas, being at that time in the same Countrey, with whom hee also left Philip with diuers other principall persons for the gage of his promises to Pelopidas. But Eurydice his mother falling in loue with her Sonne-in-law, who had married her Daughter Daughter Euryone or Exione, practized the death of Alexander her sonne, with a purpose to conferre the Kingdome on her Paramour, which Ptolomy Alorites did put in execution: by meanes whereof hee held Macedon for three yeeres; but was soone after slaine by Perdiccas the brother of Alexander. Diodore hath it otherwise of Philip being made pledge; and sayth, That Amyntas his Father deliuered him for hostage to the Illyrians, by whom he was conueyed to Thebes, there to be kept: others report that Philip (while his father was yet liuing) was first ingaged to the Thebans, and deliuered for hostage a second time by Alexander his brother.

Perdiccas the third, after hee had slaine Alorites his base brother, gouerned Macedon five yeeres, and was then slaine in a battaile against the Illyrians, according to Diodorus; but Iustine affirmeth, that he perished by the practice of Eurydice his mother; as Alexander did.

§. II.

The beginning of Philips reigne; and how he deliuered Macedon from the troubles wherein he found it entangled.

Philip the second, the yongest sonne of Amyntas by Eurydice, hauing beene instructed in all knowledge requisite vnto the gouernment of a Kingdome, in that excellent education which he had vnder Epaminondas, making an escape from Thebes, returned into Macedon, in the first yeere of the hundred and fifti Olympiad, which was after the building of Rome three hundred fourscore and thirteene yeeres: and finding the many enemies and dangers wherewith the Kingdome was enuironed, hee tooke on him, not as King (for Perdiccas left a sonne, though but an infant) but as the Protector of his Nephew, and Commander of the men of Warre. Yet his fruitfull ambition soone ouer-grew his modestie, and hee was easily perswaded by the people to accept both the Title of King, and withall, the absolute Rule of the Kingdome. And to say the truth, The necessitie of the State of Macedon at that time required a King both prudent and actiue. For, besides the incursions of the Illyrians and Pannonians, the King of Thrace did set vp in opposition Pausanias, the Athenians, Argæus, Sonnes of the late Vsurper Eropus; each of these labouring to place in Macedon a King of their owne Election. These heauie burdens when Philip could not well beare, hee bought off the weightiest by money, and by faire promises vnload himselfe of so many of the rest, as hee ranne vnder the remainder happily enough. For, notwithstanding that his brother Perdiccas had his death accompanied with foure thousand Macedonians, beside these that were wounded and taken prisoners; and that the Pannonians were destroying all before them in Macedon; and that the Athenians with a flecte by Sea, and three thousand Souldiers by Land vnder Mantias, did beate vpon him on all sides and quarters of his Countrey: Yet after he had practised the men of warre of Pannonia; and corrupted them with gifts, and had also bought the King of Thrace from Pausanias, hee forthwith made head against the Athenians his stiffest enemies; and, for the first, he preuented their recouerie of Amphipolis, a Citie on the frontier of Macedon: and did then pursue Argæus the sonne of Eropus, set against him by the Athenians, and followed him so hard at the heeles, in his retrait from Eges, that hee forced him to abide the battaile: which Argæus lost, hauing the greatest part of his Army slaine in the place. Those of the Athenians, and others which remayned vnbroken, tooke the aduantage of a strong peece of ground at hand, which though they could not long defend, yet auoyding thereby the present furie of the Souldiers, they obtained of the vanquishers life and libertie to returne into Attica. Whereupon a peace was concluded betwene him and the Athenians for that present, and for this clemencie hee was greatly renowned and honoured by all the Greekes.

§. III.

The good successe which Philip had in many enterprises.

Now had Philip leisure to looke Northward, and to attend the Illyrians and Pannonians, his irreconcilable enemies and borderers: both which he inuaded with so prosperous successe, as he slew Bardillis, King of the Illyrians, with seven thousand of his Nation, and thereby reconquered all those places which the Illyrians held in Macedon: and withall, vpon the death of the King of Pannonia, he pierst that Countrey, and after a maine victory obtained, he enforced them to pay him tribute. This was no sooner done, than (without staying to take longer breath) he hastned speedily towards Larissa, vpon the Riuer Peneus in Thessalie, of which Towne he soone made himselfe master; and thereby he got good footing in that Countrey, whereof he made vse in time following. Now although he resolved either to subdue the Thessalians, or to make them his owne against all others, because the horse-men of that Countrey were the best, and most feared in that part of Europe; yet hee thought it most for his safety to close vp the entrances out of Thrace, least while he inuaded Thessalie and Greece towards the South, those ample Nations, lying towards the North, should either withdraw him, or ouer-runne Macedon, as in former times. He therefore attempted Amphipolis, seated on the famous Riuer of Strimon, which parteth Thrace from Macedon, and wonne it. He also recovered Pydna; and (to the North of Amphipolis) the City of Crenides (sometime Datus), and called it after his name Philippi: to the people whereof Saint Paul afterward directed one of his Epistles. This place, wherein Philippi stood, is very rich in mines of gold, out of which, greatly to the aduancement of Philips affaires, he drew yeerely a thousand talents, which make fixe hundred thousand French Crownes.

And that he might with the more ease disburden the Thracian shores of the Athenian Garrisons, to which he had giuen a great blow by the taking in of Amphipolis, he entred into league with his Fathers malicious enemies the Olynthians; whom the better to fasten vnto him, he gaue them the Citie of Pydna with the Territory, meaning nothing lesse than that they should enioy it, or their owne Estate, many yeeres.

Now that he might by degrees winne ground vpon the Greekes, he tooke the faire occasion to deliuer the City of Pheres in Thessalie, from the tyrants Lycophron and Tisiphonus: who, after they had conspired with Thebe the wife of Alexander, who vsurped vpon the liberty of that State, they themselues (Alexander being murdered) held it also by the same strong hand and oppression that Alexander did, till by the assistance of Philip they were beaten out, and Pheres restored to her former liberty. Which act of Philip did for-euer after fasten the Thessalians vnto him, and, to his exceeding great aduantage, binde them to his seruice.

§. IIII.

Of the Phocian Warre which first drew Philip into Greece.

ABout this time, to wit, in the second yeere of the hundred and sixth Olympiad, eight yeeres after the battaile of Mantineia, and about the eighth yeere of Alexander Ochus, beganne that Warre, called Sacred. Now, as all occasions concurre towards the execution of eternall prouidence, and of euery great alteration in the World there is some preceding preparation, though not at the first easily discerned; so did this reuengefull hatred by the Thebans, Thessalians, and Locrians, conceived against the Phocians, not onely teach Philip how he might with halfe a hand wrest the sword out of their fingers; but the Greekes themselues, beating downe their owne defences, to giue him an easie passage, and beating themselues, to giue him victory without perill, left nothing vnperformed towards their owne slavery, sauing the title and imposition. Of this Warre the Thebans (made ouer-proude by their victory at Leuctres) were the inflamers. For at the Councell of the Amphyziones, or of the generall Estates of Greece, in which, at that time, they swayed most, they caused both the Lacedaemonians and Phocians to bee condemned in greater summes of money than they could well beare; the one for surprizing the Castle of Cadmea in the time of peace, the other for ploughing vp a peece of ground belonging to the Temple of Delphos. The Phocians being resolved not to obey this Edict, were secretly set on and encouraged by the Lacedaemonians: and for refusal were exposed as Sacrilegiers, and accused to all their Neighbour-Nations, for whom it was then lawfull to inuade, and destroy them at their pleasures.

The Phocians perswaded thereunto by Philomelus, a Captaine of their owne, cast the same dice of hazzard that Cæsar after many Ages following did; but had not the same chance.

chance. Yet they dealt well enough with all the enemies of their owne Nation. And the better to beere out an vngracious quarrell, of which there was left no hope of composition, they resolved to sacke the Temple it selfe. For seeing that for the ploughing of a peece of Apollo's ground, they had so much offended their Neighbour-God, and their Neighbour-Nations, as worse could not befall them than already was intended; they resolved to take the gold with the ground, and either to perill for all, or to preuaile against all that had commission to call them to account. The treasure which they tooke out of the Temple in the beginning of the Warre, was tenne thousand talents, which in those dayes serued them to wage a great many men; and such was their successe in the beginning of the warre, as they wonne three great battailes against the Thebans, Thessalians, and Locrians; but being beaten in the fourth, their Leader Philomelus cast himselfe head-long ouer the Rocks.

In the meane while the Cities of Chersonesus, both to defend themselues against their bad neighbour Philip, who encroched vpon them, and to draw others into their quarrell, rendred themselues to the Athenians. Philip prepareth to get them into his hands, and at the siege of Methone lost one of his eyes. It is said, That hee that shor him, did purposely direct his arrow towards him, and that it was written on the shaft thereof: After Philippo; After to Philip; for so hee was called that gaue him the wound. This Citie he euened with the soile.

The Tyrant Lycophron before mentioned, while Philip was busied on the border of Thrace, and the Thessalians engaged in the holy warre, entred Thessalie with new forces, being assisted by Onomarchus, Commander of the Phocian Armie, in place of Philomelus. For hereby the Phocians hoped so to entertaine the Thessalians at home, as they should not find leisure to inuade them. Hereupon was Philip the second time called into Thessalie, but both the Thessalians, and Macedonians, (Philip being present) were venterly overthrowne by Onomarchus; and great numbers of both Nations lost. From Thessalie, Onomarchus drew speedily towards Beotia, and with the same victorious Armie brake the forces of the Beotians, and tooke from them their Citie of Coronea. But Philip impatient of his late misadventure, after hee had re-enforced his Armie, returned with all speed into Thessalie, there to find againe the honour which hee lately lost: and was the second time encountered by Onomarchus, who brought into the field twentie thousand foot, and five hundred horse. All this great preparation sufficed not; for Onomarchus was by Philip surmounted, both in numbers and in good fortune, his Armie ouerturned, fixe thousand slaine, and three thousand taken: of which number himselfe being one, was among others hanged by Philip. Those that fled, were in part receiued by the Athenian Gallies, which sailed alongt the coast, commanded by Chares; but the greatest number of those that tooke the Sea, were therein deuoured ere they recovered them. Lycophron was now againe driuen out of Thessalie, and Pheres made free as before.

§. V.

Of the Olynthian Warre. The ambitious practises of Philip.

Rom hence Philip resolved to inuade Phocis it selfe, but the Athenians did not fauour his entrance into those parts, and therefore with the helpe of the Lacedaemonians, they retrench his passage at the Streets of Thermopylis. Whereupon he returned into Macedon, and after the taking of Micyberne, Torone, and other Townes, he quarrelled with the Olynthians, whom not long before he had wooed to his alliance, and bought his peace of them. For the Olynthians were very strong, and had euermore both braued and beaten the Macedonians. It is said, that Philip hauing put to death Archelaus his halfe brother (for Amyntas had three sonnes by Eurydice the Mother of Philip, and three other sonnes by Gygæa: but Philips elder brothers by the same Mother being dead, he determined to rid himselfe also of the rest) the two yonger held themselues within Olynthus; and that the receiuing of them by the Olynthians was the cause of the war, Iustine affirmeth. But iust quarrels are ballanced by iust Princes, for to this King all things were lawfull that might serue his turne; all his affections, & passions, how diuers soeuer in other men, were in his ambition swallowed vp, and thereinto conuerted.

For

For he neither forbore the murder of his owne brothers, the breach of faith, the buying of other mens fidelitie; he esteemed no place strong where his Asse loaden with gold might enter: Nor any Citie or State vnconquerable, where a few of the greatest, to be made greater, could lose the sense of other mens sorrow and subiection. And because he thought it vaine to practise the winning of Olynthus, till he had inclosed all the power they had within their owne walls, he entred their Territorie; and by the aduantage of a well-compounded and trained Armie, he gaue them two ouerthrowes ere he came downe before the Citie it selfe: which done, he bought Euthicrates and Lasthenes from their people, and from the seruice of their Countrey and Common-weale, by whose reason he entred the Towne, slew his brothers therein, sackt it, and sold the inhabitants for slaues by the drum. By the spoile of this place he greatly enriched himselfe, and had treasure sufficient to buy in other Cities withall, which he daily did. For so was hee aduised by the Oracle in the beginning of his vndertaking, That he should make his assaults with silver speares: Whereupon Horace well and truly said,

Od. 16.*

Diffidit Urbium
Portas vir Macedo, et subruit amulos
Reges muneribus.

By gifts the Macedon claue gates asunder,
And Kings enuying his estate brought vnder.

And it is true that he wonne more by corruption and fraude, then he did by force. For as he had in all the principall Cities of Greece his secret workers (which way of Conquest was well followed by Philip the second of Spain;) So when in the contention betwene the Competitors, for the kingdome of Thrace, he was chosen the Arbitrator, became not to the Counsell accompanied with Pietie and Iustice, but with a powerfull Armie, and hauing beaten and slaine both Kings, gaue sentence for himselfe, and made the Kingdome his owne.

§. V I.

How Philip ended the Phocian Warre.

He warre still continued betwene the Phocians, and the Associates of the holy warre, the Baotians, finding themselves vnable to subsist without some present aide, sent vnto Philip for succour, who willingly yeelded to their necessities, and sent them such a proportion of men, as were neither sufficient to master their enemies, nor to assure themselves; but yet to inable them to continue the warre, and to waste the strength of Greece. They also sent to Artaxerxes Ochus for supply of treasure, who lent them thirtie talents, which makes a hundred & fourescore thousand Crownes: but when with these supplies they had still the worst against the Phocians, who held from them three of the strongest Cities within Baotia it selfe, they then besought Philip of Macedon that he would assist them in person, to whom they would giue an enterance into their Territorie, and in all things obey his Commandements in Warre.

Now had Philip what he longed for; for he knew himselfe in state to giue the law to both, and so quitting all his other purposes towards the North, he marched with a speedie pace towards Baotia, where being arriued, Phallexus who commanded the Phocian Armie, fearing to shock with this victorious King, made his owne peace, and withdrew himselfe with a Regiment of eight thousand Souldiers into Peloponnesus, leaving the Phocians to the mercy of the Conquerour; and for conclusion he had the glorie of that warre called Sacred, which the Grecians with so many mutuall slaughters had continued for ten yeeres; and, besides the glorie, he posselt himselfe of Orchomene, Coronea, and Corfia, in the Countrey of the Baotians, who inuited him to be victorious ouer themselves. He brought the Phocians into seruitude, & wasted their Cities, and gaue them but their Villages to inhabite, reseruing vnto himselfe the yerely tribute of threescore talents, which make sixe and thirtie thousand French Crownes. He also hereby (besides the fame of pietie for seruice of the Gods) obtained the same double voice in the Councell of the Amphyctones, Amphyctones which the Phocians had, with the superintendencie of the Pythian games, forfeited by the Corinthians, by being partakers in the Phocian sacriledge.

§. VII.

How Philip with ill successe attempted vpon Perinthus, Byzantium, and the Scythians.

Philip, after his triumphant returne into Macedon, by the Lieutenant of his Armie Parmenio, slaughtered many thousands of the Illyrians and Dardaniens; and brought the Thracians to pay him the tenth part of all their reuenues. But his next enterprise against the Perinthians staied his fury. Perinthus was a City of Thrace, seated vpon Propontis, in the mid-way betwene Sestos and Byzantium, a place of great strength, and a people resolu'd to defend their libertie against Philip, where the Athenians incouraged and assisted them. Philip came downe before it with a puissant Armie, made many faire breaches, gaue many furious assaults, built many ouer topping and commanding Towers about it. But he was repell'd with equall violence. For whereas Philip thought by his continuall assaults to wearie them, and waste both their men and munition, they were supplied, not only from the Persian with men and money, and succoured from Byzantium which stood vpon the same Sea-coast, but they were relieved from Athens, Chio, and Rhodes, by the conduction of Phocion, with whatsoeuer was wanting to their necessitie. But because those of Byzantium, by reason of their neighbourhood, and easie passage by water, gaue them often and ready helpe; Philip removed the one halfe of his Armie and besieged it, leauing fiftene thousand foot before Perinthus, to force it if they could; But to be short, he failed in both attempts, (as all Princes commonly doe that vndertake diuers enterprises at one time) and returned into Macedon with no lesse dishonour than losse: whereupon he made an Overture of peace with the Athenians, and greatly desired it, to which though Phocion perswaded them in all he could, and that by the occasion offered they might greatly aduantage their conditions; Yet Demosthenes with his eloquence preuailed in the refusal. In the meane while, Philip hauing digested his late affront, and supplied his expence, by the taking of an hundred and threescore and ten Merchants ships, he gathered new forces, and being accompanied with his sonne Alexander, led them into Scythia; but he was also vnprosperous in this enterprise: For the Triballi, a people of Moesia set on him in his returne; wounded him, and tooke from him the greatest part of the spoiles, which he had gathered.

§. VIII.

How Philip overthrowing the Greekes in the battaile of Cheronea, was chosen Captaine-Generall of Greece. The death of Philip.

Among these Northren Nations (part of which he suppress, and part quieted) he spent some eight yeeres; and in the ninth yeere, after the end of the holy warre, he was by his great aduantage inuited againe by the Grecians to their assistance. For the Citizens of Amphissa hauing disobeyed the decree of the Amphyctones, in which Philip had a double voice, and who by reason that the Thebans and Lecrians gaue countenance and aide to the Amphissenians, the rest were not of themselves able to constrain them, they besought Philip to come in person to their assistance. Now you must thinke that Philip was not long in resoluing vpon this enterprise; he needed no drawing on, whom nothing could keepe backe; not other dissuasion than a mastering power could hold thence. He therefore commanded his Army forthwith to march; the same being compounded of thirty thousand foot, and two thousand horse; and with as much expedition as could be made, he entred Phocis, wanne Plataea, and brought into subiection all that Region.

Thereft, and especially the Athenians, although they had good cause to feare that a great part of this storme would fall on themselves, yet were they dissuaded by Demosthenes from accepting such reasonable conditions of peace as Philip offered, and rather made choice (hauing drawne the Thebans to ioyne with them) to leaue the enioying of their estates estates and their freedome to the chance of one battaile, than to hold it either by composition, or by the grace of Philip. But this their Oratours eloquence cost them dear. It is true that he could farre more easily minde them of the vertue of their Ancestors, than make them such as they were. He might repeat vnto them (with words moouing passion) the wonders they wrought at Marathon, but he could not transforme the Macedonians into Persians, nor draw from the dead, a Miltiades, an Aristides, a Themistocles, or a Cimon, or any of those famous Commanders, whose great vertues they had payed with the greatest ingratitude that euer Nation did. A Phocion they had, but by the strength of a contrary faction he was at this time in disgrace, and not employed in so much as when the Armies of Philip and the Confederates encountered, although some thousand of the Athenians did abide the killing, and the like number well-gereed of the Thebans died with them; yet the want of the worthie men on that side to holde vp the rest, and to draw them on, and the many choise Captains of the Macedonians, encouraged by a King of a growing fortune, as it gaue to Philip so shining a victorie that Alexander by the light thereof found his way (in despite of all the Nations interiacent) into Persia, India, and Egypt; so it cut to the ground, and gaue ende and date to all the Gracian glory: Yea their libertie (saith Curtius) with their large Dominion wonne with so many difficulties, continued for so many Ages, and so often defended against the greatest Kings, was now lost in a moment, and for euer lost.

Now this aduised King (neuer passionate to his disadvantage) to the end hee might obtaine the Soueraignetic ouer all Greece, and be acknowledged for their Captaine-General against the Persians, without any further hazard or trouble, was content to let goe those Athenians that were taken at this battaile of Cheronea, as he also forbore to attempt any thing against their Citie: but in Thebes (which lately by the vertue of Epinondas triumphed over the rest) hee lodged a Garrison of Macedonians. And being soone after (according vnto the long desire which he had nourished of this Soueraignetic) by the generall States at Corinth, stiled the first Commander of all the Gracians, and contribution of men and money granted him, he compounded an Armie of great strength, and vnder the Commandement of Attalus and Parmenio, transported the same ouer the Hellepont into Asia, to begin the warre. Of his enterprise against Persia, hee sought the successe from the Oracle at Delphos, from whence he receiued such another conuertible riddle, as Craesus did when he attempted Cyrus, and was in like sort mistaken in the exposition.

But as it is hard to discerne and withstand the flatteries of our owne appetites, so did Philips ambitious desire to inuade Persia, abuse his iudgement, so farre, that the death, wherewith himselfe was threatened, he vnderstood to be deliuered of his enemy, whom he intended presently to inuade. Before his purposed departure into Asia, hee prepared for the marriage of his Daughter Cleopatra, with Alexander King of Epirus, to which feast and pastimes thereat appointed, he inuited all his Friendes, and Alleis, with the principall persons of the Gracian Cities, from whom he receiued much honour and many rich presents; but this was indeed the feast of his Funerall. For hauing refused to doe iustice to one Pausanias a Gentleman of his Guard, whom Attalus (greatly fauoured by Philip) had first made drunke, and then left to be carnally abused by diuers base persons; This Pausanias grew into so great detestation of the Kings partiality in so foule a fact, as when Philip was passing towards the Theater, he drew a sword from vnder his long garment and wounded him to death, when he had liued fixe and fortie yeeres, and reigned siue and twenty. Iustine reports it, that Olympias encouraged Pausanias to murder the King her husband, which after his death she boldly auowed; by the honor she did vnto Pausanias, in crowning his dead body, in consecrating his sword vnto Apollo, by building for him a monument, and other like Graces.

What good foundations of Alexanders greatnesse were laid by Philip.
Of his laudable qualities, and issue.

NOW although he were then taken from the World, when he had mastered all opposition on that side of the Sea, and had seene the fruits of his hopes, and labours, changing colour towards ripenesse and perfection; yet hee was here-herein happy that he liued to see his sonne Alexander at mans estate, and had himselfe been an eye-witnesse of his resolution, and singular valour in this last battaile.

The foundation of whose future greatnesse he had laid so soundly for him, with so plaine a patterne of the buildings which himselfe meant to erect, as the performance and finishing was farre more easie to Alexander, though more glorious than the beginnings vnto Philip, though lesse famous. For besides the recovery of Macedon it selfe, in competition betweene him and the sonnes of Arropus, the one assisted by the Thracians, the other by the Athenians, and besides the regaining of many places posselt by the Illyrians, the crushing of all those Northren Kings his Neighbours, the ouerthrow of Olynthus, a State that despised the power of his Father, the many Maritime Cities taken, of great strength and ancient freedome, and the subiection of that famous Nation of Greece, which for so many Ages had defended it selfe against the greatest Kings of the World, and wonne vpon them; He left vnto his sonne, and had bred vp for him, so many choise Commanders, as the most of them, both for their valour and iudgement in the Warre, were no lesse worthy of Crownes, than himselfe was that wore a Crowne: For it was said of Parmenio (whom Alexander, vngratefull to so great vertue, impiously murdered) That Parmenio had performed many things challenging eternall fame, without the King, but the King, without Parmenio neuer did any thing worthy of renowne; as for the rest of his Captaines, though content to obey the Sonne of such a Father, yet did they not after Alexanders death endure to acknowledge any man Superiour to themselves.

Of this Prince it is hard to iudge, whether his ambition had taught him the exercise of more vices, than Nature and his excellent Education had enriched him with vertues. For besides that he was Valiant, Wise, Learned, and Master of his Affections, he had this fauour of Piety, that he rather laboured to satisfie those that were grieved, than to suppress them. Whereof (among many other) we finde a good example in his dealing with Arcadion, and Nicanor; whom, when for their euill speech of Philip, his familiars perswaded him to put to death; He answered them, That first it ought to be considered, whether the fault were in them that gaue him ill language, or in himselfe: Secondly, that it was in euery mans owne power to be well spoken off; and this was shortly proued, for after Philip relieued their necessities, there were none within his Kingdome that did him more honour than they did. Whereupon he told those that had perswaded him to vse violence, that he was a better Phisition for euill speech than they were.

His Epistles to Alexander his sonne are remembred to Cicero, and Gellius; and by Dionysius and Chrysostome exceedingly commended. His Stratagems are gathered by Polyaenus and Frontinus, his wise sayings by Plutarch; And albeit he held Macedon as in his owne right, all the time of his reigne, yet was he not the true and next Heire thereof: for Amyntas the sonne of his brother Perdiccas (of whom he had the protection during his infancy) had the right. This Amyntas he married to his Daughter Cyna, who had by him a Daughter called Eurydice, who was married to Philips base sonne Arideus, her Vncle by the Mothers-side: both which Olympias, Philips first Wife, and mother to Alexander the Great, put to death; Arideus by extreame torments: Eurydice she strangled.

Philip had by this Olympias, the Daughter of Neoptolemus, King of the Molossians (of the race of Achilles) Alexander the Great, and Cleopatra. Cleopatra was married to her Vncle Alexander, King of Epirus, and was after her brother Alexanders death slaine at Sarda, by the commandement of Antigonus.

By Andata, an Illyrian, his second Wife, he had Cyna, married as is shewed before. By Nicaipolis, the Sister of Iason, Tyrant of Pheres, he had Thessalonica, whom Cassander after he had taken Pidna, married, but she was afterward by her Father-in-law Antigonus put to death.

By Cleopatra the Neece of Attalus, he had Caranus, whom others call Philip: him, Olympias, the Mother of Alexander the Great, caused to be rosted to death in a copper Pan. Others lay this murder to Alexander himselfe. By the same Cleopatra he had likewise a Daughter, called Europa, whom Olympias also murdered at the Mothers brest.

By Phila and Meda he had no issue. He had also two Concubines, Arfinoe, whom after he had gotten with childe, he married to an obscure man, called Lagus, who bare Ptolomie, King of Egypt, called the sonne of Lagus, but esteemed the sonne of Philip: by Philinna, his second Concubine, a publike Dancer, hee had Aridæus, of whom wee shall haue much occasion to speake hereafter.

CHAP. II.

Of Alexander the Great.

§. I.

A briefe rehearfall of Alexanders doings, before he innuaded Asia.

Alexander, afterward called the Great, succeeded vnto Philip his Father, being a Prince no lesse valiant by Nature, than by Education, well instructed, and enriched in all sorts of Learning and good Arts. He began his reigne ouer the Macedonians foure hundred and seuentene yeeres after Rome built, and after his owne birth twenty yeeres. The strange dreames of Philip his Father, and that one of the gods in the shape of a Snake, begat him on Olympias his Mother, I omit as foolish tales; but that the Temple of Diana (a worke the most magnificent of the World) was burnt vpon the day of his birth, and that so strange an accident was accompanied with the newes of three seuerall victories, obtained by the Macedonians, it was very remarkable, and might with the reason of those times be interpreted for ominous, and fore-shewing the great things by Alexander afterward performed. Vpon the change of the King, the Neighbor-Nations, whom Philip had oppressed, began to consult about the recouery of their former liberty, and to aduenture it by force of Armes. Alexanders yong-yeeres gaue them hope of preuailing, and his suspected seuerity increased courage in those, who could better resolve to die, than to liue slauiishly. But Alexander gaue no time to those swelling humours, which might speedily haue endangered the health of his Estate. For after reuenge taken vpon the Conspirators against his Father, whom he slew vpon his Tombe; & the celebration of his Funerals, he first fastened vnto him his owne Nation, by firing them from all exactions, and bodily slavery, other than their seruice in his Warrs; and vied such kindly austerity towards those that contemned his young yeeres, and such clemency to the rest that perswaded themselves of the cruelty of his disposition, as all affections being passed at home, hee made a present journey into Peloponnesus, and so well exercised his spirits among them, as by the Councell of the States of Greece, he was according to the great desire of his heart, elected Captaine-Generall against the Persians, vpon which warre Philip had not onely resolved, (who had obtained the same title of Generall Commander) but had transported vnder the leading of Parmenio, and Attalus, a part of his Army, to recover some places on Asia side, for the safe descent of the rest.

This enterprise against the Persian occupied all Alexanders affections; those faire marks of Riches, Honour, and large Dominion, he now shot at both sleeping and waking: all other thoughts and imaginations were either grievous or hateful. But a contrary wind ariseth; for he receiueth aduertisement that the Athenians, Thebans, and Lacedæmonians, had vniued themselves against him, and, by assistance from the Persian, hoped for recouery of their former freedom. Hereto they were perswaded by Demosthenes, himselfe being thereto perswaded by the gold of Persia; the deuice he vsed was more subtile then profitable, for hee caused it to be bruted that Alexander was slaine in a battaile against the Triballes, and brought into the assembly a Companion whom he had corrupted to affirme, That himselfe was present and wounded in the battaile. There is indeed a certaine Doctrine of Policy (as Policy is now a daies defined by falsehood and knauery) that deuised rumors & lies, if they serue the turne, but for a day or two, are greatly available. It is true that common people are sometime mockt by them, as Souldiers are by false alarms in the Wars; but in all that I haue obserued, I haue found the successe as ridiculous as the inuention. For as those that find themselves at one time abused by such like brutes, doe at other times neglect their duties, when they are vpon true reports, and in occasions perilous, summoned to assemblage; so doe all men in generall condemne the Veners of such trumperie, and for them, feare vpon necessary occasions to entertaine the truth it selfe. This labour vnlooked for, and losse of time, was not onely very grievous to Alexander, but by turning his sword from the ignoble and effeminate Persians, against which he had directed it, towards the manly and famous Gracians, of whose assistance he thought himselfe assured, his present vndertaking was greatly disordered. But he that cannot endure to striue against the winde, shall hardly attaine the Port which he purposeth to recouer: and it no lesse becometh the worthiest men to oppose misfortunes, than it doth the weakest children to bewaile them.

He therefore made such expedition towards these Reuolters, as that himselfe, with the Armie that followed him, brought them the first newes of his preparation. Hercupon all stagger, and the Athenians, as they were the first that moued, so were they the first that fainted, seeking by their Embassadors to pacifie the King, and to be receiued againe into his grace. Alexander was not long in resolving; for the Persians perswaded him to pardon the Gracians. Wise men are not easily drawne from great purposes by such occasions as may easily be taken off, neither hath any King euer brought to effect any great affaire, who hath intangled himselfe in many enterprises at once, not tending to one and the same certaine end.

And hauing now quitted his borderers towards the South, he resolved to assure those Nations which lay on the North-side of Macedon, to wit, the Tracians, Triballes, Peones, Getae, Agrians, and other salvage people, which had greatly vexed with incursions, not onely other of his Predecessours, but euen Philip his Father: with all which, after diuers ouerthrowes giuen them, he made peace, or else brought them into subiection. Notwithstanding this good successe, he could not yet finde the way out of Europe. There is nothing more naturall to man than liberty; the Greekes had enioyed it ouer-long, and lost it too late to forget it; they therefore shake off the yoke once againe. The Thebans, who had in their Citadell a Garrison of a thousand Macedons, attempt to force it, Alexander hastneth to their succour, and presents himselfe with thirty thousand foot, all old Souldiers, & three thousand horse, before the Citie, & gaue the Inhabitants some daies to resolve, being euen heart-sicke with the desire of passing into Asia. So vnwilling, indeed, he was to draw blood of the Gracians, by whom he hoped to serue himselfe elsewhere, that he offered the Thebans remission, if they would onely deliuer into his hands Phanix and Prothytes, the stirrers vp of the Rebellion. But they, opposing the mounting fortune of Alexander, (which bare all resistance before it, like the breaking-in of the Ocean-Sea) in stead of such an answer, as men besieged and abandoned should haue made, demanded Philotas and Antipater to be deliuered vnto them; as if Thebes alone, then layed in the ballance of Fortune with the Kingdome of Macedon, and many other Provinces, could either haue euened the scale or swaied it. Therefore in the end they perished in their obstinacie. For while the Thebans oppose the Armie assailant, they were charged at the backe by the Macedonian Garrison, their Citie taken and razed to the ground, sixe thousand slaine, and thirty thousand sold for slaues, at the price of foure hundred and fortie talents. This the King did to the terrour of the other Gracian Cities.

Many Arguments were vsed by Cleadas one of the prisoners, to perswade Alexander to forbear the destruction of Thebes. He prayed the King to belieue that they were rather misse-led by giuing hasty credit to false reports, than any way malicious; for being perswaded of Alexanders death, they rebelled but against his Successeur. He also brought the King to remember, that his father Philip had his education in that Citie, yea that his Ancestor Hercules was borne therein: but all perswasions were fruitlesse; the sometimes wherein offences are committed, doe greatly aggrauate them. Yet for the honour he bare to learning, he pardoned all of the race of Pindarus the Poet, and spared, and set at liberty Timoclea, the sister of Theagenes, who died in defence of the liberty of Greece against his Father Philip. This Noble woman being taken by a Thracian, and by him reuiled, he threatened to take her life vnlesse she would confesse her treasure: she led that Thracian to a Well, and told him that she had therein cast it: and when the Thracian stooped to looke into the Well, she suddenly thrust him into the mouth thereof, and stoned him to death.

Now because the Athenians had receiued into their City so many of the Thebans, as had escaped escaped and fled vnto them for succour, Alexander would not grant them peace, but vpon condition to deliuer into his hands both their Orators which perswaded this second reuolt, and their Captaines; yet in the end it being a torment vnto him to retard the enterprife of Persia, he was content that the Orators should remaine, and accepted of the banishment of the Captaines, wherein he was exceeding ill aduised, had not his fortune, or rather the prouidence of God, made all the resistance against him vnprofitable: for these good Leaders of the Gracians betook themselves to the seruice of the Persian, whom after a few dayes he inuaded.

§. II.

When all was now quieted at home, Alexander, committing to the trust of Antipater both Greece & Macedon, in the first of the Spring did passe the Hellepont, and being ready to disimbarke, he threw a Dart towards the Asian shore, as a token of defiance, commanding his Souldiers not to make any waste in their owne Territorie, or to burne, or deface those buildings which themselves were presently, and in the future to possesse. He landed his Armie, consisting of two and thirty thousand foot, & six thousand horse, all old Souldiers, neere vnto Troy, where he offered a solemne sacrifice vpon Achilles Tombe, his maternall Ancestor.

But before he left his owne coast, he put to death, without any offence giuen him, all his Mother-in-lawes Kinsmen, whom Philip his Father had greatly aduanced, not sparing such of his owne as the suspected. He also tooke with him many of his tributarie Princes, of whose fidelity he doubted, thinking by vniust crueltie to assure all things, both in the present and future. Yet the end of all fell out contrary to the policy which his Ambition had commended vnto him, though agreeing very well with the iustice of God; for al that he had planted, was soone after withered, and rooted vp; those, whom he most trusted, were the most traitorous; his mother, friends, and children, fell by such another mercilesse sword as his owne, and all manner of confusion followed his dead body to the graue, and left him there.

When the knowledge of Alexanders landing on Asia side was brought to Darius, he so much scorned the Armie of Macedon, and had so contemptible an opinion of Alexander himselfe, as hauing stiled him his seruant on a letter which he wrote vnto him, reprehending his disloyaltie and audacitie (for Darius intituled himselfe King of Kings, and the Kinsman of the gods) he gaue order withall to his Lieutenants of the lesser Asia, that they should take Alexander aliue, whip him with rods, and then conuay him to his presence: that they should sinke his ships, and send the Macedons taken prisoners beyond the Red-Sea, belike into Ethiopia, or some other vnhealthfull part of Africa.

In this sort did this glorious King, confident in the glittering, but heartlesse, multitude which he commanded, dispose of the already-vanquished Macedonians; But the ill destinies of men beare them to the ground, by what strong confidence soeuer armed. The great numbers which he gathered together, and brought in one heape into the field, gaue rather an exceeding aduantage to his enemies, than any discouragement at all. For besides that they were men vterly vnacquainted with dangers, men who by the name and countenance of their King were wont to preuaile against those of lesse courage than themselves, men that tooke more care how to embroder with gold and siluer their vpper garments, as if they attended the inuasion but of the Sunne-beames, than they did to arme themselves with yron and Steele against the sharpe pikes, swords and darts of the hardie Macedonians; I say, besides all these, euen the opinion they had of their own numbers, of which euery one in particular hoped that it would not fall to his turne to fight, filled euery of them with the care of their owne safetie, without any intent at all to hazard any thing but their owne breath, and that of their horses, in running away. The Macedonians as they came to fight, and thereby to enrich themselves with the gold and iewels of Persia, both which they needed; so the Persians, who expected nothing in that Warre but blowes and wounds, which they needed not, obeyed the King, who had power to constrain them in assembling themselves for his seruice; but their owne feares and cowardice, which in time of danger had most power over them, they they onely then obeyed, when their rebellion against so seruile a passion did iustly and violently require it. For saith Vegetius: Quemadmodum bene exercitatus miles prelium capit, ita formidat inuictus; nam sciendum est in pugna usum amplius prodesse quam vires. As the well-practised Souldier desires to come to battaile, so the raw one feares it: for we must understand, that in fight it more auaiseth to haue beene accustomed vnto the like, than onely to haue rude strength. What manner of men the Persians were, Alexander discovered in the first encounter, before which time it is said, by those that writ his Storie, That it was hard to iudge, whether his daring to vndertake the conquest of an Empire so well peopled, with a handfull of men, or the successe he had, were more to be wondred at. For at the River of Granicus, which severeth the Territorie of Troy from Propontis, the Persians fought to stop his passage, taking the higher ground and banke of the Riuer to defend, which Alexander was forced (as it were) to clime vp vnto, and scale from the Leuel of the water; Great resistance (saith Curtius) was made by the Persians, yet in the end Alexander preuailed. But it seemes to me, that the victory then gotten was exceeding easie; and that the twenty thousand Persian foot-men, said to be slaine, were rather kil'd in the bade, in running away, than hurt in the bosomes by resisting. For had those twenty thousand foot, and two hundred and fiftie horse-men, or after Plutarch; two thousand and five hundred horse-men, dyed with their faces towards the Macedonians, Alexander could not haue bought their liues at so small a rate, as with the losse of foure and thirtie thousand sorts of his owne. And if it were also true, that Plutarch doth report, how Alexander encountered two of the Persian Commanders, Spithridates and Rhesaces, and that the Persian horse-men fought with great furie, though in the end scattered; and lastly, how those Gracians in Darius his pay, holding themselves in one body vpon a peece of ground of aduantage, did (after mercy was refused them) fight it out to the last; how doth it then resemble truth, that such resistance hauing beene made, yet of Alexanders Armie there fell but twelue Foot-men, and two and twenty Horse-men?

§. III.

He winning of this passage did greatly encourage the Macedonians, and brought such terror vpon all those of the lesser Asia, as he obtained all the Kingdomes thereof without a blow, some one or two Townes excepted. For in all inuasions, where the Nations inuaded haue once beene beaten vpon a great aduantage of the place, as in defence of Riuers, Streights, and Mountaines, they will soone haue perswaded themselves, that such an enemy vpon equall tearmes and euen ground, can hardly be resisted. It was therefore Machiavels counsell, that he which resoluth to defend a passage should with his ablest force oppose the Assailant. And to say truth, few Regions of any great circuit are so well fenced, that Armies of such force as may be thought sufficient to conquer them, can be debarred all entrance, by the naturall difficultie of the wayes. One passage or other is commonly left vnguarded: if all be defended, then must the forces of the Country be distracted, and yet lightly, some one place will be found that is defended very weakely. How often haue the Alpes giuen way to Armies, breaking into Italy? Yea, where shall we finde that euer they kept out an inuadour? Yet are they such, as (to speake briefly) afflict with all difficulties those that trauaile ouer them; but they giue no security to those that lye behind them: for they are of too large extent. The Townes of Lombardie perswaded themselves that they might enioy their quiet, when the Warlike Nation of the Switzers had vndertaken to hinder Francis the French King from descending into the Duchie of Milan: but whilest these Patrons of Milan, whom their owne dwelling in those Mountaines had made fittest of all other for such a seruice, were busied in custodie of the Alpes; Francis appeared in Lombardie, to so much the greater terror of the Inhabitants, by how much the lesse they had expected his arrival. What shall we say of those Mountaines, which locke vp whole Regions in such sort, as they leaue but one gate open? The Streights, or (as they were called) the gates of Taurus in Cilicia, and those of Thermopyle, haue seldome beene attempted, perhaps because they were thought impregnable: but how seldome (if euer) haue they beene attempted in vaine? Xerxes and long after him, the Romans, forced the entrance of Thermopylae, Cyrus the yonger, and after him Alexander, found the Gates of Cilicia wide open; how strongly soeuer they had beene locked and barred, yet were those Countreys open enough to a fleet that should enter on the backe-side. The defence of Riuer-shore hard a thing it is, we finde examples in all histories that beare good witnesse. The deepest haue many Foords; the swiftest and broadest may be passed by Boates, in case it be found a matter of difficultie to make a bridge. He that hath men enough to defend all the length of his owne banke, hath also enough to beate his enemy; and may therefore doe better to let him come ouer, to his losse, than by struiuing in vaine to hinder the passage, as a matter tending to his owne disadvantage, fill the heads of his Souldiers with an opinion, that they are in ill case, hauing their meanes of safeguard taken from them, by the skill or valour of such as are too good for them. Certainly, if a Riuer were sufficient defence against an Armie, the Isle of Mona, now called Anglesey, which is diuided from North-Wales by an arme of the Sea, had beene safe enough against the Romans, inuading it vnder conduct of Iulius Agricola. But he wanting, & not meaning to spend the time in making vessels to transport his forces, did assay the foords. Whereby he so amazed the enemies attending for ships and such like prouision by Sea, that surely beleeuing nothing could be hard or inuincible to men, which came so minded to Warre, they humbly intreated for peace, and yielded the Island. Yet the Britaines were men stout enough; the Persians were very daftards.

It was therefore wisely done of Alexander, to passe the Riuer of Granicke in face of the enemy, not marching higher to seeke an easier way, nor labouring to conuey his men ouer it by some safer meanes. For hauing beaten them vpon their owne ground, he did thereby cut off no lesse of their reputation, than of their strength, leauing no hope of succour to the partakers and followers of such vnable Protectors.

Soone after this victory he recovered Sardis, Ephesus, the Cities of the Trallians and Magnesians, which were rendred vnto him. The Inhabitants of which, with the people of the Countrey, he receiued with great grace, suffering them to be gouerned by their owne lawes. For he obserued it well; Nouum Imperium inchoantibus uilis clementia summa; It is commodious vnto such as lay the foundations of a new Souerainety, to haue the same of being mercifull. He then by Parmenio vvan Adiletus, and by force mastered Halicarnassus, which because it resisted obstinately, he razed to the ground. From whence he entred into Caria, where Ada the Queene, who had beene cast out of all that she held (except the Citie of Alinda) by Darius his Lieutenants, presented her selfe vnto him, and adopted him her sonne and successour, which Alexander accepted in so gracious part, as he left the whole Kingdome to her disposing. He then entred into Lycia, and Pamphylia, and obtained all the Sea-coasts, and subiecting vnto him Pisidia, he directed himselfe towards Darius (who was said to be aduanced towards him with a maruellous Armie) by the way of Phrygia: For all the Prouince of Asia the lesse, bordering vpon the Sea, his first victory layed vnder his feet.

While he gaue order for the gouernment and setling of Lycia, and Pamphylia, they sent Cleander to raise some new Captaines in Peloponnesus, and marching towards the North, he entred Celenas seated on the Riuer Alexander, which was abandoned vnto him, the Castle onely holding out, which also after forty dayes was giuen vp: for so long time he gaue them to attend succour from Darius. From Celenas he past on through Phrygia towards the Euxine Sea, till he came to a City called Gordium, the Regall-seate, in former times, of King Midas. In this City it was that he found the Gordian-knot, which when he knew not how to vndoe, he cut it a funder with his sword. For there was an ancient propheticke did promise to him that could vntie it, the Lordship of all Asia; whereupon Alexander, not respecting the manner how, so it were done, assumed to himselfe the fulfilling of the propheticke, by hewing it in pieces.

But before he turned from this part of Asia the lesse towards the east, he tooke care to cleare the Sea-coast on his backe, and to thrust the Persians out of the Ilands of Lesbos, Chio, and Coos: the charge whereof he committed vnto two of his Captaines, giuing them such order as he thought to be most conuenient for that seruice; and deliuering vnto them fiftie Talents to defray the charge; and withall out of his first spoyle gotten, he sent threescore Talents more to Antipater his Lieutenant in Greece and Macedon. From Celenas he remoued to Ancira, now called Anguori, standing on the same Riuer of Sangarius, which runneth through Gordium: there he mustered his Armie, and then then entred Paphlagonia, whose people submitted themselves vnto him, and obtained freedome of tribute: where he left Catus Gouvernour with one Regiment of Macedonians lately arrived.

Here he vnderstood of the death of Memnon, Darius Lieutenant, which hartned him greatly to passe on towards him, for of this onely Capitaine he had more respect than of all the multitude by Darius assembled, and of all the Commanders he had besides. For so much hath the spirit of some one man excelled, as it hath vnderaken and effected the alteration of the greatest States and Common-weales, the erection of Monarchies, the conquest of Kingdomes and Empires, guided handfulls of men against multitudes of equal bodily strength, contriued victories beyond all hope and discourse of reason, conquered the fearefull passions of his owne followers into magnanimities, and the valour of his enemies into cowardize; such spirits haue beene stirred vp in sundry Ages of the world, and in diuers parts thereof, to erect and cast downe againe, to establish and to destroy, and to bring all things, Persons and States, to the same certaine ends, which the infinite Spirit of the Vniuersall, piercing, mouing, and gouerning all things, hath ordained. Certainly the things that this King did were maruellous; and would hardly haue beene vnderaken by any man else: and though his Father had determined to haue inuaded the lesser Asia; it is like enough that he would haue contented himselfe with some part thereof, and not haue discovered the Riuer of Indus: as this man did. The swift course of victory, wherewith he ran ouer so large a portion of the World; in so short a space, may iustly be imputed vnto this, that he was neuer encountered by an equall spirit, concurring with equall power against him. Hereby it came to passe that his actions being limited by no greater opposition, then desert places, and the meere length of tedious iournies could make, were like the Colossus of Rhodes, not so much to be admired for the workmanship, though therein also praise-worthy, as for the huge bulke. For certainly the things performed by Xenophon, discover as braue a spirit as Alexanders, and working no lesse exquisitely, though the effects were lesse materiall, as were also the forces and power of command, by which it wrought. But he that would finde the exact patterne of a noble Commander, must looke vpon such as Epaminondas, that encountering worthy Captaines, and those better followed than themselves, haue by their singular vertue ouer-topped their valiant enemies, and still preuailed ouer those, that would not haue yielded one foot to any other. Such as these are, doe seldome liue to obtaine great Empires. For it is a worke of more labour and longer time, to master the equall forces of one hardy & well-ordered State, than to tread downe and vtterly subdue a multitude of feeble Nations, compounding the body of a grosse vniuersall Empire. Wherefore these Pauo Potentes, men that with little haue done much vpon enemies of like ability, are to be regarded as choise examples of worth; but great Conquerours, to be rather admired for the substance of their actions, than the exquisite managing: exactnesse and greatnesse concurring so seldome, that I can finde no instance of both in one, saue onely that braue Roman, Caesar.

Hauing thus farre digressed, it is now time that we returne vnto our Easterne Conqueror, who is trauiailing hastily towards Cilicia, with a desire to recover the Streights thereof before Darius should arrive there. But first making a dispart into Greece, he sent to those Cities, in which he reposed most trust, some of the Persian Targets which he had recovered in his first battaile, vpon which, by certaine inscriptions, he made them partakers of his victory. Herein he well aduised himselfe; for he that doth not as well impart of the honour which he gaignes in the Warres, as he doth of the spoiles, shall neuer belong followed of those of the better sort. For men which are either well borne or well bred, and haue more of wealth than of reputation, doe as often satisfie themselves with the purchase of glory, as the weak in fortune, and strong in courage, doe with the gaine of gold and siluer.

The Gouvernour of Cilicia hearing of Alexander comming on, left some Companies to keepe the Streights, which were indeede very defensible; and withall, as Curtius noteth, he began ouer-late to prise and put in execution the Counsell of Memnon: who in the beginning of the Warres aduised him to waste all the prouisions for Men and Horse, that could not be lodged in strong places, & alwayes to giue ground to the Inuader, till he found some such notable aduantage as might assuredly promise him the obtaining of victory. For the fury of an inuading Army is best broken, by delays, change of diet, and want, eating sometimes too little, and sometimes too much, sometimes reposing themselves in beds, and more often on the cold ground. These and the like suddaine alterations bring many diseases vpon all Nations out of their owne Countries. Therefore if Darius had kept the Macedonians but a while from meat and sleepe, and refusing to giue or take battaile, had wearied them with his light horse, as the Parthians afterward did the Romans, hee might perchance haue saued his owne life, and his estate. For it was one of the greatest encouragements giuen by Alexander to the Macedonians, in the third and last fatall battaile, that they were to fight with all the strength of Persia at once.

Xerxes, when he invaded Greece and fought abroad, in being beaten, lost onely his men; but Darius being inuaded by the Greekes, and fighting at home, by being beaten, lost his Kingdome. Pericles, though the Lacedamonians burnt all in Attica to the Gates of Athens, yet could not be drawne to hazard a battaile: for the inuaded ought euermore to fight vpon the aduantage of time and place. Because we reade Histories to informe our vnderstanding by the examples therein found, wee will giue some instances of those that haue perished by aduenturing in their owne countries, to charge an inuading Armie. The Romans, by fighting with Hannibal, were brought to the brinke of their destruction.

Pompey was well aduised for a while, when he gaue Cesar ground, but when by the importunity of his Captaines he aduentured to fight at Pharsalia, he lost the battaile, lost the freedome of Rome, and his owne life.

Ferdinand, in the Conquest of Naples, would needs fight a battaile with the French to his confusion, though it was told him by a man of sound iudgement, that those Counsels which promise suretie in all things, are honourable enough.

The Constable of France made frustrate the mighty preparation of Charles the Fifth, when he inuaded Prouence, by wasting the Countrie, and forbearing to fight; so did the Duke of Alua wearie the French in Naples, and dissolue the boisterous Armie of the Prince of Orange in the low-Countries.

The Leigers, contrarie to the aduice of their Generall, would needs fight a battaile with the Bourgonians, inuading their Countrie, and could not be perswaded to linger the time, and stay their aduantage; but they lost eight and twenty thousand vpon the place. Philip of Falaise set vpon King Edward at Chesie; and King John (when the English were well-nere tired out, and would in short time by an orderly pursuit haue bene waited to nothing) constrained the blacke Prince with great furie, neere Poitiers, to ioyne battaile with him: But all men know what lamentable successe these two French Kings found. Charles the fifth of France made another kinde of Fabian-Warfare; and though the English burnt and wasted many places, yet this King held his resolution to forbear blows, and followed his aduice which told him, That the English could neuer get his inheritance by snoake; and it is reported by Bellay and Herrault, that King Edward was wont to say of this Charles, that he wan from him the Dutchie of Guien without ever putting on his Armour.

But where God hath a purpose to destroy, wise men grow short-liued, and the charge of things is committed vnto such as either cannot see what is for their good, or know not how to put in execution any sound aduice. The course which Memnon had propounded, must in all appearance of reason haue brought the Macedonian to a great perplexity, and made him stand still a while at the Streights of Cilicia, doubting whether it were more shamefull to returne, or dangerous to proceede. For had Cappadocia and Paphlagonia been wasted whilest Alexander was farre off; and the Streights of Cilicia bene defended by Arsenes, Gouernor of that Prouince, with the best of his forces: hunger would not haue suffered the enemy, to stay the triall of all meanes that might be thought vpon, of forcing that passage; or if the place could not haue bene maintained, yet might Cilicia, at better leisure haue bene so thoroughly spoiled, that the heart of his Armie should haue bene broken, by seeking out miseries by painfull traualle.

But Arsenes leauing a small number to defend the Streights, tooke the best of his Armie with him, to waste and spoile the Countrie, or rather, as may seeme, to finde himselfe some worke, by pretence of which he might honestly run further away from Alexander. He should rather haue aduentured his person in custody of the Streights, whereby he might perhaps haue saued the Prouince; and in the meane time, all that was in the fields, would would haue bene conueighed into strong Townes. So should his Armie, if it were driven from the place of aduantage, haue found good entertainment within walled Cities, and himselfe with his horse-men haue had the lesse worke in destroying that little which was left abroad. Handling the matter as he did, he gaue the Cilicians cause to wish for Alexanders coming, and as great cause to the Keepers of the passage not to hinder it. For cowards are wise in apprehending all formes of danger. These Guardians of the Streights, hearing that Arsenes made all haste to ioyne himselfe with Darius, burning downe all as he went, like one despairing of the defence, began to grow circumspect, and to thinke that surely their Generall, who gaue as lost the Countrie behinde their backs, had exposed themselves vnto certaine death, as men that were good for nothing else, but to dull the Macedonian swords. Wherefore, not affecting to die for their Prince and Countrie (which honour they saw that Arsenes himselfe could well forebore) they speedily followed the foot-steps of their Generall, gleaning after his Haruest. Thus Alexander without labour got both the entrance of Cilicia, abandoned by the cowardise of his Enemies, and the whole Prouince that had bene alienated from the Persian side by their perfidie.

§. IIII.

Of the vnwarlike Armie leuied by Darius against Alexander. The vnadvised courses which Darius took in this Expedition. He is vanquished at Issus, where his Wife, and Children are made prisoners. Of some things following the battaile of Issus.

IN the meane season Darius approached; who (as Curtius reports) had compounded an Armie of more than two hundred and ninetie thousand Souldiers, out of diuers Nations; Iustine musters them at three hundred thousand Foot, and a hundred thousand Horse; Plutarch at fixe hundred thousand.

The manner of his coming on, as Curtius describes it, was rather like a masker than a man of Warre, and like one that tooke more care to set out his glorie and riches, than to provide for his owne safety, perswading himselfe, as it seemed, to beat Alexander with pompe and sumptuous Pageants. For, before the Armie there was carried the holy fire which the Persians worshipped, attended by their Priests, and after them three hundred and threescore and fve yong-men, answering the number of the daies of the yeere, covered with Scarlet; then the Chariot of Iupiter drawne with white Horses, with their Riders clothed in the same colour, with rods of gold in their hands; And after it, the Horse of the Summe: Next after these follow ten sumptuous Chariots, in-laid and garnished with siluer and gold; and then the Vantguard of their horse, compounded of twelue feuerall Nations, which the better to auoid confusion, did hardly vnderstand each others language, and these marshalled in the head of the rest, being beaten, might serue very fitly to disorder all that followed them; in the taile of these Horses the Regiment of foot marched, with the Persians called immortall, because if any died, the number was presently supplied: and these were armed with chaines of gold, & their coates with the same metall imbrodered, whereof the sleeves were garnished with pearle; baires, either to catch the hungrie Macedonians withall, or to perswade them that it were great inciuillitie to cut and to deface such glorious garments. But it was well said: Sumptuose indufus miles, se virtute superiorem alij non existimet, cum in praelijs oporteat fortitudine animi, & non vestimentis muniri, quoniam hostes vestibus non debellantur; Let no man thinke that hee exceedeth those in valour, whom hee exceedeth in gay garments; for it is by men armed with fortitude of minde, and not by the apparell they put on, that enemies are beaten. And it was perchance from the Roman Papyrius that this aduice was borrowed, who when he fought against the Sannites in that fatall battaile, wherein they all sware eyther to preuaile or die, thirty thousand of them hauing apparelled themselves in white garments, with high crests and great plumes of feathers, bade the Roman Souldiers to lay aside all feare: Non enim cristas vulnere facere, & per picta atque aurata scuta transire Romanum pilum; For these plumed crests would wound no body, and the Roman pile would bore holes in painted and gilded shields.

To second this Court-like company, fifteene thousand were appointed more rich and glittering than the former, but apparellled like Women (belike to breede the more terror) & these were honoured with the Title of the Kings Kinsmen. Then came Darius himselfe, himselfe, the Gentle-men of his Guard-robe, riding before his Chariot, which was supported with the gods of his Nation, cast and cut in pure gold; these the Macedonians did not serue, but they serued their turnes of these, by changing their massie-bodies into thin portable and currant coyn. The head of this Chariot was set with precious stones, with two little golden Idols, couered with an open-winged-Eagle of the same mettall: The hinder part being raised high wheron Darius sat, had a couering of inestimable value. This Chariot of the King was followed with ten thousand Horse-men, their Lances plated with filuer, and their heads guilt; which they meant not to imbrow in the Macedonian blood, for feare of marring their beautie. Hee had for the proper Guard of his owne person, two hundred of the bloud Royall, bloud too Royall and precious to bee spilt by any valorous aduerture, (I am of opinion that two hundred sturdy fellows, like the Switzers, would haue done him more seruice) and these were backt with thirtie thousand foot-men, after whom againe were led foure hundred spare horses for the King, which if he had meant to haue vsed, hee would haue marshalled somewhat nearer him.

Now followed the Reareward, the same being led by Sisygambis the Kings Mother, and by his Wife, drawn in glorious Chariots, followed by a great traine of Ladies their attendants on horse-backe, with fifteene Wagons of the Kings children, and the wines of the Nobility, waited on by two hundred and fiftie Concubines, and a world of Nurses and Eunuchs, most sumptuously apparelled. By which it should seeme that Darius thought that the Macedonians had beene Comedians or Tumblers; for this troupe was far fitter to behold those sports than to be present at battailes. Betweene these and a company of flight-armed slaues, with a world of Valters, was the Kings treasure, charged on fixe hundred Mules, and three hundred Camels, brought, as it proued, to pay the Macedonians. In this fort came the Maygame-King into the field, incumbred with a most vnecessary traine of Strumpets, attended with troupes of diuers Nations, speaking diuers languages, and for their numbers impossible to be marshalled; and for the most part so effeminate, and so rich in gold and in garments, as the same could not but haue encouraged the nakedest Nation of the world against them. Wee finde it in daily experience, that all discourse of magnanimitie, of Nationall Vertue, of Religion, of Libertie, and whatsoever else hath beene wont to moue and incourage vertuous men, hath no force at all with the common-Souldier, in comparison of spoyle and riches. The rich ships are boarded vpon all disadvantages, the rich Townes are furiously assaulted, and the plentiful Countries willingly inuaded. Our English Nation haue attempted many places in the Indies, and runne vpon the Spaniards head-long, in hope of their Royalls of plare, and Pistoles; which, had they beene put to it vpon the like disadvantages in Ireland, or in any poore Countie, they would haue turned their Peecces and Pikes against their Commanders, contesting that they had beene brought without reason to the Butchery & slaughter. It is true that the warre is made willingly, and for the most part with good successe, that is ordained against the richest Nations; for as the needie are alwaies aduenturous, so plentie is wont to shunne perill, and men that haue well to liue, doe rather studie how to liue well, I meane wealthily, than care to die (as they call it) honourably. Car on il ny a rien a gaigner que des coups, volontiers il ny va pas. No man makes haste to the market, where there is nothing to be bought but blowes.

Now if Alexander had beheld this preparation before his consultation with his Soothsaiers, hee would haue satisfied himselfe by the out-sides of the Persians, and neuer haue looked into the intrailles of Beasts for successe. For leauing the description of this second battell (which is indeed no where wel described, neither for the confusion & hastie running away of the Asians could it be) we haue enough by the slaughter that was made of them, & by the few that fell of the Macedonians, to informe vs what manner of resistance was made. For if it be true that three score thousand Persian footmen were slaine in this battaile, with ten thousand of their horsemen: Or (as Curtius saith) an hundred thousand footmen, with the same number of horsemen, and besides this slaughter, fortie thousand taken prisoners, while of Alexanders Armie there miscarried but two hundred & foure score of all sorts, of which numbers Arianus and other Historians cut off almost the one halfe: I doe verily beleue, that this small number rather died with the ouer-trauaille and paines-taking in killing their enemies, than by any strokes receiued from them. And surely if the Persian Nation (at this time degenerate, and the basest of the World) had had any any fauour remaining of the ancient valour of their fore-fathers, they would neuer haue sold so good cheape, and at so vile a price, the Mother, the Wife, the Daughters, and other the Kings children; had their owne honour beene valued by them at nothing, and the Kings safetie and his estate at lesse. Darius by this time found it true, that Charidemus a banished Gracian of Athens had told him, when he made a view of his Army about Babylon, to wit, That the multitude which he had assembled of diuers Nations, richly attired, but poorly armed, would be found more terrible to the Inhabitants of the country, whom in passing by they would deuoure, than to the Macedonians, whom they meant to assaile; who being all old and obedient Souldiers, imbattailed in grosse squadrons, which they call their Phalanx, well couered with Armour for defence, and furnished with weapons for offence of great aduantage, would make so little accompt of his delicate Persians, louing their ease and their palat, being withall ill armed and worse disciplined, as except it would please him to entertain (hauing so great abundance of treasure to doe it withall) a sufficient number of the same Gracians, and so to encounter the Macedonians with men of equall courage, he would repent him ouerlate, as taught by the miserable successe like to follow.

But this discourse was so vnpleasing to Darius (who had beene accustomed to nothing so much as to his owne praises, and to nothing so little as to heare truth;) as he commanded that this poore Gracian should be presently slaine: who while hee was a funding in the Tormentors hand, vsed this speech to the King, That Alexander, against whom hee had giuen this good counsell, should assuredly reuenge his death, and lay deserved punishment vpon Darius for despising his aduice.

It was the saying of a Wise man: Desperata eius Principis salus est, cuius aures ita formate sunt, ut aspera que vtilia, nec quicquam nisi iucundum accipiat; That Princes safetie is in a desperate case, whose eares iudge all that is profitable to be too sharpe, and will entertaine nothing that is vnpleasing.

For libertie in counsell is the life and essence of counsell; Libertas consilij est eius vita, & essentia, qua erepta consilium euanesce.

Darius did likewise value at nothing the Aduice giuen him by the Gracian Souldiers, that serued him, who intreated him not to fight in the Streights: But had they beene Counsellors and directors in that Warre, as they were vnderlings and commanded by others, they had with the helpe of a good troupe of horse-men beene able to haue opposed the furie of Alexander, without any assistance of the Persian foot-men. For when Darius was ouerthrowne with all his cowardly and confused rabble, those Gracians, vnder their Captaine Amyntas, held firme, and marched away in order, in despite of the vanquishers. Old Souldiers are not easily dismayed: wee reade in Histories ancient and moderne, what braue retraitts haue beene made by them, though the rest of the Army in which they haue serued, hath beene broken.

At the battaile of Ranenna, where the Imperials were beaten by the French, a squadron of Spaniards, old Souldiers, came off vnbroken and vndismayed; whom when Gaston de Foix, Duke of Nemures, and Nephew to Lewis the twelfth, charged, as holding the victorie not entire by their escape, he was ouer-turned and slaine in the place. For it is truly said of those men, who, by being acquainted with dangers feare them not, That, Neglecto periculo imminenti malis opus ipsum quantumvis difficile aggrediuntur; They goe about the businesse it selfe, how hard soeuer it be, not standing to consider of the danger, which the mischiefe hanging ouer their heads may bring: and as truly of those that know the warres but by heare-say. Quod valentes sunt & prauales ante pericula, in ipsis tamen periculis discedunt; They haue abilitie enough, and to spare, till danger appeare, but when perill indeed comes, they get them gone.

These Gracians also that made the retract, aduised Darius to retire his Army into the plaine of Mesopotamia, to the end that Alexander being entred into those large fields and great Champions, hee might haue inuironed the Macedonians on all sides with his multitude; and withall they counsellled him to diuide that his huge Armie into parts, not committing the whole to one stroke of Fortune, whereby hee might haue fought many battailes, and haue brought no greater numbers at once than might haue been well marshalled & conducted. But this counsell was so contrary to the cowardly affections of the Persians, as they perswaded Darius to inuiron the Gracians which gaue the aduice, and to cut them in peeces as Traitors. The infinite wisdom of God doth not work alwaies by by one and the same way, but very often in the alteration of Kingdomes and Estates, by taking vnderstanding from the Gouvernours, so as they can neither giue nor discern of Counsels. For Darius that would needs fight with Alexander vpon a streightned piece of ground, neere vnto the Citie of Iffus, where he could bring no more hands to fight than Alexander could, (who by the aduice of Parmenio staid there, as in a place of best aduantage) was vtterly ouerthrowne, his Treasure lost, his Wife, Mother, and Children (whom the Gracians his followers had perswaded him to leaue in Babylon, or elsewhere) taken prisoners, and all their traine of Ladies spoiled of their rich Garments, Jewels, and Honour. It is true, that both the Queene, with her Daughters, who had the good hap to be brought to Alexanders presence, were entertained with all respect due vnto their birth, their Honours preferred, and their Jewels and rich Garments restored vnto them; and though Darius Wife was a most beautifull Lady, and his Daughters of excellent forme, yet Alexander mastred his affections towards them all: onely it is reported out of Aristobulus the Historian, that he embraced the Wife of the valiant Memnon, her Husband lately dead, who was taken flying from Damascus by Parmenio, at which time the Daughters of Oebus, who reigned before Darius, and the Wiues and Children of all the Nobility of Persia in effect, fell into captiuitie; at which time also Darius Treasure (not lost at Iffus) was seized, amounting to fixe thousand and two hundred talents of coine, and of Bullion siue hundred talents, with a world of riches besides.

Darius himselfe leauing his brother dead, with diuers other of his chiefe Captaines (casting the Crowne from his head) hardly escaped.

After this ouerthrow giuen vnto Darius, all Phoenicia (the Citie of Tyre excepted) was yielded to Alexander, of which Parmenio was made Gouvernour.

Aradus, Zidon, and Biblos, maritime Cities of great importance, of which one Strato was King (but hated of the people) acknowledged Alexander. Good fortune followed him so fast that it trod on his heeles, for Antigonus, Alexanders Lieutenant in Asia the lesse, ouerthrew the Cappadocians, Paphlagonians, and others lately reuolted; Aristodemus, Darius Admirall, had his Fleet partly taken, and in part drowned by the Macedonians newly leauied; the Lacedamonians that warred against Antipater were beaten; four thousand of those Greeks which made the retrait at the last battaile, forsaking both the party of Darius and of Alexander, and led by Amyntas into Egypt, to hold it for themselves, were buried there; for the time was not yet come to diuide Kingdomes.

Alexander to honour Ephesion, whom he loued most, gaue him power to dispose of the Kingdome of Zidon. A man of a most poore estate, that laboured to sustaine his life, being of the Royall bloud, was commended by the people vnto him, who changed his Spade into a Scepter, so as he was beheld both a Begger and a King in one and the same houre.

It was a good desire of this new King, when speaking to Alexander, he wisht that he could beare his prosperity with the same moderation, and quietnesse of heart, that he had done his aduersitie; but ill done of Alexander, in that he would not performe in himselfe that which he commended in another mans desire: for it was a signe that he did but accompany, and could not gouerne his felicitie. While he made some stay in those parts, he receiued a letter from Darius, importing the ranfome of his Wife, his Mother, and his Children, with some other conditions of peace, but such as rather became a Conqueror, than one that had now been twice shamefully beaten, nor vouchsafing, in his direction, to stile Alexander King. It is true, that the Romans after that they had receiued an ouerthrow by Pyrrhus, returned him a more scornfull answer vpon the offer of peace, than they did before the trial of his force. But as their fortunes were then in the Spring, so that of Darius had already cast lease, the one a resolute well armed and disciplined Nation, the other cowardly and effeminate. Alexander disdaind the offers of Darius, and sent him word that he not onely directed his letter to a King, but to the King of Darius himselfe.

§. V.

How Alexander besieged and won the Citie of Tyre.

Alexander comming neere to the Citie of Tyre, receiued from them the present of a golden Crowne, with great store of victuals, and other presents, which he tooke very thankfully, returning them answer, That he desired to offer a sacrifice sacrifice to Hercules, the Protector of their Citie, from whom he was descended. But the Tyrians like not his companie within their Walls, but tell him that the Temple of Hercules was seated in the old City adioyning, now abandoned and desolate. To be short, Alexander resolved to enter it by force: and though it were a place in all mens opinion impregnable, because the Island whereon it was built, was eight hundred furlongs from the Main, yet with the labour of many hands, hauing great store of stone from the old Tyre, and timber sufficient from Lybanus, he filled the passage of the Sea betwene the Island and the Main, which being more then once carried away by the strength of the Sea vpon a storme of winde, sometime by the Tyrians fired, and sometime torne asunder, yet with the helpe of his Nauie which arriued (during the siege) from Cyprus, he ouercame all difficulties and preuailed, after he had spent seauen moneths in that attempt. The Tyrians in the beginning of the siege had barbarously drowned the messengers sent by Alexander, perswading them to render the City, in respect whereof, and of the great losse of time and men, he put eight thousand to the sword, and caused two thousand of those, that escaped the first furie, to be hanged on Crosses on the Sea-shore, and referred for slaues (saith Diodore) thirteene thousand, Arrianus reckons them at thirty thousand. Many more had died, had not the Zidonians, that serued Alexander, conueied great numbers away by shipping vnto their owne Citie.

Happy it was for Apollo that the Towne was taken, for one of the Tyrians hauing dreamt, that this god meant to forsake the Citie, they bound him fast with a golden chaine to the Idoll of Hercules, but Alexander like a gracious Prince loosened him againe.

It is true, that it was a notable enterprife and a difficult, but great things are made greater. For Nabuchodonosor had taken it before, and filled vp the channell, that lay betwene the Island and the Main.

The gouernement of this Territorie he gaue to Philotas, the Sonne of Parmenio; Cilicia, he committed to Socrates, and Andromachus Lieutenant vnder Parmenio; Ephesion had the charge of the Fleet, and was directed to finde Alexander at Gaza towards Egypt.

§. VI.

How Darius offered conditions of peace to Alexander. Alexander wins Gaza; and deales graciously with the Iewes.

IN the meane while Darius sends againe to Alexander, sets before him all the difficulties of passing on towards the East, and laierh the losse of the last battaile to the streightnesse of the place: he hoped to terrifie him, by threatening to encompass him in the plaine Countries, he bids him to consider, how impossible it was to passe the Rivers of Euphrates, Tigris, Araxes, and the rest, with all such other fearefull things: for he that was now filled with nothing but feare, had arguments enough of that nature to present vnto another. All the Kingdomes betwene the Riuer of Alys, and the Hellepont, he offered him in Dowry with his beloued daughter. But Alexander answered, That he offered him nothing but his owne, and that which victory and his own vertue had posselt him of; That he was to giue conditions, and not to receive any, & that he hauing passed the Sea it selfe, disdaind to thinke of resistance in transporting himselfe ouer Rivers. It is said, that Parmenio, who was now old and full of honour and riches, told the King, that were he Alexander, he would accept of Darius his offers; to which Alexander answered, That so would he, if he were Parmenio.

But he goes on towards Egypt, and comming before Gaza, Betis a faithfull seruant to Darius, shuts the Gate against him, and defends the Towne with an obstinate resolution, at the siege whereof Alexander receiued a wound in the shoulder, which was dangerous, and a blow on his legge with a stone; He found better men in this place than he did at the former battailes, for he left so many of his Macedonians buried in the sands of Gaza, that he was foor to send for a new supply into Greece. Here it was that Alexander first began to change condition, and to exercise cruelty. For after that he had entred Gaza by assault, and taken Betis, (whom Iosephus calleth Babemesis) that was weakened with many wounds, and who neuer gaue ground to the Assailants; he bored holes through his feet, and caused him to be drawne about the street, whilest he was as yet aliue; who being as valiant valiant a man as himselfe, disdained to aske him either life or remission of his torments. And what had he to countenance this his tyrannie, but the imitation of his Ancestor Achilles, who did the like to Hector. It is true, that cruelty hath alwayes somewhat to couer her deformity.

Lib. 11. c. 26.

From Gaza (saith Iosephus) he led his Army towards Ierusalem, a Citie, for the antiquitie and great fame thereof, well knowne vnto him while he lay before Tyre; He had sent for some supply thither, which Iaddus the high Priest, being subiect and sworneto Darius, had refused him. The Iewes therefore fearing his reuenge, and vnable to resist, committed the care of their estates and safetie to Iaddus, who, being taught by God, issued out of the Citie couered with his Pontificall Robes, to wit, an vpper garment of purple, embrodered with gold, with his Miter, and the plate of gold wherein the name of God was written, the Priests and Leuites in their rich ornaments, and the people in white garments, in a manner so vnusuall, stately and graue, as Alexander greatly admired it. Iosephus reports it, that he fell to the ground before the high Priest, as reuerencing the name of God, and that Permenio reprehended him for it; Howsoeuer it was, I am of opinion, that he became so confident in his enterprise, and so assured of the successe after the prophesie of Daniel had beene read vnto him, wherein he saw himselfe, and the conquest of Persia so directly pointed at, as nothing thenceforth could discourage him or feare him. He confessed to Parmenio (saith Iosephus) That in Dio a Citie of Macedon, when his mind laboured the conquest of Asia, he saw in his sleepe such a person as Iaddus, and so appalled, professing one and the same God, by whom he was encouraged to pursue the purpose he had in hand with assurance of victorie. This apparition, formerly apprehended onely by the light of his fantasie, he now beheld with his bodily eies, wherewith he was so exceedingly pleased and imboldened, as contrarie to the practice of the Phenicians, (who hoped to haue sackt and destroyed Ierusalem) he gaue the Iewes all, and more than they desired, both of libertie and immunitie, with permission to liue vnder their owne lawes, and to exercise and enioy their owne Religion.

§. VII.

Alexander winnes Egypt: and makes a iournie to the Temple of Hammon.

From Ierusalem Alexander turned againe towards Egypt, and entred it, where Darius his Lieutenant, Astaces, receiued him and deliuered into his hand the Citie of Memphis, with eight hundred talents of treasure, and all other the Kings riches. By this we see that the King of Persia, who had more of affection than of iudgement, gaue to the valiantest man he had but the command of one Citie, and to the veriest coward the government of all Egypt. When hee had set things in order in Egypt, he began to trauaile after God-head, towards Iupiter Hammon, so foolish had prosperitie made him. He was to passe ouer the dangerous and drie sands, where, when the water which he brought on his Camels backe was spent, he could not but haue perished, had not a maruellous showre of raine fallen vpon him, when his Armie was in extreame despaire. All men that know Egypt, and haue written thereof, affirm, That it neuer raines there; but the purposes of the Almighty God are secret, and he bringeth to passe what it pleaseth him; for it is also said, That when he had lost his way in those vast deserts, that a flight of Crows flew before the Armie; who making faster wing when they were followed, and fluttering slowly when the Army was cast backe, guided them ouer those pathlesse sands to Iupiters Temple.

Arrian. l. 3.

Arrianus from the report of Ptolomie, the sonne of Lagus, saies, That hee was led by two Dragons, both which reports may bee a-like true. But many of those wonders and things prodigious, are fained by those that haue written the Storie of Alexander, as that an Eagle lay houering directly ouer his head at the battell of Issus; That a Swallow flew about his head when he slept, and could not be feared from him, till it had wakened him at Halicarnassus, fore-shewing the treason of Aropus, practised by Darius to haue slaine him; That from the yron barres of which the Tyrians, made their defensue engines, when Alexander besieged them, there fell drops of blood; and that the like drops were found in a loafe of bread, broken by a Macedonian Souldier, at the same time; That a Turfe of earth fell on his shoulder, when he lay before Gaza, out of which there flew a Bird into the aire. The Spaniards in the conquest of the West Indies haue many such pretie pretie tales; telling how they haue beene assisted in battaile, by the presence of our Lady, and by Angels riding on white horses, with the like Romish miracles, which I thinke themselves doe hardly beleue. The strangest thing that I haue read of in this kinde being certainly true, was, That the night before the battaile at Nouara, all the Dogges which followed the French Armie, ranne from them to the Switzers, leaping and fawning vpon them, as if they had beene bred and fed by them all their liues, and in the morning following, Triunzi and Tremouille, Generals for Lewis the twelfth, were by these Imperiall Switzers utterly broken and put to ruine.

The place of this Idol of Iupiter Hammon is ill described by Curtius, for hee bounds it by the Arabian Troglodites on the South, betwene whom and the Territorie of Hammon, the Region Thebaïs, or the superiour Egypt, with the Mountaines of Lybia, and the Riuer of Nilus, are interiacent; and on the North hee ioynes it to a Nation, called Nassamones, who bordering the Sea-thore, liue (saith he) vpon the spoyle of shipwracke: whereas the Temple or groue of this Idol hath no Sea neere it by two hundred miles and more, being found on the South part of Lybia; these Nassamones being due West from it, in the South part of Marmarica.

When Alexander came neere the place, hee sent some of his Parasites before him to practise the Priests attending the Oracle, That their answer might be giuen in all things, agreeable to his madde ambition, who affected the title of Iupiters sonne. And so he was saluted, Sonne of Iupiter, by the Devils Prophet, whether prepared before to flatter him, or rather (as some thinke) defectiue in the Greeke tongue; For whereas hee meant to say Opaidion, he said Opaidios, that is; O sonne of Iupiter, in stead of, O deare sonne: for which Grammaticall error he was richly rewarded, and a rumour presently spread, that the great Iupiter had acknowledged Alexander for his owne.

He had heard that Perseus and Hercules had formerly consulted with this Oracle, The one, when he was employed against Gorgon, The other, against Anteus and Bustiris; and seeing these men had deriued themselves from the gods, why might not hee? By this it seemes, that hee hoped to make his followers and the world fooles, though indeed hee made himselfe one, by thinking to couer from the Worlds knowledge his vanities and vices; and the better to confirme his followers in the beleefe of his Deitie, he had practized the Priests to giue answer to such as consulted with the Oracle, that it should bee pleasing to Iupiter to honour Alexander as his Sonne.

Curt. li. 4.

Who this Ammon was, and how represented, either by a bosse carried in a Boat, or by a Ram, or a Rams-head; I see that many wise men haue troubled themselves to finde out; but, as Arrianus speaks of Diomyssus, or Liber Pater (who liued, saith S. Augustine, in Moses time) Ea qua de dijs veteres fabulis suis conscripserunt, non sunt nimium curiosè peruejiganda; Nec must not ouer-curiously search into the fables, which the Ancients haue written of their gods.

But this is certaine and notable, that after the Gospell beganne to bee preached in the world, the Deuill in this and all other Idols became speechlesse. For that this Hammon was neglected in the time of Tiberius Caesar, and in the time of Traian altogether forgotten, Strabo and Plutarch witnesse.

There is found neere his Temple a Fountaine called Fons solis (though Ptolomie in his third African Table sets it farther off) that at mid-night is as hot as boyling water, and at Noone as cold as any yce: to which I cannot but giue credit, because I haue heard of some other Wells of like nature, and because it is reported by S. Augustine, by Diodore, Herodotus, Plinie, Mela, Solinus, Arrianus, Curtius, and others; and indeed our Bathes in England are much warmer in the night, than in the day.

§. VIII.

How Alexander marching against Darius, was opposed very unskilfully by the Enemy.

From the Temple of Hammon hee returned to Memphis, where among many other learned men, he heard the Philosopher Psammones, who, belike vnderstanding that he affected the Title of Iupiters Sonne, told him that God was the Father-king of all men in generall; and refining the pride of this haughtie King, brought him to say, That God was the Father of all mortall men, but that he acknowledged none for his children saue good men.

He gaue the charge of the feuerall Prouinces of Egypt to feuerall Gouvernours, following the rule of his Master Aristotle, That a great Dominion should not be continued in the hands of any one: whom therein the Romane Emperours also followed, not daring to commit the government of Egypt to any of their Senators, but to men of meaner ranke and degree. He then gaue order for the founding of Alexandria vpon the Wester-moſt branch of Nilus. And hauing now ſetled (as he could) the eſtate of Egypt, with the Kingdome of the leſſer Aſia, Phœnicia, and Syria, (which being but the pawnes of Darius his ill fortune, one happie victory would readily haue redeemed,) he led his Army towards Euphrates, which paſſage though the ſame was committed to Mazeus to defend, yet was it abandoned, and Alexander without reſiſtance paſt it. From thence hee marched towards Tigris, a Riuer for the ſwiftnesse thereof called by the Persians The Arrow. Heere, as Curtius, and Reason it ſelfe tells vs, might Darius eaſily haue repelled the inuading Macedonian: for the violent courſe of the ſtreame was ſuch, as it draue before it many waighy ſtones, and thoſe that moued not but lay in the bottome, were ſo round and well poliſhed by continuall rolling, that no man was able to fight on ſo ſlipperie a footing; nor the Macedonian foot-men to wade the Riuer, otherwiſe then by ioyning their hands and counterlacing their armes together, making one waighy and entire body to reſiſt the ſwift paſſage and furious race of the ſtreame. Beſides this notable helpe, the Channell was ſo deepe towards the Eaſterne ſhore, where Darius ſhould haue made head, as the footmen were inforſt to liſt their Bowes and Arrowes, and Durt ouer their heads to keepe them from being moiſtined, and made vſeruiſeable by the Waters. But it was truly and vnderſtandingly ſaid of Homer,

*Talis eſt hominum terreſtrium mens,
Qualem quotidie ducit pater virorumq; Deorumq;.*

The mindes of men are euer ſo affected,
As by Gods will they daily are directed.

And it cannot be denied, that as all Eſtates of the World, by the ſurſet of miſgouernment haue bene ſubiect to many grieuous, and ſometimes mortall diſeaſes: So had the Empire of Persia at this time brought it ſelſe into a burning and conſuming Feauer, and thereby become franticke and without vaderſtanding, foreſhewing manifeſtly the diſſolution and death thereof.

But Alexander hath now recouered the Eaſterne ſhores of Tygris, without any other difficultie, than that of the nature of the place; where Mazeus (who had charge to defend the paſſage both of Euphrates and it) preſented himſelſe to the Macedonians, followed with certaine companies of Horſe-men, as if with vneuen forces hee durſt haue charged them on euen ground, when as with a multitude farre exceeding them, hee forlooke the aduantage which no valour of his enemies could eaſily haue ouercome. But it is commonly ſcene, that fearefull and cowardly men doe euer follow thoſe waies and counſels, whereof the opportunity is already loſt.

It is true that he ſet all prouiſions a fire wherewith the Macedonians might ſerue themſelues ouer Tygris, thinking thereby greatly to haue diſtreſſed them; but the execution of good counſell is fruitleſſe, when vnreaſonable. For now was Alexander ſo well furniſhed with carringes, as nothing was wanting to the competencie of the Armie which hee conducted. Thoſe things alſo which he fought to waſte, Alexander being now in fight, were by his Horſe-men ſaued and recouered. This, Mazeus might haue done ſome daies before at good leiſure; or at this time with ſo great a ſtrength of horſe-men, as the Macedonians durſt not haue purſued them, leauing the ſtrength of their foote out of fight, and far behinde.

The new prouiſions of Darius. Accidents foregoing the battaile of Arbela.

Darius, vpon Alexanders firſt returne out of Egypt, had aſſembled all the forces, which thoſe Regions next him could furniſh, and now alſo were the Arians, Scythians, Indians, and other Nations arriued; Nations (ſaith Curtius) that rather ſerued to make vp the names of men, than to make reſiſtance. Arrianus hath numbered

numbered them with their Leaders; and findes offoot-men of all ſorts ten hundred thouſand, and of horſe foure hundred thouſand, beſides armed Chariots, and ſome few Elephants. Curtius who muſters the Armie of Darius at two hundred thouſand foote; and neere ſixtie thouſand horſe, comes (I thinke) neerer to the true number; and yet ſeeing hee had more confidence in the multitude than in the valour of his Vaſſalls, it is like enough that hee had gathered together of all ſorts ſome three or foure hundred thouſand, with which hee hoped in thoſe faire plaines of Aſſyria, to haue ouerborne the few numbers of the inuading Armie. But it is a Rule in the Philoſophie of the Warre:

In omni praelio non tam multitudo, & virtus indocta, quam ars & exercitium ſolent præſtare vici-toriam; In euery battaile ſkill and practice doe more towards the victory, than multitude and rude audacitie.

While Alexander gaue reſt to his Armie after the paſſage ouer Tygris, there happened an Eclipse of the Moone, of which the Macedonians, not knowing the cauſe and reaſon, were greatly affrighted. All that were ignorant (as the multitude alwaies are) tooke it for a certaine preſage of their ouerthrow and deſtruction, in ſo much as they began not only to murmur, but to ſpeake it boldly, That for the ambition of one man, a man that diſſained Philip for his Father, and would needs be called the Son of Iupiter, they ſhould all periſh; For he not onely inforſt them to make warre againſt Worlds of enemies, but againſt Riuers, Mountaines, and the Heauens themſelues.

Hereupon Alexander being ready to march forward made a halt, and to quiet the mindes of the multitude, he called before him the Egyptian Aſtologers, which followed him thence, that by them the Souldiers might bee aſſured that this deſection of the Moone was a certaine preſage of good ſucceſſe; for that it was naturall they neuer imparted to the common people, but reſerued the knowledge to themſelues, ſo as a ſorry Almanack-maker had bene no ſmall ſoole in thoſe daies.

Of this kind of ſuperſtitious obſeruation Caſar made good vſe, when he fought againſt Arminius and the Germans: for they being perſwaded by the caſting of lots, that if they fought before the change of the Moone, they ſhould certainly loſe the battaile, Caſar forſt them to abide it, though they durſt not giue it; wherein hauing their mindes already beaten by their owne ſuperſtition, and being reſolutely charged by the Romans, the whole armie in effect periſhed.

Theſe Egyptians gaue no other reaſon than this, That the Gracians were vnder the aſpect of the Sunne, the Persians, of the Moone; and therefore the Moone failing and being darkened, the ſtare of Persia was now in danger of falling, and their glory of being obſcured. This iudgement of the Egyptian Priests being noyed through all the Armie, all were ſatiſfied, and their courage redoubled. It is a principle in the Warre, which, though deuſed ſince, was well obſerued then: Exercitium terrore plenum Dux ad pugnam non ducat; Let not a Captaine leade his Armie to the fight, when it is poſſeſſed with maſter of terror.

It is truly obſerued by Curtius, that the people are ledde by nothing ſo much as by ſuperſtition; yea, wee finde it in all ſtories, and often in our owne, that by ſuch inuentions, deuſed tales, dreames, and prophesies, the people of this Land haue bene carried head-long into many dangerous tumults and inſurrections, and ſtill to their own loſſe and ruine.

As Alexander drew neere the Persian Armie, certaine letters were ſurprized, written by Darius to the Gracians, perſwading them for great ſummes of money, either to kill or betray Alexander. But theſe by the aduice of Parmenio he ſuppreſſed.

At this time alſo Darius his faire Wife, oppreſt with ſorrow, and wearied with trauell, died. Which accident Alexander ſeemed no leſſe to bewaile than Darius, who vpon the firſt bruit, ſuſpected that ſome diſhonourable violence had bene offered her; but being ſatiſfied by an Eunuch of his owne that attended her, of Alexanders Kingly reſpect towards her, from the day of her being taken, he deſired the immortal Gods, That if they had decreed to make a new Maſter of the Persian Empire, then it would pleaſe them to conſerre on ſo iuſt and continent an enemy as Alexander, to whom he once againe before the laſt triall by battell offered theſe conditions of peace.

That with his Daughter in marriage he would deliuer vp and reſigne all Aſia the leſſe, and with Egypt, all thoſe Kingdome between the Phœnician Sea, & the Riuer of Euphrates; That he would pay him for the ranſome of his Mother, and his other Daughters 30. thouſand thousand talents, and that for the performance thereof, hee would leaue his son Ochus in hostage: To this they sought to perswade Alexander by such arguments as they had, Alexander causing the Embassadors to be removed, aduised with his Counsell, but heard no man speak but Parmenio, the very right hand of his good fortune, who perswaded him to accept of these faire conditions. He told him, that the Empire between Euphrates and Hellepont was a faire addition to Macedon; that the retaining of the Persian prisoners was a great cumber, and the treasure offered for them of farre better vse then their persons, with diuers other arguments; all which Alexander reiected. And yet it is probable that if he had followed his aduice, and bounded his ambition within those limits, hee might haue liued as famous for vertue as for fortune, and left himselfe a Successor of able age to haue enioyed his estate, which afterward, indeede, hee much enlarged, rather to the greatning of others than himselfe: who to assure themselves of what they had vsurped upon his issues, left not one of them to draw breath in the world within a few yeeres after. The truth is, That Alexander in going so farre into the East, left behinde him the reputation which he brought out of Macedon; the reputation of a iust and prudent Prince, a Prince temperate, aduised and gratefull: and being taught new lessons by abundance of prosperitie, became a louer of wine, of his owne flatterie, and of extreame cruelty. Yea, as Seneca hath obserued, the taint of one vniust slaughter, amongst many, defaced and withered the flourishing beauty of all his great acts and glorious victories obtained. But the Persian Embassadors stay his answere, which was to this effect, That whatsoever hee had bestowed on the Wife and children of Darius, proceeded from his owne naturall clemencie and magnanimitie, without all respect to their Master, but thanks to an enemy was improper; that he made no warres against aduersitie, but against those that resisted him; not against Women and Children, but against armed enemies: and although by the reiterated practice of Darius, to corrupt his Souldiers, and by great summes of money to perswade his friends to attempt vpon his person, he had reason to doubt that the peace offered was rather pretended than meant, yet he could not (were it otherwise & fairly) resolute in haste to accept the same, seeing Darius had made the Warre against him, not as a King with Royall and ouert force, but as a Traitor by secret and base practice; That for the Territorie offered him, it was already his owne, and if Darius could beat him back againe ouer Euphrates, which he had already past, he would then beleue that hee offered him somewhat in his owne power: Otherwise he propounded to himselfe for the reward of the Warre which hee had made, all those Kingdomes as yet in Darius possession; wherein, whether hee were abused by his owne hopes or no, the battaile which hee meant to fight in the day following should determine. For in conclusion, he told them, that he came into Asia to giue, and not to receive; That the Heauens could not hold two Sunnes: and therefore if Darius could be content to acknowledge Alexander for his Superior, hee might perchance be perswaded to giue him conditions fit for a second Person, and his Inferiour.

§. X.

The battaile of Arbela: and that it could not bee so strongly fought as reports hath made it.

In this answere the Embassadors returne; Darius prepares to fight, and sends Maceus to defend a passage, which hee neuer yet dared so much as to hazard. Alexander consults with his Captaines, Parmenio perswades him to force Darius his Campe by night; so that the multitude of enemies might not moue to our in the Macedonians, being but few. Alexander disdaines to steale the victorie, and resolueth to bring with him the day fight, to witnesse his valour. But it was the successe that made good Alexander's resolution, though the counsell giuen by Parmenio was more sound: For it is a ground in Warre, Sipauci necessario cum multitudine pugnare cogantur, consilium est non his tempore belli fortunam temere. Notwithstanding vpon the view of the multitude at hand, hee staggers and trenches himselfe vpon a ground of aduantage, which the Persian had abandoned: And whereas Darius for feare of surprise had stood with his Armie in armour all the day, and forborne sleepe all the night; Alexander gaue his men rest and store of foode, for reason had taught him this Rule in the Warre, In pugna milites validius resistunt, si cibo potuque refecti fuerint, nam famem intrinsecus magis pugnat, quam ferrum exterius; Souldiers doe the better stand to it in fight, if they haue their bellies full of meate and drinke; for hunger within, fights more eagerly than Steele without.

The numbers which Alexander had, saith Arrianus, were fortie thousand foot, and seuen thousand horse; these belike were of the European Armie; for hee had besides both Syrians, Indians, Egyptians, and Arabians, that followed him out of those Regions. He vsed but a short speech to his Souldiers to incourage them; and I thinke that hee needed little Rhetoricke; for by the two former battailes vpon the Riuer of Granick and in Cilicia, the Macedonians were best taught with what men they were to encounter. And it is a true saying, Victoria Victoriam parat, animusque victoribus auget, & aduersarijs auferit; One victorie begets another, and puts courage into those that haue already had the better, taking spirit away from those that haue beene beaten.

Arrianus and Curtius make large descriptions of this battaile, fought at Gaugamela; They tell vs of many charges and re-charges; That the victory inclined sometime to the Persians, sometime to the Macedonians; That Parmenio was in danger of being overthrowne, who led the left wing; That Alexander's Reare-guard was broken, and his carriages lost; That for the fierce and valorous encounters on both sides, Fortune her selfe was long vnresolved on whom to bestow the Garland: And lastly, That Alexander in person wrought wonders, being charged in his reitrait. But, in conclusion, Curtius deliueers vs in account but three hundred dead Macedonians, in all this terrible daies worke, saying, That Ephesion, Perdiccas and others of name were wounded. Arrianus findes not a third part of this number slaine; of the Persians there fell fortie thousand (saith Curtius), thirty thousand according to Arrianus: Ninety thousand, if wee beleue Diodore. But what can we iudge of this great encounter, other than that, as in the two former battailes, the Persians vpon the first charge ranne away, and that the Macedonians pursued? For if of these foure or fise hundred thousand Asians brought into the field by Darius, eury man had cast but a Dart, or a Stone, the Macedonians could not haue bought the Empire of the East at so easie a rate, as fixe or seuen hundred men in three notorious battailes. Certainly, if Darius had fought with Alexander vpon the banks of Euphrates, & had armed but fiftie or threescore thousand of this great multitude, one lie with Spades (for the most of all hee had were fit for no other weapon) it had beene impossible for Alexander to haue past that Riuer so easily, much lesse the Riuer of Tygris. But as a man whose Empire God in his prouidence had determined, hee abandoned all places of aduantage, and suffered Alexander to enter so farre into the bowells of his kingdom, as all hope and possibilitie of escape by reitrait being taken from the Macedonians, they had presented vnto them the choise, either of death or victorie, to which election Darius could no way constraime his owne, seeing they had many large Regions to runne into from those that inuaded them.

§. XI.

Of things following the battaile of Arbela. The yeelding of Babylon and Susa.

Darius* after the rout of his Armie recovered Arbela the same night, better followed in his flight, than in the fight. He propounded vnto them that ranne after him his purpose of making a reitrait into Media, perswading them that the Macedonians, greedy of spoyle and riches, would rather attempt Babylon, Susa, and other Cities, filled with treasure, than pursue the vanquished. This miserable resolution his Nobilitie rather obeyed than approved.

Alexander soone after Darius his departure arrines at Arbela, which with a great masse of treasure, and Princely ornaments, was rendred to him: for the feare which conducted Darius, tooke nothing with it but shame and dishonour. Hee that had beene twice beaten, should rather haue sent his treasure into Media, than brought it to Arbela, so neer the place where he abid the comming of his enemies; if he had beene victorious, hee might haue brought it after him at leisure; but being ouercome, he knew it vnpossible to drine Mules and Camels laden with gold from the pursuing Enemy, seeing himselfe, at the ouerthrow hee had in Cilicia, cast the Crowne from his head, to runne away with the more speed. But errors are then best discerned when most incurable. Et praeferat magis reprehendi possunt quam corrigi; It is easier to reprehend than amend what is past.

From Arbela Alexander tooke his way towards Babylon, where Mazeus in whom Darius had most confidence rendred himselfe; his children and the Citie. Also the Capitaine of the Castle, who was keeper of the treasure, strewed the streets with flowres, burnt frankincence vpon Altars of siluer as Alexander passed by, and deliuered vnto him whatsoeuer was committed to his trust. The Magi (the Chaldean Astrologers) followed this Capitaine in great solemnitie to entertaine their new King: after these came the Babylonian horsemen, infinite rich in attire, but exceeding poore in warlike furniture. Betweene these (though not greatly to be feared) and himselfe, Alexander caused his Macedonian foote-men to march. When he entred the Castle, hee admired the glory thereof, and the abundance of treasure therein found, amounting to fiftie thousand talents of siluer vncoynd. The Citie it selfe I haue elsewhere described with the Walles, the Towers, the Gates and Circuite, with the wonderfull place of pleasure about two miles in Circuite, surrounded with a Wall of fourescore foote high, and on the top thereof (being vnder-borne with Pillars) a Grove of beaurifull and fruitfull trees, which it is said that one of the Kings of Babylon caused to be built, that the Queene and other Princesses might walke priuately therein. In this Citie, rich in all things, but most of all in voluptuous pleasures, the King rested himselfe and the whole Army foure and thirty daies, consuming that time in banquetting and in all sorts of effeminate exercise, which so much softned the mindes of the Macedonians, not acquainted till now with the like delicacies, as the seuer discipline of warre which taught them the sufferances of hunger and thirst, of painefull trauaile, and hard lodging, began rather to be forgotten, than neglected.

An. b. Alex.

Heere it was that those bands of a thousand Soldiers were erected, and Commanders appointed ouer them, who thereupon were stiled Chiliarchi. This new order Alexander brought in, was to honor those Capitaines which were found by certaine selected Iudges to haue deserued best in the late warre. For before this time the Macedonian companies consisted but of fise hundred. Certainly the drawing downe of the foot-bands in this latter age hath bene the cause (saith the Marshal Adonluf) that the title and charge of a Capitaine hath been bestowed on euery Picque Baus or Spurn-Cow, for when the Capitaines of foote had a thousand Souldiers vnder one Ensigne, and after that fise hundred, as in the time of Francis the first, the title was honorable, and the Kings were lesse charged, and farre better serued. K. Henry the eight of England neuer gaue the commandement of any of his good ships, but to men of known valour, and of great estate, nay sometime he made two Gentlemen of qualitie Commanders in one ship: but all orders and degrees are fallen from the reputation they had.

While Alexander was yet in Babylon, there came to him a great supply out of Europe, for Antipater sent him fixe thousand foote and fise hundred horse, out of Macedon; of Thracians three thousand foot, and the like number of horse; and out of Greece foure thousand and foure hundred horse, by which his Armie was greatly strengthened: for those that were infected with the pleasures of Babylon, could hardly bee brought againe, De 40 quitter la plume pour dormir sur la dure; To change from soft beds to hard boords.

Hee left the Castle and Citie of Babylon with the Territories about it in charge with three of his owne Capitaines, to wit, Agathon, Minetus, and Appolidorus; to supply all wants, a thousand talents; but to grace Mazeus, who rendred the Citie vnto him, hee gaue him the title of his Lieutenant ouer all, and tooke with him Bagistines that gaue vp the Castle, and hauing distributed to euery Souldier a part of the Treasure, he left Babylon, and entred into the Province Satrapene: from thence hee went on towards Susa in Persia, the same which Ptolomie, Herodotus, and Elianus call Memnonia, situate on the River Euleus, a Citie sometime gouerned by Daniel the Prophet. Abulites also, gouernour of this famous Citie, gaue it vp to the Conqueror, with fiftie thousand talents of siluer in bullion, and twelue Elephants for the warre, with all other the treasures of Darius. In this sort did those Vassalls of fortune, louers of the Kings prosperitie, not of his person, for so all ambitious men are) purchase their owne peace and safetie with the Kings treasures. And heerein was Alexander well aduised, that whatsoeuer titles hee gaue to the Persians, yet hee left all places of importance in trust with his owne Capitaines, to wit, Babylon, Susa, and Persepolis, with other Cities and Provinces by him conquered; for if Darius (as yet liuing) had beaten the Macedonians but in one battell, all the Nobilitie of Persia would haue returned vnto their naturall Lord. Those that are Traitors to

Diodor speaketh of more than fiftie thousand talents in bullion, and of nine Millions of gold, sub dicitur in forma excusae

to their owne Kings, are neuer to be vied alone in great enterprises by those Princes that entertaine them, nor ever to be trusted with the defences of any frontier Towne, or Fortresse of waight, by the rendring whereof they may redeeme their liberty and estates lost. Hereof the French had experience, when Don Pedro de Nauarra, being banished out of Spain, was trusted with Fonterabe, in the yeere 1523.

While Alexander spoiled Arbela, Mazeus might haue furnished the King from Babylon; and while he stayed foure and thirty daies at Babylon, Abulites might haue holpen him from Susa: and while hee feasted there, Tiridates from Persepolis might haue relieved him; for the great masse of treasure was laied vp in that Citie. But who hath sought out and friended fearefull aduersitie? It is certaine, that benefits binde not the ambitious, but the honest: for those that are but greedy of themselves, doe in all changes of fortune onely consult the conseruation of their owne greatnesse.

The gouernment of Susa, with the Castle and Treasure, he committed to his own Macedonians, making Abulites who rendred it vnto him his Lieutenant, as he had done Mazeus and others, in giuing them Titles, but neither trust nor power; for he left three thousand old Souldiers in Garrison to assure the place; and Darius Mother and her children to repose themselves.

It is said, that Charles the fift hauing promised Charles of Bourbon the gouernment of Marseilles, if he could haue forst it, and whereof he made sure accompt, told some of his nearest Counsellors, that he meant nothing lesse than the performance of that promise; because hee should thereby haue left the Duke (reioiced from his Master) very well wherewithall to haue recouered his fauour.

§. XII.

How Alexander came to Persepolis, and burnt it.

From Susa Alexander leadeth his Armie toward Persepolis, and when he fought to passe those mountains which lunder Susiana and Persia, he was soundly beaten by Ariobarzanes, who defended against him those Steights, called Pyle Persejia, or Susida, and after the losse of many Companies of his Macedonians, he was forst to saue himselfe by retreat, causing his foote to march close together, and to couer themselves with their Targets from the stones tumbled on them from the Mountain top. Yet in the end he found out another path, which a Lycian, liuing in that Countrie, discovered vnto him, and came thereby suddenly in view of Ariobarzanes, who being inforst to fight vpon euery ground, was by Alexander broken, whereupon he fled to Persepolis; but (after that they of Persepolis had refused to receiue him) he returned and gaue a second charge vpon the Macedonians, wherein he was slaine. In like manner did King Francis the first, in the yeere 1515, finde a way ouer the Alpes, the Switzers vnder taking to defend all the passages, who, if their footman ship had not saued them vpon the Kings descent on the other side, they had bene ill paid for their hard lodging on those Hills.

Foure thousand Greekes, saith Curtius (Iustine numbers them but at eight hundred) hauing bene taken prisoners by the Persians, presented themselves to Alexander now in sight of Persepolis. These had the barbarous Persians so maimed and defaced, by cutting off their Hands, Noses, Eares, and other Members, as they could no way haue bene knowne to their Countrey-men, but by their voices; to each of these Alexander gaue three hundred Crownes, with new garments, and such Lands as they liked to liue vpon.

Tiridates, one of Darius his false-hearted Grandes, hearing of Alexanders approach, made him know that Persepolis was ready to receiue him, and prayed him to double his pace, because there was a determination in the people to spoyle the Kings treasure. This Citie was abandoned by many of her Inhabitants vpon Alexanders arrivall; and they that staid followed the worst counsell, for all was left to the liberty of the Souldiers, to spoyle and kill at their pleasure. There was no place in the world at that time, which, if it had bene layed in the ballance with Persepolis, would haue waighed it downe. Babylon, indeede, and Susa, were very rich; but in Persepolis lay the bulke and maine store of the Persians. For after the spoyle that had bene made of money, curious plate, bullion, Images of gold and siluer, and other Iewells; there remained to Alexander himselfe one hundred and twenty thousand talents. Hee left the same number of three thousand Macedonians

Macedonians in Persopolis, which he had done in Susa, and gave the same formall honour to the Traitor Tiridates, that he had done to Abulites; but he that had the trust of the place was Nicarides, a creature of his owne. The body of his Armie hee left here for thirtie dayes, of which the Commanders were Parmenio and Craterus, and with a thousand horse and certaine troopes of chosen foote, hee would needes view in the Winter-time those parts of Persia, which the Snow had couered, a fruitlesse and foolish enterprise, but as Seneca saies: Non ille ire vult, sed non potest stare; He hath not a will to goe, but he is unable to stand still. It is said and spoken in his praise: That when his Souldiers cried out against him, because they could not endure the extreame frost, and make way, but with extreame difficulty, through the snow, that Alexander forooke his horse, & led them the way. But what can be more ridiculous than to bring other men into extremitie, thereby to shew how well himselfe can endure it? His walking on foote did no otherwise take off their wearinesse that followed him, than his sometime forbearing to drinke did quench their thirst, that could lesse endure it. For mine owne little iudgement I shall rather commend that Captaine, that makes carefull prouision for those that follow him, and that seeks wisely to prevent extreame necessity, than those witlesse arrogant fooles, that make the vaunt of hauing endured equally with the common Souldier, as if that were a matter of great glory and importance.

We finde in all the Warres that Cesar made, or the best of the Roman Commanders, that the prouision of victuals was their first care. For it was a true saying of Co-ligni, Admirall of France; That who so will shape that beast (meaning Warre) must begin with his belly.

But Alexander is now returned to Persopolis, where those Historians, that were most amorous of his vertues, complaine, that the opinion of his valour, of his liberality, of his clemencie towards the vanquished, and all other his Kingly conditions, were drowned in drinke; That he smothered in carrowling cups all the reputation of his actions past, and that by descending, as it were, from the reuerend Throne of the greatest King, into the company and familiarity of base Harlots, he began to be despised both of his owne and all other Nations. For being perswaded, when he was enflamed with wine, by the infamous Strumpet Thais, he caused the most sumptuous and goodly Castle and Citie of Persopolis, to be consumed with fire, notwithstanding all the arguments of Parmenio to the contrary, who told him that it was a dishonour to destroy those things by the perswasions of others, which by his proper vertue and force he had obtained; and that it would be a most strong perswasion to the Asians, to thinke hardly of him, & thereby aliene their hearts: For they might well beleue that he which demolished the goodliest Ornament they had, meant nothing lesse than (after such vastation) to hold their possession. Per violentiam crudelitas sequitur; Crueltie doth commonly follow drunkenness: For so it fell out soone after, and often, in Alexander.

§. XIII.

The Treason of Bessus against Darius. Darius his death.

ABOUT this time he receiued a new supply of Souldiers out of Cilicia, and goes on to finde Darius in Media. Darius had there compounded his fourth and last Armie, which he meant to haue increased in Bactria, had he not heard of Alexander coming on, with whom (trusting to such companies as he had, which was numbered at thirty or forty thousand) he determined once againe to trie his fortune. He therefore calls together his Captaines and Commanders, and propounds vnto them his resolution, who being desperate of good successe vsed silence for a while. Artabazus, one of his eldest men of Warre, who had sometime liued with Philip of Macedon, brake the yce, and protesting that he could neuer be beaten by any aduersitie of the Kings, from the faith which he had euer ought him, with firme confidence, that all the rest were of the same condition (whereof they likewise assured Darius by the like protestation) he approved the Kings resolution. Two onely, and those the greatest, to wit, Naburzanes, and Bessus, whereof the latter was Gouvernour of Bactria, had conspired against their Master, and therefore aduised the King to lay a new foundation for the Warre, and to pursue it by some such person for the present, against whom neither the gods nor Fortune had in all things declared themselves to be an enemy: this preamble Naburzanes vsed, and and in conclusion aduised the election of his fellow Traitor Bessus, with promise that the warres ended, the Empire should againe be restored to Darius. The King swollen with disdain prest towards Naburzanes to haue slain him; but Bessus and the Bactrians whom he commanded, being more in number than the rest, with-held him. In the meane while Naburzanes with-drew himselfe, and Bessus followed him, making their quarter a-part from the rest of the Armie. Artabazus, the Kings faithfull seruant, perswaded him to be aduised, and serue the time, seeing Alexander was at hand, and that he would at least make shew of forgetting the offence made; which the King being of a gentle disposition, willingly yeelded vnto. Bessus makes his submission and attends the King, who remoues his Armie. Patron, who commanded a Regiment of four thousand Greekes, which had in all the former Battailles serued Darius with great fidelity, and alwayes made the retreat in sight of the Macedonians, offered himselfe to guard his person, protesting against the Treason of Bessus; but it was not his destinie to follow their aduice who from the beginning of the Warre gaue him faithfull counsell, but he cained still to Bessus, who told him, that the Greekes with Patron their Captaine were corrupted by Alexander, and practised the diuision of his faithfull seruants. Bessus had drawne vnto him thirtie thousand of the Armie, promising them all those things, by which the louers of the World and themselves are wont to be allured, to wit, riches, safetie, and honour.

Now the day following Darius plainly discovered the purposes of Bessus, and being overcome with passion, as thinking himselfe vnable to make head against these vngrateful and vnaturall Traytors, he prayed Artabazus his faithfull seruant to depart from him, and to prouide for himselfe. In like sort he discharged the rest of his attendants, all save a few of his Eunuchs, for his Guards had voluntarily abandoned him: His Persians being most base Cowards, durst not undertake his defence against the Bactrians, notwithstanding that they had foure thousand Greekes to ioyne with him, who had bene able to haue beaten both Nations. But it is true, that him, which forsakes himselfe, no man follows. It had bene farre more Man-like and King-like, to haue dyed in the head of those foure thousand Greekes, which offered him the disposition of their liues, (to which Artabazus perswaded him) than to haue lien bewailing himselfe on the ground, and suffering himselfe to be bound like a Slave by those ambitious Monsters that layd hand on him, whom neither the consideration of his former great estate, nor the honour he had given them; nor the trust reposed in them, nor the world of benefits bestowed on them, could moue to pittie: no, nor his present aduersitie, which about all things should haue moued them; could pierce their viperous and vngrateful hearts. Vaine it was indeede to hope it, for infidelitie hath no compassion.

Now Darius, thus forsaken, was bound & laid in a Cart, couered with Hides of Beasts, to the end that by any other ornament he might not be discovered; and to adde despight and denision to his aduersity, they fastned him with Chaynes of Gold, and so drew him on among their ordinary Carriages and Carts. For Bessus and Naburzanes perswaded themselves to redeeme their liues and the Prouinces they held, either by delivering him a Prisoner to Alexander, or if that hope failed, to make themselves Kings by his slaughter, and then to defend themselves by force of Armes. But they failed in both. For it was against the nature of God, who is most iust, to pardon so strange villany, yea though against a Prince purely Heathenish and an Idolater. Alexander hauing knowledge that Darius was retired towards Bactria, and durst not abide his coming, hastened after him with a violent speed, and because he would not force his Foote men beyond their powers, he mounted on horse-backe certaine selected Companies of them, and best armed, and with sixe thousand other Horse, rather ran than marched after Darius. Such as hated the Treason of Bessus, and secretly forooke him, gaue knowledge to Alexander of all that had happened, informing him of the way that Bessus took, and how neere he was at hand, for many men of worth daily ran from him. Hereupon Alexander againe doubled his pace, and his Vanguard being discovered by Bessus his Reare, Bessus brought a Horse to the Cart, where Darius lay bound, perswading him to moue thereon, and to saue himselfe. But this unfortunate King refusing to follow those that had betrayed him, they cast Darius into the Cart, wounded him to death, and wounded the Beasts that drew him, & slew two poore seruants that attended his person. This done, they al fled that could, leauing the rest to the mercy of the Macedonian swords.

Polystratus a Macedonian, being by pursuite of the vanquished prest with thirst, as he was refreshing himself with some water that he had discovered, espying a Cart with a T came of wounded beasts breathing for life, and not able to moue; searched the same, and therein found Darius bathing in his owne blood: And by a Persian captiue which followed this Polystratus, he vnderstood that it was Darius, and was informed of this barbarous Tragedie. Darius also seemed greatly comforted (if dying men ignorant of the liuing God can be comforted) that he cast not out his last sorrowes vnheard, but that by this Macedonian, Alexander might know and take vengeance on those Traitors, which had dealt no lesse vnworthily than cruelly with him, recommending their reuenge to Alexander by this messenger, which he besought him to pursue, not because Darius had desired it, but for his owne honour, and for the safetie of all that did, or should after weare Crownes. He also, hauing nothing else to present, rendred thanks to Alexander for the Kingly grace vsed towards his Wife, Mother, and Children, desiring the immortall gods to submit vnto him the Empire of the whole World. As he was thus speaking, impatient death pressing out his few remaining spirits, he desired water, which Polystratus presented him, after which he liued but to tell him, that of all the best things that the world had, which were lately in his power, he had nothing remaining but his last breath, where-with to desire the gods to reward his compassion.

§. XIII.

How Alexander pursued Bessus, and tooke into his grace Darius his Captaines.

IT was now hoped by the Macedonians, that their trauels were neere an end, euery man preparing for his returne. Hereof when Alexander had knowledge, he was greatly grieved; for the bounded earth sufficed not his boundlesse ambition. Many arguments he therefore vsed to draw on his Armie farther into the East, but that which had most strength was, that Bessus, a most cruell Traitor to his Master Darius, hauing at his deuotion the Hyrcanians, and Bactrians, would in short time (if the Macedonians should returne) make himselfe Lord of the Persian Empire, and enioy the fruits of all their former traualles. In conclusion, he wan their consents to goe on: which done, leauing Craterus with certaine Regiments of foote, and Amyntas with fixe thousand Horse in Parthenia, he enters not without some opposition into Hyrcania; for the Mardons, and other barbarous Nations, defended certaine passages for a while. He passeth the Riuer of Ziobris, which taking beginning in Parthia, disolues it selfe in the Caspian Sea: it runneth vnder the ledge of Mountaines, which bound Parthia & Hyrcania, where hiding it selfe vnder-ground for three hundred furlongs, it then riseth againe and followeth its former course. In Zadracarta or Zendracarta, the same Citie which Ptolomie writes Hyrcania, the Metropolis of that Region, he rested fiftene dayes, banquetting and feasting therein.

Phataphernes, one of Darius his greatest Commanders, with others of his best followers, submit themselves to Alexander, and were restored to their places and governments. But of all other he graced Artabazus most highly for his approued and constant faith to his Master Darius. Artabazus brought with him ten thousand and fise hundred Greekes, the remainder of all those that had serued Darius. He treats with Alexander for their pardon, before they were yet arriued, but in the end they render themselves simply without promise or composition: he pardons all but the Lacedamonians, whom he imprisoned, their Leader hauing slaine himselfe. He was also wrought, (though to his great dishonor) to receiue Nabarzanes that had ioyned with Bessus to murder Darius.

§. XV.

Of Thalestris Queene of the Amazons; where, by way of digression it is shewed, that such Amazons haue beene, and are.

Ere it is said, that Thalestris or Minothea, a Queene of the Amazons, came to visite him, and her suite was, (which she easily obtained) That she might accompany him till she were made with childe by him: which done (refusing to follow him into India) she returned into her owne Countrie.

Plutarch

Plutarch citeth many Historians, reporting this meeting of Thalestris with Alexander, and some contradicting it. But, indeede, the letters of Alexander himselfe to Antipater, recounting all that befell him in those parts, and yet omitting to make mention of this Amazonian businesse, may iustly breed suspition of the whole matter as forged. Much more iustly may we suspect it as a vaine tale, because an Historian of the same time reading one of his bookes to Lyfimachus (then King of Thrace) who had followed Alexander in all his voyage; was laught at by the King for inserting such newes of the Amazons; and Lyfimachus himselfe had neuer heard of. One that accompanied Alexander tooke vpon him to write his acts; which to amplifie, He told how the King had fought single with an Elephant, and slaine it. The King hearing such stuffe, caught the booke, and threw it into the Riuer of Indus, saying, that it were well done to throw the writer after it, who by inserting such fables, disparaged the truth of his great exploits. Yet as we beleue and know that there are Elephants, though it were false that Alexander fought with one; so may we giue credit vnto writers, making mention of such Amazons, whether it were true or false that they met with Alexander; as Plutarch leaues the matter vndermined. Therefore I will here take leaue to make digression, as well to shew the opinions of the ancient Historians, Cosmographers, and others, as also of some moderne discoverers touching these warlike Women, because not onely Strabo, but many others of these our times make doubt, whether, or no, there were any such kinde of people. Julius Solinus seates them in the North parts of Asia the lesse. Pom. Mela finds two Regions filled with them; the one, on the Riuer Thermodoon; the other, neere the Caspian Sea; Quas (saith he) Sauromatidas appellant; Which the people call Sauromatidas. The former of these two had the Cimerians for their Neighbours; Certum est, (saith Vallinus, who hath Commented vpon Mela) illos proximos Amazonibus fuisse. It is certain that the Cimmerians were the next Nations to the Amazons. Ptolomie sets them farther into the Land North-wards, neere the Mountaines Hippaci, not farre from the Pillars of Alexander. And that they had Dominion in Asia it selfe toward India, Solinus and Pliny tels vs; Where they gouerned a people called the Pandæans, or Pādæans, so called after Pandæa the Daughter of Hercules, from whom all the rest deriue themselves. Claudian affirms, That they commanded many Nations: For he speaks (largely perhaps as a Poet) thus:

Medis leuibusq; Sabæis

Claud. de exp. Persicæ.

ouer the Medes, and light Sabæans, raignes
This female sexe: and vnder armes of Queene, Great part of the Barbarian Land remains.

Diodorus Siculus hath hard of them in Zybia, who were more ancient (saith he) than those which kept the banks of Thermodoon, a Riuer falling into the Euxine Sea, neere Heraclium. Herodotus doth also make report of these Amazons, whom he tels vs that the Scythians call Scorpatas, which is as much as Viricidas, or Men-killers. And that they made incursion into Asia the lesse, sackt Ephesus, and burnt the Temple of Diana, Manetho & Auchonius report, which they performed fortie yeeres after Troy was taken. At the siege of Troy himselfe we read of Penthesilea, That she came to the succour of Priamus.

Am. Marcellinus giues the cause of their inhabiting vpon the Riuer of Thermodoon, speaking confidently of the Warres they made with diuers Nations, and of their overthrow.

Plutarch in the life of Thesens, out of Philochorus, Hellenicus, and other ancient Historians, reports the taking of Antiope Queene of the Amazons by Hercules, and by him giuen to Thesens, though some affirme, That Thesens himselfe got her by stealth, when she came to visit him aboard his ship. But in substance there is little difference, all confessing, That such Amazons there were. The same Author in the life of Pompey speaks of certaine companies of the Amazons, that came to aide the Albanians against the Romans, by whom after the battaile, many Targets and Buskins of theirs were taken vp: and he saith farther; That these women entertaine the Gela and Lelages once a yeere, Nations inhabiting betwene them and the Albanians.

But

part. 2. c. 28.

But to omit the many Authors, making mention of Amazons that were in the old times, Fran. Lopez who hath written the nauigation of Orellana, which he made down the Riuer of Amazons from Peru, in the yeere 1542. (vpon which Riuer, for the diuers turnings, he is said to haue sailed fixe thousand miles) reports from the relation of the said Orellana, to the Councell of the Indies. That he both saw those women and fought with them, where they sought to impeach his passage towards the East-Sea.

It is also reported by Phricus Schmidel, that in the yeere 1542. when he sailed vp the Riuers of Paragna and Parabol, that he came to a King of that Countrey, called Scherues, inhabiting vnder the Tropick of Capricorne, who gaue his Captaine Ernando Rieffere, a Crowne of siluer, which he had gotten in fight from a Queene of the Amazons in those parts.

Ed. Lopes, in his description of the Kingdome of Congo, makes relation of such Amazons, telling vs, That (agreeable to the reports of elder times) they burne off their right brefts, and liue a part from men, saue at one time of the yeere, when they feast and accompany them for one month. These (saith he) possesse a part of the Kingdome of Momotapa in Africa, nineteene degrees to the Southward of the line: and that these women are the strongest guards of this Emperour, all the East Indian Portugals know.

I haue produced these authorities in part, to iustifie mine owne relation of these Amazons, because that which was deliuered me for truth by an ancient Cacique of Gutana, how vpon the Riuer of Papamena (since the Spanish discoueries called Amazons; that these women still liue and gouerne, was held for a vaine and vnprobable report.

§. XVI.

NOW as Alexander had begun to change his conditions after the taking of Persopolis: so at this time his prosperity had so much over-wrought his vertue, as he accomplished clemency to be but basenesse, & the temperance which he had vsed all his life time, but a poore and deiected humour, rather becoming the instructors of his youth, than the condition and state of so mighty a King, as the world could not equall. For he perswaded himselfe that he now represented the greatnesse of the gods; he was pleased that those that came before him, should fall to the ground, & adore him; he ware the Robes and garments of the Persians, & commanded that his Nobility should doe the like; he entertained in his Court and Campe, the same shamelesse rabble of Curisians, and Sodomiticall Eunuchs, that Darius had done, & imitated in all things the proud, voluptuous, & detested manners of the Persians, whom he had vanquished. So licentious is felicity, as notwithstanding that he was fully perswaded, that the gods whom he serued (detesting the vices of the inuaded) assisted him in all attempts against them, he himselfe, contrary to the Religion he profest (which how Idolatrous soeuer it were, could not be but fearfull vnto him by neglecting it) became by imitation, & not by ignorance or education, a more foule and fearefull Monster than Darius, from whose tyranny he vaunted to haue deliuered so many Nations. Yea, those that were dearest and neereest vnto him, began to be ashamed of him, entreaining each other with this, and the like scornfull discourse; That Alexander of Macedon was become one of Darius his licentious Courtiers; That by his example, the Macedonians were in the end of so many trauailes, more impouersished in their vertues, than enriched by their victories; and that it was hard to iudge whether the Conquerors, or the Conquered were the baser slaues. Neither were these opinions so reserued, but that the noise of them came to his eares. Hee therefore with great gifts sought to pacifie the better sort, and those of whose iudgements he was most ialous, and making it knowne to the Armie, that Bessus had assumed the title of a King, and called himselfe Artaxerxes, and that he had compounded a great Armie of the Bactrians, and other Nations, he had arguments enow to perswade them to goe on, to the end that all already gotten, might not with themselves (so farre ingaged) be cast away. And because they were pestered with the spoiles of so many Cities, as the whole Armie seemed but the guard of their carriages, (not much vnlike the warfare of the French) having commanded euery mans fardels to be brought into the market-place, he together with his owne, caused all to be consumed with fire. Certainly, this could not but haue procured most dangerous vnto him, seeing the common-Souldiers had more interest in these things which they had bought with their painefull trauailes, and with their bloud; than in the Kings ambition; had not (as Seneca often obserued) his happy temeritie overcome all things. As he was in his way, newes came to him, that Satibarzanes, whom he had established in his former gouernment ouer the Arrians, was reuolted; whereupon leaving the way of Bactria, he sought him out; but the Rebelle, hearing of his coming, fled to Bessus, with two thousand Horfe. He then went on towards Bessus, and by setting a great pile of wood on fire, with the aduantage of a strong winde, won the passage ouer an high and vnacceffable Rocke, which was defended against him, with thirtene thousand foote. For the extremitie of the Flame and smoake, forced them from the place, otherwile inuincible. I saw in the third ciuill warre of France, certaine Caues in Languedoc, which had but one entrance, and that very narrow, cut out in the mid-way of high Rockes, which we knew not how to enter by any ladder or engine, till at last, by certaine bundels of straw, let downe by an yron chaine, and a waigthy stone in the midst, those that defended it, were so smothered, as they rendred themselves with their plate, monie, and other goods therein hidden. There were also some three yeeres before my arriual in Guiana, three hundred Spaniards well mounted, smothered to death, together with their Horfes, by the Countrey-people, who did set the long dry grasse on fire to the Eastward of them, (the winde in those parts being alwayes East) so as notwithstanding their flying from the smoake, there was not any one that escaped. Sir John Barrowes also, with a hundred English, was in great danger of being lost at Margarita, in the West-Indies, by hauing the grasse fired behinde him, but the smoake being timely discovered, he recouered the Sea-shore with the losse of sixteene of his men. I remember these things, but to giue caution to those that shall in times to come inuade any part of those Countreies, that they alwayes, before they passe into the Land, burne downe the grasse and sedge to the East of them; they may otherwise, without any other enemy, than a handfull of straw set on fire, dye the death of hony-Bees, burnt out of the Hieue.

§. XVII.

ALEXANDER was, after he parted hence, no where resisted, till he came into Aria, to the East of Bactria, where the chiefe Citie of that Prouince, called Artacoana, was a while defended against him, by the reuolt of Satibarzanes, but in the end he receiued the Inhabitants to mercy. At this place his Armie was re-enforced with a new supply of fise thousand and fise hundred foote, and neere fise hundred Horfe, out of Greece, Thessalie, and other places. His iourne out of Persia into these parts, is very confusedly described. For hauing (as all his Historians tell vs) a determination to finde Bessus in Bactria, he takes it at the very entrance, & takes the way of Hyrcania, from thence he wanders Northwards towards the obscure Mardi, vpon the Caspian-Sea, and thence ouer the Mountaine Coronus into Aria, and Drangiana.

At this time it was that the treason of Dimnius brake out, of which Philotas the sonne of Parmenio was accused, as accessarie, if not principall. This Dimnius, hauing (I know not vpon what ground) conspired with some others against the life of Alexander, went about to draw Nicomachus, a young man whom he loued, into the same treason. The Youth, although he was first bound by oath to secrecie, when he heard so foule a matter vttered, began to protest against it so vehemently, that his friend was like to haue slaine him for security of his owne life. So, constrained by feare, he made shew as if he had bene won by perswasion; and by seeming at length to like well of the businesse, he was told more at large what they were, that had vndertaken it. There were nine or ten of them, all men of ranke, whose names Dimnius (to countenance the enterprife) reckoned vp to Nicomachus. Nicomachus had no sooner freed himselfe from the company of this Traitor Dimnius, than he acquainted his owne brother Ceballinus with the whole Historie: whereupon it was agreed betweene them, that Ceballinus (who might with least suspicion) should goe to the Court, and vtter all. Ceballinus, meeting with Philotas, told him the whole businesse, desiring him to acquaint the King therewith: which he promised to doe,

but

but did not. Two dayes passed, and Philotas neuer brake with the King about the matter, but still excused himselfe to Ceballinus by the Kings want of leisure. This his coldnesse bred suspicion, and caused Ceballinus to addresse himselfe to another, one Metron, Keeper of the Kings Armorie, who forth-with brought him to Alexanders presence. Alexander, finding by examination what had passed betwene Ceballinus and Philotas, did fully perswade himselfe that this concealment of the treason, argued his hand to haue bene in the businesse. Therefore when Dimnus was brought before him, he asked the Traitor no other question than this: Wherein haue I so offended thee, that thou shouldst thinke Philotas more worthy to be King than I? Dimnus perceiuing when he was apprehended, how the matter went, had so wounded himselfe, that he liued no longer, than to giue his last groane in the Kings presence. Then was Philotas called, and charged with the suspicion, which his silence might iustly breede. His answer was, That when the practice was reuealed vnto him by Nicomachus, he iudging it to be but fruitlesse, did forbear to acquaint Alexander therewithall, vntill he might haue better information. This error of his, (if it were onely an error) although Alexander, for the notorious seruices of his Father Parmenio, of his brother Nicanor lately dead, and of Philotas himselfe, had freely pardoned and giuen him his hand for assurance; yet by the instigation of Craterus, he againe swallowed his Princely promise, & made his enemies his Iudges: Curtius giues a note of Craterus in this businesse; How he perswaded himselfe, that he could neuer finde a better occasion to oppresse his priuate enemy, than by pretending pietie, and dutie towards the King. Hereof a Poet of our owne hath giuen a note as much better, as it is more generall in his Philotas:

See how these great men cloathe their priuate hate,
In these faire colours of the publike good,
And to effect their ends, pretend the State,
As if the State by their affection stood:
And arm'd with power and Princes ialousies,
Will put the least conceit of discontent
Into the greatest ranke of treacheries,
That no one action shall seeme innocent;
Yea valour, honour, bounty, shall be made
As accessaries vnto ends vniust:
And euen the seruice of the State must lade
The needfullst vndertaking with distrust;
So that base vilenesse, idle Luxurie,
Seeme safer farre, than to doe worthily, &c.

Now although it were so, that the King, following the aduice of Craterus, had resolved the next day to put Philotas to torment, yet in the very evening of the same night in which he was apprehended, he called him to a banquet, and discoursed as familiarly 40 with him as at any other time. But when in the dead of the night Philotas was taken in his lodging, and that they which hated him began to binde him, he cryed out vpon the King in these words: O Alexander, the malice of mine Enemies hath surmounted thy mercy, and their hatred is farre more constant than the word of a King. Many circumstances were vrged against him by Alexander himselfe, (for the Kings of Macedon did in person examine the accusations of treason) and this was not the least (not the least offence, indeede, against the Kings humour, who desired to be glorified as a God) That when Alexander wrote vnto him concerning the title giuen him by Iupiter Hammon; He answered, That he could not but reioyce that he was admitted into that sacred Fellowship of the gods, and yet he could not but withall grieue for those that should liue vnder such a one as 50 would exceede the nature of man. This was (saith Alexander) a firme perswasion vnto me, that his heart was changed, and that he held my glory in despiht. See what a strange Monster Flatterie is, that can perswade Kings to kill those that doe not praise and allow those things in them, which are of all other most to be abhorred. Philotas was brought before the multitude, to heare the Kings Oration against him: he was brought forth in vilde garments, and bound like a Theefe, where he heard himselfe, and his absent Father the greatest Capitaine of the World, accused, his two other Brothers, Hector and Nicanor hauing bene lost in the present Warre. He was so greatly oppressd with gneffe, as for a while he could utter nothing but teares, and sorrow had so waisted his spirits, as he stanke vnder those that led him. In the end, the King asked him, In what language he would make his defence; he answered, In the same wherein it had pleased the King to accuse him, which he did, to the end that the Persians, as well as the Macedonians, might vnderstand him. But hercof the King made his aduantage, perswading the assembly, that he disdaind the language of his owne Countrey, and so with-drawing himselfe, left him to his mercilesse enemies.

This proceeding of the Kings, Philotas greatly lamented, seeing the King, who had so sharply inueyed against him, would not vouchsafe to heare his excuse. For not his enemies onely were imboldened thereby against him; but all the rest, hauing discovered the Kings disposition and resolution, contending among themselves, which of them should exceede in hatred towards him; Among many other arguments, which he vs'd in his owne defence, this was not the weakest; That when Nicomachus, desired to know of Dimnus, what men of marke and power were his partners in the conspiracie (as seeming vnto him Demetrius of the Kings Chamber, Nicanor, Amyntas, and some others, but spake not a word of Philotas, who by being Commander of the Horse, would greatly haue valued the party, and haue encouraged Nicomachus. Indee, as Philotas said well for himselfe, it is likely that Dimnus, thereby the better to haue heartned Nicomachus, would haue named him, though he had neuer dealt with him in any such practice. And for more certaine prooffe, that he knew nothing of their intents that practised against the King, there was not any one of the Conspirators, being many, inforc'd by torments, or otherwise, that could accuse him; and it is true, that aduersity being seldome able to beare her owne burden, is for the most part found so malicious, as she rather desires to draw others (not alwayes deseruing it) into the same danger, than to spare any that it can accuse. Yet at the last, howsoeuer it were, to auoide the extremity of resistlesse and vnnatural torments, deuised by his profest enemies Craterus, Cenus, Ephesion, and others, Philotas accused his owne selfe; being perswaded that they would haue slaine him forthwith. But he failed euen in that miserable hope; and suffering all that could be laid on flesh and bloud, he was 30 forced to deliuer, not what he knew, but whatsoeuer best pleased their eares, that were farre more mercilesse than death it selfe.

Of this kinde of iudiciall proceeding S. Augustine greatly complaineth as a matter to be bewailed, saith he, with Fountains of teares. Quid cum in sua causa quisque torquetur: & cum quaeritur utrum sit nocens, cruciatur: & innocens luit pro incerto scelere certissimas Aug. de Ciuit. Dei. l. 1. c. 5. penas: non quia illud commississe detegitur, sed quia non commississe nescitur: what shall we say to it, when one is put to torture in his owne case; and tormented whilst yet it is in question whether he be guilty; and being innocent, suffers assured punishment for a fault, of which there is no certaintie; not because he is knowne to haue committed the offence, but because others doe not know that he hath not committed it:

It had bene enough for Alexanders safety, if Philotas had bene put to death without torment, the rest would not much haue griued theroat, because he was greatly suspected. But Hemolaus, who afterward conspired against him, made the Kings cruelty and delight in bloud, the greatest motiue of his owne ill intent. Therefore, Seneca, speaking of Alexander, saith thus: Crudelitas minime humanum malum est, indignum amitti animo; ferina ista rabies est sanguine gaudere & vulneribus, & abiecto homine, in siluestre animal transire; Cruelty is not a humane vice; it is unworthy of so milde a spirit. It is euen a beastly rage to delight in bloud and wounds, and casting away the nature of man, to become a sauaige Monster. Seneca de Cle. l. 2.

For the conclusion of this Tragedie, Curtius makes a doubt, whether the confession 30 that Philotas made, were to giue end to the torments which he could not any longer endure, or that the same was true indeede; For (saith he) in this case, they that speake truly, or they that deny falsly, come to one and the same end. Now, while the Kings hands were yet wet in bloud, he commanded that Lyncestes, sonne-in-Law to Antipater, who had bene three yeeres in prison, should be slaine: The same dispatch had all those that Nicomachus had accused: others there were that were suspected, because they had followed Philotas, but when they had answered for themselves that they knew no way so direct to winne the Kings fauour, as by louing those whom the King fauoured; they were dismissd. But Parmenio was yet liuing; Parmenio, who had serued with great fidelitie as well Philip of Macedon the Kings Father, as himselfe; Parmenio that first opened the way into Asia; That had deprest Attalus the Kings enemy; that hadelwayes, and in all hazards, the leading of the Kings Vant-guard, that was no lesse prudent in counsell, than fortunate in all attempts; A man beloued of the men of War, and, to say the truth, he that had made the purchase for the King of the Empire of the East, and of all the glory and fame he had: That he might not therefore reuenge the death of his Sonne, though not vpon the King, (for it was vnlike that he would haue dishonoured his fidelity in his eldest age, hauing now liued threescore and ten yeeres) yet vpon those that by the witchcraft of flattery had posselt themselves of his affection; it was resolved that he should be dispatcht. Polydamas was imployed in this businesse, a man whom of all other Parmenio trusted most, and loued best, who (to be short) finding him in Media, and hauing Cleander and other Murderers with him, slew him walking in his Garden, while he was reading the Kings letters. Hic exitus Parmenionis fuit, militie domig, clari viri; Multa sine Rege prosperè, Rex sine illo nihil magnareti gesserat; This was the end of Parmenio (saith Curtius) who had performed many notable things without the King, but the King, without him, did neuer effect any thing worthy of praise.

§. XV III.

How Alexander subdued the Bactrians, Sogdians, and other people. How Bessus was deliuered into his hands. How he fought with the Scythians.

When these things had end, Alexander went on with his Armie, and brought vnder his obedience the Araspians or Euergetians; he made Amenides (sometime Darius his Secretarie) their Gouverneur, then he subdued the Arachosians, and left Menon to command ouer them. Here the Armie, sometimes led by Parmenio, findes him, consisting of twelue thousand Macedons and Greekes, with whom he past through some cold Regions with difficultie enough. At length he came to the foote of the Mountaine Taurus towards the East, where he built a Citie which he honoured with his own name, and peopled it with seuen thousand of his old Macedons, worne with age and with trauailes of the warre. The Arians, who since he left them were reuolted, he subdued againe by the industry and valour of Caranus and Erignus; And now he resolues to finde out the new King Bessus in Bactria. Bessus, hearing of his coming, prepares to passe ouer the great Riuer of Oxus which diuides Bactria from Sogdiana; Artabazus is made Gouverneur of Bactria abandoned by Bessus; The Macedonian Armie suffereth for want of Water, inasmuch as when they came to the Riuer of Oxus, there died more of them by drinking inordinately, then Alexander had lost in any one battaile against the Persians. And it may well be; For (as Clytus did after obiect vnto him) he fought against women, not against men, and not against their persons, but their shadowes. He found on the banks of this great Riuer no manner of Timber or other materials, to make either boates, bridges, or raffe, but was foor to sew together the Hides that covered his carriages, and stiffe them with straw, and on them in fixe daies to passe ouer his Armie, which Bessus might easily haue distrest, if he had dared but to behold the Macedonian Armie afarre off. He had formerly complained against Darius for neglecting to defend the banks of Tigris, and other passages, and yet now, when this traiterous slaue had styled himselfe a King, he durst not performe any thing worthy of a slaue. And therefore those that were neere vnto him, and whom he most trusted, to wit, Spitamenes, Dataphernes, Catanes, and others the Commanders of his Armie, moued both by the care of their owne safety, and by the memory of Bessus his Treason and cruelty against Darius, bound him in the like manner that he had done his Master, but with this difference, that he had the chaine closed about his necke like a mastiffe Cog, and so was dragged along to be presented to his enemy.

In the meane while Alexander was arriued at a certaine Towne inhabited with Greekes of Miletum, brought thither by Xerxes, when long before he returned out of Greece, whose issues had well neere forgotten their Countrey-language. These most cruelly (after they had receiued him with great ioy) he put to the sword, and destroyed their Citie. At this place he receiued Bessus, and hauing rewarded Spitamenes with the rest that deliuered him, he gaue the Traitor into the hands of Oxatres, Darius his brother, to be tormented.

But

But while he now thought himselfe secure, some twenty thousand Mountainers assailed his Campe; in repelling whom he receiued a shot in the legge, the arrow head sticking in the flesh, so as he was carried in a Horse-Lytter, sometime by the horse-men, sometime by the foote.

Soone after he came vnto Maracanda, which Petrus Peronidinus takes to be Samarchand, the great Citie of the great Tamerlaine. It had in compasse threescore and ten furlongs (Curtius saith.) Here he receiued the Embassadors of the Scythians (called Aians) who offered to serue him.

The Bactrians are shortly again with the Sogdians stirred to Rebellion, by the same Spitamenes and Catanes, who had lately deliuered into his hands the Traitor Bessus. Many Cities were resolutely defended against him, all which, after victory, he defaced and rased, killing all therein. At one of these he receiued a blow on the necke, which stricke him to the ground, and much disabled him for many dayes after. In the meane while Spitamenes had recouered Maracanda, against whom he imployed Menedemus with three thousand foote and eight hundred horse.

In the heate of these tumults Alexander marched on (if we may beleue Curtius and others) till he came to the Riuer of Tanais, vpon whose banke he built another Alexandria threescore furlongs in compasse, which he beautified with houses within seuentene daies after the wals built. The building of this Citie is said to haue beene occasion of a war betwene him and the Scythians; the Scythian King perswading himselfe, that this new Towne was fortified of purpose to keepe him vnder. I doe not well vnderstand, why the Scythians, offering war in such terrible manner, that Alexander was iudged by his owne Souldiers to counterfeite sicknesse for very feare, should neuertheless make suit for peace: neither finde I the reason why Alexander (not intending the conquest of those Northerne deserts, but only the defence of his owne banke) should refuse to let them alone, with whom he could not meddle further then they should agree to suffer him. Yet hercof is made a great matter; & a victory described, in pursuit of which the Macedons ran beyond the bounds and monuments of Bacchus his expedition.

The truth is, That Curtius and Trogus haue greatly mistaken this Riuer which they call Tanais. For it was the Riuer of Iaxartes, that runs betwene Sogdiana and Scythia, which Alexander past ouer, while Menedemus was imployed in the recovery of Samarchand: But Tanais which diuides Asia from Europe, is neere two thousand miles distant from any part of Bactria and Sogdiana, and the way desert and vnknowne. So that Alexander had (besides Iaxartes) the great Riuer of Volga and many others to swim ouer, ere he could recouer Tanais: which (from the place where he was) he could hardly haue discovered with the Armie that followed him, if he had imployed all the time that he liued in Asia in that trauaile.

Wherefore it is enough to beleue, that the Asiatique Scythians, making some offer to disturbe the erection of this new Citie, which was like to giue some hindrance to their excursions, were driuen away by the Macedonians; and being naked of defensiue Armes, easily chased some ten or twelue miles; which is the substance of Curtius his report. As for the limits of Bacchus his iourne, like enough it is that Bacchus (if in his life time he were as sober a man, as after his death he was held a drunken god) went not very far into that waste Countrey, where he could finde nothing but trees and stones, nor other businesse than to set vp a monument.

Threescore of the Macedons are said to haue beene slaine, and one thousand one hundred hurt in this fight, which might easily be in passing a great Riuer, defended against them by good Archers. Of Scythian horses one thousand eight hundred were brought into the Campe, and many prisoners. It is forbidden by some Historians, and indeede it is hardly possible, to set down the numbers of such as perish in battell: yet Cesar commonly did it. And where the diligence of the victors hath beene so inquisitiue into the greatnesse of their owne successe, that writers haue beene able to deliuer such particulars by credible report, I hold it not vnlawfull to set downe what wee finde; especially when it serues to giue light to the businesse in hand. The small number which the Macedonians lost; the omission of the number which they slew (a thing nor vsuall in Curtius, who forbears nothing that may set out the greatnesse of Alexander) & the little bootie that was gotten; doe make it probable, that this war was no better than the repulsion of a few rousing Tartars (the like being yeerely performed by the Moscouite, without any boast) and therefore better omitted by some Historians, than so highly extolled as a great exploit by others.

While Alexander was assuring himselfe of those Scythians bordering vpon Taxartes, he receiued the ill newes that Menedemus was slaine by Spitamenes, the Armie (by him led) broken, and the greatest numbers slaine, to wit, two thousand four, and three hundred horse. He therefore, to appease the rebellion, and to take reuenge of Spitamenes, makes all the haste he can; but Spitamenes flies into Bactria. Alexander kills, burns, and laies waste all before him; not sparing the innocent children, and so departs, leauing a new Governour in that Prouince.

To repaire this losse he receiued a great supply of nineteene thousand Souldiers out of Greece, Lycia, and Syria, with all which, and the old Armie, he returnes towards the South, and passeth the Riuer of Oxus; on the South-side whereof he built fixe Townes neere each other for mutuall succour. But he findes a new start-up-Rebell, called Arimazes, (a Sagidian) followed with thirty thousand Souldiers that defended against him a strong piece of ground on the top of a high Hill; whom when Alexander had fought in vaine to win by faire words, he made choice of three hundred yong men, and promised ten talents to the first, nine to the second, and so in proportion to the rest, that could finde a way to creepe vp to the top thereof. This they performed with the losse of some two and thirty of their men, and then made a signe to Alexander, that they had performed his commandement. Hereupon he sent one Cophes to perswade Arimazes to yeld the place, who, being shewed by Cophes that the Armie of Macedon was already mounted vp, yelded simply to Alexanders mercy, and was (with all his kinred) scourged and crucified to death, which punishment they well deserued for neglecting to keepe good watch in so dangerous a time. For the place, as seemes by the description, might easily haue bene defended against all the Armies of the World. But, what strength cannot doe, Mans wit, being the most forcible engine, hath often effected; Of which I will giue you an example in a place of our owne.

The Island of Sarke, ioyning to Garnsey and of that gouernement, was in Queene Maris time surprised by the French, and could neuer haue bene recouered againe by strong hand, having cattell and corne enough vpon the place to feede for many men as will serue to defend it, and being euery way so inaccessible, that it might be held against the Great Turke. Yet by the industry of a Gentleman of the Netherlands, it was in this sort regained. He anchored in the roade with one Ship of small burden, and pretending the death of his Merchant, besought the French, being some thirty in number, that they might burie their Merchant in hallowed Ground, and in the Chappell of that Isle; offering a present to the French of such Commodities as they had aboard; whereto (with condition that they should not come a-shore with any weapon, no not so much as with a Knife) the French men yelded. Then did the Flemings put a Coffin into their Boat, not filled with a dead carkasse, but with Swords, Targets, and Harquebusses; The French receiued them at their landing, and searching euery of them so narrowly as they could not hide a Pen-knife, gaue them leaue to draw their Coffin vp the Rockes with great difficulty; some part of the French tooke the Flemish Boat and rowed aboard their Ship, to fetch the commodities promised, and what else they pleased, but being entred, they were taken and bound. The Flemings on the Land, when they had carried their Coffin into the Chappell, shut the doore to them, and taking their weapons out of the Coffin, set vpon the French; they run to the Cliffe and cry to their Company aboard the Fleming to come to their succour, but finding the Boat charged with Flemings, yelded themselves and the place. Thus a Fox-taile doth sometimes helpe well to piece out the Lions-skin, that else would be too short.

§. XIX.

How Alexander slew his owne friends.

After these Sagidian and Scythian Warres, we reade of Alexanders killing of a Lion, and other friuolous matters, and that he committed the Gouernment of Macedonia, and the Country about it, to Clytus, and how he slew him soone after, for valuing the vertue of Philip the father before that of Alexander the son, or rather because he objected to the King the death of Parmeno, and derided the Oracle of Hammon:

for

for therein hee toucht him to the quicke; the same being deuoured in publike; and ara drunken Banquet. Clytus, indeed, had deserued as much at the Kings hands, as any man liuing had done, and had in particular saued his life, which the King well remembered when he came to himselfe, and when it was too late. Yet to say the truth, Clytus his insolencie was intolerable. As he in his Cups forgot whom he offended, so the King in his (for neyther of them were themselves) forgot whom he went about to slay, for the griefe whereof hee tare his owne face and sorrowed so inordinately, as, but for the perswasions of Calisthenes, it is thought he would haue slaine himselfe.

Wine begat Furie, Furie matter of Repentance: but preceding mischiefes are not attended by succeeding bewailings: Omne vitium ebrietas & incendit, & detegit; oblatione malis comatibus verecundiam remouet; ubi possedit animum nimia vis vini, quicquid mali latet, emergit: non facit ebrietas vitia, sed protrahit; Drunkenesse both kindles and layes open euery vice; it remoues out of the way that shame which giues impediment vnto badde attempts; where wine gets the mastery, all the ill that before lay hidden breakes out: drunkenesse indeed rather discouers vices, than makes them.

Soone after this, Spitamenes, who slew Bessus, and had lately revolted from Alexander, was murdered by his Wife, and his head presented to Alexander. Spitamenes being taken away, the Dahans also seized vpon his fellow conspirator Dataphernes, and deuoured him vp. So Alexander being now freed from all these petty Rebels, disposed of the Prouinces which he past ouer, and went on with his Armie into Gabaza, where it suffered so much Hunger, Cold, Lightning, Thunder, and Storme, as he lost in one Tempest a thousand of his Trainee. From hence he inuaded the Sacans, and destroyed their Countrey. Then came he into the Territorie of Cohortanes, who submitted himselfe vnto him, feasted him greatly, & presented him with thirtie beautifull Virgins, among whom Roxane, afterward his Wife, was one: which although all the Macedonians disdained, yet none of them durst vse any freedome of speech after Clytus his death. From hence he directed his course towards India, having so increased his numbers, as they amounted to an hundred and twenty thousand armed men.

In the meane while he would needs be honoured as a God: whereto that hee might allure the Macedonians, hee employed two pernicious Parasites, Hagis and Cleo; whom Calisthenes opposed: For, among many other honest arguments vsed to the assembly, he told Cleo, That hee thought, that Alexander would disdaine the gift of God-head from his Vassalls; That the opinion of Sanctity, though it did sometime follow the death of those, who in their life-time had done the greatest things, yet it neuer accompanied any one as yet liuing in the world. Hee further told him, That neither Hercules nor Bacchus were Deified at a banquet, and vpon drinke, (for this matter was propounded by Cleo at a carousing feast) but that, for the more than manly acts by them performed while they liued, they were in future and succeeding Ages numbred among the gods. Alexander stood behinde a partition and heard all that was spoken, waiting but an opportunitie, to be reuenged on Calisthenes, who being a man of free speech, honest, learned, and a louer of the Kings honour, was yet soone after tormented to death; not for that hee had betrayed the King to others: but because he neuer would condescend to betray the King to himselfe, as all his detestable flatterers did. For in a conspiracy against the King made by one Hermolaus and others (which they confest) he caused Calisthenes without confession, accusation, or triall, to be torne a-sunder vpon the racke: This deed, vnworthy of a King, Seneca thus censureth. Hoc est Alexandri crimen aeternum, quod nulla virtus, nulla bellorum felicitas ad redimet. Nam quotiens quis dixerit, Occidit Persarum multa milia: opponitur, & Calisthenem: Quotiens dictum erit, Occidit Darium: opponitur, & Calisthenem. Quotiens dictum erit, Omnia Oceano tenus viciit, ipsum quoque tentauit nouis classibus, & Imperium ex angulo Thracie usque ad Orientis terminos protulit: dicetur, sed Calisthenem occidit. Omnia licet antiqua Ducum Regumque exempla transferat, ex his que fecit nihil tam magni erit quam scelus Calisthenes; This is the eternall crime of Alexander, which no vertue nor felicitie of his in Warre shall euer bee able to redeeme. For as often as any man shall say, Hee slew many thousand Persians; it shall bee replied, Hee did so, and hee slew Calisthenes: When it shall bee said, Hee slew Darius, it shall bee replied, and Calisthenes; When it shall be said, Hee warne all as farre as the very Ocean; thereon also hee aduentured with vnusall Names; and extended his Empire from a corner of Thracia, to the utmost bounds of the Orient, it shall be said, withall; But hee killed Calisthenes. Let him haue out-gone all the ancient examples examples of Captaines and Kings; none of all his acts make so much to his glory, as Callisthenes to his reproach.

§. XX.

Of Alexanders journey into India. The battaile betweene him and Porus.

With the Armie before remembered, of one hundred and twenty thousand foote and horse, Alexander did enter the borders of India, where such of the Princes, as submitted themselues vnto him, he entertained louingly, the rest hee constrained; killing Man, Woman, and Childe, where they resisted. He then came before Nisa built by Bacchus, which after a few daies was rendred vnto him. From thence he removed to a Hill at hand, which on the top had goodly Gardens filled with delicate fruits and Vines, dedicated to Bacchus, to whom hee made feasts for ten daies together. Now when hee had drunke his fill, hee went on towards Dadala, and from thence to Acadera, Countries spoiled and abandoned by the Inhabitants, by reason whereof, victuals failing, hee diuides his Armie: Ptolomie led one part, Cemon another, and himselfe the rest. They take many Townes, whereof that of greatest fame was Mazage, which had in it 3. hundred thousand men; but after some resistance, it was yielded vnto him by Cleoppe the Queene, to whom againe he restored it; at the siege of this Citie he received a wound in the legge. After this, Nora was taken by Polyperchon, and a Rocke of great strength by himselfe: he wanne also a passage vpon one Eryx, who was slaine by his companie, and his head presented to Alexander. This is the summe of Alexanders doings in those parts, before such time as he arrived at the Riuer of Indus. Comming to Indus, he found there Ephesian, who (being sent before) had prepared boates for the transportation of his Army, and ere Alexanders arriuall, had perswaded Omphis King of that part of the Country, to submit himselfe to this great Conquerour. Therefore, soone vpon Alexanders comming, Omphis presented himselfe with all the strength of his Country, and fixe and fiftie Elephants, vnto him; offering him his seruice and assistance. He made Alexander know, that hee was an Enemie to the next two great Kings of that part of India, named Abisares and Porus; wherewith Alexander was not a little pleased, hoping by this diuision to make his owne victorie by farre the more easie. Hee presented Alexander with a Crowne of gold, so did hee the rest of his Commanders, and withall fourescore talents of siluer coyne; which Alexander not onely refused, but to shew that he was couetous of glory, not of gold, hee gaue Omphis a thousand talents of his owne treasure, besides other Persian rarities. Abisares, hauing heard that Alexander had received his enemie Omphis into his protection, resolved to make his owne peace also: For, knowing that his owne strength did but equall that of Omphis, and that there was no other difference betweene them, than that which the chance of Warre gaue, hee thought it an ill match when Alexander, who had already beaten vnder foote all the greatest Princes of Asia, should make himselfe a Party and Head of the quarrell. So had Alexander none now to stand in his way but Porus, to whom he sent a commandement, that hee should attend him at the border of his Kingdome, there to doe him homage. But from Porus hee received this manly answere; That he would satisfie him in his first demand, which was to attend him on his borders, and that well accompanied; but for any other acknowledgement hee was resolved to take counsell of his Sword. To be short, Alexander resolves to passe ouer the Riuer Hydaspes, and to finde Porus at his owne home. Porus attends him on the farther banke with thirtie thousand foot, fourescore and ten Elephants, and three hundred armed Chariots, and a great troope of Horse. If Darius had done the like on Tigris, Alexander had surely stayed somewhat longer ere he had seene India. The Riuer was foure furlongs broad, which makes halfe a mile, and withall deep and swift. It had in it many Ilands, among which there was one well shadowed with wood, and of good capacite. Alexander sent Ptolomie vp the Riuer with a great part of the Army, shrowding the rest from the view of Porus: who by this deuice being drawne from his first incamping, sets himselfe downe opposite to Ptolomie, supposing that the whole Armie of Macedon meant to force their passage there. In the meane while Alexander recouers the farther shore without resistance. Hee orders his troopes and aduanceth towards Porus, who at first rather beleeueth, that Abisares his Confederate (but now the Confederate of fortune) had bin come ouer Hydaspes to his aide, than that Alexander had past it. But

But he findes it otherwise, and sends his Brother Hagis with foure thousand horse, and a hundred armed waggons to entertaine him. Each waggon had in it foure to fight, and two to guide it; but they were at this time of little vse: for there had fallen so much raine, and thereby the fields were so moistned, as the horses could hardly trot. The Scythians and Dahans had the Vanguard, who so galled these Indians, as they brake their reines, & other furniture, ouerturning the waggons, and those in them. Perdiccas also gaue vp the Indian horse-men, and the one and the other were fust to recoile. Porus moues forward with grosse of his Armie, that those of his Vanguard scattered might recouer his Reare: Alexander being followed with Ephesians, Ptolomie, and Perdiccas, rooke on him to charge the Indian horsemen on the left wing, commanding Cemon or Cemon to inuade the right; Antigenus and Leontas, he directed to breake vpon Porus his battaile of foot, strengthened with Elephants, Porus himselfe being carried vpon one of them, of the greatest stature. By these beafts the Macedonian foot were most offended; but the Archers and Darters being well guarded with the long & strong Pikes of the Macedonians, so galled them, as being enraged, they turned head, and ranne ouer the foot that followed them: In the end, and after a long and doubtfull fight, by the aduantage of weapon, and by the courage and skilfulnesse of the Macedonian Captaines, the victory fell to Alexander, who also farre exceeded Porus in number: for besides the Macedonians and other Easterne and Northerne Nations, Porus was assailed by his owne Confederate and Countrey people. Yet for his owne person hee neuer gaue ground otherwise than with his sword towards his enemies, till being weakened with many wounds, and abandoned by his Armie, he became a prisoner to the Conqueror, from whom againe hee received his estate with a great enlargement.

§. XXI.

How Alexander finished his expedition, and returned out of India.

Forbeare to trouble my selfe and others with a friuolous discourse of Serpents, Apes and Peacocks, which the Macedonians found in these their trauailes: or of those pettie Warres which Alexander made betweene the ouerthrow of Porus, and his falling downe the Riuer of Indus. The descriptions of places about the head and branches thereof are better knowne vnto vs in this Age, by means of our late Navigations into those parts, than they were in any former times. The magnificence and riches of those Kings we could in no sort be perswaded to beleue, till our own experience had taught vs, that there were many stranger things in the World, than are to be seene betweene London and Stanes.

Our great traveller Mandeuile, who died in the yeere 1372. and had seene so much of the World, and of the East India, we accompted the greatest fabler of the World; yet had hee another reputation among other Nations, as well able to iudge as we. Witnesse the Monument made of him in the Couent of the Friars Guillimins in Liege, where the religious of that place keep some things of his, Comme pour honorable memoire de son Excellence. For an honourable memorie of his Excellencie, saith Guichardine.

The Countries towards the Springs of Indus, and where those many Riuers of Hydaspes, Zaradris, Acesines, and the rest, fall into the maine streame, are now posselt by the great Mogor, the ninth from Tamberlane, who commands all that tract betweene Persia and Indus towards the West, as also a great extent of Countrey towards Ganges. In the mouth of Indus, the Ascension, a shippe of London, suffered shipwracke, in the yeere 1609. and some of the company travelled ouer Land till they came to Agra, the same great Citie (as I take it) which our later Cosinographers call Nagra, being named of old Dionysopolis.

Philostatus in the life of Apollonius Tyanicus, speaking of the expedition of Bacchus and Hercules into the East India, tells vs, that those two great Captaines (whom Alexander fought by all means to out-fame) when they intended to subiect to them the Oxydraces, a people inhabiting betweene the Riuers of Hyphasis and Ganges, they were beaten from the assault of their Cities with thunder and lightnings. This may well be vnderstood by the great Ordinance that those people had then in vse. For it is now certainly knowne, that the great Kings of the vttermost East, haue had the vse of the Canon many hundreds of yeeres since, and euen since their first ciuilitie and greatnesse, which was long before Alexander of the Low Countries.

Alexander's time. But Alexander pierst not so farre into the East: It sufficed, that hauing already ouer-wearied his Armie, hee discouered the rest of India by t me. The Indian Kings whom he had subdued, informed him, that a Prince called Aggramenes, who commanded many Nations beyond the Riuer Ganges, was the powerfullst King of all those Regions: and that he was able to bring into the field two hundred thousand Foot, three thousand Elephants, twenty thousand Horse, and two thousand armed Chariots. With this report, though Alexander were more inflamed than euer to proceed in this discovery and conquest, yett all thea hee had, could not perswade the Souldiers to wander ouer those great Deserts beyond Indus and Ganges, more terrible vnto them than the greatest Armie that the East could gather. Yett at the last contented they were, after many perswasive Orations, to follow him towards the South, to discouer such part of the Ocean Sea, as was neerer at hand, whereunto the Riuer of Indus was their infallible guide. Alexander seeing that it would be no otherwise, deuised a prettierticke, wherewith hee hoped to beguile posteritie, and make himselfe seeme greater than he was. Hee enlarged his Campe, made greater trenches, greater cablines for Souldiers, greater Horse-stalles, and higher mangers than Horses could feede in. Hee caused all furniture of Men and Horses to bee made larger than would serue for vse, and scattered these Armour and Bridles about his Campe, to be kept as reliques, and wondered at by the Sauages. Proportionable to these he raised vp twelue great Altars to be the monument of his iournies end. This was a readie way to encrease the fame of his bignesse; to his greatnesse it could adde nothing saue a suspition, that it was lesse than is thought, seeing he strove to earnestlie to make it thought more than it was.

This done, he returned againe to the banke of Acesines, and there determined to set vp his fleet where Acesines and Hydaspis incounter, where to testifie by a surer monument, how far he had past towards the East, he built by those riuers two Cities: the one he called Nicaa, & the other Bucephalon, after the name of his beloued Horse Bucephalus. Here againe he receiued a fourth supply of fixe thousand Thracian Horse-men, seuen thousand Foot, and from his Lieutenant at Babylon fixe and twenty thousand Armour, garnished with siluer and gold, which he distributed among his Souldiers. About these Riuer he wanne many Townes, and committed great slaughter on those that resisted; It is then written of him, that assaulting a Citie of the Oxidracans, he leapt from the top of the wall into it, and fought, I know not how long, against all the Inhabitants; tales like those of Benis of Southampton, frivolous and incredible. Finally, hee past downe the Riuer with his fleet, at which time also the newes came vnto him of a rebellion in Bactria, and then of the arriual of an hundred Embassadors from a King of India, who submitted himselfe vnto him. Hee feasted these Embassadors vpon a hundred beds of gold, with all the sumptuosity that could bee deuised, who soone after their dispatch, returned againe with a present of three hundred Horse, one hundred and thirty Waggon, and to each of them foure Horses, a thousand Targets, with many other things rare and rich.

Their entertainments ended, hee sailed towards the South, passed through many obscure Nations, which did all yeeld vnto him either quietly, or compelled by force: among these hee builded another Alexandria. Of many places which hee tooke in this passage, Samus was one, the Inhabitants whereof fought against him with poysoned Swords, with one of which Ptolomie (afterward King of Egypt) was wounded, and cured by an herb which Alexander dreamt he had seene in the mouth of a Serpent.

When he came neere the out-let of Indus (being ignorant of the tides of the Sea) his Gallies as they were on a sudden shuffled one vpon another by the Floud, so on the Ebbe they were left on the drie ground, and on the sandie bankes of the Riuer, wherewith the Macedonians were much amazed; but after hee had a few daies obserued well the course of the Sea, hee past out of the riuers mouth some few miles, and after Sacrifices offered to Neptune, returned: and the better to informe himselfe, hee sent Nearchus and Onesicritus, to discouer the coast towards the mouth of Euphrates. Arrianus in the beginning of his first Booke hath written this passage downe the Riuer of Indus at length, with the manner of the Vessels, in which he transported his Army, the Commanders that were vsed therein, and other the maruellous prouisions made.

Neere the out-lets of this Riuer, he spent some part of the Winter, and in eightene daies march from thence recovered Gedrosia, in which passage his Armie suffered such miserie for want of food, that of a hundred and twenty thousand foot, and twelue thousand horse, which he carried into India, not the fourth part returned aliue.

§. XXII.

Of Alexander's Riot, Crueltie, and death.

From Gedrosia, Alexander led his Armie into Carmania, and so drawing neere to Persia, hee gaue himselfe wholly to feasting and drinking, imitating the triumphs of Bacchus. And though this Swinish vice be hatefull enough in it selfe, yett it alwaies inflamed this King to Crueltie. For (saith Curtius) the Hang-man followed the feast, for Aspatius one of his Prouinciall Gouvernors he commanded to bee slaine, so as neither did the excesse of voluptuousnesse qualifie his crueltie, nor his crueltie hinder in ought his voluptuousnesse.

While hee refreshed his Army in these parts, a new supply of fixe thousand foote and a thousand horse, was brought him by Cleander, and his fellows, that had been employed in the killing of Parthenio. Against these Murderers great complaint was made by the Deputies of the Prouinces, in which they had commanded; and their offences were so outrageous, as Alexander was perswaded, that, had they not altogether despaired of his returne out of India, they durst not haue committed them. All men were glad of the occasion, remembering the vertue of him, whom they had slaughtered. The end was, That Cleander, and the other chiefe, with fixe hundred Souldiers by them employed, were deliuered ouer to the Hang-man: every one reioycing that the Ire of the King was at last executed on the ministers of his Ire.

Nearchus and Onesicritus were now returned from the coast, and made report of an Island rich in gold, and of other strange things; whereupon they were commanded to make some farther discouerie: which done, that they should enter the mouth of Euphrates, and finde the King at Babylon.

As he drew neere to Babylon, hee visited the Sepulchre of Cyrus in Pasargada, now called Chalquera: where he was presented with many rich gifts by Orsines, one of the Princes of Persia, of the race of Cyrus. But because Bagoas, an Eunuch in especiall fauour with the King, was neglected, hee not onely practised certaine loofe fellows to witness against Orsines, that he had robbed Cyrus tombe, for which hee was condemned to die; but hee assisted the Hang-man with his own hands in tormenting him. At which time also Alexander caused Phradites to be slaine, suspecting his greatnesse. Caperat (saith Curtius) esse preceptis ad representanda supplicia, item ad deteriora credenda; Hec began head-longly to shed blood, and to beleeue false reports. It is true, that he tooke a way to make all men weary of his gouernement, seeing crueltie is more fearefull, than all aduentures that can be made against it.

At this time it is said, that Calanus the Philosopher burnt himselfe, when hee had liued threescore and thirteene yeeres. Whether herein he followed the custome of his Countie, being an Indian, Or sought to preuent the griefe and incommoditie of elder age, it is vncertaine: but in this the Historians agree, that fore-seeing and fore-shewing Alexander's death, he promised to meet him shortly after at Babylon.

From Pasargada hee came to Susa, where he married Statira, Darius his eldest Daughter, giuing her younger sister to his beloued Ephesion, and fourescore other Persian Ladies to his Captaines. There were fixe thousand guests invited to the feast, to each of which he gaue a cup of gold. Here there came vnto him three thousand yong souldiers, out of his conquered Prouinces, whereat the Macedonians greatly murmured, Harpalus, his Treasurer in Babylon, hauing laithly consumed the monies in his keeping, got him going with fixe thousand Talents, and fixe thousand hired Souldiers, but hee was reiected in Greece, and there slaine. Alexander greatly reioyced at the fidelity of the Greeks, whom Harpalus with these forces and treasures could not stirre: yett hee sent commandement, that they should againe receiue their banished men, whereunto (fearefull of his indignation) all submitted themselves (except the Athenians) though they resolved, that it was a manifest preparation towards their bondage. After this there followed a marvellous discontentment in his Army, because he had resolved to send into Macedon all those olde Souldiers which could no longer endure the trauell of Warre, and to keepe the rest in Asia. Hee vsed many Orations to satisfie them, but it was in vaine during the tempest tempest of their fury. But afterward, as Whales are drawne to the Land with a twinethreed, when they haue tumbled a while, so are the vnconsiderate multitude easily conducted when their first passions are evaporate. With such as were licenced to depart, he sent Craterus, to whom he gaue the Lieutenanthip of Diacedon, Thessaly, and Thrace, which Antipater had held from his first departure out of Europe, who had beaten the rebellious Greekes in his absence, discharged the trust committed vnto him with great fidelitie, and sent him so many strong supplies into Asia from time to time. Certainly if A- lexander had not taken counsell of his cups, hee would haue cast some better colour on this alteration, and giuen Antipater a stronger reason for his remouee, than to haue im-ployed him in the conduction of a new supply to be brought him to Babylon, the Warre to being now at an end. For Antipater saw nothing in this remoue, but the Kings disposition to send him after Parmenio, and the rest. With this Antipater, the King, notwithstanding his great courage, had no great appetite to grapple: Princes, though ieaious, doe not stand in doubt of euery man ill affected, though valiant: but there is a kinde of Kingly courage, compounded of hardinesse and vnderstanding, which is many times so fearefull vnto them, as they take leave both of Law and Religion, to free themselves thereof.

After hee had sent for Antipater, hee made a iourney into Media to settle things there; where Ephesion, whom hee fauoured most of all men, dies. The King according to the greatnesse of his loue, laments his losse; hangs his Physicion, and bestowes vpon his Monument twelue thousand talents: After which he returns to Babylon. Thither Antipater so came not, but sate; and not to excuse himselfe, but to free himselfe. For if wee beleue Curtius (whom Plutarch and others gaine-say) Antipater by his sonnes, Cassander, Philip, and Tolla, who waited on Alexanders cup, gaue him poyson; Thessalus (who was of the conspiracie) hauing inuited him to a drinking feast of purpose. For after hee had taken a carouse in Hercules his cup, a draught of drinke stronger than Hercules himselfe, hee quitted the World within a few daies.

Certainly the Princes of the World haue seldome found good, by making their Ministers ouer great, and thereby suspicious to themselves. For hee that doth not acknowledge fidelitie to be a debt, but is perswaded, that Kings ought to purchase it from their Vassalls, will neuer please himselfe with the price giuen. The onely restorative, indeed, so that strengthens it, is the goodnesse and vertue of the Prince, and his liberality makes it more diligent; so as proportion and distance be obserued. It may bee that Antipater hauing commanded two or three Kingdomes ten or twelue yeeres, knew not how to play any other part; no more than Caesar did, after he had so long a time gouerned the Gauls, where he utterly forgot the art of obedience. A most cruell and vngatefull traitor Anti- pater was, if Curtius doe not belie him: For though he feared some ill measure vpon his remoue (the Tragedies of Parmenio, Clytus, and Callisthenes, hauing beene so lately acted) yet hee knew nothing to the contrary, but that the King had resolved to haue gi-uen him some other great gouernment in Asia: The old Souldiers thence returned, hauing perchance desired to be gouerned by Craterus, whom they had followed in all the former Warre.

§. XXIII. Of Alexanders person and qualities.

Howsoeuer it were, Alexanders former cruelties cannot be excused, no morthan his vanitie to be esteemed the sonne of Iupiter, with his excessive delight in drinke and drunkenesse, which others make the cause of his feuer and death. In that he lamented his want of enterprising, and grieved to consider what hee should doe when hee had conquered the World, Augustus Caesar found iust cause to deride him, as if the well-gouerning of so many Nations and Kingdomes, as he had already conquered, could not haue offered him matter more than abundant, to busie his braines withall.
That hee was both learned and a loue of learning, it cannot bee doubted. Sir Francis Bacon, in his first booke of the Aduancement of Learning, hath prouoed it sufficiently.
His liberallitie I know not how to praise, because it exceeded proportion. It is said, That when he gaue a whole Citie to one of his Seruants, He, to whom it was giuen, did out of modestie refuse it, as disproportionable to his fortune: to whom Alexander replied, That he did not enquire what became him to accept, but the King to giue: of which Seneca;
Animosa

Animosa vox videtur ex regia, cum sit iustissima. Nihil enim posse quonquam decet. Re- fert, quid qui, quando, quare, ubi, &c. sine quibus facti ratio non constabit; habeatur persona- rum et dignitatum proportio, & cum sit ubi, virtus in modum, eque peccat quod excedit, quam quod deficit: ita scimus a tyrano et regali spech, ubi eas indec est in vniuerso. For nothing simply considered by it selfe becommes a man. We must regard what, to whom, when, why, where, and the like; without which considerations no act can be approved. Let honours be proportioned unto the persons: for whereas vertue is ever limited by measure, the excess is as faultie as the defect.

For his Person, it is very apparent, That he was as valiant as any man, a disposition taken by it selfe, not much to be admired. For I am resolved that he had ten thousand in his Armie as daring as himselfe. Surely, if aduenturous natures were to be commended simply, we should confound that vertue with the hardinesse of Thebes, Ruffians, and mallice Dogges. For certainly it is no way praise-worthy but in daring good things; and in the performance of those lawfull enterprises, in which wee are imployed for the seruice of our Kings and Common-weales.

If we compare this great Conquerour with other troublers of the World, who haue bought their glory with so great distraction, and effusion of blood, I thinke him farre inferiour to Caesar, and many other that liued after him, seeing hee neuer vnderooke any warlike Nation, the naked Scythians excepted; nor was euer encountered with any Armie of which he had not a most mastering aduantage, both of weapons & Commanders, euery one of his Fathers old Captaines by far exceeding the best of his Enemies. But it seemes, Fortune and Destinies (if we may vse those termes) had found out and prepared for him, without any care of his owne, both heaps of Men, that willingly offered their neckes to the yoke, and Kingdomes, that inuited and called in their owne Conquerours. For conclusion, we will agree with Seneca, who speaking of Philip the Father, and Alexander the Sonne giues this iudgement of them: Quod non minores fuisse pestes mortalium quam inun- datio, quae plenum omne perfusum est, quam conflagratio qua magna pars animantium exaruit;
they were no lesse plagues to mankind, than an ouerflow of Waters, drowning all the leuell, or some burning droughth, whereby a great part of liuing creatures are scorched up.

CHAP. III.

The reigne of Aridæus.

§. I.

Of the question about succession to Alexander.

THE death of Alexander left his Armie (as Demades the Athenian then compared it) in such case, as was that monstrous Giant Po- lyphemus, hauing lost his onely eye. For, that which is reported in fables of that great Cyclops, might well be verified of the Mace- donians: their force was intolle able, but for want of good guidance vneffectuall, and harmefull chiefly to themselves. The causes whereof (vnder the diuine ordinance) were, partly the vn-certainty of Title to succession in the Kingdome of Macedon, partly the stubborn pride of Alexander himselfe, who thinking none worthy to bee his Heire, did refuse to establish the right in any one, leauing euery one to his owne fortune:
but especially the great ambition of his followers, who all had learned of their Master to suffer no equals; a lesson soone taught vnto spirits reflecting vpon their owne worth, when the reuerence of a greater object faileth.

It hath formerly beene shewed, That Philip (the Father of Alexander) gouerning in Macedon as Protector, assumed vnto himselfe the Kingdome, not rendring it vnto Amintas, (the Sonne of his elder brother Perdiccas) when hee grew to mans estate; but onely bestowing vpon him in marriage a Daughter of his owne: by which bond, and much more by his owne proper strength, hee assured the Crowne vnto himselfe:
Amintas neuer attempting ought against Philip; though with price of his life he did against

against Alexander in the beginning of his reigne. Wherefore Eurydice the sole issue of this marriage, ought in reason to haue beene acknowledged Queene after Alexander, as hauing better Title thereto, than either He or Philip had, when they liued, vnlesse (peraduenture) some Law of that Nation forbade the reigne of Women. But the excellent vertue of these two Princes had vtterly defaced the right of all Pretenders, not claiming from their owne bodies: and so great were their conquests, that Macedon it selfe was (in regard of them) a very small Appendix, and no way deseruing to bee laid in ballance against the demand of their posteritie, had they left any able to make challenge of the Royall seate.

Alexander hauing taken many wiues, had issue by none of the principall of them. Bar-tine the Daughter of Artabazus a Persian had borne vnto him a yong Sonne: and Roxane the Daughter of Oxyartes (whom hee had more solemnly married) was left by him great with childe. But the baseness of the Mothers, and contempt of the conquered Nations, was generally alleaged in Barre of Plea made for them, by some that would (perhaps) haue wrought out their owne ends, vnder the name of Alexanders children:

Cleopatra a sister of Alexander, widdow to the King of Epirus, & Aridaus his base brother (sonne to Philip by a Concubine of no account) who had married the Lady Eurydice before mentioned, were next in course. Of Cleopatra there was no speech, which may giue suspition, that either Law or Custome had made that sexe vncapable of the Soueraignty: Aridaus (besides his bastardie) was neither for person nor qualitie fit to rule as King; yet vpon him the election fell, but slowly, and (as happeneth often) for lacke of a better: when the Counsaillers hauing ouer-laboured their disagreeing wits in devising what was best, were content for very wearinesse to take what came next to hand.

Ptolomie (soone after King of Egypt) concurring with them who reiected all mention of the halfe-Persian brood, King Alexanders children, was of opinion, that the rule of all should be giuen to the Captaines, that going for law which by the greater part of them should bee decreed: so farre was hee from acknowledging any one as true Heire to the Crowne.

This Ptolomie was called the sonne of Lagus, but reputed of Philip: who hauing vsed the company of Arfinoe Ptolomeis mother, deliuered her in marriage to Lagus being great with childe. Therefore, whether it were so, that hee hoped well to worke his owne fortune out of those distensions, which are incident vnto the consultations of many ambitious men, equall in place, forcing them at length to redeeme their quiet with subiection to one, deseruing regard by his blood, and trust for his euen carriage; or whether he desired onely to get a share to himselfe, which could not haue come to passe, had all beene giuen to one: plaine enough it is, that he thought not on preferring Aridaus before himselfe; and therefore gaue such counsaile as fitted his owne and other mens purposes. Yea, this deuice of his tooke place indeed, though not in forme as hee had propounded it: For, it was in effect all one, to haue assembled at Alexanders empty chaire, as Ptolomie had conceiued the forme of their consultations, or to set in the chaire such a King as Aridaus, no wiser then the chaire it selfe. Also the controuersies arising were determined by the greater part of the Captaines; by the greater part, if not in number, yet in puissance.

But as these counterfeit shewes of dissembling aspirers, doe often take checke by the plaine dealing of them, who dare to go more directly to work: so was it like to haue fared with Ptolomie & the rest, when Aristonius, another of the Captaines, interpreted the very words of Alexander; saying, That he left his Kingdom to the worthiest, as designing Perdiccas: to whom (lying at the point of death) he deliuered his ring. It seemed good in reason, that Alexander should bee disposer of his owne purchases: and those tokens of Alexanders purpose appeared plain enough, so long as no man would interpose anothers construction: euery one being vncertaine how the secret affections of the rest might be inclined. Many therefore, either out of their loue, or because they would not bee of the lateft, vrged Perdiccas to take vpon him the estate Royall. Hee was no stranger to the Royall blood; yet his birth gaue him not such reputation, as the great fauour of his dead King, with whom he had bin very inward, & that especially since the death of Ephesion (a powerful Minion) into whose place he was chosen. For his own worth he might wel be commended, as a good man of Warre, and one that had giuen much prooffe of his priuate valour. But very furly he was: which quality (ioyned with good fortune) carried a shew of Maieftie: being checkt with misaduenture, it was called by a true name Pride; and rewarded with death.

Maieftie:

In the present businesse a foolish ouer-weening did him as great harme, as it had been great happinesse to haue succeeded Alexander. For not content to haue the acclamation of the Souldiers, approving the sentence of Aristonius, he would needs counterfait modestie, thinking that euery one of the Princes would haue intreated him to take the weighty burden of an Empire, which would be the lesse enuious, the more solemnity he vsed in the acceptance. It is truly said, He that faineth himselfe a sheepe, may chance to be eaten by a Wolfe. Melaeus (a man by nature enuious, and bearing a particular hatred to Perdiccas) tooke aduantage of his irresolute behauiour, and very bitterly enueighed against him. In conclusion, he pronounced, That whosoever was Heire to the Crowne, the Souldiers ought to be Heires to the treasure; and therefore he inuited them, who were nothing slow, to share it. This disturbed all the Consultation. The Captaines were left alone, farre enough from agreeing, and not able to haue brought any conclusion to good effect without consent of the Souldiers, who greedie of spoile thronged about Melaeus.

§. II.

The Election of Aridaus, with the troubles there about arising;
the first diuision of the Empire.

Bringing this vprere, mention was made of Aridaus by some one, and entertained with good liking of many, vntill at last it grew to the voice of the Armie. Melaeus hauing withdrawn himselfe tumultuously from the company of the Lords, was glad of so faire an occasion to make himselfe great: therefore he produced Aridaus, commended him to the Souldiers, who called him by his Fathers name Philip, and brought him into the Paiaee, inuesting him in Alexanders Robes, and proclaiming him King. Many of the Nobles withstood this election, but in vaine: for they could not resolue what course to follow, reiecting this. Only Pythox, a hot-headed man, tooke vpon him to proclaime the Sonne of Alexander by Roxane, according to the counsaile which Perdiccas at first had giuen, appointing Perdiccas and Leonatus his Protectors. But this childe was not yet borne, which made that attempt of Pythox vaine. Finally, Perdiccas with fixe hundred men, and Ptolomie with the Kings Pages tooke vpon them to defend the place where Alexanders body lay: but the Army conducted by Melaeus, who carried the new king about whither he listed, easily brake in vpon them, and enforced them to accept Aridaus for their Soueraigne Lord. Then by the intercession of the ancient Captaines, a reconciliation was propounded and admitted, but on neither side faithfully meant.

Leonatus, who was of Royall blood, a goodly Gentleman and valiant, issued out of Babylon, being followed by all the horse, which consisted (for the most part) of the Nobility. Perdiccas abode in the City (but standing vpon his guard) that he might be ready to take the opportunity of any commotion, that should happen among the infantry. The king (who was gouerned by Melaeus) commanded or gaue leaue to haue Perdiccas made away; which attempt succeeded ill, being neither secretly carried, nor committed to sure executioners. Their comming was not vnexpected: and they were by Perdiccas rebuked with such grauitie, that they departed honeste then they came; being sorry for their bad enterprife. Vpon the newes of this attempt the campe was in an vprere, which the King seeking to pacifie, wanted authority, as hauing newly got the Crowne by them, and holding it by their courtesie. The matter it selfe afforded no good excuses, and his indiscretion made them worse. He said, that no harme was done, for Perdiccas was aliue: but their exclamations were against the tyrannous enterprife, which he imputed to Melaeus, abandoning the surest of his friends to the rage of the multitude, who were not appeased, vntill the King by offering to resigne his estate vnto them, renewed out of their pittie that fauourable affection, which had moued them to set him vp at the first.

Perdiccas hauing now ioyned himselfe with Leonatus, kept the fields, intending to cut off all prouision of victuals from the City. But after sundry Embassies passing betweene the King and the Nobles, (they requiring to haue the Autors of sedition giuen vp into their handes; the King, that Meleager might be ioyned with Leonatus and Perdiccas, as a Third in gouernment of the Army) things were compounded according to the Kings desire. Meleager should haue done well to consider, that such men as had one day demanded his head, were not like the day following to giue him a principall place among them without any new occasion offered, had not some purpose of treacherie lurked vnder their great facilitie. Generall peace was renewed, and much loue protested where little was intended. The face of the Court was the same which it had bene in Alexanders time: but no longer now did the same heart giue it life; and windy spirits they were which mooued in the arteries. False reports were giuen out by appointment of Perdiccas, tending to his owne disgrace, but in such termes as might seeme to haue proceeded from Meleager: who finding part of the drift, but not all, tooke it as an injury done to himselfe; and (as desirous of a true friendship) desired of Perdiccas, that such authors of discord might be punished. Perdiccas (as a louer of peace) did well approve the motion; and therefore agreed that a generall Muster should be made, at which time the disturbers of the common quiet should receiue their punishment (as was the manner for Souldiers offending) in presence of the Army. The plot was mischieuouly laied: Had Meleager giuen way to seditious rumours, he must needs haue incurred the generall hatred of al, as a sower of dissension, & therby with a publike approbation might haue been cut off, as hauing often offended in that kinde: his Prince being too weak a Patron. Now seeking redresse of these disorders, he hastned his owne ruine, by a lesse formall, but more speedie way. This kinde of Muster was very solemne, and practised with many ceremonies, as for cleansing of the Army. The Horse-men, the Elephants, the Macedonian foot, the Mercenaries, were each according to their qualitie set in aray, apart from others, as if they had bene of sundrie sorts, met at aduenture: which done, the manner was to skirmish (as by way of exercise) according to direction of their severall Captaines. But at that time the great battaile of Macedonian Pikes, which they called the Phalanx, led by Meleager, was of purpose bestowed in a ground of disadvantage; and the countenance of the horse and Elephants beginning to giue charge vpon them, was such, as discovered no jesting pastime nor good intent. Kings were alwaies wont to fight among the horsemen: of which custom Perdiccas made great vse that day, to the vtter confusion of his enemies. For Arideus was alwaies gouerned by him, which for the present had him in possession. Two or three dayes before he sought the death of Perdiccas at the instigation of Meleager: now he rides with Perdiccas vp and downe about the foot-men, commanding them to deliuer vnto the death all such as Perdiccas required. Three hundred they were who were cast vnto the Elephants, and by them slaine, in the presence of the King, who should haue defended them, and of their affrighted companions. But these three hundred were not the men whose punishment Meleager had expected: they were such as had followed him, when he disturbed the first consultation that was held about the election of a new King, and some of them his especiall friends. Hauing therefore kept himselfe quiet a while, as vnwilling to giue offence to them which had the aduantage; when he saw their proceedings tend very manifestly to his destruction, he fled away into a Temple, which he found no Sanctuary: for thither they sent and slew him.

The Army being thus corrected was led into the City, where a new Councill of the Princes was held, who finding what maner of man their King was, diuided all the Provinces of the Empire among themselves; leauing to Arideus the office of a Visitor, and yet making Perdiccas his Protector, and Commander of the forces remaining with him. Then were the funerals of Alexander thought vpon; whose body hauing bene seven daies neglected, was opened, and embalmed by the Egyptians: no signe of poison appearing, how great soeuer the suspicion might be. The charge of his buriall was committed to Arideus: one of the Captaines, who was two yeeres preparing of a great and costly shew, making a stately Chariot in which the corps was laid, many coarces of his friends being layed in the ground before that of Alexander was bestowed in Alexandria, a City of his owne building, in Egypt.

§. III.

The beginning of the Egyptian Warre.

Hilest these things were in doing, or presently after, Antipater and Craterus, two principall Noble men, and inferior to none of Alexanders followers, if not greater than any of the rest, were busied in Greece with a Warre, which the Athenians more bravely than wisely had begun in Alexanders life, but now did prosecute more boldly than before, vpon the courage which they had taken by his death. Alexander, not long before he died, had commanded that all the banished Greekes (few excepted) should be restored vnto their former places. He knew the factious quality of the Grecian Estates, and therefore thought so to provide, that in euery City he would haue a sure party. But it fell out otherwise: For he lost the hearts of many more than he wanted by this proud injunction. His pleasure indeede was fulfilled; yet not without great murmuring of the whole Nation, as being against all order of Law, and the beginning of open tyranny. The Athenians greatly decayed in estate, but retaining more than needfull of their ancient spirits, tooke the execution of this decree in their Dominions; so did also the Asiatics, who were valiant men, and inhabited a Region well fortified by nature: yet neither of them tooke Armes, but seemed to beare themselves; as men that had done no more than they might well iustifie by reason: neuertheless to prevent the worst, the Athenians gaue secret instructions to Leosthenes a Captaine of theirs, willing him to leaue an Army, but in his owne name, and to keepe it in a readinesse for their vse. This was no hard thing for Leosthenes to doe: great numbers of Grecke Souldiers being lately returned from the Asian Warre in poore estate, as defrauded of their pay by the Captaines. Of these he had gathered vp eight thousand, when the certaine newes were brought of Alexanders death: at which the Citie of Athens declared it selfe, and more honourably than wisely, proclaimed open War against the Macedonians for the libertie of Greece. Hereupon Leosthenes drew in the Asiatics, and some other Estates, gaue battaile to the Asians, who sided with Antipater, and overthrew them; growing so fast in reputation, and so strong in adherents; that Antipater (arming in all haste, yet suspecting his owne strength) was faine to send into Asia to Craterus for succour.

Nothing is more vaine than the feares and hopes of men; shunning or pursuing their destinies as farre off; which deceiue all mortall wise dome, euen when they seeme nere at hand. One month was scarcely past, since nothing so heauily burthened the thoughts of Antipater as the return of Craterus into Macedon; which he then feared as death, but now desired as the most likely assurance of his life. Craterus, whom Alexander held as of al men the most assured vnto him, was sent into Macedon to conuiege home the old Souldiers (that was the pretence,) and to succeed Antipater in the gouernment of Macedon and Greece. The suspicions were strong that he had a priuy charge to put Antipater to death: neither did that which was commonly published sound much better; which was, That Antipater should be sent vnto the King, as Captaine of the yong Souldiers, newly to be leaued in Europe. For Alexander was much incensed against him by his Mother Olympias: and would sometimes giue out speeches testifying his owne ialousie and hatred of him; but yet he strove to smother it, which in a cruell Prince betokeneth little good. Few of Alexanders Lieutenantes had escaped with life: most of them indeede were meane persons in regard of those who followed him in his Indian expedition; and were therefore (perhaps) remoued to make place for their betters. But if the Kings rigour was such, as could finde rebellious purposes (for so he interpreted euen lewd gouernment) in base persons yittie might Antipater hope for, who hauing sitten Viceroy tenne yeeres in the strongest part of the Empire, was called away to the presence of so fell a Master, and the enuy of a Court, wherein they had bene his inferiors, which would now repine to see him their equall. Therefore whether his feare drew him to preuention, working first the kings death by poison, giuen by his sonne Tolus, Alexander cup-bearer; or whether it brake not forth vntill opportunitie had changed it into the passion of reuenge, which was cruell performed by his sonne Cassander: great cause of much feare he had; which I note in this place, as the ground of effects to be produced in very few yeeres.

At the present Craterus was sent for, and all the Captains of companies lying neere, solicited solicited to make haste. Not without cause. For in Macedon there could not at that time be raised more than thirteene thousand foot, and sixe hundred horse; which Muster was of raw Souldiers, all the force of the Country being emptied into Asia. The Thessalians indeede who had long stood firme: for Philip and Alexander, who also were the best horse-men of Greece, furnished him with very braue troupes, that might have done great seruice: had their faith held out, which they changed for the liberty of Greece. With these forces did Antipater in Thessalie trie the fortune of a battaile with Leofthenes, rather (as may seeme) fearing the increase of his enemies power, and rebellion of the Greekes, (were they not checkt at the first) than presuming on his strength. For Leofthenes had of Athenians, Ætolians, and Mercinaries, two and twenty thousand foot, besides the assistance of many petty Signories, and of some Illyrians, and Thracians: of horse he brought into the field about two thousand and sixe hundred; but ouer-strong he was that way also, when once the Thessalians had revolted vnto him. So Antipater lost the day: and his losse was such, that he neither was able to keepe the field, nor to make a safe retraite into his owne Country: therefore he fled into the Towne of Lamia, which was well fortified, and well provided of all things necessary to beare out a siege. Thither did Leofthenes follow him, present him battaile againe, and vpon refusall closevp the Towne with earth-works, and a wall. There will we leaue him for a while, trauieling in the last honourable enterprize that euer was vndertaken by that great Citie of Athen.

§. IIII.

How Perdiccas employed his Army.

King Arideus living vnder the rule of Perdiccas, when all the Princes were gone each to his owne Prouince, kept a naked Court: all his greatnesse consisting in a bare title, supported by the strength of his Protector, who cared not for him otherwise than to make vse of him. Perdiccas had no Prouince of his owne peculiar, neither was helike to be welcome to any whom he should visit in his gouernement. A stronger Armie then any of the rest he had, which he might easily hope in that vntested condition of things to make better worth to him, than many Prouinces could haue been. The better to accomplish his desires, he closely sought the marriage of Cleopatra, the sister of Alexander; yet about the same time he either married Nicas the Daughter of Antipater, or made such loue to her as blinded their eyes, who did not somewhat narrowly search into his doings.

Ariarathes the Cappadocian, the second of that name, and tenth King of that Country, had continued faithfull to the Persian Empire as long as it stood: following the example of his forefathers, euen from Pharnaces the first that reigned in Cappadocia, who married Asoff a sister to the great Cyrus. Some of his Ancestors had (indeede) bene oppressed by the Persians: but what Fortune tooke from them at one time, Vertue restored at another, and their faithfull Princes had much increased all. But now in the fatal Period of so great an Empire, with much wisdom, and (Darius being slaine) with sufficient honour, he might haue acknowledged the Macedonian in the Persians roome. This he did not: neither did Alexander call him to account, being occupied with great cares. But Perdiccas, who had no greater businesse wherein to entertaine his Army, found it expedient both for the honour of the Empire, to take that in-land Kingdome, surrounded with Prouinces of the Macedonian conquest, and for his owne particular to haue one opportune place of sure retreat, vnder the gouernment of a stedfast friend. Therefore he entred Cappadocia, fought with Ariarathes, who drew into the field thirty thousand foot, and fiftene thousand horse (a strong Army, had it not incountred a stronger, and better trained) wanne the victorie, and thereby the whole kingdome. But with much crueltie did he vse the victory: for hauing taken Ariarathes prisoner with many others, he crucified him, and as many of his Kindred as he could light vpon: and so deliuered that Prouince to Eumenes, whom of all men living he trusted most.

Another part of his forces he had committed to Python, rather as to the most honorable of such as remained about him, than as to the most assured. Python was to subdue the Greekes, rebelling in the high Countries of Asia. About twenty thousand foot, and three thousand horse they were, (all old Souldiers) who planted in Colonies by Alexander, to bridle the barbarous nations, were soon weary of their vnpleasant habitations, & the rude people people, among whom they liued: and therefore tooke aduantage of the present troubles to seeke vnto themselves a better fortune. Against these Python went, more desirous to make them his owne, than to destroy them: which intent of his Perdiccas discouering, did both giue him in charge to put all those Rebels to the sword, giuing the spoyle of them to his Souldiers, and further enioyned it vnto Pythons Captaines (his owne creatures) that they should see this commandement executed. These directions for vse of the victory might haue proued needlesse; so vncertaine was the victorie it selfe. A Captaine of the Rebels commanding ouer three thousand, corrupted by Python: did in the heate of the fight (which was very doubtfull) retire without necessitie to a hill not farre off. This dismayed the rest, and gaue the day to Python: who being farre enough from Perdiccas, offered composition to the vanquished, granting vnto them their liues and libertie, vnder condition of laying downe their armes; and hereupon he gaue them his faith. Being master of these companies, he might well haue a good opinion of his owne power: all power being then valued by strength in followers, when as none could vaunt himselfe as free Lord of any Territory. He had thirteene thousand foot, and eight thousand eight hundred horse, besides these new Companions, whom needlesse feare with our great losse had caused to leaue the field: but in true estimation all the greatnesse wherof Python might thinke himselfe assured, was (and soone appeared to be) inherent in Perdiccas. For by his command were ten thousand foot, and eight thousand horse, of those which followed Python, leauied; the Rulers of the Prouinces carefully obeying the letters of Perdiccas, by which they were enioyned to giue assistance to that businesse: and by vertue of the precept giuen vnto them by Perdiccas, did the Macedonians cut in peeces all those poore men who had yielded themselves; leauing Python as naked as he came forth to returne vnto his great Master.

Now was Perdiccas mighty about the mighty, and had faire leisure to pursue his hopes of marriage with Cleopatra, and thereby to make himselfe Lord of all: but this must be secretly carried for feare of opposition. How it succeeded will appeare, when the Lamian warre taketh ending.

§. V.

The proceesse of the Lamian warre.

When Antipater hardly besieged, wanting meanes to free himselfe without succours from his friends in Asia. Those helps not appearing so soone as he expected, hee came to parley with Leofthenes, and would haue yielded vnto any termes of reason, wherewith men possessed with hope of victorie, doe seldom limit their desires. Leofthenes willed him without further circumstance to submit himselfe to discretion. This was too much for him, that had once commanded ouer them, who now required of him such a dishonourable composition. Wherefore knowing that the extremities, from which as yet he was farre enough, could bring no worse with it, Antipater prepared for the defence; and the other for winning the Towne, which felt great want of victuals.

In this lingring warre, the Ætolians (whether weary of sitting still at a siege, or hauing businesse which they pretended at home) tooke their leaue, and returned into their owne Country. Their departure left the trenches so thinly manned, that Antipater found meanes to sally out vpon his enemies to the great losse: for many were slaine, and Leofthenes himselfe among them, ere he could be repulsed into the Towne. Yet hereby the Macedonians were nothing relieved, their victuals wasted, and they were not strong enough to deale with the Greekes in open fight, Craterus was long in coming. Eysimachus, who was neere at hand in Thrace, had worke too much of his owne, leading no more than foure thousand foote, and two thousand horse, against Scuthes the Thracian King, who brought into the field about foure times that number; and though Eysimachus not without losse, had gotten one victory, yet the enemy abounding in multitude, felt not the blow so much as might haue been his courage. Therefore Leontus was earnestly solicited by Antipaters friends, to make all haste to the rescue. He had the gouernment of Phrygia the lesse, and was able to raise an Army of more than twenty thousand foot, and two thousand sixe hundred horse, whether leauied out of his Prouince, or appointed vnto him out of the maine Armie, it is vncertaine. Certaine it is, that he was more willing to take in hand the iourney into Greece, than Antipater was to haue him come. For Cleopatra had written vnto him, desiring his presence at Pella, the chiefe Citie of Macedon, and very kindly offering her selfe to be his wife; which letters he kept not so close as had bene requisite, and therefore brought himselfe into great suspicion; that soone ended with his life. Antiphilus, choosen Generall by the Athenians in place of Leofhenes, hearing of his approach, forsooke the siege of Lamia, and tooke the ready way to these great Conquerers of Asia, with purpose to giue them an euill welcome home, before Antipater, and they should ioyne in one. He had (notwithstanding the departure of the Etolians) the aduantage of Leonatus in horse, by the ods of 2000. Thessalians; in other things he was quall with him; in cause he thought himselfe Superior; in the fortune of that day he proued so: for he won a great victorie (chiefly by vertue of the Thessalians) which appeared the greater by the end of Leonatus himselfe, who fighting valiantly, was driuen into a marshie piece of ground, where he found his death, which he desperately had sought among the Indians, but it waited for him at home, not far from the place of his natiuitie. He was the first of Alexanders Capitaines which died in battaile, but all, or most of the rest, shall follow him the same way. After this day, the Athenians did neuer any thing suitable to their ancient glory.

The vanquished Macedonians were too weake to renew the fight, and too proud to flie. They betooke themselves to high grounds, vsit for seruice on horse backe, and so abode in the sight of the enemy that day; the day following Antipater with his men came into their campe, and tooke the charge of all. The Athenians perceiuing their strength to be at the greatest, and fearing lest that of the enemy should increase, did earnestly seeke to determine the matter quickly by another battaile. But still Antipater kept himselfe on ground of aduantage; which gaue more than reasonable confidence to the Greekes, many of whom departed to their homes, accounting the enemy to be vanquished. This retchlesse (incorrigible in an Army of voluntaries) was very inexcusable; seeing that the victories by Land were very much defaced by losses at Sea, where the Athenians labouring to haue made themselves once againe Masters, were put to the worst.

But now the fatall captiuitie of Greece came on, of which she neuer could be deliuered vnto this day. Craterus with a strong Army having made great marches from Cilicia, passed ouer into Europe, and coming into Thessalie, ioyned himselfe with Antipater. The forces of Leonatus, Antipater, and Craterus, being ioyned in one, contained fortie thousand waighly armed, three thousand light armed men, and five thousand horse, of which numbers the Greekes wanted a thousand and five hundred in horse, in foot eightene thousand. Carefully therefore did Antiphilus labour to auoid the necessity of a battaile, vntill such time as the Townes confederate, should returne vnto the campe those bands which had straggled from it. But those companies were so slow in coming, and Antipater so vrgent vpon the Greekes, that compelled they were to put the matter in hazard without further attendance. Like enough it is, that with a little more helpe they had carried away the victorie: for the Thessalians had the vpper hand, and held it, vntill such time as they perceiued their battailes (over-laid with multitude) retire vnto the higher ground, which caused them also to fall backe. So the Macedonians became Lords of the field, hauing little else to boast of, considering that with the losse of an hundred and thirty men, they had onely purchased the death of some five hundred enemies. Yet herof was great vse made. For the Greekes, as not subiect vnto the full command of one Generall, and being euery one desirous to preserve his owne estate, and City; concluded to make a treaty of peace with Antipater; who being a subtle artificer, and well vnderstanding their aptnesse to diuision, refused to harken to any generall composition, but willed euery City to deale apart for it selfe. The intent of his deuce was so apparent, that it was reiecte; the Greekes choosing rather to abide the coming of their Assistants, whose vnreasonable carelesse betraied the cause. Antipater and Craterus besieging & winning some townes in Thessalie, which the Army of the Confederates wanted means and courage to relieue, waited that Nation from attending any longer vpon other mens vnlucky hopes, with their owne assured and present calamity.

§. V I.

Of the peace granted to Athens by Antipater. Of Demosthenes his death.

He Thessalians falling off, all the rest soone followed scuerally, and sued for peace; the gentle conditions given to the most forward, inuiting such as were slacke. Onely the Athenians and Acetians held out. Little fauour could they hope for, hauing bene Authors of this tumult; and their feare was not great; the feate of the warre being farre from them. But the celeritie of Antipater confounded all their imaginations; who sate still at Athens, deuising vpon courses of prosecuting the Warre to come, which came to their dores, before their consultation could finde issue. He was ready to enter vpon their Frontiers; they had no abilitie to resist, and were as heartlesse as friendlesse. All that remained was to send Embassadors, desiring peace vpon some good termes: necessitie enforcing them to haue accepted euen the very worst. Phocion, with Demades the Orator, and Xenocrates the Philosopher, were chiefe of this Embassage; Phocion as the most Honorable; Demades a strong Perswader; (both of them well respected by Antipater) and Xenocrates, as one admired for wisdom, grauitie of manners, and vertue; but all these ornaments consisting in speculation, and therefore of lesse regard, when their admiration was to cost much in reall effects.

Antipater calling to minde the pride of Leofhenes, required of the Athenians, that they should wholly submit themselves to his pleasure; which being (perforce) granted, he commanded them to despay the charges of the warre past, to pay a fine, and entertaine a Garrison. Further, he abrogated the popular estate, committing the gouernement of the City to those of most wealth, depriving of the right of suffrage all such as wanted a convenient proportion of riches.

About nine thousand they were, all men of good substance, to whom the administration of the Common-wealth was giuen; a number great enough to retaine the name and forme of a Democratie. But the rascall multitude of beggerly persons, accustomed to get their liuings out of the common troubles, being now debarred from bearing offices and giuing their voices, cried out, that this was a meere Oligarchie, the violent vsurpation of a few inroaching vpon the publike right. These turbulent fellows (of whom King Philip had been wont to say, That warre to them was peace, and peace warre) Antipater planted in Thrace, and gaue them lands to manure; leauing as few of them as he could to molest the quiet of Athens.

To the same end (yet withall for satisfying his owne suspicions and hatred) he caused Demosthenes and Hyperides famous Orators, with some others to be slaine. Had the death of these two, especially of Demosthenes, bene forborne, the rest of his proceedings in this action might well haue passed for very milde: whereas now all such, as either are delighted with the Orations of Demosthenes, or haue surrendered their iudgements to Authors iustly admiring him, as the most eloquent of all that euer did speake and write, condemne him vterly, calling him a bloody tyrant. Such grace and reputation doe the learned arts finde in all ciuill Nations, that the euill done to a man, famous in one of them, is able to blemish any action, how good soeuer otherwise it be, or honorably carried.

Demosthenes had taken Sanctuarie in the Temple of Neptune, in the Isle of Calauria; there did Archias (sent with Souldiers by Antipater for the purpose) finde him, and gently perswaded him to leaue the place, but not so preuailling, he threatned violence. Then Demosthenes, entreating a little respite as it had bene to write somewhat, secretly tooke poison, which he had kept for such a necessity, and so died; rather choosing to do the last execution vpon himselfe, than to fall into the hands of such as hated him. Only this act of his (commendable, perhaps, in a Heathen man) argued some valour in him; who was otherwise too much a coward in battaile, how soeuer valiant in perswading to enterprises, wherein the way to very honourable ends was to be made through passages exceeding dangerous. He loued money well, and had great summes giuen him by the Persians to encourage him, in finding worke for the Macedonians at home. Neither did hee ill (me thinks) in taking from the Persians which loued not his Country, great reward, for speaking such things as tended to his Countries good; which hee did not cease cease to procure, when the Persians were no longer able to giue him recompence. Such as in tender contemplation of his death can endure no honourable, though true, mention of Antipater, may (if they can) beleuee Lucian, who tells vs, That it was Antipaters purpose to haue done him great honour. Sure it is, that he was a stedfast enemy to the Macedonians; therefore discretion required that he should be cut off.

The matters of Athens being thus ordered, the chiefe command was left in the hands of Phocion, a vertuous man, and louer of his Country, yet applying himselfe to the necessity of the times; by which commendations he had both at other times done the City much good, and now procured this peace, which (though grieuous to free-men, yet fauourable to the vanquished) he endeoured carefully to preserve.

§. VII.

How Craterus and Antipater were drawne from their Ætolian warres into Asia.
The grounds of the first Ciuill Warre betweene the Macedonian Lords.

SO Antipater with Craterus returned into Macedonia, where they strengthened their friendship with a new alliance; Craterus taking Phila, the Daughter of Antipater, to Wife.

Shortly after they went against the Ætolians, whose pouerty was not so easily danted, as the luxurious wealth of the more powerfull State of Athens had bene. Their Country was rough and mountainous, hauing many places of great fastnesse, into which they conuied such of their goods as they most esteemed, and of their people, as were least fit for warre: with the rest they fortified the strongest of their Cities, and so abode the coming of the Macedonians, whom they manfully resisted. With great obstinacy did the Macedonians contend against the difficulties of the places, which the Ætolians made good as long as their victuals held out. But when Craterus had shut vp all passages, and vterly debarred them of reliefe, then were they put to a miserable choice; either to descend from their strong holds, and fight vpon equall ground, with vnequall numbers; or to endure the miseries of hunger and cold, against which they could make no longer resistance; or to yeld themselves to the Macedonians: who incensed by the losse of many good Souldiers, were not like to leaue so stubborne enemies in places, which might giue confidence to rebellion. In cases of extremity, much finenesse of wit apprehending all circumstances of danger, commonly doth more hurt than a blunt consideration of that only, which at the present is in hand. These Ætolians did not as yet want meat; but their enemies dayly molested them: wherefore as yet they thought vpon nothing but fighting. Fortune was gracious to their courage. For such newes came out of Asia into the Macedonian campe, as made Antipater and Craterus thinke every houre a month, till they had rid their hands of these Ætolians, giuing them whatsoever conditions they would aske: yet with purpose to call them to stuer account; yea, to roote them out of Greece by death, or by captiuiaty, when once they should haue settled the affaires of Asia; as they hoped and desired. But of mens purposes God is disposer: in whose high counsell it was ordained, that this poore Nation should continue a troublesome bare to the proceedings of Macedon and Greece, and (when time had ripened the next Monarchie) an open gate to let the Roman Conquerors into those and other Prouinces. Likewise concerning the matters of Asia, the reformation inteded by Antipater & Craterus, was so far from taking effect, that it serued merely as an introduction to all the ciuill warres ensuing.

The grounds of the Asiaticque expedition, which did set the world in an vp-roe, were these. Antipater and Craterus were of Alexanders Captaines the mightiest in reputation: The one, in regard of his ancient precedency, and the present rule which he bare in the parts of Europe. The other, as of all men the best beloued, and most respected, both of Alexander and of the whole Army. Next vnto these had Perdiccas been; whom the aduantage of his presence at the Kings death did make equall, or superior, to either of these, if not to both together. The first intents of Perdiccas were, to haue consorted with these two, and to haue been with them a third partner in the government of all; to which purpose he entertained the discourse of marriage with one of Antipaters Daughters. But feeling in short space the strength of that gale of winde which bore him vp, he began to take wing and soare quite another way. Arideus was a very simple man, yet yet serued well enough to weare the title of that Maiestie, whereof Perdiccas being Administrator, and hoping to become proprietarie, the practice was more leuere than had bene in the dayes of Alexander: the desire to seeme terrible, being very familiar with weak Princes, and their ambitious Officers, who know no other meanes of preserving themselves from contempt, and of giuing such a fiery lustre to their actions, as may dazzle the eyes of the beholders. How cruelly the poore Greekes in the higher Asia were all put to the sword; and how tyrannously the King and Princes of Cappadocia were crucified, hath already bene shewed. The Pisidians were the next who felt the wrath of these counterfait Alexanders. One Citie of theirs was vtterly razed, the children sold for slaues, and all the rest massacred. The Issaurians by this example growne desperate, when after two or three dayes triall they found themselves vnable to continue the defence, lockt themselves into their houses, and set the Town on fire, into the flame wherof the young men did throw themselves, after that they had a while repelled the Macedonians from the wals.

The exploits being performed, the Armie had no other worke than to sift the ashes of the burnt Citie for gold and siluer; but Perdiccas had businesse of greater importance troubling his braines. Nothing was more contrary to his ends, than to sit still without imploiment: letting his Souldiers grow idle about him, whilst others grew great, and vooke deepe roote in their feuerall Prouinces. He purposed therefore to transport his forces into Europe, vnder pretence of bringing the King into Macedonia, the seate of his Ancestors, and head of the Empire. The Kings presence would make the offices of his Vice-royes (during the time) actually voide; Antipater with Craterus being once in case of priuate men, and onely Perdiccas holding authoritie, the match with Cleopatra might easily be made. So should greatnesse meete with a good title; and what more could be wished? Some impediment the power of Ptolomie might giue, who held Egypte well fortified with men, but much better with loue of the people; yet if the businesse prospered in Macedonia, like enough it was that either Ptolomie would follow of himselfe, or be driuen to come to reason. Antigonus likewise then gouerning in Phrygia, a busie-headed man, and ill affected to the side, was to be looked into, and made away, for feare of further trouble. So thought Perdiccas, and was decciued in so thinking. Antigonus was as good a man of warre, of as deepe a iudgement, as high a spirit, and as great vnderstanding, as any of Alexanders Captaines. His imploiments had bene lesse than some of theirs, which made him also the lesse respected. But his thoughts were as proud as theirs: for, he valued himselfe by his owne worth, not by the opinions of other men; with carefull attention had he watched Perdiccas, and founded the depth of his purposes, which it was now high time to discouer. For Perdiccas hauing with a ialous eye pried into the demeanour of Antigonus, and finding him no way fit for his turne, caused him to be charged with such accusations, as might suffice to take away his life, especially by a Iudge that sought his death. This deuiice Antigonus would not seeme to perceiue, but prepared himselfe in shew to make answer, indeede, to make escape, which easily he did, putting himselfe and his sonne Demetrius aboard of some Athenian Gallies, that carried him to Antipater, laden with such tidings, as finished the Ætolian warre before mentioned.

As the coming of Antigonus made Craterus and Antipater manifestly perceiue their owne danger: so his flight gaue Perdiccas to vnderstand that his intentions were laied open, and must now be iustified by the sword. Therefore he prepared as fast as he could, not onely for defence, but (as hauing on his side the Kings name) to meete with them at home, who were nothing slacke in prouiding to encounter him. Ptolomie being aduertised of these proceedings, and considering how neerely they concerned him, sided with Antipater. To his government of Egypte he had annexed the Dominion of Cyrene, not without consent of the chiefe Citizens; and now in the midst of these garboiles he celebrated the funerall of Alexander with great solemnitie, purchasing thereby to himselfe much good wil and many partakers, notwithstanding the terrible report of the Kings Armie comming against him.

Perdiccas, vncertaine which way to bend his maine power, at length resolved to set vpon Ptolomie; leauing Eumenes to keepe to his vie, against Craterus and Antipater, the parts of Asia bordering vpon Europe.

It may seeme strange, that he did not rather make head against those who were to come out of Greece with a great number, and of more able men than Ptolomie could bring. Perhaps he thought to make a quicke end with Ptolomie; of beleueed that Craterus would not be ready for him soone enough. Sure it is that he tooke a bad course, and made it worse with ill handling.

Ptolomie by his sweet behauiour allured many to his party, without helpe of any bad arts. Perdiccas contrariwise was full of insolencie, which neuer failed to be rewarded with hatred; that is truly defined, An affection founded vpon opinion of an vnjust contempt. The whole storie of his proceedings in Egypt is not worth relation: for he did nothing of importance; but (as a wilfull man) tired his followers, and wasted them in hard enterprises without successe. His most forceable attempt was vpon a little Towne, called the Camels wall: thither he marched by night, with more haste than good speed; for Ptolomie preuenting him, did put himselfe into the place, where behauiing himselfe not onely as a good Commander, but as a stout Souldier, he gaue the foile to Perdiccas, causing him to retire with losse; after a vehement, but vaine, assault continued one whole day. The night following, Perdiccas made another iournie, (which was his last) and came to the diuisions of Nilus, ouer against Memphis. There with much difficulty he began to passe ouer his Armie into an Island, where he meant to incampe. The current was strong, the water deepe, and hardly foordable. Wherefore he placed his Elephants about the passage, to breake the violence of the streame, and his horse-men beneath it; to take vp such as were carried away by swiftnesse of water. A great part of his Armie being arriued on the further banke, the channell began to waxe deepe; so, that whereas the former companies had waded vp to the chin, they who should haue followed could finde no footing. Whether this came by rising of the water, or stirring away of the ground, (the earth being broken with the feete of so many Men, Horse, and Elephants) no remedy there was, but such as had passed must repasse againe, as well as they might: for they were too weake for the enemy, and could not be relieued by their fellowes. With great confusion therefore they committed themselues to the Riuer, wherein about two thousand of them perished, a thousand were deuoured by *Crocodile*s; a miserable spectacle euen to such as were out of danger; such as were strong and could swim, recovered the Campe; many were carried downe the streame, and driuen to the contrary banke, whereby they fell into the hands of their enemies.

This misfortune exasperated the Souldiers against their Generall, giuing liberty to their tongues, which long time had concealed the euill thoughts of their hearts. While they were thus murmuring, newes came from Ptolomie, which did set them in an vpror. Ptolomie had not onely shewed much compassion on those who fell into his hands alive, but performed all rights of funerall to the dead carcases, which the Riuer had cast vpon his side: and finally, sent their bones and ashes to be interred by their Kinsmen or Friends. This did not onely moue the common Souldiers, but made the Captaines fall to mutinie, thinking it vnreasonable to make warre vpon so vertuous and honourable a person, to fulfill the pleasure of a Lordly ambitious man, vsing them like slaues. The sedition growing strong wanted onely a head, which it quickly found. Pythion was there, who inwardly hated Perdiccas, for the disgrace which he had suffered by his procurement, after the victory vpon the rebellious Greekes. Pythion had liued in honourable place about Alexander; he was in the diuision of the Prouinces made Gouverneur of Media; he had followed Perdiccas, and being in all things (the Protectorship excepted) equall to him, had neuertheless beene scornfully vsed by him, which now he requited. Drawing together a hundred of the Captaines, and a good part of the horse, which consisted of the G<sup>n</sup>trie, (the footmen hauing declared themselues before) he entred the Tent of Perdiccas, where without further circumstance they all ranne vpon him, and slew him. Such end had the proud misgouerning authoritie of Perdiccas. He might haue liued as great as any, could he haue suffered any as great as himselfe; yea, peradventure master of all, had he not beene too masterly ouer those which were already his.

The next day Ptolomie came into the Campe, where he was ioyfully receiued; hee excused himselfe of things past, as not hauing beene Author, or giuen cause of the Warre, and was easily beleueed; the fauour of the Armie being such toward him, that needes they would haue made him Protector in the roome of Perdiccas. But this hee refused. It was an Office fit for one, that would seeke to increase his greatnesse with his trouble. Ptolomie was well enough already; wherefore, for his owne quiet he forbore to accept it, and for their well-deseruing of him he procured that honourable charge to Pythion, and to Arideus the Captaine, who hauing had some companies of Souldiers, to furnish with their attendance the solemnities of Alexanders Funerals, did with them adhere to him against Perdiccas.

In the midst of these busineses came newes of two great victories obtained by Eumenes; which newes, had they arriued two or three daies sooner, had beene entertained with ioyfull acclamations; and would haue giuen such reputation to Perdiccas, as had caused both his priuate maligners to continue his open flatterers, and his open enemies to haue accepted any tolerable composition. But these good tidings comming in ill time, when death had stopped the eares which would haue giuen them wel-come, found bad acceptance, as shall be shewed hereafter.

Victories of Eumenes in the lower Asia.

BEfore we proceed in the relation of things, happening about the person of the King, it is meete that wee speake of those bulineses in the lower Asia, which were handled by Eumenes with notable dexteritie, whilst Perdiccas was occupied in the Egyptian warres. Alcetas the brother of Perdiccas, and Neoptolemus, had receiued command from Perdiccas to be assistant to Eumenes, and to follow his directions. But Alcetas made flat answere that he would not; alleaging the backwardnesse of his men to beare Armes against so great a person as Antipater, and a man so much honoured as Craterus. Neoptolemus was content to make faire shew, but inwardly hee repined at the Precedency giuen to Eumenes, as thinking himselfe the better man. Eumenes discouering, through the counterfaieted lookes of Neoptolemus, the mischief lurking in his heart, wisely dissembled with him, in hope to winne him by gentle behauiour, and sweete language, that commonly are lost, when bestowed vpon arrogant creatures. Yet the better to fortifie himselfe, that he might stand vpon his owne strength, hee raised out of the Countie vnder his iurisdiction, about fixe thousand horse, giuing many priuiledges to such as were seruicable, and training them well vp. Not without great need. For when vpon aduertisement of the great preparations made by Craterus and Antipater (who had newly passed the Hellepont) for the inuasion of his Prouinces, he willed Neoptolemus to come to him with all his power, Neoptolemus did (indeed) aduance, but in hostile manner, though vnprovoked, presented him battell. Neoptolemus had secretly couenanted with Antipater to lay open the way for him to the conquest of Asia, which now intending to performe, he was shamefully disappointed. For though his foot-men, being all Macedonians, had much the better, and preuailed farre vpon Eumenes his batailles; yet were his horse driuen out of the field, and himselfe compelled, with a few of them, to runne away, leauing naked the backs of his Macedonian foot-men, to bee charged by Eumenes who forced them in such wise, that casting downe their Pikes, they cried for mercie, and gladly tooke their oath to doe him faithfull seruice. Antipater and Craterus endeoured with many goodly promises to draw Eumenes into their societie, who contrariwise offered himselfe, as a meane of reconciliation, betweene Perdiccas and Craterus, whom he dearly loued; professing withall his hatred to Antipater, and constant faith to the cause which hee had undertaken to maintaine.

Whilst these negotiations were on foote, Neoptolemus came with his broken crue to Antipater, and his Associates, vilifying Eumenes, and calling him a Scribe (at which foolish railing they laught,) but extolling the vertue of Craterus (as well he might) with high commendations; assuring them, that if Craterus did but once appeare, or that his voyce were but heard by any Macedonians in Eumenes his Campe, the victory was wonne; for

they would all forth-with revolt vnto him. Earnestly therefore he desired them to giue him aide against Eumenes, and especially requested that Craterus might haue the leading of the Armie to besent. Their owne affections did easily leade them to condescend to his motion; and good hope there was, that the reputation of Craterus might preuaile as much, as the force which he drew along. For hee had in the midst of Alexanders vanities, when others (imitating their King) betooke themselves to the Persian fashions of garments and customes, retained the ancient Macedonian forme of behaviour, and apparel; whereby he became very gracious with the common Souldiers, who beheld these new trickes of Asia, with discontented eies, as reprochfull and derogatorie to the manners of their native countrie. So Antipater tooke the way toward Cilicia, to hold Perdiccas at bay, and to ioyne with Ptolomy. Craterus vsed great celeritie, to haue taken Eumenes reauelling (as he hoped) according to the common fashion of Captaines, after a great victory. But he had a warie and well-advised enemy to encounter, who kept good espiall vpon him, and with much wisdom fore-saw all that was to be feared, and the meanes of preuention, which his courage did not faile to execute. Eumenes was not ignorant, that Craterus was able to defeat him without battell, yea without stroke; him therefore hee feared more than the Army following him: (yet the Armie following him was such, as much exceeded his own in footmen, but was inferior in horse-men) & thought it more vnesse to keepe the Macedonians from revolting to him, than from knowing him. Hereupon he took in hand a strange peece of worke, which desperation of all courses else taught him, & wise managing, prosperously accomplished. He gaue out reports, that Neoptolemus was returned with such company as he could gather together, & had gotten Pigres (a Captaine of no great estimation, who lay not far off) to ioyne with him. Having animated his men against Neoptolemus, whom he knew to be despised & hated among the, (as hauing bin vanquished by some of them, & forsaken others in plain field, whilst they valiantly fought in his quarrell) he took great care to keep them from receiuing any intelligence of the enemies matters. Peremptorily he comanded, that no Messenger nor Trumpeter should be admitted; and not heere with satisfied, he placed against Craterus no one Macedonian, nor any other that much would haue regarded him had he bin knowne: but Thracians, Cappadocians, and Persians, vnder the leading of such, as thought more highly of none, than of Perdiccas & himselfe. To these also he gaue in charge, that without speaking or hearkning to any word, they should run vpon the enemy, & giue him no leaue to say or do any thing, but fight. The directions which he gaue to others, he did not faile to execute in his own person: but placing himselfe in the right wing of his battaile, opposite to Neoptolemus, who (as he vnderstood) conducted the left wing on the contrary side, he held the Macedonians arranged in good order, & ready to charge the enemy as soon as the distance would giue leaue. A rising peece of ground lay between them, which hauing ascended, the Armies discovered each other: but that of Eumenes euery way prepared for the fight, the other wearied with long iournies, which ouer-hastily they had made, seeking the deceitfull issue of fruitles hopes. Then was it high time for Craterus (hauing failed in surprising them as enemies) to discover himselfe to his old friends & fellow-souldiers, of whom he could see none. Phenix a Tenidian, and Artabazus a Persian, had the leading of that side, who mindefull of their instructions, began to giue vpon him, with such countenance as told him his error, which to redeem, he had his men fight & redeem the day, and take the spoyle to themselves. But the Beare whose skin he fels is not yet caught. The ground whereon the battaile was fought gaue most aduantage to the horse, who encountered very roughly on all parts: especially about Eumenes & Neoptolemus; who as soone as they had discovered one another, could not containe themselves, but with great rage met body to body, and letting loose their bridles, grappled so violently together, that their horses ran from vnder them, leauing both of them tumbling on the ground. Neoptolemus rose first vp, but Eumenes had his sword first drawne, wherewith he houghed the other, causing him to fall downe and fight vpon one knee. In this conflict they receiued many wounds, but Neoptolemus giuing flight ones tooke such as were deadly, by which hee died in the place, and was there (being halfe-dead halfe-alive) stripped by his mortall enemy, whose reuilings he requited, lying euen at the last gaspe, with one wound in the groin, dangerous had it not wanted force. The death of Neoptolemus caused his followers to runne away vpon the spur, and seeke shelter behinde the battailes of their foote. They were nothing hotly pursued. For Eumenes pained himselfe to carrie succour succour to his left wing, which he suspected much to be distressed; but found accompanied with the same fortune, that had assisted him when he fought in person. Craterus had gallantly borne himselfe a while, and sustained the impression of Artabazus and Phenix, with more courage than force; holding it nothing agreeable with his honour to retire, and protract the fight, when he was charged by men of little estimation or note. Otherwise it is not vnlikely, that he might haue either carried the day, or preferred himselfe to a better aduantage by giuing ground, as the rest (when he and Neoptolemus were slaine) did. But whilst hee fought to preserve his reputation, hee lost his life by the fall of his horse, or his falling from his horse, through force of a wound receiued; vpon which accident hee was trampled vnder foote by many that knew him not, and to perished vnknowne, till it was too late to know it. Eumenes comming to the place where he lay, made great lamentation, as hauing alwaies loued and honoured Craterus, of whose death hee was now become the instant lament. The vanquished Armie entertained a Treatie of peace with Eumenes, making shew of willingness to become his followers; but their intent was onely to refresh themselves, which (by his permission) hauing done, they stole away by night, and fled toward Antipater.

This battaile fought within ten daies of the former, wanne to Eumenes more reputation than good will: for his owne Souldiers tooke the death of Craterus heauily, and the Armies lying further off were enraged with the newes. But other matters there were which incited men against him, besides the death of Craterus, whereof it manifestly appeared, that he was as sorry as any that pretended greater heauinesse. His Army wanted pay. This was a great fault; which he wisely amended, by giuing to them the spoyle of such Townes as were ill-affected to him. So he redeemed the loue of his own men, who of their meere motion appointed vnto him a guard for defence of his person. Others were not so easie to be reconciled. They who had bene Traitors to Perdiccas, hated him for his faithlesse, as greatly, as they thought he would hate them for their faithlesse; neither found they any fairer way of excusing their late revolt, than by accusing and condemning the side which they had forsaken. Wherefore they proclaimed Eumenes a Traitor, and condemned him to die: but it was an easier matter to giue that sentence, than to put it in execution.

§. X.

Quarrels betwene Eurydice the Queene, and Python the Protector. Python resignes his office, into which Antipater is chosen.

Python and Arideus being chosen Protectors of King Arideus and the children of Alexander, took the way to Asia the lesse, conducting the Armie through Syria. Of these two, Python was the greater in reputation, yet farre too weake to undertake so important a charge. For Eurydice, wife to King Arideus, was come to her husband, a Ladie of a masculine spirit, well vnderstanding what she was or should be, and thinking her selfe able to support the waight which Fortune laied vpon her foolish husband, being due to her owne title. Her Mother Cyna, sister to Alexander by her Father King Philip, was married (as hath bene shewed) to Amynias, who was the right Heire to the Kingdome of Macedon, being the onely sonne of King Perdiccas, Philips elder brother.

This Cyna was a warlike woman, she had led Armies, and (as a true sister of Alexander) fighting hand to hand with Caria Queene of the Phrygians, a Virago like vnto her selfe, had slaine her. Shee brought vp this Eurydice in the same vnwomanly Art of Warre, who now among the Souldiers beganne to put in practice the rudiments of her education, to the small contentment of Python, that could not brooke her too curious intermeddling in his charge. Whether it were so, that Python had some purpose to aduance the sonne of Alexander by Roxane, to the Kingdome (as once he had sought to doe) or whether the Queene did suspect him of some such intent; or whether only desire of rule caused her to quarrell with him; quarrell shee did, which disturbed the proceeding against Eumenes. The Armie hauing shaken off such a ranke-rider as Perdiccas, would not afterward be reined with a twined thred: Python bearing himselfe vpon his office, tooke vpon him to giue directions in the Kings name, which the Queene did oftentimes controuersing the same name, with more authoritie, and better liking of the Souldiers.

Python, seeing this, would needs resigne his office, whether vpon wearinesse of the contentions daily growing, or on purpose to bring the Queene into enuie, it is vncertaine. Perhaps he thought, that now being the farre worthiest man in the Campe, hee should be intreated to retaine the place, and haue his authoritie confirmed, or (as might be) increased, were it but for want of a fit Successor. Eurydice was nothing sorrie at this court; for now she thought to manage the affaires of the Empire at her owne will, being freed from the troublesome assistance of a Protector. But the Souldiers disappointed both her and Python, of their contrarie expectations: choosing Antipater, the onely powerfull man of Alexanders Captaines, then living, into the roome of Python. Hereat the Queene fretted exceedingly, and began to deale earnestly with the Macedonians, that they should acknowledge no Lord saue onely the King their Soueraigne. Yet shee failed of her purpose, being hindred (as may seeme) by three things: the apparent weaknesse of her husband: the growth of Alexanders children, who (though borne of out-landish women) were bred in the Macedonian Campe; and the mightinesse of Antipater, who commanding a great Armie neere at hand, arrived in few daies at the Campe, and enforced Eurydice to hold her selfe content. Antipater was of such power, that he needed not to worke by any close deuices, as Perdiccas had done: he had no concurrents, all the Governours of Provinces that remained aliue, acknowledged him their better: yea, many of them he displaced out of hand, putting others in their roomes. This done, hee tooke the King, Queene, and Princes along with him into Macedonia, leaving Antigonius Generall of the Royall Armie: to whom for his good seruices done, and to be done against Eumenes, he gaue the rule of Susiana, besides his former Provinces, and committed into his hands the government of Asia during that warre.

§. XI.

Antigonius Lieutenant of Asia, winnes a battell of Eumenes, and besiegeth him in Nora: Hee vanquisheth other followers of Perdiccas.

Here begins the greatnesse of Antigonius, whose power in few yeeres ouer-growing the rest, wanted little of spreading it selfe ouer the whole Monarchie. Hee was to make warre vpon Eumenes, Alcetus the brother, and Attalus the brother in-law to Perdiccas: worke enough to keepe his Armie employed in the publike seruice, till such time as he might finde occasion to make vse of it in his owne businesse. The first of these which he vndertooke was Eumenes, with whom Alcetus and Attalus refused to ioyne, hauing vnseasonably contended with him in time of common danger about the chiefe place. Eumenes had an Army strong in number, courage, and all needfull prouisions; but obedient onely at discretion. Therefore Antigonius tried all waies of corrupting his Souldiers; tempting first the whole Armie with letters: which practice failing by the cunning of Eumenes (who made shew as if hee himselfe had scattered abroad those letters, to trie the faith of his men) he dealt apart with such Captaines, as he thought most easie to be wonne. Of these Captaines one rebelled, breaking out too hastily before any helpe was neere him, yet looking so carelesly to himselfe, that he and his were surprised, when hee thought his enemies farre off. Another follower of Eumenes (or rather of good fortune, which hee thought now to bee in company with Antigonius) kept his treachery secret, reseruing it for the time of execution. Vpon confidence of the treason which this false man Apollonides had vndertaken, Antigonius presented battaile to Eumenes; in the heate whereof Apollonides, Generall of the Horse to Eumenes, fled ouer to the contrarie side, with such as he could get to follow him: but was closely followed by some, whose company he desired not. Eumenes, perceiuing the irrecoverable mischiefe which this traitorous practice had brought vpon him, pursued the villain, and cut him off before he could thrust himselfe into the troops of Antigonius; and boast of his treachery. This was some comfort to Eumenes in the losse of that battel, which disabled him vnto to keepe the field, and left it very hard for him to make a safe retreat. Yet one thing hee did which much amazed his enemies, and (though a matter of small importance) caused Antigonius himselfe to admire his high resolution. It was held no small part of the victorie to get possession of the dead bodies. Eumenes, whilest Antigonius held him in chase, turned out of the way, and fetching a compasse, returned to the place where the battaile had bene fought; there he burned (according to the manner of the time) the bodies of his owne men, men, and interred the bones and ashes of the Captaines, and common Souldiers, apart; raising vp heapes of earth as Mountaines ouer them, and so went his way. As this bold aduventure bred in the Macedonians, (returned to their camp) great admiration of his braue spirit: so the newes which Menander (who was set to looke vnto their carriages) brought and published among them, enriched them to loue him as their honourable friend. Hee had found Menander in an open Plaine, carelesse, as after an assured victory, and laden with the spoyle of many Nations, the rewards of their long seruice; all which he might haue taken: but fearing least such a purchase should proue a heauie burthen to him, whose chiefe hope consisted in swift expedition, hee gaue secret warning to Menander to flie to the mountaines, whilest he detained his men (whom authority could not haue restrained) by this sleight, setting them to bait their horses. The Macedonians extolled him for this courtesie, as a noble Gentleman, that had forborne when it lay in his power to strip them out of all their wealth, and make their children slaues, and to rauish their wiues: but Antigonius told them, that he had not forborne to doe this out of any good will to them; but out of meere subtiltie had auoyded those precious fetters, which would haue hindred his speedie flight. He told them true. For Eumenes did not onely thinke all cariages to bee our-burdenfome, but the number of his men to be more troublesome than auailable in his intended course. Wherefore he sent them from him as fast as he could, wishing them to shift for themselves; and retaining onely fife hundred horse, and two hundred foote. When hee had wearied Antigonius a while in following him vp and downe, hee came to Nora: where againe, keeping no more about him, than necessity required to make good the place, hee longingly dismissed all the rest. Nora was a little Fortresse in the borders of Lycania and Cappadocia, so strongly situated that it seemed impregnable, and so well victualled and stored with all necessaries, that it might hold out for many yeeres. Thither did Antigonius follow him, with more desire to make him his friend, than to vanquish him in warre. To this purpose hee entertained parlee with him, but in vaine. For whereas Antigonius offered him pardon, and his loue, Eumenes required restitution of his Provinces, which could not be granted without Antipaters consent. Then was Nora closed vp; where Antigonius leauing sufficient strength for continuance of the siege, tooke his iournie into Pisidia against Alcetus and Attalus, with whom he made short worke. He came vpon them vnexpected, and seized on passages, which wanted not men, but such a Captaine as Eumenes, to haue defended them. Alcetus and Attalus, as they had bene too secure before his coming, so were they too aduenturous, in fighting at the first sight, vpon all disadvantages: and their folly was attended with futable event. Attalus with many principall Captaines was taken; Alcetus fled to the Citie of Termessus, where the loue of the yonger sort toward him was so vehement, that stopping their cares against all persuasions of the ancient men, they needs would hazard their liues and their Countrie in his defence. Yet this auailed him nothing: For the Governours of the Towne hauing secretly compounded with Antigonius, caused the yong men to fall out; and vsing the time of aduantage, they with their seruants did set vpon Alcetus, who vnable to resist slew himselfe. His dead body was conueied to Antigonius, and by him barbarously torne, was cast forth without buriall. When Antigonius was gone, the yong men interred the carcasse with solempne funerals, hauing once bene minded to set on fire their owne towne in reuenge of his death. Such fauor had he purchased with courteous liberalitie: but to make an able Generall, one vertue, how great soeuer, is insufficient.

§. XII.

Ptolomie winnes Syria and Phenicia. The death of Antipater.

Hilest these things were in doing, the rest of the Princes lay idle, rather seeking to enioy their Governments for the present, than to confirme or enlarge them. Onely Ptolomie looking abroad, wan all Syria and Phenicia: an action of great importance, but not remarkable for any circumstance in the managing. He sent a Lieutenant with an Armie, who quickly took Laomedon prisoner, that ruled there by appointment of Antipater, and formerly of Perdiccas; but (as may seeme) without any great strength of Souldiers, farre from assistants, and vainely relying vpon the authority which had given him that Province, and was now occupied with greater cares, than with seeking to maintaine him in his Office.

Antipater was old and sickly, desirous of rest, and therefore contented to let Antigonus pursue the dispatch of those businesses in Asia. He had with him Polysperchon, one of the most ancient of Alexanders Captaines, that had lately suppressed a dangerous insurrection of the Ætolians, which Nation had stirred in the quarrell of Perdiccas, preuailing farre at the first, but soone losing all that they had gained, whilest Antipater was abroad in his Cilician expedition. In this Polysperchon, Antipater did repose great confidence; so farre forth, that (suspecting the youth of his own Sonne Cassander of insufficiencie in so great a charge) hee bequeathed vnto him on his death-bed the Government of Macedon and Greece, together with his Office of Protectorship. So Antipater died, being foure-score yeeres old, hauing alwaies trauelled in the great affaires of mighty Princes, with such reputation, that Alexander in all his greatnesse was iealous of him, and the successours of Alexander did either quietly giue place vnto him, or were vnfortunate in making oppositions. In his priuate qualities he was a subtile man, temperate, frugall, and of a Philosophicall behauiour, nor vnlearned, as hauing bene Scholler to Aristotle, and written some Histories. He had bene much molested by Olympias, Alexanders mother, whom after the death of her Sonne, he compelled to abstaine from comming into Macedonia, or entermedling in matters of Estate: yea, at his owne death hee gaue especiall direction, that no woman should be permitted to deale in the administration of the Empire. But this precept was soone forgotten; and yet ere long, by sorrowfull experience approued to haue bene found and good.

§. XIII.

Of Polysperchon who succeeded vnto Antipater in the Protectorship. The insurrection of Cassander against him.

Polysperchon* was very skilfull in the Art of Warre, hauing long time bene Apprentice in that occupation; other qualities, requisite in so high an Office as hee vnder-went, either Nature had not giuen to him, or Time had robbed him of them. He managed his business more formally than wisely, as a man of a second witte, fitter to assist, than command in chiefe. At the first entrance vpon the stage, he called to counsaile all his friends, wherein, for waighty considerations (as they who waighed not the contrary reasons held them) the Queene Olympias was reuoked out of Epyrus into Macedon, that the presence of Alexanders mother might countenance and strengthen their proceedings. For the condition of the times requiring, that the Gouvernours of Prouinces abroad should keepe greater Armies, than were needfull or easie to be retained about the person of the King in Macedonia; it seemed expedient, that the face of the Court should bee filled with all Maicstie, that might giue authoritie to the Iniunctions from thence proceeding, and by an awfull regard containe within the limited bounds of dutie such as could not by force haue bene kept in order, being strong, and lying too farre off.

Such care was taken for preuention of imaginarie dangers and out of sight, whilest present mischief lay vnregarded in their bosomes. Cassander, the Sonne of Antipater, was not able to discouer that great sufficiencie in Polysperchon, for which his father had reposed in him so much confidence: neither could hee discern such oddes in the qualitie of himselfe and Polysperchon, as was in their fortune. He was left Captaine of one thousand; which Office by practice of those times was of more importance, than the title now seemes to implice. Hee should thereby haue bene as Campe-master, or Lieutenant generall to the other: a place no way satisfying his ambition, that thought himselfe the better man. Therefore he began to examine his owne power, and compare with the forces likely to oppose him. All that had relied on his Father, were his owne assured, especially such as commanded the Garrisons bestowed in the principall Cities of Greece. The like hope was of the Magistrates, and others of principall authoritie, in those Common-weales, whose formes had bene corrected by Antipater, that they would follow the side, and draw in many partakers: it concerned these men in their owne particular, to adhere vnto the Captaines, by whom their faction was vp-held; and by whom the rascall multitude, couetous of regaining the tyrannous power which they had formerly exercised ouer the principall Citizens, were kept in order, obeying their betters perforce. Besides all these helps, Cassander had the secret loue of Queene

Eurydice, who had in priuate rendred him such curtesie, as was due onely to her husband. But neither the Queenes fauour, nor all his other possibilities, gaue him confidence to breake out into open rebellion; because he saw Polysperchon much reuerenced among the Macedonians, and strong enough to suppress him, before he could haue made head. Therefore he made shew of following his pleasures in the Countrey, and calling many of his friends about him, vnder pretence of hunting, aduised with them, vpon the safest course, and most free from all suspicion. The necessitie was apparant of raising an Armie, before the business was set on foote; and to doe this, opportunitie presented him with faire means. Ptolomie had by fine force, without any commission, annexed Syria to his government of Egypt and Cyrene: this was too much either for the King to trust him with, or for him to part with. Antigonus vpon the first newes of Antipaters death, began to lay hold vpon all that he could get, in such sort, that he manifestly discouraged his intent of making himselfe Lord of all Asia. These two therefore stood in neede, of a ciuill Warre, which Cassander well noted, and presumed withall, That the friendship which had passed betweene his Father and them, would auaille him somewhat. Whereupon he secretly dispatched messengers to them both, and within a little while conuieced himselfe on a sudden ouer the Hellepont, that he might in person aduance the business with greater speede. Much perswasion is needlesse in winning a man to what he desireth. Antigonus coueted nothing more, than to finde Polysperchon worke, by raising some commotion in Greece. Yet (as formalities must not be neglected) Cassander did very earnestly presse him, by the memory of his Father, and all requisite coniurations, to assist him in this enterprise; telling him, that Ptolomie was ready to declare for them, and vrging him to a speedy dispatch. Antigonus on the other side repaid him with the same coine, saying, That for his owne sake, and his dead Fathers, whom he had very deereely loued, he would not faile to giue him all manner of succour. Hauing thus feasted one another with words, they were nothing slacke in preparing the common meanes, leading to their feuerall ends.

§. XIII.

The necessity there was of timely prouision. For Polysperchon needed no other instructions to informe him of Cassanders drift, than the newes of his departure. He was not ignorant of the ready disposition, which might be found in Antigonus and Ptolomie, to the strengthening of rebellion; and well he knew that one principall hope of Cassander was reposed in the confidence of such as ruled in the Grecian Estate. Therefore (loving to worke circumspectly) he called another Councell, wherein it was concluded, That the Popular forme of Government should be erected in all the Cities of Greece, the Garrisons withdrawne, and that all Magistrates and principall Men, vnto whose hands Antipater had committed the supreme authority, should forthwith be either slaine or banished. This was a sure way to diminish the number of Cassanders friends, and to raise vp many enemies to him in all quarters. Yet hereby was disclosed both an vnthankfull nature in Polysperchon, and a factious malice in his adherents. For how could he be excused of extreme ingratitude, that for hatred of the Son went about to dishonour the Fathers actions, whose onely bountie had inabled him to doe it? Or what could be said in their defence, who sought to destroy many worthy men, friends to the State, by whom the Greekes were held restrained from stirring against the Macedonians; and in opposition to their priuate Enemie, gaue the rule of things to base Companions, and such as naturally maligned the Empire? But as in mans body, through sinnewes newly issuing from one branch, a finger is more vexed by inflammation of his next neighbour, than by any distemper in the contrary hand: so in bodies politique, the humours of men, subdiuided in faction, are more enraged by the disagreeable qualities of such as curbe them in their neere purposes, than they are exasperated by the generall opposition of such as are diuided from them in the maine trunk. Hereby it comes to passe, that contrary religions are inuited to helpe against Neighbour Princes; bordering enemies drawne in, to the part in ciuill warres; and ancient hatred called to counsaile against iniurious friends. Of this fault Nature is not guiltie; she hath taught the same to offer it selfe vnto manifest losse in defence of the head: They are depraued affections, affections, which render men sensible of their owne particular, and forgetfull of the more generall good, for which they were created.

The decree, whereby the Greekes were presented with a vaine shew of liberty, ran vnder the Kings name; but so, as one might easily discerne, that Polyperchon had guided his pen. For the maine point was, That they should follow such directions, as Polyperchon gaue, and treat with him about all difficulties. In the rest it contained such a deale of kindnesse, as proceeding on a sudden from those who had kept them in hard subiection, might well appeare to haue some other root than the pretended good will; and was of it selfe too base and vnfit for a King to vse toward his conquered Subiects, and often subdued Rebels.

§. XV.

Of the great commotions raised in Athens by Polyperchons decree. The death of Phocion.

NEuerthelesse the Athenians with immoderate ioy entertained this happy-seeming Proclamation, and sought how to put it in execution without further delay. But Nicanor, Capitaine of the Garrison, which kept one of their Hauens, called Munychia, in the lower part of the Towne, would needes take longer time of deliberation, than was pleasing to their hastie desires.

Nicanor, as a trusty follower of Cassander, was by him shifted into the place, and Meillus (that was Capitaine there before) discharged, when Antipater was newly dead. His comming to Athens was no way gratefull to the Citizens, who soone after hearing the newes of Antipaters death, cried out vpon Phocion, saying, That he had sufficient intelligence of that accident, and might by aduertising them in due time, haue put into their hands a faire opportunity of thrusting out the Macedonians. But these exclamations argued no more than a desire to shake off the Macedonian yoke. Far more grieuouly would they haue beene offended, had they knowne the instructions which Cassander had giuen to Nicanor, and his resolution to follow them. It was concluded, That he should not onely retaine Munychia, any iniunction to the contrary notwithstanding; but that he should finde meanes to thrust some Companies into Piræus, and fortifie that also, which was the principall Hauen, against the high-Towne. How to accomplish this, he rather wanted some reasonable pretence, than good ability. But the Athenians were not long in giuing him sufficient cause to do that, which he would haue done without any cause giuen. They desired him to come vnto their Councell, assembled in the Piræus, there to consider of the Kings Proclamation: whither vpon Phocians word and safe conduct he came, and earnestly pressed them to hold with Cassander in the warre which was ready to break forth. Contrariwise they vrged him first of all, to make them Masters of their own, which how to vse, they might consult afterwards. Each of them refusing to condescend vnto the others demand; the Athenians (who did alwaies measure iustice by profit, yet seldome thrured by that course) practised with Dercyllus, a Capitaine following Polyperchon, and then lying neere at hand, that he should enter into the Towne, and take Nicanor prisoner. But Phocion, who then gouerned in Athens, a man very vnlikly to the rest of the Citizens, being nothing pleased with such a trick of politike dishonesty, did quietly suffer him to depart and saue himselfe.

Nicanor hereupon began to deuise vpon taking Piræus; not as following now the proiect of Cassander, but prosecuting his owne iust reuenge. He leauied as many Souldiers as he could, and drew them closely into Munychia; which done, he issued into Piræus, tooke it, and intrenched himselfe therein, to the exceeding discomfort of the Athenians, who lately impatient of his keeping the one Hauen, saw him now Master of both. Alexander, the sonne of Polyperchon, came thither shortly after with an Armie. Then were the Citizens in great hope of recouering all, and addressed themselves vnto him; who made faire shewes, intending meere mischief, which they perceiued not, being blinded with the vaine Epistles of his Father, and of Olympias the old Queene. Olympias taking vpon her to command, before she durst well adventure to returne into Macedon, had peremptorily charged Nicanor to restore to the Athenians the places which he held: but he would first consider more of the matter. Polyperchon had further ordained, that the Isle of Samos should be rendred vnto them: a goodly offer, had it accorded with his power and meaning. He was (indeede) so farre from purposing to let them haue Samos, that as yet he did not thoroughly intend to let them haue themselves. The commoditie of their Hauens was such, as he would rather get into his owne hands, than leaue in theirs; yet rather wished in theirs, than in Cassanders. His son Alexander not ignorant of this, made faire shew to the Athenians, and spent much labour in communing with Nicanor, but suffered not them, for whom he seemed to labor, to intermeddle with the businesse. Hereupon the Citizens grew ielous, and the displeasure they conceiued against him, they powred out vpon Phocion, depriuing him of his office. This was done with much tumult: furnished men and strangers, thrusting themselves into the assembly of the Citizens, who distracted with sundry passions, growing out of their present misfortunes, thought euery one that best could inueigh against things past, a most likely man to finde some remedy for the euill threatening them. In this hurly-burly was Alexander deuising how he might come to some good point of composition with Nicanor, and held much priuie conference with him; which he could not so secretly carry, but that his negotiation was discouered, whereby the vp-rore in the Towne was so farre increased, that Phocion with many of his friends, were accused, and driuen to seeke saueguard of their liues by flight. So they came to Alexander, who entertained them gently, and gaue them his letters of commendation to his Father, desiring him to take them into his protection.

Polyperchon was in the Countrie of Phocis, ready to enter with an Armie into Attica. Thither came Phocion with his Companions, hoping well that the letters which they brought, and their owne deserts, (hauing alwaies beene friends to the Macedonians, as far as the good of their Countrie gaue leaue) should be enough to get patronage to their innocency. Besides all this, Dinarchus a Corinthian, Polyperchons familiar friend, went along with them (in an euill houre) who promised to himselfe and them great fauour, by meanes of his acquaintance. But Polyperchon, was an vnstable man, very earnest in what he tooke in hand, yet, either for want of iudgement in following them, or of honesty in holding the best of them, easily changing his intended courses, and doing things by the halues, which made him commonly faile of good successe. For feare of Cassander, he had offered wonderfull kindnesse to the Athenians; this had caused them to loue him: out of their loue he gathered hope of deceiuing them, which made him to change his minde, and seeke how to get into his owne hands those keyes, with which Cassander held them fast lockt vp: finding himselfe disappointed of this purpose, and suspected as a false dishonourable man, he stood wauering betwene the contrary allurements of profit and reputation. To keepe the Athenians perforce at his deuotion, would indeede haue done well: but the effecting of this beganne to grow desperate; and many Townes of importance in Greece began to cast their eyes vpon his proceeding in that action. Wherefore he thought it the wisest way to redeme their good opinion, by giuing all contentment vnto the popular faction, which was then growne to be Master of that Citie. And in good time for this purpose were the Athenian Embassadors come, treading (as one may say) vpon Phocians heeles, whom they were sent to accuse. These had solemne audience giuen to them in the Kings presence, who was attended by many great Lords, and for ostentations sake was glorified with all exteriour shewes of maiestie; yet all too little to change Arideus into Alexander: for hee did nothing there, but either laugh or chafe, as he saw others doe. For beginning of the businesse Polyperchon commanded that Dinarchus should be tortured and slaine. This was enough to testifie his hearty affection to the Commonaltie of Athens, in that he spared not his old acquaintance for their sake; whose Embassadors he then bad to speake. When their errand was done, and answer to it made by the accused, who had no indifferent hearing, Phocion and the rest were pronounced guiltie of treason; but to giue sentence, and doe the execution vpon them, was (for Honours sake) referred vnto the Citie of Athens, because they were Burgesses. Then were they sent away to Athens, where the insatiable multitude, not suffering them to speake for themselves, condemned them to dye. So they perished being innocent. But the death of Phocion being very conspicuous, made the fortune of the rest to be of the lesse regard. Fiue and fortie times had he beene chosen Gouernour of the Citie, neuer suing for the place, but sent for when he was absent: so well was his integritie knowne, and so highly valued, euen of such as were no pretenders to the same vertue. He was a good Commander in Warre, wherein though his actions were not very great, yet were they of good importance, and and neuer vnfortunate. Neuer did the Citie repent of hauing followed his counsaile: nor any priuate man of hauing trusted his word. Philip of Macedon highly esteemed him; so, and much more did Alexander, who (besides other signes of his loue) sent him two hundred talents of siluer, and offered to bestow vpon him of foure Cities in Asia any one which he would cloose. But Phocion refused these and other gifts, howsoever importunately thrust vpon him, resting well contented with his honest poeerty: wherein he lived about fourescore yceres, and then was compelled by the vniust iudgement of wicked men to drink that poyson, which by iust iudgement of the righteous God, so infected the Citie of Athens, as from that day forwards it neuer brought forth any worthy man resembling the vertue of their Ancestors.

§. XVI.

Not long after these things were done, Cassander with such forces as Antigonus lent him, entred into Piræus; which newes drew Polysperchon head-long into Attica, with a great Army, but so ill victualed, that he was faine to depart without any thing done. Onely he had giuen some impediment to the enemy; who not contented with defending what he held, began to looke out, and make new purchases abroad. Finding therefore himselfe vnable to driue Cassander out of Athens, he left his sonne Alexander, with such number of men, as exceeded not the proportion of victuals, to withstand his further incroaching. The greatest part of his Armie he carried into Peloponnesus, to make the Countrey sure to himselfe, wherein Cassander had many Friends.

His doings in Peloponnesus were such, as they had beene in other parts of Greece. First, he began to fight with Edicts, restoring the Democratie, or Popular forme of gouernement. Hee commanded that the principall Citizens, that had by Antipater beene made Rulers, should be either slaine, or driuen into exile. This decree tooke immediate effect in most places: The vulgar fort being very ready to seale the Charter of their freedom and authoritie, with the blood of those who had kept them in subiection. Yet many Cities there were, which delighted in the rule of the chiefe Citizens, and many which wished well to Cassander, especially they of Megalopolis, on whom Polysperchon meant to inflict an exemplary punishment of disobedience to him, which he termed Rebellion. Megalopolis had in it fiftene thousand seruiceable men, well furnished of needfulls, and resolved to endure the worst. And need there was of such resolution. For Polysperchon comming thither with all his power, did so much, that he ouerthrew, by a Mine, three of their Bulwarks, and all the space of wall betwene them. But the Defendants manfully repelled the Macedonians which came vp to the breach; and at the same time with great labour they raised vp an inner wall, to beare out the next assault. The Assaultants hauing failed to carry the Towne at the first attempt, tooke much paine to cleare the ground, and make faire way for their Elephants, whose violence was likely to ouerthrow all that came in their way. But the Towns-men perceiuing their drift, prepared boords driuen through with long nailes, which they vsed as gall-throps, bestowing them sleightly, couered with the points vpwards, in the way by which the beasts were to passe. Neither did they let any to encounter them in front, but appointed certaine light-armed men to beate vpon their sides with Arrowes and Darts, as they were instructed by some that had learned the manner of that fight in the Asian Warres. Of these prouisions they made happy vse in the next assault. For by them were the Elephants (wherein the enemy chiefly trusted) either forely hurt, or driuen backe vpon the Macedonians, whom they trampled vnder feet. Polysperchon came as ill furnisht for long abode to Megalopolis as before to Athens. Therefore being neither able to dispatch the businesse quickly, nor to take such leasure as was requisite, he forsooke the siege, with some losse, and much dishonour; leaving some part of his Armie to lye before the Towne for his credit.

After this he sent Clitus, his Admirall, to Sea, to wyne with Ardeus that was come out of Phrygia, and to cut off all succour, which might come to the enemy out of Asia. Cassander also sent his whole Fleet vnder Nicanor, who taking along with him some ships of Antigonus, came to the Propontis, where he fought with Clitus, and was beaten. But Antigonus hearing of the ouerthrow, gathered together the ships that were escaped, and and manning them very well, sent out Nicanor againe, assuring him of the victory, as well he might. For he sent out sufficient numbers of light-armed men, whom he caused to be waited ouer the Straights in small Vessels by night; these before day-light setting vpon Clitus, draue his men, that lay securely on the land, head-long into their ships; in which tumult Nicanor arriuing, did assaile them so lustily, that few or none escaped him.

This losse at Sea, together with his bad successe by Land, brought Polysperchon into great contempt. He had a good facility in penning bloody decrees, but when the execution was referred to his owne sword, he could finde the matter more difficult. Wherefore the Athenians, perceiuing that he had left them to shift for themselves, and was not able to giue them Protection against the enemy which lay in their bosomes, came to agreement with Cassander; accepting a Gouvernour of his appointment; and restoring all things to the same state wherein Antipater had left them. The like inclination to the party of Cassander, was found in very many Cities of Greece, which daily and willingly reuolued vnto him; as to an industrious man, and likely to preuaile in the end. Thus was the whole Country set in a combustion, vncase to be quenched; which presented vnto Antigonus an opportunity, that he neglected not, of making himselfe Lord of Asia.

§. XVII.

Antigonus seekes to make himselfe an absolute Lord: and thereupon tractes with Eumenes, who disappointeth him. Phrygia and Lydia wonne by Antigonus.

Antigonus* had in Antipaters life time a firme resolution, to make vnto himselfe the vmost benefit that he might of the Army committed to his charge. And in faire season for aduancement of his purposes came the newes of Antipaters death; when then, when all the businesse in Pisidia was dispatched, and no more employment for the Army remaining, saue onely the continuance of the siege of Nora, a small thing of it selfe, but as hard as a greater matter; and requiring few men, but much time; when time of all things was most precious. Eumenes lay in that Fort of Nora, able to make the place good, and hoping that the mutability, to which the present estate was manifestly subiect, would in continuance of some yeres (which he might abide) worke more for him, than his enemies in that space could worke against him. His most feare was, that for want of exercise in that narrow Castle, his men & horses might grow sickly and vnserviceable: which made him to practise many deuices of keeping them in health and lustie. But when he had continued shut vp in this manner about a yeece, his hopes came to goode passe, and he was eased of his cares by Antigonus himselfe, whose forces held him besieged.

Antigonus knowing the great sufficiencie of Eumenes, and considering his fidelity shewed vnto Perdiccas, thought that he could not finde in all the world a fitter man than him, to employ in managing those high designs, wherein he doubted not that he should be withstood by the mightiest Princes of the empire. He sent therefore to Eumenes by one that was friend to them both, acquainting him with some part of his intent, and promising to make him a better Lord than euer hee had beene, and the next man to himselfe, if things fell out as he desired: in regard whereof hee required onely his friendship, and thereupon sent him an oath to take; which done, he might at his good pleasure issue safely out of Nora, and enioy his perfect libertie. Eumenes, perusing the forme of the oath, did perceine the meaning of Antigonus; which was, rather to make him his follower than his fellow. For whereas, in a few words, it mentioned the King and Princes of the blood, rather to keepe the Decorum, than vpon any loyall intent; the binding words and summe of all were such, as tied him fast onely to Antigonus, omitting all reservation of duty to the King or any other. This hee liked not, holding it vncseemly to become a sworne man to him, with whom hee had fought for the masterie; and being assured that his voluntary assistance, which way soeuer he gave, would be more acceptable, and farre more honourable, than the course propounded. Yet would he not therefore breake off for the negotiation, and waite for some better occasion of enlargement, which might perhaps be long in comming: but seeming to be well agreed with Antigonus, he prepared to giue vp his Hold and depart. As for the oath it selfe, when he came to take it, he made shew of dislike, in that it was not solemne enough enough for such personages as they were, who could not be too ceremonious in testifying their Allegiance. The Macedonians which lay incamped before Nova, liked his words, and gaue him leaue to put in Olympias, and the children of Alexander, binding himselfe to them and their adherents, as well as to Antigonus; and so he departed.

Antigonus had taken vpon him, as soone as he came downe to the Sea-side, to remoue some of the Gouvernours of the Prouinces, behauing himselfe according to the authoritie which he had receiued of Antipater, to exercise in the time of warre. Neither did he want sufficient pretence whereby to iustifie his proceedings. For if Polyperchon might lawfully hold the Protectorship, which the old man doting on his death-bed bequeathed vnto him, as a legacie, without consent of the Princes or Souldiers; why might not he himselfe aswell retaine the Lieutenantship of Asia, that was granted vnto him for the generall good of the State, in presence of the whole Armie, by the King, and by Antipater, who had power to ordaine what should seeme conuenient whilest he liued, not to dispose of things that should happen after his death? To giue a faire colour to his ambition, this was enough: if any were not herewith satisfied, he had threescore thousand footmen, ten thousand horse, and thirtie Elephants in a readinesse to answer them.

The first that perceiued his drift, and provided to resist him, was Arideus Gouvernour of Phrygia, who fortified the Townes of his owne Prouince, and sought to haue won Cyzicus, a faire Hauen Towne, and seated very conueniently for him, but was faine to goe away without it. Hereupon Antigonus tooke occasion to command him out of the Countie. Arideus was so farre from obeying him, that he sent forces to relieue Eumenes. Nevertheless finding that he was vnable of himselfe to make long resistance, he tooke such companies as he could draw along with him, and so passed ouer into Europe, to complaine at the Court. The like fortune had Clitus, who ruled in Lydia, and sought the like remedy of his fortune, with some hope at the first (for both of them were entertained with very good words) which quickly vanished, and grew desperate, when they were beaten at Sea, as hath already beene declared.

§. XVIII.

Antigonus pursues Eumenes. Eumenes hauing authoritie from the Court, raiseth great war against Antigonus in defence of the Royall house.

Antigonus hauing thus gotten into his hands all, or most of all Asia the lesse, was able to haue entred Macedon, and seized vpon the Court; which that he forbore to doe, it proceeded (as may seeme) for some of these reasons. It would haue bred as much ialousie in Cassander, as feare in Polyperchon, which might haue brought them to tearmes of reconciliation; It would aske more time than he could spare, and the enuie which followed the Protectorship was such, as he that had power enough without the Office, ought rather to shun, than to pursue. Besides all this, it was manifest that Eumenes would not onely refuse to take his part, but would make warre vpon him in defence of the Royall house, to which it was found that Antigonus did not stand well affected. Against him therefore he bent his course, and with an Army of twenty thousand foot, and foure thousand Horse, made great haste toward Cilicia, hoping to suppress him before he should be able to make head.

Eumenes was one of those few that continued faithfull to their dead master, which being well knowne in the Court, he had commission sent vnto him from thence to raise an Armie, and make warre vpon Antigonus, taking of the Kings treasure as much as he should neede. Other letters also there were directed to all the Gouvernours of Prouinces, requiring them to giue assistance to Eumenes, and be ordered by his direction: especially to the Captaines of the old Souldiers; called the Argyraspides, or silver-sheeled bands, commandement was giuen to be at his appointment. He had of his old followers gathered together two thousand foot, and five hundred horse, before this authority was giuen him: but now he purposed with all the strength which he could make, to fight with Antigonus in defence of the Royall blood. Olympias had written to him, desiring him to bring helpe to her and to her Nephew the sonne of Alexander, and in the meane time to giue her his aduice in that which Polyperchon required of her: for shee was desirous desirous to returne into Macedon, but suspected his ambition, as not contained within lawfull bounds. Eumenes therefore counselled her to remaine in Epirus, till such time as he could bring the warre to a good issue, which done, he promised that his faith and care should not be wanting to the seede of Alexander.

Strange it is to consider, that in all the Empire, scarce any one could be found among the Noble men, in whom Alexanders mother, wiues, and children, might repose firme confidence, saving onely this Eumenes, a stranger to the Macedonian blood, borne at Gordias, a Citie of Thrace. His reputation was no more than his owne vertue had made in; his followers obeyed at their owne discretion; and compelled he was to trauaile as fast as Perseus, to gather together an Armie sufficient, to resist the enemies that pursued his heeles.

§. XIX.

How the Princes of Macedon stood affected mutually. Olympias takes Arideus and Eurydice, whom she cruelly puts to death.

OW, forasmuch as in this present warre all the Rulers of the Prouinces did entremiddle; and great alterations happened, not onely in the parts of Asia, but Macedon it selfe; which brought a new face vnto the State, by the extirpation of the royall house of Philip and Alexander: I hold it conuenient in this place, before we enter into the particulars of the warre it selfe, to shew briefly how the great ones did mutually stand affected; and by what passions they were drawne into those courses, which ouer-threw most of them, and out of their ruines built the greatnesse of a few: as likewise to what extremitie the faction brake out in Macedon it selfe, about the maine controuersie of the title to the Crowne, whereupon all other quarrels were or should haue beene depending.

Arideus the King, being simple and fearefull, did onely what hee was bidden.

Polyperchon, desirous to continue long in Office, had a purpose to aduance the sonne of Alexander by Roxane to the kingdome, and become Gouvernour to a King of his owne making.

Eurydice the Queene discouering plainly this intent, and meaning nothing lesse than to let her husband serue as a Stale, keeping the throne warmer till another were growne old enough to sit in it, grew acquainted with Cassander, who hated the memory of Alexander, and was therefore the fitter for her turne.

Cassander held fresh in minde the danger wherein his family had beene through Alexanders malice, together with the indignitie offered to himselfe by Alexander, who knocked his head against a wall for deriding one that adored him after the Persian manner. The displeasure hereof; and the pleasure which he tooke in the amorous Queene, made him to resolute, both to suppress the linage which he hated, and to maintaine his beloued mistresse, either by supporting her weake husband, or by taking her to be his owne wife.

The rest of the Lords held it a thing indifferent who reigned ouer all, so as they might reigne in their feuerall Countries, and establish their authority in such wise, that it might not be taken from them.

Among these, Ptolomie and Antigonus were well enough already, if their ambition would haue suffered them to see it.

Phibos and Seleucus lying farre off, and being strong, had some good hope to encroach vpon their neighbours. Against these, Pencestes and some others with much ado hardy made made resistance, vntill such time as Eumenes came to them; who propounded to himselfe great matters, which he liued not to accomplish.

Olympias the old Queene (as it is common with step-dames) hated the children of her husband by his other wiues. It was thought that she had giuen poyson to Arideus, which failing to take away his life, had much impaired both his body and wits. Now considering, that Eumenes was too full of businesse to come home so soone as she wished that he should; and that Cassander daily preuailed in Greece: thought it the best way to ioyne with Polyperchon, and set vp, as King, her Nephew Alexander, the son of Roxane, remouing Arideus before Cassander were able to defend him. To this intent she procured men among her kindred in Epirus, and so tooke her way towards Polyperchon, who ioyning with her, entred into Macedon.

Eurydice hearing these newes, wrote very earnestly to Cassander, praying him to set aside all other businesse, and come to succour her. She herselfe by entreatie, gifts and promises, drew to her parties as many of the Macedonians as she could, vntill she thought her owne side strong enough; and then taking her husband with her, went boldly forth against Olympias, and the Traitor Polyperchon.

These two Queens met armed, as if the matter should haue bene determined by their own hands, which ended without any stroke stricken, by the reuolt of those who followed Eurydice. For as soone as the Macedonians beheld Olympias; calling to minde her former Estate, and the victorious reignes of her husband and sonne, they refused to lift any weapon against her. Eurydice finding her selfe thus forsaken, fled towards Amphipolis, but was intercepted and made prisoner with her husband.

Olympias hauing obtained this victory without blood, thought that all things would succeed as easily, and that vpon the same considerations for which they had refused to beare Armes against her, the Macedonians would not sticke to maintaine her, whatsoeuer her proceedings were. Hauing therefore shut vp Arideus and his wife in a close roome, where they could scarce turne round, she fed them through a little hole, till after a while it came in her head, (for feare lest the people should haue commiseration of him, that had reigned almost fixe yeeres and a halfe) to put them to death. So she deliuered Arideus to some barbarous Thracians, who tooke away his life by cruell torments: to Eurydice she sent a sword, a halter, and a cup of poyson, willing her to choose the instrument of her owne death; who praying that the like presents might one day be sent to Olympias, yeelded her necke to the halter, hauing spent her last curses not in vaine. Nicanor the brother of Cassander, and a hundred the chiefe of his friends, did Olympias then choose out, all whom she commanded to be slaine. His brother Solans that was already dead and buried, she accused of poyson giuen to Alexander, & thereupon caused his Tomb to be throwne downe, and his bones to be scattered abroad. The Macedonians wondering at this furie, began to condemne themselves, and the folly of Polyperchon, who had, quite contrarie to Antipaters charge giuen on his death-bed, called this outrageous woman to the gouernment of the Empire.

§. XX.

How Cassander was reuenged vpon Olympias.

†. I.

The great expedition of Cassander. Olympias shuts her selfe into Pydna, where Cassander besieged her. Æacides King of Epirus, coming to succour Olympias, is forsaken, and banished by his owne Subjects.

Cassander at that time lay before Tegea, in Peloponnesus; whither when all these ill tidings were brought to him, he neuer staied to take the Citie, nor to giue order for the State of things in that Countrie, (though Alexander the sonne of Polyperchon were there with an Armie) but compounding with them of Tegea, he willed his associates to looke to themselves as well as they could, till his returne; and so in all haste he tooke his journey toward Macedon, carried headlong with the greedie desire of iust reuenge. The Ætolians had taken the Streights of Thermopylae, in fauour of the Queene and Polyperchon, to hinder his passage; but he, not willing to mispend any time in dealing with them, got together as many shippes as he could, great and small, with which he transported his Army into Thessaly. There he diuided his companies, appointing some vnder Callas, a subtile Captaine, to hold Polyperchon busied, who then lay incamped neere to Perbæbia, with the rest he marched directly against Olympias. She, hauing once preuailed by the respect giuen to her dignitie, tooke more care how to appeare Maiestically, than to make her selfe strong. To this end she made a solemne progresse to Pydna, a Sea-towne, and well fenced, hauing in her companie all the floure of the Court, especially the great Ladics, among whom was Roxane, and her yong son Alexander, heire to the great Alexander, by his grandmothers designement: who, during his minority kept the Soueraigne power in her owne hands. But all this pompe serued to little vse, against the violence of the enemy, that soone presented himselfe before the wals, onely it fed the besieged with a vaine hope of succour, that would from all parts arrive, to rescue persons of their quality. And hereof there soone appeared faire likelihood, which as soone vanisht, and went away in smoke.

For Æacides King of Epirus, made great haste to bring succour to Olympias, his cosen, with whom Deodamia his daughter was also shut vp. Neuertheless, his Subjects were nothing forward in this expedition; but finding certaine passages taken in the way by Cassanders raen, they called vpon him to retire, and quit the enterprife. The Kings importunitie vrging them to proceede, and the obstinate refusall of the Armie, brake out at length into such termes, that when he had raged in vaine against the multitude, his authority, with which he thought to haue preuailed vpon them, was by them taken from him, and he compelled to forsake his Kingdome, and to wander vp and downe in forraine Countreies a banished man, his people ioyning with the enemy, against whom he had led them forth to warre.

Pydna in the meane time was closed vp streightly, both by Sea and Land, so that neither any could issue out of the Citie, nor any reliefe be conueyed into it; but it held out as long as any food was left, no memorable seruice being done there, whilst great actions were managed abroad.

†. II.

Continuation of Olympias her storie. Polyperchon defeated. Extreme famine in Pydna. Olympias yeeldes to Cassander.

Now, though order of time require it, that we should rehearse the doings of Eumenes and Antigonus in this place, leauing Olympias yet a while to the howre of her destiny, which growes the faster vpon her, because she may discern it coming; yet that wee may not be compelled to interrupt the course of our narration, by inserting her Tragedie in the midst of things, not manifestly coherent with it; we will here (as elsewhere we haue done, and elsewhere must) continue to an end one History, that we may not be therewith distracted, when we shall come to the relation of another. All the hope of the besieged, remaining in Polyperchon, was in like manner disappointed, as their former trust had bene, which was reposed in the succours of the Epiros. For Callas, who was sent against him, found the meanes to corrupt the greatest part of his Armie with money, leauing him within a little while so slenderly accompanied, that he was fit for no other businesse of warre, than a swift retrait. When famine had so fure preuailed in the Citie, that the horses were killed as a precious food, many men feeding on the dead carcasses of their fellowes, and sawdust being giuen to the Elephants for prouender; some of the Souldiers obtaining the Queenes leaue, (who could not denie it) others, without asking leaue, yeelded themselves to the enemy, and were by him gently relieued, and sent abroad into the Countrey. The newes of the Queenes affaires, dispersed by these men, did so affright her wel-willers, that such as had referred themselves to the euent, came in apace, and submitted them to Cassander. At length, when the mortalitie was so great in the Towne, that the liuing were euen poysoned with the noysome sent of the dead; Olympias bethought her selfe of stealing away by Sea in a Galley that she had: wherewith her successe was as bad as in the rest. For God had appointed this Towne, by her chosen as a place of refuge, to be vnto her as a house of torment, and a laile, out of which she should not be deliuered, but vnto an euill death. Being therefore vterly broken with miseries, which daily afflicted her her and the other Ladies, vnaccustomed to so wretched a kind of life, she offered composition, & with much labor hardly obtained of Cassander (who hauing fetcht her Gally out of the Hauen, accounted himselfe as good as master of her body) a grant of her own life. Immediately vpon her apprehension, Pella, the chiefe Citie of the Kingdome, was yeelded to Cassander. Amphipolis did stand out: for Aristonius (to whom Olympias had giuen charge of such forces as were left abroad in the Countrey, taking courage from the successe of some petty seruices wherein he had preuailed) began to promise himselfe great vnlikelihoods. But Olympias, to win Cassanders fauour, very earnestly required him vpon his faith to her, that he should giue it vp. He did so, and presently after was killed by his priuate enemies, that were set on by Cassander, who partly hated him vpon old respects, partly doubted him, as a man likely to seeke innouation.

†. III.

The death of Olympias, and her conditions.

WHEN Olympias had now heard sorrowfull tidings of all her friends, shee her selfe was called into question, and accused in an assembly of the Macedonians, for the murders (they were so stiled in her affliction, which in time of prosperitie she called iustice) by her committed. There was she (being not heard nor called to speake) condemned to die. The suite was commenced and prosecuted against her, by the kindred of those whom she had slaine. But it was at Cassanders instigation; who (to hasten the execution) sent her word, that he would furnish her with a ship, and other necessities, to saue her selfe by flight: which when she refused, saying, that she would plead for her selfe, and tell her owne tale; he dissimbled no longer, but sent vnto her such men as hated her most, who tooke away her miserable life. She was daughter, and sister, vnto two Kings of Epirus; wife, and mother, vnto two the mightiest Kings, of that, or many other ages; a stout Lady, and of vnreproueable chastitie; but her ambition was boundlesse, her hatred vnappeafable, and her furie in reuenge, most vnwomanly. Her peruerse conditions made her husband seeke other wives and Concubines, which caused her to hate both him, and them. She was thought priuie to her husbands death; after which, very cruelly she slew his late wife Cleopatra, hauing first murdered one of her two children in her armes, and with a beastly fury broiled the other aliuie in fire, in a copper bason. For these things, her sonne Alexander (otherwise louing her well) forbade her to meddle in the gouernement of Macedon. But God more seuerely vnto cruell Tyrants, than onely to hinder them of their wils, permitted her to liue and fulfill the rest of her wickednesse, (which was his iustice vpon the adulteries of Philip, and the oppression done by him and others;) after all which, He rewarded her malice, by returning it vpon her owne head.

†. IIII.

Cassander celebrates the funerall of Aridaeus and Eurydice; and seekes to make himselfe King of Macedon.

AFTER her death, Cassander gaue honourable buriall to Aridaeus and Eurydice, among their Progenitors, Kings of Macedon. And looking further into his owne possibilities of greatnesse, he married the Lady Theſsalonica, whom he had taken at Pydna, being the daughter of King Philip, by another of his wiues; that by her he might haue some title to the Crowne. For the same end he committed Roxane, and her yong sonne, to close prison, remouing thereby some part of his impediment. And, the better to encrease his fame, and purchase loue, built a Citie, called by his owne name Cassandria, that soone grew to be very great and powerfull. He reedified likewise Thebes in Greece, and restored it vnto the old inhabitants, after it had laine twenty yeeres waste, being utterly razed by Alexander. By these meanes, especially by the restauration of Thebes, whereunto all Greece voluntarily contributed, he grew so strong, that few remained enemies vnto him; and they, with much labour, hardly could resist him. Leauing him, therefore daily preuailling in Greece, we will returne to them, who contended in Asia, for lesse titles, but larger Prouinces, with greater forces.

CHAP. IIII.

Of the great Lordship which ANTIGONVS got in Asia.

§. I.

The iourney of Eumenes into Persia. His wife dealing with those that ioyned with him.

Eumenes, hauing ioyned vnto his company the Argyraspides, made haste into the Easterne parts. to take possession of those Countreies, according to his commission, and strengthen himselfe against Antigonus. He tooke his iourney through Callosyria and Phoenicia, hoping to reclaime those Prouinces, vsurped with the rest of Syria (as hath beene shewed) by Ptolomie, to the Kings obedience. But to effect this, his haste of his passing forward was too great, his Armie too little, and the readinesse of the people, to returne to their due obedience, none at all. Besides all which impediments, one inconuenience troubled him in all his proceedings, making them the lesse effectfull. The Captaines of the Argyraspides were so froward, that they scorned to repaire to him, and take his directions; and their fidelity was so vnsteady, that he might more easily haue dealt with open traitors. It was not expedient, that he, being Generall, should weaken his authority by courting them; neither lay it in his power to keepe them in order by compulsion. Therefore he fained, that Alexander had appointed vnto him in a dreame, a place for their meeting, namely, in a rich pavilion, wherein an empty throne was placed, as if Alexander himselfe had beene present at their consultations. Thus he freed himselfe from their vaine pride; but of their faith he could haue no assurance. Yet when Ptolomie requested them, and Antigonus bribed them to forsake him, they continued (though not without considering of the matter) to take his part. So hee marched on, sending before him the Kings warrant; which Pytho and Seleucus refused to obey; not as reiecting the Kings authority, but excepting the person of Eumenes, as a man condemned to die by the Macedonian Armie, for the death of Craterus. Eumenes, knowing well that hee was not to relye vpon their assistance, who stood otherwise affected then his affaires required, and were not to be dealt with by perswasion, sought passage by strong hand, through the Countrey of Babylon, in such wise that Seleucus, hauing in vaine assailed to hinder him, by opening the sluices of Euphrates, was glad at length to grant him friendly way, as desirous to be rid of him. Thus he came to Peucestes and the rest of the Easterne Lords, who were glad of his company, because of the differences betwene Pytho, Seleucus, and themselves. Yet the contention about superiority, grew very hot among them; euery one finding matter enough, to feede his owne humour of selfe-worthinesse. But the former deuice of assembling in one pavilion, made all quiet; the conclusion euer being sure to follow that which Eumenes propounded, who was both wisest in giuing aduice, and best able to reward, by means of the authority giuen him, to take what he pleased of the Kings treasures. By these meanes he won to himselfe many of those, who had most power to doe good or hurt.

§. II.

Antigonus, hearing that Eumenes lay in the Prouince of Susa, had an earnest desire to follow him, and driue him further from the Kings treasures, which were kept there. To which end, as soone as he had made himselfe strong enough, he removed out of Mesopotamia, where he had wintered; and taking to him Pytho and Seleucus, with their men, he marched directly against the enemies, with intent to giue them battaile. Eumenes had fortified the Castle of Susa, & was retired back toward Persia, keeping keeping the Riuer of Tygris betweene him and his pursuers. The passages of the Riuer were well guarded, and good espiall kept vpon Antigonus, to obserue which way he took. Before he came to Tygris it selfe, he was to passe ouer Coprates, a great Riuer, and not foordable, which he sought to doe by small vessels, whereof he had no great store. A great part of his Armie had gotten ouer, when Eumenes, who kept a bridge vpon Tygris, came with a thousand horse, and foure thousand foot, to see their demeanour: and finding them out of order, charged them, brake them, and draue them headlong backe into Coprates, wherein most of them were drowned; very few escaping with life, except foure thousand that yelded themselves prisoners, in fight of Antigonus, that was not able to relieue them. This losse made Antigonus glad to fall off, and the heate of that Countrie in the dog dayes, breeding diseases in his Armie, by which many perished, caused him to remoue as farre as into Media: So he tooke Python with him; (leaving Selenus to besiege the Castle of Susa) and seeking to goe the neereft way, passed through Savage Nations, that continually vexing him with skirmishes, slew great numbers of his men, before he could arriue in Media, with his troupes that were quite heart-broken.

§. III.

Of Eumenes his cunning. A battaile betweene him and Antigonus.

After his departure, Eumenes with his associates fell into consultation, about the manner of their businesse. Faine he would have had them to enter vpon those Provinces, which Antigonus had left behinde him; to which also the Captaines of the Argyripides or Siluer-shields were very inclinable, as desiring to draw neerer to Greece. But Peucestes, and the rest, whose dominions lay in the high Countries, had more care of their owne particular Estates, and would needes march Eastward. These carried it; for the Armie was not strong enough to diuide it selfe into parts.

When they came into Persia, Peucestes, ruling there, feasted them royally, and sought by all means to win the Souldiers loue to himselfe. Eumenes perceiuing whereunto those doings tended, suffred him a while to keepe good cheare, till the time of war drew neere. Then did he faine an Epistle, directed, as from Orontes Gouvernor of Armenia, to Peucestes himselfe: The purport whereof was, that Olympias had vanquished Cassander, and sent ouer a great Armie vnder Polyperchon, to ioyne with Eumenes. These newes, as they filled the Campe with vaine ioy, so they wrought in all mens mindes a great willingness to obey Eumenes, by whom was the likeliest apparance of their preferment; wherein they dealt wisely, he being farre the most sufficient Commander, as they found soone after. For when Antigonus, coming out of Media, drew neere vnto them, Eumenes by some mischance was fallen sick, and faine to be carried in a Litter, the Armie marched in very bad array, and was likely to haue bene forced to take battaile in that disorder. But Eumenes, when the rest of the Captaines were amazed, was carried about the Armie in his Litter, and vpon the sodaine did cast his men into so good forme, that Antigonus, perceiuing him a farre off, could not refraine from giuing him deserued commendations. Yet he did not cease to promise great rewards to the Captaines, and all sorts of men, if they would forsake Eumenes: which hopes deceiuing him, he came to the trial of a battaile. Eumenes had more Elephants than Antigonus, otherwife, he was inferiour in number both of horse and foote by a third part. The battaile was fought with variable success, and great losse on both sides, continuing a great part of the day, and of the night following. Yet the victory was vncertaine. For Eumenes could not force his men to lye farre from their carriages: by which meanes Antigonus (who had a more absolute command ouer his) incamping on the ground whereon they fought, had in his power the dead bodies; which was accounted the signe of victory; for he buried his owne, and gaue leaue to his enemies crauing it, to doe the like. But a greater signe of victory had Eumenes. For he abode still in the same place, and not onely buried his men very honourably, at great leisure, but held the Countrie round about; whereas Antigonus was glad (hauing carried but one day) to steale away by night, and returne into Media, from whence he came.

§. IIII.

Of diuers stratagems practised by Antigonus, and Eumenes, one against the other.

Hus did the Warre continue doubtfull, and was protracted to a greater length, each part hauing stout Souldiers, and skilfull Generals: but the side which had hitherto preuailed, being hindered by the equall authoritie of many, from pursuing all aduantages to the best. Antigonus grew daily weaker, in men and reputation, so that to repaire himselfe he could finde no way safer, than to put all to aduenture. Hee knew that his enemies lay in their wintering places, quartered farre asunder, so that if hee could suddenly come among them, he was likely to put them in great distresse. Between him & them, the way was not long, being only nine daies iourney, but very bad, through a rough drie wilderness, hardly passable. Another way, fairer and leading through a Countrie well peopled, but requiring 25. daies iourney, he forsooke, partly for the length, partly, and chiefly, because he would come vndiscovered. So therfore taking his iourney in the dead of winter, he forbade vnto his men the vse of fire by night, because hee would not haue them descried a farre off. This commandement had bene well obserued foure or fiue daies, when continuance of time (as commonly) breeding negligence, and the cold weather pinching them, they were bold to cherish themselves, being neerer to their waies end. The light of these fires gaue notice of their coming; which being reported to Peucestes, and other Captaines, they were so astonished with the sodaine danger, that in all haste they betooke themselves to flight. But Eumenes, meeting with the newes, began to hearken his affrighted companions, promising to make Antigonus march leisuely, and willing them to abide, and draw vp their men together. They could scarce beleue him; yet they were content to be ruled, and did as he appointed, who failed not in making his word good. He tooke with him some companies of the readiest men, wherewith he occupied certain tops of mountaines, looking toward the Campe of Antigonus: there hee chose a conuenient ground to incampe vpon, and made great store of fires in sundry places, as if the whole Armie had bene present. This was a sorrowfull spectacle to Antigonus, who thought himselfe preuented of his purpose; and began to feare lest he should be compelled to fight, whilest his men were tired with a long & painfull iourney. Therefore he resolu'd to turne aside, and take the way to such places, as might better serue to refresh his Armie. This he did with great care and circumspection, at the first, as knowing how ready Eumenes would be vpon all aduantages. But after a while, considering that no enemy stirred about him, he began to pause, and thinke in himselfe, that somewhat or other was not fallen out according to his opinion. To be the better informed in the matter, he caused some Inhabitants of that Desert to be taken, and brought before him; of whom he learned, that they had seene no other Armie than his thereabout, but onely a few men that kept fires on the hill-tops. It vexed him exceedingly to finde that hee had bene so deluded. Therefore he went against these troupes with great furie, meaning to take sharpe vengeance on them, for hauing so deceiued him. But by this time, sufficient strength was arriued there, which could not bee forced without much businesse, and long stay. All the Armie was come, saue onely Eudamus, Captaine of the Elephants, who, besides those beasts, had no more than foure hundred horsemen in his company. Antigonus hearing of this supply coming to his enemies, sent about two thousand horse, and all his light-armed footmen, to cut it off by the way. Eudamus beeing fallen into this danger, was faine to place his Elephants round about his carriages, and so to defend himselfe as well as he could; for his horsemen, ouerlaid with multitudes, were quickly broken, and driuen to runne away vpon the spur. Neither knew they, who sate vpon the Elephants, which way to turne them; for on all sides they receiued wounds, and were not able to requite them with the like. In this extremitie there appeared braue troupes of horse and foot, that came v unexpected to the rescue, and charging the assailants vpon the backe, draue them to seeke their owne safety by speedy flight. These were sent by Eumenes; who though he knew not what his aduersarie meant to doe, yet he knew very well what was fittest for him to doe: and therefore, playing both games himselfe, prouided the remedie.

§. V.

BY these meanes Eumenes wanne great honour, and was by the whole Armie acknowledged a most expert Generall, and well worthy of the chiefe command. But Peucestes, and the other Captaines, guilty of their owne much insufficiency, were so transported with enuie, that they could no longer containe their vile thoughts, but held communication, as vpon a necessary point, how they might finde meanes to murder him.

Surely, it is great injustice to impute the mischief continued against worthy men, to their owne proud carriage, or some other ill deseruing: For, though it often happen, that small vices do serue to counterpoise great vertues; (the sense of euill being more quick and lasting than of good) yet hee shall bewray a very foolish malice, that, wanting other testimonie, will thinke it a part of wisdome, to finde good reason of the euills, done to vertuous men, which oftentimes haue no other cause than vertue it selfe. Eumenes, among many excellent qualities, was noted to bee of singular court: he, of a very sweet conuersation among his friends, and carefull by all gentle meanes to winne their loue, that seemed to beare him any secret ill affection. It was his meere vertue that ouerthrew him, which euen they that sought his life acknowledged. For they concluded that hee should not be slaine, before the battaile were fought with Antigonus, wherein they confessed that it stood best with their safety, to be gouerned by his direction. Of this treason he was quickly aduertised by Eudamias, to whom hee had done many pleasures, and by some others of whom hee vsed to borrow money when hee needed not, to the end that they should be carefull of his good, for feare of losing their owne. Considering therefore, and discoursing with himselfe of the villany intended against him, he made his last Will, and burnt all his Writings that contained any matter of secret: which done, hee reuolued many things in his minde, being doubtfull what course he were best to follow. All the Nobles of the Empire stood ill affected to the Royall blood, excepting those which were with him, that were more in number than in worth. How things at that time stood in Macedon and Greece, either he knew not, or, knowing the truth, knew nothing that might incourage him to seek their helpe, that needed his. To make his owne peace with Antigonus, had bene against his faith to Olympias, and the Princes, that had committed this great power into his hands. For which cause also it may be thought, that he forbore either to lose the battaile willingly, or to flee into Cappadocia, and make shift for himselfe among his old friends. At length he resolved to do his best against the common enemy, and afterwards to looke to himselfe as well as he might.

§. VI.

The last battaile betwene Antigonus and Eumenes.

HE Souldiers, especially those olde bands of the Silver-shields, finding Eumenes perplexed, and not knowing the cause, entreated him not to doubt of the victory, but onely to bring them into the field, and set them in array; for the rest, they alone would take sufficient order. The like alacritie was generally found in the common Souldiers faces; but the chiefe Commanders were so mischieuously bent against him, that they could not endure to thinke of being beholding to him for the victory. Yet hee ordered the battaile so well, that, without their owne great fault, they could hardly faile of getting the vpper hand.

Before the Armies came to ioyning, a horse-man from the side of Eumenes, proclaimed with a loud voice vnto the followers of Antigonus, That their wickedness in fighting against their owne Fathers, would now be punished, as it well deserued. This was not spoken in vaine. For the Silver-shields were men of threescore or seuentie yeeres olde, and strengthened more by continuall exercise than decayed by age, and excelling in courage, as hauing passed through greater dangers, than any like to be presented in that fight. Therefore Antigonus his men (who had often bene beaten by them, and were now to trie their last hope with these resolute warriors, the most Ancient and best regarded of all Alexanders Souldiers) grew very pensiue, and advanced heavily,

heavily, suspecting their owne cause, and fearing that the threatnings vttered would proue true.

Antigonus was now againe farre the stronger in horse, which gaue him cause of great hope; the ground, on which they were to fight, being a plaine leuelled field. Placing therefore himselfe and his sonne Demetrius in the right wing, and committing the left wing to Pithon, hee did set forward couragiously against the enemies, that were ready to giue him a sharpe entertainment.

Eumenes tooke vnto him Peucestes, with the rest of the Lords, and stood in the left wing of his battaile, in the face of Antigonus, meaning both to prevent the Traitors, his Companions, of all meanes to make head against him on the sodaine; and (withall) to giue proofe of his owne valour, which perhaps he should no more doe, in the face of all his enemies. In the right wing, opposite vnto Pithon, he bestowed the weakest of his Horse and Elephants, vnder one Philip, an honest man, and (which was enough at such a time) obedient: commanding him to protract the fight, and make a reasonable retreat, expecting the event of the other side.

So they ioyned very fiercely; Antigonus, labouring to make himselfe master of all; Eumenes, to die an honourable death, or to winne such a victorie vpon his open enemies, as might giue him leisure and opportunitie to deale with his false friends.

The footmen of Antigonus, being euen in their owne opinions, farre inferior to those to whom they must encounter, were at the first brunt presently defeated by the Silver-shields, who slew aboute five thousand of them, losing of their owne not one man. But in horse, Eumenes was so ouer-marched, that hee could not repell Antigonus, who pressed him very hard, but was faine to stand wholly vpon defence. Yet his courage wrought so well by example, among his followers, that the enemy could not winne one foot of ground vpon him, vntill such time as Peucestes, with one thousand five hundred horse, withdrew himselfe out of the battell, leauing his companions fighting to defend his backe.

Then did Eumenes desperately rush amongst his enemies, labouring to breake open the way vnto Antigonus himselfe. And though he failed of his purpose; yet with great slaughter hee did so beat vpon them which came in his way, that the victorie hung a long time in suspense, vncertaine which way to incline.

The ground whereon they fought, being of a slight sandie mould, through the trampling of horses, men, and Elephants, did cast vp such a cloud of dust, as hindered the prospect, so that no man could see what was done a little from him. Antigonus finding this aduantage, dispatched away some companies of horse, that passed vndiscovered beyond Eumenes his battailes, and came to his carriages, which lay about halfe a mile from the place of fight, slenderly guarded, (for that the whole body of the Army lay betwene them and danger) and therefore easily taken. Had Peucestes retired himselfe no further than vnto the carriages, he might not onely haue defended them, but peradventure haue surprised those which came to surpris him, and so haue done as good a piece of seruice as a better man. But he was gotten somewhat further, to a place, where out of danger he might expect the event: and Eumenes was so ouer-laboured both in body and minde, that hee could not possibly giue an eye to euery place, being not well able to continue where he was.

It happened so, that the Elephants meeting together, those of Antigonus had the better hand; whereupon Eumenes, finding himselfe euery way ouer-charged, beganne to giue backe, and withdrew himselfe and his companies in good order, to the other side of the battaile, where Philip (as he was directed) had by fighting and retiring together, kept that wing from losse. The Antigonians had felt so much of Eumenes that day, that they were well content to let him depart quietly, and wished not to see him come againe; as faine he would haue done.

The losse of the carriages was reported vnto him, as soon as he had any leisure to heare how things went: whereupon he presently ordered his men for a fresh charge, and sent for Peucestes that was not far off, requesting him to bring in his men, and renew the fight, whereby he trusted, not only to recouer their owne goods, but to enrich themselves with the spoiles of the enemies. Peucestes not onely refused to ioine with him, but immediately withdrew himselfe into a safer place, where hee might be further from such dangerous temptations.

By this, the night grew on; and both Armies, wearied with fighting, were desirous to returne into their Campes. Yet Antigonus conceiued hope of doing somewhat more; and therefore taking halfe his horsemen, he waited vpon Eumenes a part of his way homewards, but found no opportunity to offend him: the other halfe he committed to Pithon, willing him to set vpon the Siluer-shields in their retrait; which yet he forbore to doe, because it appeared too full of danger. So the battaile ended; wherein Antigonus had not so much the better in horse, as the worse in foot: but the spoyle which he got, by surprizing his enemies cariages, made amends for all his other losses.

§. VII.

How Eumenes was betrayed to Antigonus, and slaine.

Eumenes, comming into his Campe, and finding the Siluer-shields extremely discontented with their misfortune, began to cheere them vp, and put them in hope of recouering all with aduantage. For their braue demeanor that day had so crushed the enemy, that hee had no power left, wherewith to abide them in open field, and was much lesse able to draw their Carts after him, through that great Wildernesse, ouer the high mountains.

But these perswasions auailed nothing. Peucestes was gone; the other Captains would needs returne into the high Countries; and the Souldiers had no desire either to flie or to fight, but onely to recouer their goods. Wherefore Teutamus, one of the two Captaines of the Siluer-shields, (who had in former times readily consented vnto traitorous motions, in hope of gaine, but was letted by his partner Antigenes) finding, as hee thought, a fit occasion of making himselfe great, and winning the loue of those bands, dealt secretly with Antigonus, requesting him to restore vnto those olde Souldiers their goods, which hee had taken, being the onely reward of their seruices, in the warres of Philip and Alexander.

Antigonus, as a subtile man, knew very well, that they which requested more than they had reason to expect, would also with little entreaty, performe a great deale more than they promised; and therefore he louingly entertained the messengers, filling them with hopes of farre greater matter than they desired, if they would put Eumenes into his hands, by whom they were seduced to make warre against him. This answere pleased them so well, that they forthwith deuised how to deliuer him aliue. Wherefore comming about him, as at other times, to doe their dutie, and pretending more ioy of their victorie, than sorrow of their losse, which they said they would redeem by another fight, in the midst of this goodly talke, they leapt vpon him, caught hold of his sword, and bound him fast. So they haled him away; and stopping their cares against all perswasions, would not yeeld so furre, as to loosen one of his hands and let him kill himselfe, but brought him aliue (that was their owne Generall, vnder whom they had obtained many victories) as it had beene in triumph, into the Campe of their enemies.

The preffe of men, running out of the Campe to see him, was so great, that Antigonus was faine, to send a guard of horsemen and Elephants, to keepe him from being smothered; whom hee could not sodainely resolue, either to kill or saue. Very few they were that sued for his life; but of these, Demetrius the sonne of Antigonus was one; the rest were desirous to be rid of him quickly; thinking belike, that if he were saued, hee would soone be the chiefe in reputation, for his great abilitie. So after long deliberation, Antigonus concluded, that it was the safest way, to put him to death; which intending to haue done by famine (perhaps because he would keepe it a while in his owne power, to reuerse the sentence, as desiring, if it might be, to haue him liue his friend) haste of other busines made him doe it by the sword.

To this end came all the traualles of that worthy Generall Eumenes; who had with great wisdom, fidelitie, and patience laboured in vaine, to vphold the family which God had purposed to cast downe. Hee is reckoned among the notable examples of Fortunes mutabilitie; but more notable was his government of himselfe, in all her changes. Aduersitie neuer lessened his courage, nor Prosperitie his circumspection. But all his vertue, industrie, and wit, were cast away, in leading an Armie, without full power, to keepe it in due obedience: Therefore it was not ill answered, by Gaspar de Collignie, Admirall of France in our daies, to one that foretold his death, which ensued soone after in the mas-acre of Paris; That rather than to leade againe an Armie of Voluntaries, he would die a thousand times.

Antigonus himselfe gaue to the body of Eumenes honourable Funerall; and rewarded the Treason, wrought against him, with deserved vengeance. One chiefe Captaine of the Siluer-shields he burnt aliue; many of the other Captaines he slew; and to the whole multitude of the Siluer-shields, that had betrayed so worthy a Commander, he appointed a Leader that should carry them into farre Countries, vnder pretence of warres; but with a priuy charge, to consume them all, as periured wretches, letting none of them returne aliue vnto his friends and kindred, or so much as once behold the Seas that beat vpon the shores of Greece and Macedon.

§. VIII.

How Antigonus slew Pithon, and occupied Media. How he removed Gouvernours of Prouinces, and made himselfe Lord of Persia, carrying away Peucestes.

His two Armies being ioyned thus in one, were carried into Media, where they spent the rest of the Winter; the common Souldier idly; the principall men industriously bent vnto the businesse ensuing. Pithon began to consider his owne seruings; for that the whole warre had beene chiefly maintained by the strength and riches of his Prouince. Besides, he thought himselfe as good a man as Antigonus, vnlesse it were in the Souldiers opinion, which he iudged easie to be purchased with gifts, and therefore spared not to assay them with great liberality. But in following this course, hee was driuen by necessitie to trust many, of whom hee stumbled vpon some, that were treacher, and others, bearing him no sincere affection. Thus was his purpose discouered to Antigonus, who (nothing like to Pithon) dissembled his indignation, and rebuked the informers, as breeders of dissention betwene him, and his honourable friend, vnto whom he meant to commit the Government of all those Countries: his owne businesse calling him into the lower Asia. These reports, comming daily to his eares, did finelie delude Pithon. By his greatnesse with Alexander; his authority in that Prouince where they lay, whereof he was Governour; and the loue of the Souldiers which he had bought with money; hee was strong enough to maintaine, euen an offensiue warre. But what need had he to vse the sword, when hee was likely without contention, to obaine more than his owne asking? Therefore he came as soone as he was sent for, to take his farewell of Antigonus, and to diuide the Prouinces with him, that meant nothing lesse than to yeeld to any such diuision. As soone as he came, he was taken, and accused, condemned to die, and slaine out of hand. For Antigonus, hauing begun with Eumenes his ancient friend, was not afterward restrained by any consideration of olde acquaintance, from cutting downe indifferently all that stood in his way: but swamme carelessly through the blood, wherein at the first he doubtfully waded.

When this businesse was ended, hee appointed a new Gouvernour in Media, to order the Prouince, and a Captaine, to suppress all commotions: thinking belike, that the power and authoritie, so diuided, would hardly agree in one against him, from whom both were deriued.

After this hee marched into Persia, where hee was entertained, as absolute Lord of Asia. There began hee to shew how well hee vnderstood his owne mightinesse. For he placed and displaced at his owne pleasure, Gouvernours in all Prouinces, leauing none in Office, that were not his owne creatures, excepting such as lay too farre off to bee dislodged easily.

Peucestes, who ruled in Persia, thought with good cheere to redeeme olde offences, but was deceiued, hauing to doe with one that could not bee taken with such baits: hee was caried away, and feasted with goodly words of promise, that neuer after tooke effect. Thus hee, that eniued the vertue of his friend, was driuen to flatter (in vaine) the fortune of his enemy, after which he led a most contemptible life, till he died obscurely and forgotten.

How Seleucus was chased out of Babylon by Antigonus. The great riches of Antigonus.

Seleucus was the next in this visitation; one that had from time to time continued in the same tenor of good will to Antigonus, & now gave proofe of his hearty affection toward him, by making the Capitaine of the Caste of Susa to meete him on the way, rendering vnto him that strong Peece, and all the treasures therein bestowed. This offer was so great, that Antigonus (though hauing in his hands the Keeper of the place) could hardly beleue it; but vied him with excessive kindnesse, for feare so good a mood should change. In that Caste he found all the treasures of Alexander, with the Jewels of the Persian Kings, which added to his former store of money, made vp 25. thousand talents. Hauing all this, he might well account himselfe a happy man, if riches were sufficient to happinesse. But large dominion was the marke at which hee aimed; therefore he proceeded, with intent to leaue no Countrey behinde his backe, that should not acknowledge him for Soueraigne Lord. Comming to Babylon, hee was entertained by Seleucus with all possible demonstration of loue, and honoured with presents, beseeching the Maiestie of a King. All this he accepted with great grauitie, as being due to him; and began to require an account of the reuenues of that Prouince. This demand Seleucus held vnreasonable; saying, That it was not needfull for him to render vnto any man an account of that Prouince, which was giuen vnto him, in respect of his many good seruices to the State. But whether he spake reason or no, it sufficed, that Antigonus was powerfull; who vrged him daily to come to a reckoning. Manifest it was, that neither want of money, nor any other necessity, moued Antigonus to presse him thus, but onely the desire to picke matter of quarrell against him, whereof it was likely that hee should finde such issue, as Pithon and Peucestes had done. Therefore taking with him onely fifty horse, he conueied himselfe away, and fled into Ptolomies Dominions; desiring him to protect him from such a man as went about to oppresse all, that in former times had bene his betters, or at least his equalls. Antigonus was glad of his flight; for now all those Countreies were yeelded vnto him without battaile, whereas to fight with Seleucus for them, he wanted all pretence; and to kill him it was not his desire, hauing receiued many benefites of him, and those not intermixed, as commonly it happens, with any iniuries. Yet it is reported, that the Chaldeans brought a strange Prophecie to Antigonus, bidding him look well to himselfe, and know, that if Seleucus did escape his hands, he should recouer Babylon, yea, winne all Asia, and kill Antigonus in battaile. Easie beleeuers may giue credit to this tale. Had it bene true, me thinks, Antigonus rather should haue hanged those Chaldeans, for giuing him no warning till it was too late, than sent pursuers (as they say that he did) after him, whom the destinies preferred for so great purposes. When he had setled things at Babylon, he tooke his iourne into Cilicia, where he wintered. There hee took vp ten thousand talents more of the Kings treasures, and casting his accounts, found his yeerely income to amount vnto eleuen thousand Talents.

CHAP. V.

Of the great Warre betweene ALEXANDERS Capitaines: and how they assumed the name and state of Kings.

This great riches, and the rest of his power, made Antigonus dreaded, enuied, and suspected, whereby he quickly was embarked in a new Warre. Ptolomie, Cassander, and Lyfimachus, had priuily combined themselves together, intending to hinder his further growth, and bring him to more reason, than of his owne accord he seemed like to yeeld vnto. Of their practices hee had some notice; the good good entertainment giuen vnto Seleucus, giving him sufficient cause of mistrust. Therefore he sent Embassadors to them seuerally, entreating them to continue firme in their louetoward him, that would be ready to requite them with the like. The cold answers which they made, occasioned his hasty preparation against the most forward of them, which was Ptolomie, it being likely that a good armie should preuaile more than a faire message. Therefore, as soone as the season of the yeere would permit, he tooke the way toward Syria, & was encountered by Embassage from them all. These told him, that their Lords did much reioyce at his victorie, obtained against Eumenes their common enemy, and the honour that he had thereby gotten. In which warre, forasmuch as they being his Confederates, must haue endured great losse, with hazard of their whole Estates, if the contrary faction had preuailed; they held it very iust, that all should bee partakers in the fruits of that voyage, wherein they had bene all aduenturers. Wherefore they desired him, that making betwene them all an equall diuision of the treasures that were in his hands, (a thing easie to be done) he would also take some conuenient order for enlarging their Dominions, according to the rate of his new purchases. This might best be to euerie ones liking, if he would make ouer Cappadocia, with Lycia, to Cassander; and Phrygia, bordering vpon the Hellepont, to Lyfimachus; for whereas his owne Dominions were so much extended Eastward by his late victorie, he might well spare some of those westerne Prouinces, to those that were seated in the West. As for Ptolomie, he would not craue any new addition, but rest contented within his owne Territories. Provided alwaies, that Seleucus their common friend, and partner in the late warre, might be restored to his owne, out of which hee had bene driuen so iniuriouly, that all of them were forced to take it deeply to heart; requiring amends, with his friendly consent vnto their demands; which otherwise they must labour to obtaine with armed hands.

Antigonus knew, that after many losses receiued, hee should yet bee able to redeeme peace whensoever he listed, with these, or perhaps with easier conditions. Neither was hee so weake, to giue away quietly any part of his strength into the hands of such bad friends, for feare onely, lest it should be taken from him perforce. Rather he hoped that he should be able to finde them worke, more then enough to defend their owne. Therefore he roundly answered the Embassadors, that it was no part of his meaning to communicate with other men the profit of that victorie, which he alone without other mens helpe had obtained. Though indeed they had already sufficiently gained by him, if they could see it, hauing by his meanes kept their governments, whereof they were like to be dispossessed by Polyperchon, and the councill of estate in Macedon. But what maruell was it, if they considered not how he had saued them, seeing one of them had forgotten the time, when comming to him as a fugitiue, and begging succour, he was by his mere bountie relieved, and enabled to get all that he now held? Cassander did not (saide hee) in those daies command mee to surrender Prouinces, and giue him his equall share of my treasures; but (for his Fathers sake) desired mee to pittie him, and helpe him against his enemies: which I did; by lending him an Armie, and Fleet, on confidence whereof he now presumes to threaten me. As for Seleucus, how can hee complaine of wrong, that durst not stay to plead his right? I did vse him well; but his conscience told him that he had deserued ill: else he would not haue fled. Let them that so curiously search into my doings, consider well their owne, which some of them can hardly iustifie. I am now in the way to Syria, meaning to examine Ptolomies proceedings, and after him to deale with others, if they continue to prouoke me.

§. II.

When the Embassadors were dismissed with this answere, nothing was thought vpon but warre. Antigonus perceiving that he should be invaded from Europe, as soone as he were entred into Syria; left his Nephew Ptolomie to guard the Sea coasts, and hinder Cassander from landing in Asia: giuing him also in charge, to driue out of Cappadocia some that were already sent ouer to molest him. Likewise he dispatched Messengers into Greece and Cyprus, not vnfurnished of mony, to draw friends to his side, and raise vp troubles to his enemies. Especially, hee laboured to make himselfe the strongest by Sea; to which purpose he rather hastened, than foreflowed his journey into Syria, that he might get possession of Mount Libanus, which afforded many excellent commodities for building of a Naue. Therefore, hauing erected Beacons, and laid post-horses throughout all Asia, to giue swift aduertisement of all occurrences, hee invaded Syria, that was not held against him by any power sufficient to maintaine the field.

Ptolomie lay in Egypt, the strength and heart of his Dominion, where he was beloued and honoured of the people as their naturall Lord: his other Prouinces hee kept with a few Garrisons, better seruing to containe the people within obedience, than to confront a forraigne enemy. So Antigonus tooke many Cities, and Places, of that Countrey, and began to set great numbers of Artificers on worke in making ships, which was one of his most earnest cares. In these businesses he consumed a yeere and three moneths, not idly. For he tooke Ioppe, and Gaza, which were yeelded vnto his discretion, and well used. The strong Citie of Tyris held out long, but was compelled in the end by famine, to render it selfe vpon composition, that Ptolomies Souldiers might depart with their Armes, which was permitted.

Ptolomie was not asleepe, whilest these things were in doing, though hee kept himselfe within the bounds of Egypt, as indeed it behoued him to doe. His forces were not able to stand against Antigonus in plaine field, but likely they were to increase, which made him willing to protract the time. Neuertheless by Sea (where his enemy was as yet vnready) he sent his Fleet into all quarters, whereof Seleucus had the chiefe command.

Seleucus passed with an hundred saile along the coast of Syria, in the full view of Antigonus, and his Armie, to their no little discomfort. He landed in Cyprus, which was then gouerned by many pettie Lords; of whom the greatest adhered to Ptolomie, the rest were by the Factors of Antigonus, bought for him with gold, but now redeemed by the Egyptian with sharpe Steele.

The same commoditie of aide by Sea encouraged the President of Caria (called also Cassander, but not the sonne of Antipater, howsoever by the painefull and learned writer Reinerus Reineccius, he is by some oversight, counted for the same) to declare for Ptolomie and his Confederates, and busily imploy in their quarrell all his forces, which he had hitherto kept in good neutralitie, and thereby enioyed rest; but now he threw himselfe into dangerous warre, choosing rather to vndergoe trouble at hand, than to fall vnder certaine ruine, though somewhat further distant, which would haue overwhelmed him, if Antigonus had beaten all the rest.

§. III.

How each partie sought to winne the assistance of Greece. Antigonus his declaration against Cassander. Alexander the sonne of Polysperchon revolteth from Antigonus who had vsed him vp.

IN the meane season all care possible was taken on both sides, to assure vnto them the people of Greece, whose aide which way soeuer it inclined was of great importance. Here in at the first, Antigonus sped so well by large effusion of his treasure, that he drew to him the Lacedaemonians, and other Peloponnesians, of whom hee waied eight thousand, and caused Polysperchon (who had a good while made hard shifts) to rowe himselfe againe, and taking vpon him the title of Captaine of Peloponnesus, to make head against Cassander.

These hopefull beginnings encouraged him to proceed further in the same kinde. Wherefore to make Cassander the more odious, hee called together both his owne Souldiers, and all the Greekes and Macedonians that were to be found thereabouts. To these he declared, that Cassander had very cruelly slaine Olympias, mother to the great Alexander; and not herewith contented, had shut vp in close prison the poore Lady Roxane, Alexanders wife, and his sonne begotten on her bodie. That all this proceeded from a desire to make himselfe King ouer the Macedonians; which well appeared by his enforcing the Lady Thessalonica, Daughter to King Philip, a match vnfit for a man of no greater parentage than he, to ioyne with him in marriage. That in meere despight of those dead Priores, Philip and Alexander, he had planted the Olynthians, rooted out by Philip, in a new Citie by him built, and called by his owne name Cassandria; and had reedified the City of Thebes, which for the great treason of the inhabitants, was leuelled with the ground by by the victorious hand of Alexander. For these reasons hee required them to make a decree, that Cassander should restore to absolute libertie the Lady Roxane, and her son; and should yeeld obedience to the Lord Lieutenant Generall of the Empire, (by which name Antigonus himselfe was vnderstood) or else should be reputed a Traitor, and open Enemy to the State. Furthermore he propounded, that all the Cities of Greece should be restored into freedome; this he did, not because he was carefull of their good, but for the need which he had of their assistance.

These things being decreed, Antigonus was perswaded, that not onely the Greekes would adhere vnto him, as to their louing Patron, and fall off from Cassander; but that the Rulers of Prouinces, who had hitherto suspected him as a man regardfull of nothing but his owne benefit, would correct their opinion, and thinke him the most faithfull of all others to the Royall blood. But concerning his loyaltie to the yong Prince, the world was too wise to be deceived with vaine shewes. His vndertaking for the libertie of the Greekes was more effectually, and got easie beleefe, in regard of his present hatred to Cassander. Yet herein also Ptolomie strove to be as earnest as he, making the like decree, in hope to winne to himselfe that valiant Nation, which afforded men farre more seruicable in warre, than were to be found in any Prouince of the Empire.

And this indeed was the point, at which both sides aimed. Wherein Antigonus thinking to make all sure, deceived himselfe, not without great cost. For he gaue to Alexander the sonne of Polysperchon five hundred talents, willing him to set the warre on foot in Peloponnesus, whereby it might appeare, that on his side was meant nothing else, than what was openly pretended.

In Peloponnesus, Cassanders men had with much blood-shed, grievously afflicted the contrarie faction; and he himselfe perceiuing, that they were more easily spoiled as enemies, than retained as friends, thought it the best way, to make what vse he could of them, that were not long like to continue his. Finally, perceiuing that Alexander came furnished with plentie of gold, wherewith he was able, not only to winne the doubtfull, but to corrupt such as might seeme best assured: he thought it a part of wisdom, to surrender vpon faire conditions, that which hee could not assure himselfe to hold any long time by force. Therefore he sent on to deale with Alexander, about the matters in controvertie; telling him, that Antigonus was very skilfull in setting men together by the eares, not caring who preuailed, but onely desiring haue them to weary themselves, whilest he was busied elsewhere; that so at length he might find opportunity to set vpon the stronger. If therefore Alexander were so wise, as to keepe in his purse the five hundred Talents which he had, and without stroke stricken, to receiue the whole Lordship of Peloponnesus; it should be freely put into his hands by Cassander. Prouided, that hee should from thenceforth renounce all confederacy made with Antigonus, and enter into a sure & faithfull league with Ptolomie, Cassander, & the rest of the Confederates. Otherwise, he might well perswade himselfe, that the Countrey which his Father could not keepe, when hee was indeede the Lieutenant of the Empire, should not in haste be wonne by him; that was onely the Factor of a proud iniurious man, so stiling himselfe, but not acknowledged by others.

Alexander had liued a while with Antigonus since the beginning of these wars; among whose followers it was not hard to discouer the intent, (which he did not carrie very secret) of making himselfe absolute Lord of all. Therefore he was soone entreated to accept so good an offer; and did not sticke to enter into that league, whereby he was to become a free Lord, and subiect vnto no mans controll.

Howbeit this his honour continued not long, ere he lost both it and his life together, by reason of the Sicyonians; who thinking thereby to haue made themselves free, were soone after vanquished in battaile by Craseippolis, Alexanders wife, a discreet and valiant Lady. Shee in reuenge of her husbands death, crucified thirtie of the Citizens taken in fight; and hauing by feueritie taught them obedience, did afterwards continue her Armie in good order, and gouerned those places that shee held, with the commendation of her Subjects and Neighbours.

§. IIII.

The Etolians rise against Cassander in fauour of Antigonus, and are beaten. A fleet and land-armie of Antigonus, viterly defeated by Ptolomies Lieutenant. In what termes the warre stood at this time. Antigonus drawes neerer to Greece.

Antigonus, when he found, that with so much money he had only bought an enemy, began to raise troubles to Cassander and his other aduersaries in Greece, by stirring vp the Etolians against them; Likewise he laboured to winne to his partie the Ilands in the Greeke Seas, by whose assistance hee might be the better able to deale with Ptolomie, that greatly preuailed by reason of his strong fleet. But neither of these attempts had the successe which he expected. The Etolians, a factious Nation, & alwaies enuying the greatnesse of their Neighbours, were often in commotion, but so, that commonly their gaines equalled not their losses. Cassander wanne some of their own Countrie; fortified the Acarnanians against them, and compelled Glaucias, King of the Illyrians, whom hee vanquished in battaile, to forsake their side, and binde himselfe to beare no Armes against Cassanders friends.

On the other side, as many pettie Ilands were drawne to ioyne with Antigonus: so the fleet of the Rhodians vnder Theodatus, who was Admirall to Antigonus, passing along the coast of Asia towards Cyprus, with an Armie vnder conduct of Perilaus marching on the shore for mutuall assistance, was quite ouerthrowne by Ptolomies Nauie. Polychytus, who in Ptolomies behalfe had bene sent into Peloponnesus against Alexander, finding no need of his seruice in that Countrie, because Alexander was come ouer to their side, returned homewards, and by the way heard of the course which these Antigonians held, whom he very cunningly surprised. Heerode with his Fleet behinde a Cape, which the enemies were to double; his Land-forces he placed in ambush, whereinto Perilaus falling was taken prisoner, with many of his men, and many were slaine, making little resistance. Theodatus the Admirall perceiuing this, made all haste to help his fellowes that were on Land, but whilst he with all his Fleet were intentiue onely to that businesse, Polychytus appeared at their backs; who as soone as he perceiued their disorder, hastened about the Cape, and charging them behinde, suffered not one of them to escape him. These ill tidings caused Antigonus to deale with Ptolomie about some composition. First, he sent Embassadors; afterwards they met in person. But Antigonus would not yeeld vnto the demands of Ptolomie: so the parlie was vaine.

Hitherto each part seemed to haue indifferently sped in the warre, and thereby to haue equall cause of hope and feare. This late victorie with the good successe of his affaires in Cyprus, did seem to make amends to Ptolomie for his losses in Syria. Likewise the reuolt of Alexander from Antigonus did equal the Confederacy, made betweene the Etolians and him; as also those pettie skirmishes, that had bene in Asia the lesse, to Antigonus his aduantage, were sufficiently recompensed by others of like regard, but aduerser to him, and by the troubles brought vpon his estates in those parts by the two Cassanders.

Contrariwise, Antigonus valued the losse of his men, monie, and shippes, no otherwise than as the paring of his nailes, that were left long enough, and would easily grow againe; but the enlargment of his Territorie by addition of Syria, hee prized at a higher rate, as if thereby he had fed vpon a limbe of Ptolomie his enemy, and strengthened the body of his owne Empire. Concerning other accidents, whereof the good were hitherto sufficient to counterpoyze the bad, he meant to proceed as occasion should direct, which commonly is not long wanting to them, that want no monie.

That which most molested him, was the attempts of his enemies vpon Asia the lesse; wherein though as yet they had gotten little, yet had he caused feare, lest the people being tied vnto him by no bond of allegiance, might vpon small occasion reuolt from him, to men of as honourable reputation as he himselfe. To preuent this, and to be neerer to Greece, he held it expedient for him to be there in person, where his affaires did seeme to prosper the worse, by reason of his absence. Therefore he left part of his Armie in Syria vnder his sonne Demetrius, to whom being then but two and twenty yeeres old, hee appointed many ancient Captaines or assistants, or rather as Directors: the rest hee carried with him into Phrygia, where he meant to winter.

How Lyfimachus and Cassander vanquished some enemies, raised against them by Antigonus. The good successe of Antigonus in Asia and Greece: with the rebellion of many Cities against Cassander.

He comming of Antigonus into those parts, wrought a great alteration in the proceesse of his businesse thereabouts. For his enemies had short leiture to thinke vpon molesting him in Asia: they themselves were held ouer-hardly to their owne worke on Europe side. Seuthes a King of the Thracians, ioyning with some Townes that rebelled against Lyfimachus, brought also the bordering Scythians into the quarrell. All these relied vpon Antigonus, who was to helpe them with mony and other aide. The Etolians likewise tooke courage, and rose against Cassander, hauing Aacides, lately restored to the Kingdome of Epirus, their assistant. But Lyfimachus gaue vnto his Rebels no time to confirme themselves. Hee sodainely presented himselfe before two of the Cities that had rebelled, and compelled them by feare to returne vnto their former dutie. Hee fought a battaile with the Scythians, and wilde Thracians, and draue them out of the Countrie. Finally, hee ouercame Seuthes; and following the heare of his victorie, slew Pausanias in battaile, whom Antigonus had sent ouer with an Armie; and all his men hee did either put to ransome, or fill vp with them his owne Bands. The like successe had Philip, Cassanders Lieutenant, against the Etolians. For hee wasted their Countrie; fought with the Epirotes, that came to helpe them; and after the victory, fought againe with their forces ioynd in one, ouerthrowing them, and killing Aacides that vnfortunate King. Finally, hee diaue the Etolians out of most of their Countrie, and forced them to seeke their safety among the wilde Mounrains. Of the Epirotes hee sent as prisoners to Cassander, the principall authors of the Kings restitution, and of the present Varre.

Yet these actions required some time, and wearied Antigonus his aduersaries with painefull trauaile; after which they remained onely sauers. Antigonus himselfe at faire leisure, wanne all Caria the whilst, and sent Armies into Peloponnesus, and other parts of Greece, bestowing liberty vpon all the Cities hee rooke out of Cassanders hands. The whole Countrie of Peloponnesus (excepting Sicyon and Corinth) with the Ile of Eubaea, and many places of the firme Land, were by those meanes wonne to be his in true and vehemēt affection, readie to doe or suffer any thing for him that had made so euident a demonstration of his readinesse, to giue them the libertie in dedde, which others had promised in idle words. Many States desirous of the same benefite, would faine haue shewed their good will; but they were kept in by Cassanders Garrisons, who was too wise to trust them loose. Therefore Antigonus made shew as if hee would passe ouer into Macedon: by which terror hee forced Cassander to repaire thither in all haste, with the best of his strength, leauing many good Townes of Greece so weakelie guarded, that well they might take courage to helpe themselves, if any forraine succour appeared. The aide which they desired was not long wanting. The Lieutenant of Antigonus, taking the aduantage of Cassanders departure, entred the Countrie; draue his Garrisons out of diuers Cities; forced the Gouvernour of Athens to enter into league with their Lord; wanne the Citadell of Thebes, and set the people at libertie. This last action was somewhat remarkable. For Thebes had not long before bene raised out of her olde ruines by the meere power of Cassander; of which act he was accused by Antigonus, as if it had bene some hainous crime. Yet now the same Antigonus winneth the Citie, and the loue of the Inhabitants, onely by expelling him that was their Founder. So much are men readier to thanke the Increaser, than the Author of their good; and rather to looke forward vpon those hopes, which vainly they extend beyond all measure, than backward vpon their miserable nullitie, that held them vncapable of being any thing.

§. VI.

Victories of Ptolomie by Sea. A great battaile at Gaza, which Ptolomie and Seleucus man, against Demetrius the sonne of Antigonus.

AS the presence or neerenesse of Antigonus gaue life to his affaires in the lower Asia, and Greece; so the designs of his enemies, taking aduantage of his absence, ruined the very foundations of those great works in the Easterne parts, wherewith in the yeere preceding he had ouer-topped them. The Isle of Cyprus, whole Princes wauered betweene contrary affections, inclining one while to Antigonus, another to while faintly regarding their couenant with Ptolomie, was visited by an Egyptian fleet, wherewith Ptolomie, in his owne person easily reduced them to a more settled order, putting some to death, carrying others away prisoners, and leauing a Lieutenant of his owne appointment, Gouverneur of the whole Countrey. With the same fleet hee ranne alongst the Sea-coasts, wasting a great part of Caria and Cilicia, with the spoyle of which he enriched his followers, and returned laden to Cyprus. Demetrius the sonne of Antigonus, hearing frequent reports of the miseries, wherewith his Fathers subiects were oppressed, made all haste out of Syria to the rescue, taking onely his Horse and light-armed foote with him, because the businesse required expedition. But in vaine did hee tire himselfe and his followers, in haste seeking of one, that by lanching out into the deepe, could in a few minutes delude the labour of so many daies, if need had so required. Answerable to the vanitie of this expedition was the successe. For Ptolomie was gone, before Demetrius came into Cilicia. Neither was it certaine, whether hauing lightened his ships of their burthen in Cyprus, he would return vpon those maritime Countreys; or make towards Syria, where his comming was expected. He was indeed gone into Egypt, and there with Seleucus was describing a royall Army, which he leuied with all conuenient speed, for the recouerie of Syria. This was more then Demetrius knew. Therefore hee was faineto choose out of vncertainties the most likelihood, and returne the way that he came, with all his companies, which were fitter for seruice in the open field, than to be bestowed in Garrisons among the Cilicians. Hee had scarce refreshed his Men and Horses in Syria, when the newes arrived of Ptolomies comming with a puissant Armie, to giue him battaile. Heereupon hee called to counsaile his principall friends, to giue him way to the time, and expect some better opportunity in the future: being a yong man, and weakely furnished with meanes to resist such ancient and famous Generalls, as Ptolomie & Seleucus. This counsaile seemed rather to proceed from the cold temper of those aged men that gaue it, than from any necessity growing out of the present businesse. For Demetrius considering himselfe to be the son of Antigonus, and now Generall of his Fathers Armie, thought his own title waighy enough to be laid in ballance against the bare names of those two great Commanders. Neither found he much reason that shuld moue him to distrust his forces, as insufficient. His men were better exercised than the enemies, and promised as much as could be required. Therefore perswading himselfe, that such oddes of number, and of great fame, would rather serue to adorne his victorie, than hinder him in obtaining it, he resolved to put the matter to triall, without expecting the aduantage of more helpe. So animating his Souldiers with hope of spoyle and rewards, he abode the comming of the Enemies at Gaza, with purpose to encounter them, as soone as they had finished their wearisome iourneie ouer the Deserts of Arabia.

Ptolomie and Seleucus issuing out of so rich a Prouince, as Egypt, came so well provided of all necessaries, that their Armie felt not any great grievance of the euill way, when battaile was presented them, which confidently they vnderooke. In all things else they had the ods of Demetrius; of Elephants they were vtterly vnprovided. But how to deale with those beasts they were not ignorant. They had prepared a kinde of Palisado, fastened strongly together with chaines, and sharpened in such a manner, that the Elephants could not seeke to breake vpon it, without receiuing much hurt. The rest of their forces, (which besides that they had aduantage in multitude) were heartened with many fortunate seruices, by them performed that yeere, whilest the enemies had wearied themselves, either with vaine iournies, or long and dulling expectation; they disposed in such order, as best answered to the forme, wherein Demetrius was embattailed. The fight beganne, and was maintained with equall courage, for a long time, each part striving more to win honour, than to satisfie any other passion, as hauing little cause of hatred, or reuenge. But after some continuance, the greater number holding better out, the error of Demetrius, who vpon no necessitie would needes fight a battaile with disaduantage, began to appeare by his losses. Hee had committed himselfe to Fortune, hauing more to lose by her than he could get: but in this fight she was idle, and left all to be decided by strong hands; vnlesse it may be said, that the terror brought vpon his men, by the losse of his Elephants, was bad lucke. Those beasts were in that kinde of warre hardly to be resisted on plaine ground, and therefore at the first they made great spoile amongst Ptolomies men. Afterward seeking to breake through the Palisado, they were forely hurt, and euery one of them taken. This disaster caused the Horsemen of Demetrius to faint. They had laboured hard, and preuailed little, till now perceiuing that all must lye vpon their hands, who were illable to make their owne places good, they began to shrink, and many of them to prouide for their safetie by timely flight, which example the rest quickly followed. When Demetrius had strouen so long in vaine to make his men abide, that he himselfe was likely to be lost; he was faine to giue place to the stronger, making a violent retrait as farre as to Azotus, which was about thirtie miles from the place of battaile. A great part of his cariages was in Gaza, whither some of his company turned aside, hoping to saue such goods, as in haste they could pack vp. This foolish couetousnesse was their destruction, and the losse of the Towne. For whilest they were forgetfull of the danger, had filled the streets with sumpter Horses, and cloyed vp the gates, thronging, some to get in and fetch others, to carry out what they had already laden, Ptolomies Armie brake in without resistance, taking them with their goods and the Citie altogether.

This victory restored vnto Ptolomie the best part of Syria, a Prouince more easie in those times to get, than to keepe; and opened the way vnto all the greatnesse of Seleucus. For betweene Gaza and Phenicia no place offered resistance. In Celossyria and Phenicia, some Townes held out a while, but were soone taken in by Ptolomie. Among these were the great Cities of Tyrus and Sidon; of which Sidon was giuen vp by the Inhabitants; Tyrus by the Garrison, falling to mutinie against their Captaine; who trusting to the strength of it, had made great vaunts; but was pardoned by Ptolomie, and honourably entertained, in respect of his fidelity.

§. VII.

How Seleucus recovered Babylon, and made himselfe Lord of many Countreys, in the highest Asia. The Era of the Kingdom of the Greeces, which began with the Dominion of Seleucus.

WHile Ptolomie followed his businesse with such prosperity, Seleucus tooke leaue of him, and went vp to Babylon, to trie his owne fortune; which he found so fauourable, that recouering first his owne Prouince, he became at length master of the better part of Alexanders purchases.

This expedition of Seleucus was very strange, and full of vnlikelihoods. His traine consisted of no more than eight hundred foote, and two hundred horse, a number too small to haue beene placed as Garrison, in some one of those maine great Cities, against which he carried it into the higher Asia. But little force is needefull, to make way into strong places, for him that already stands possessed of their hearts which dwell within the walls. The name of Seleucus was enough; whom the Babylonians had found so good a Gouverneur, that none of them would finde courage to resist him; but left that worke to Antigonus his owne men, wishing them ill to speede. Some of the Macedonians that were in those Countreys, had the like affection; others made a countenance of warre, which by easie compulsion they left off, and followed new Ensignes. This added courage to the people, who came in apace, and submitted themselves ioyfully to Seleucus. In a defecti-on to generall, it was not a safe course for the Antigonians, to thrust themselves into the Townes of most importance: for euery man of them should haue beene troubled with daily enemies, in his owne lodging. It remained that they should issue forth into the field, and trie the matter by fight. But the treason of one principall man, who revolted to the enemy, with more than a thousand Souldiers following him, so dismayed the rest, that that they did no more than seeke to make good one strong place, wherein were kept the Hostages and Prisoners, that Antigonus held for his security in those quarters. This Castle, belike, they had not fortified in times of leisure, against dangers, that were not then apparent. Seleucus quickly tooke it, and so got the entire possession of Mesopotamia and Babylon.

Antigonus had bestowed in Media and Persia, forces conuenient for defence of those Prouinces, that were the utmost of his Dominion. In the Countries about Euphrates he had not done the like: for his owne great Armie lay betwene them and all enemies. Therefore when the victorie at Gaza had opened vnto Seleucus the way into those parts, hee found little impediment in the rest of his businesse. Having now got ten what he sought, it behooued him to seeke how he might keepe his gettings: for his owne forces were too small, and his friends were ill able to lend him any more. That which his friends could not doe for him, his enemies did. Nicanor, to whom Antigonus had committed his Armie in Media, ioyning vnto himselfe, out of Persia and other Countries, all needefull helpe came, with ten thousand foote, and seauen thousand horse, either to saue all from being lost, or to driue Seleucus out of that which he had won.

Against this power, Seleucus had onely foure hundred horse, and somewhat above three thousand foote, wherewith to oppose himselfe: his large conquest of vnwarlike Nations hauing yeilded him many louing Subiects, but few Souldiers. Therefore when his enemies were neere to the Riuer of Tigris, hee withdrew himselfe from the place where his resistance was expected, into certaine marshes not farre off, wher he lay secretly waiting for some aduantage. Nicanor thought that he had beene fled, and was the lesse carefull in fortifying his campe. In recompence of this vaine securitie, his campe was taken by surpris, the first night of his arriuall; the Satrapa, or Lieutenant of Persia, together with sundry of the Captaines, were slaine, hee himselfe was driuen to flee for his life into the Desarts, and the whole Armie yeilded vnto Seleucus: whose gentle demeanour, after the victory, drew all Media, Sassiana, and the Neighbour Prouinces, to acknowledge him their Lord without any further stroke stricken.

This victory of Seleucus gaue beginning vnto the new stile, of The Kingdome of the Greekes, an accompt much vsed by the Iewes, Chaldeans, Syrians, and other Nations in those parts. I will not make any long disputation about the first yeere of this Æra. The authoritie of that great Astrologer Ptolomie, from which there is no appeale, makes it plaine, that the five hundred and nineteenth yeere of Nabonassar, was the fourescore and two yeere of this accompt. Other inference hereupon is needefesse, than that note of the learned Gauricus, That the first of these yeeres was reckoned complete, at Babylon, together with the end of foure hundred thirtie and eight yeeres after Nabonassar. With the obseruation of the Saturne, recorded by Ptolomie, agrees (as it ought) the calculation of Burning; finding the same Planet to haue beene so placed in the signe of Virgo, as the Chaldeans had obserued it, in the same yeere; which was from Nabonassar the five hundred and nineteenth; from Seleucus the fourescore and two yeere; and the last of the hundred thirtie and seauenth Olympiad. These obseruations of the Celestiall bodies, are the surest markes of time: from which he that wilfully varies, is inexcusable. As for such occurrences in Historie, and the yeeres of succeeding Princes (that are not seldome ambiguous, by reason of vnremembered factions) if they seeme to be here against, it is not greatly materiall. Yet thus much is worthy of note; that these yeeres of the Greekes were not reckoned in all Countries from one beginning; as plainly appears in the difference of one yeere, that is found betwene actions, related by the severall Authors of the two Bookes of the Machabees, who follow diuers accompts. He that shall adhere to the time defined by Ptolomie, may apply the other supputations thereunto, as being no farther from it, than a yeeres distance.

§. VIII.

How Ptolomie lost all he wonne in Syria. What the causes were of the quiet obedience, performed vnto the Macedonians, by those that had beene subiect vnto the Persian Empire. Of diuers petty enterprizes, taken in hand by Antigonus and Demetrius, with ill successe.

IN a happy houre did Seleucus aduenture, to goe vp to Babylon, with so few men as his friend could then well spare: for had he staid longer vpon hope of getting more Souldiers, Ptolomie could haue spared him none at all. Demetrius the sonne of Antigonus, hauing lost the battaile at Gaza, receiued from Ptolomie all his owne goods, his Pages, and Seruants, in free gift, and therewithall a courteous message, to this effect: That no personall hatred was the ground of this Warre, which he and his Confederates held with Antigonus; but onely tearmes of honour, wherein they would seeke to right themselves after such manner, that other friendly Offices, without reference to the quarrell, should not be forgotten.

This Noble dealing of Ptolomie, did kindle in Demetrius an earnest desire of requiting him, with some as braue liberalitie. Which to effect, he gathered together the remainder of his broken troups, drew as many as could be spared, out of the Garrisons in Cilicia, or other Prouinces thereabouts, and aduertising his Father of his misfortune, besought him to send a new supply, wherewith he might redeeme his honour lost. Antigonus vpon the first newes of this ouerthrow, had said, That the victory which Ptolomie wan vpon a beardless Boy, should be taken from him by bearded men: yet vpon desire that his sonne, whom he tenderly loued, should amend his owne reputation, he was content to make a stand in Phrygia. Ptolomie hearing of Demetrius his preparations, did nevertheless follow his owne businesse in Calosyria; thinking it enough to spend part of his Armie vnder Cilles his Lieutenant, against the remnant of those, that had beene already vanquished, when Cilles too much vnderualued the power of such an Enemy. Hee thought that this young Gallant, hauing lately saued his life by flight, would now be more carefull of hauing a faire way at his backe, than aduenturous in setting further forward, then vrgent reason should prouoke him. In this confidence he passed on without all feare; as one that were already Master of the field, and should meete with none, that would issue out of their places of strength, to make resistance. When Demetrius was informed of this carelesse march, he tooke the lightest of his Armie, and made his iournie with such diligence, one whole night, that early in the morning, he came vpon Cilles vnexpected, and was on the suddaine, without any battaile, Master of his Campe: taking him alive, with his Souldiers, and their carriages all at once.

This exploit serued not onely to repaire the credit of Demetrius, which his losse at Gaza had almost ruined: but further it enabled him, to recompence the bountie of Ptolomie, with equall fauour, in restoring to him Cilles, with many other of his friends, accompanied with rich presents. But neither was Ptolomie so weakened by this losse, nor Demetrius so emboldened by his victory, that any matter of consequence therupon ensued. For Demetrius feared the comming of Ptolomie, and therefore he fortified himselfe in places of aduantage: Ptolomie on the other side was loth to engage himselfe in an enterprize, wherein he might perceiue, that if the comming of Antigonus found him entangled, he should either be driuen to make a shamefull retrait, or a dangerous aduenture of his whole estate, in hope of not much more than already he possessed.

Antigonus, indeede, was nothing slow in his way towards Syria; whither hee made all haste, not so much to relieue his sonne, as to embrace him. For he reioyced exceedingly, that the young man had so well acquitted himselfe, and being left to his owne aduice, performed the office of a good Commander. Wherefore to increase the reputation of this late victorie, he brought such forces, as might serue to reconquer all Syria: meaning, that the honour of all, should be referred vnto the good foundation, layed by his sonne; whom from this time forwards, he employed in matters of greatest importance.

Ptolomie had now lesse reason to encounter with Antigonus, than before his comming to haue assailed the Campe of Demetrius. Yet he made it a matter of consultation; as if he

he had dared more than he meant. But all his Captaines aduised him to retire into Egypt, alleging many good arguments to that purpose: which they might well perceiue to be agreeable to his owne intent, by his propounding that course, not without remembrance of the good successe against Perdiccas, in the like defensue warre. So he departed out of Syria, preserving his honour; as being rather led by mature deliberation, than any suddaine passion of feare: and he departed at faire leisure, not onely carrying his treasures along with him, but staying to dismantle some principall Cities, that he thought most likely to trouble him in the future. All the Countie that he left at his backe, fell presently to Antigonus, without putting him to the trouble of winning it by pieces: so easie was it in those times, for the Captain of a strong Armie, to make himselfe Lord of a great Province.

We may iustly wonder, that these Kingdomes of Syria, Media, Babylon, and many other Nations, (which the victory of Alexander had ouer-run, with so hastie a course, as gaue him not leisure to take any good view of them) were so easily held not onely by himselfe, but by the Captaines of his Armie after him. The hot contentions for superiority betwene the King of Israel, and those of Damascus; betwene Egypt, and Babylon; Babylon, and Nineue; the Persians, and many Countie; argue a more manly temper, to haue once bene in those people; which are now so patient of a foraine yoke, that like Sheepe or Oxen, they suffer themselves to be distributed, fought for, won, lost, and againe recovered, by contentious Masters; as if they had no title to their owne heads, but were borne to follow the fortune of the Macedonians. This will appeare the more strange, if we shall consider, how the feuerall States of Greece (many of which had neuer possessed so large Dominion, as might cause their Spirits to swell beyond their ability) did greedily embrace all occasions of libertie: and how these proud Conquerours were glad to offer it, desiring to haue them rather friends than seruants, for feare of further inconuenience.

It must therefore be noted, that most of these Countie had alwayes bene subiect vnto the rule of Kings, or pettie Lords, whom the Babylonians and Persians long since had rooted out, and held them in such bondage, that few of them knew any other Law, than the command of foraine Masters. This had vterly taken from them all remembrance of home-borne Princes, and incorporated them into the great body of the Persian Empire: so that wanting within themselves all soveraigne power, or high authoritie, the life and spirit of euery Estate, they lay as dead, and were bereaued of motion, when that Kingdome fell, whereof they lately had bene members.

Why the Persian Satrapes, or Princes of that Empire, did not when Darius was taken from them, as the Macedonian Captaines, after the death of Alexander, strue to lay hold vpon those Provinces, which had many ages been subiect vnto them, & scarce foureyers in quiet possession of their enemies; or why at least they contended not (when the terrible name of that great Conquerour did cease to affright them) to get their shares among his followers, if not wholly to dispossesse them of their new purchases: it is a question, wherein, who is not satisfied, may finde no lesse reason to suspect the Historie, than authoritie to confirme it. For we seldome reade, that any small Kingdome, preuailling against a farre greater, hath made so entire a conquest, in the compasse of ten yeeres, as left vnto the vanquished no hope of recouerie, nor meanes to rebell; especially when such disorders, or rather vter confusion hath ensued, by the furie of ciuill warre among the Victors.

The cause why the Macedonians held so quietly the Persian Empire, is well set downe by Machiauell; and concerns all other Kingdomes, that are subiect vnto the like forme of Government: the summe whereof is this; Wherefoeuer the Prince doth hold all his Subjects vnder the condition of slaues, there is the conquest easie, and soone assured: Where ancient Nobility is had in due regard, there is it hard to winne all, and harder to keepe that which is wonne. Examples of this are the Turkish Empire, and the Kingdome of France. If any Inuader should preuaile so farre vpon Turkie, that the great Sultan and his Children (for brethren he vseth not to suffer aliue) were taken or slaine: the whole Empire would quickly be wonne, and easily kept, without any danger of rebellion. For the Bassas, how great soeuer they may seeme, are meere slaues; neither is there in all that large Dominion, any one man, whose personall regard could get the people to follow him in such an attempt, where in hope of priuate gaine, should not counteruaile counteruaile all apparent matter of feare. Contrariwise, in France, it were not enough for him that would make a conquest, to get into his hands the King and his Children; though he further got the better part of the Countie, and were by farre the strongest in the field. For, besides the Princes of the Royall blood, there are in that Kingdome store of great men; who are mightie in their feuerall Countie, and haue certaine Royalties and Principalities of their owne, are able to raise Warre, in all quarters of the Realme; whereunto the remembrance of their owne ancient Families, and long continued Nobilitie, will alwayes stirre vp and inflame them: so that vntill euery one piece were won, and euery one (in endlesse worke) of the chiefe Nobilitie, brought vnder or destroyed, the victorie were not compleat, nor well assured. It is true, that such power of the Nobilitie, doth often-times make way for an Inuader; to whom the discontentments of a few can easily make a faire entrance. But such assistants are not so easily kept, as they are gotten: for they looke to be satisfied at full, in all their demands; and haue what they would, they soone returne to their old allegiance, vpon condition to keepe what they haue, vnlesse they be daily hired with new rewards: wherein it is hard to please one man, without offending another as good as himselfe. The Turke, on the other side, needs not feare any perill, that might arise from the discontented Spirits of his principall men. The greatest mischiefe that any of them could worke against him, were the betraying of some frontier Towne, or the wilfull losse of a battaile: which done, the Traitor hath spent his sting, and must either flye to the enemy, whereby he loseth all that he formerly did hold; or else, in hope of doing some further harme, he must aduenture to excuse himselfe vnto his Master, who seldome forgives the Captaine, that hath not striven by desperate valour against misfortune. As for making head, or arming their followers against the great Sultan, and so ioyning themselves vnto any Inuader; it is a matter not to be doubted: for none of them haue any followers or dependants at all, other than such, as are subiect vnto them, by vertue of their Offices and Commissions. Now as this base condition of the principall men, doth leaue vnto them no meanes, whereby to oppose themselves against the flourishing estate of their Prince; so would it weaken both their power and their courage in giuing him assistance, if aduersitie should make them stand in neede of them. For there is scarce any one among the Turke Bassas, or provinciall Gouvernours, that knowes either from whence he was brought, or from whom descended, nor any one among them, that by the losse and vter ruine of the Turkish Empire, can lose any foote of his proper inheritance; and it is the proper inheritance of the subiect, which is also a Kingdome vnto him, which makes him fight with an armed heart against the Conquerer, who hath no other deuice painted on his Ensigne, than the picture of slauey.

As is the Turkish Empire, so was the Persian, void of libertie in the Subjects, and vterly destitute of other Nobilitie, than such as depended vpon meere fauour of the Prince. Some indeede there were of the Royall blood, and others, descended from the Princes that ioynd with Darius, the Sonne of Hystaspes, in oppressing the Magi: these were men of reputation in Persia; but their reputation consisted onely in their Pedigree, and their safetie in not meddling with affaires of State, which made them little esteemed. In what small account these Persian Princes were held, it may appeare by this, that the Kings Vncles, Cousin Germans, and Brethren, were called by the Kings, Their Slaues, and so did stile themselves, in speaking vnto these great Monarchs. That vpon euery light occasion of displeasure they were handled as Slaues; it is easie to be discerned, in that example of crueltie, practised by Xerxes vpon his owne brother Masistes, which hath bene formerly noted, in place more conuenient. As for the Satrapes, or Gouvernours of the Provinces, it is needefulle to cite examples, prouing them to haue bene meere slaues: it may suffice, that their heads were taken from them at the Kings will; that is, at the will of those Women and Eunuches, by whom the King was governed.

To this want of Nobilitie in Persia, may be added the generall want of libertie conuenient among the people: a matter no lesse auailable, in making easie and sure the conquest of a Nation, then is the cause assigned by Machiauel. For as Aesop his Assie did not care to run from the enemies, because that was not possible, that they should load him with heauier burthens, then his Master caused him daily to beare: so the Nations, that endure the worst vnder their owne Princes, are not greatly fearefull of a foraine yoke, Nor

Nor will be hastie to shake it off, if by experience they finde it more light, than was that whereunto they had beene long accustomed. This was it that made the Gascones beare such faithfull affection to the Kings of England; for that they gouerned more mildly than the French: this enlarged the Venetian iurisdiction in Lombardie; for the Townes that they wan, they wan out of the hands of Tyrannous oppreßours: and this did cause the Macedonians, with other Nations, that had beene subiect vnto the posteritie of Alexanders followers, to serue the Romans patiently, if not willingly; for that by them they were eased of many burthens, which had beene imposed vpon them by their owne Kings.

So that of this tamenesse, which we finde in those that had beene subiects of the Per-10 sian Kings, the reasons are apparent. Yet some of these there were, that could not so easily be contained in good order by the Macedonians: for they had not indeede beene absolutely conquered by the Persian. Such were the Sogdians, Bactrians, and other Nations about the Caspian Sea. Such also were the Arabians bordering vpon Syria: against whom Antigonus sent part of his Armie; thinking therewith to bring them vnder; or rather to get a rich bootie. The Captaines that he sent, fell vpon the Nabathians, at such time as they were busied in a great Mart; wherein they traded with the more remote Arabians, for Myrr, Frankincense, and other such commodities. All or most of these rich wares, together with five hundred talents of siluer, and many prisoners, the Macedonians laid hold vpon: for their comming was suddaine and v unexpected. But ere they could 20 recouer Syria, the Nabathians ouertook them, & finding them wearie with long marches, made such a slaughter, that of foure thousand foote, and sixe hundred horse, onely little horse escaped. To reuenge this losse, Demetrius was set out with a greater power: yet all in vaine; for he was not resisted by any Armie, but by the naturall defence of a valde Wildernesse, lacke of water, and of all things necessary. Therefore he was glad to make peace with them; wherein he lost not much honour: for they craued it, and gaue him presents. Returning from the Nabathians, he viewed the Lake Asphaltites, whence he conceived hope of great profit that might be raised, by gathering the Sulphure. With this good husbandrie of his sonne, Antigonus was well pleased, and appointed mento the worke: but they were slaine by the Arabians, and so that hope vanished. 30

These pettie enterprises, with the ill successe accompanying them, had much impaired the good aduantage against Ptolomie: when the newes of Seleucus his victories in the high Countries, marred all together. For neither was the losse of those great and wealthy Provinces, a matter to be neglected, neither was it safe to transport the warre into the parts beyond Euphrates, whereby Syria and the lower Asia should haue beene exposed, to the danger of ill-affected Neighbours. A middle course was thought the best; and Demetrius, with fifteene thousand foote and three thousand horse, was sent against Seleucus. These forces being sent away, Antigonus did nothing, and his sonne did lesse. For Seleucus was then in Media; his Lieutenants about Babylon withdrew themselves from necessitie of fight; some places they fortified and kept; Demetrius could hold nothing that he got. 40 without setting in Garrison more men than he could spare, neither did he get much; and therefore was faine to set out the brauery of his expedition, by burning and spoiling the Countrey; which he did thereby the more alienate, and as it were acknowledge to belong vnto his enemy, who thenceforth held it as his owne assured.

Antigonus had laid vpon his sonne a peremptoric commandement, to returne vnto him at a time prefixed: reasonably thinking (as may seeme) that in such an vnstedfast state of things, either the Warre might be ended, by the furie of the first brunt; or else it would be vaine to striue against all difficulties likely to arise, where want of necessities should frustrate the valour, that by strength of time was like to become lesse terrible to the Enemy. Demetrius therefore leauing behinde him five thousand foote, and a thousand horse, 50 rather to make shew of continuing the warre, than to effect much, where himselfe, with greater forces could doe little more than nothing, forsooke the enterprise, and went backe to his Father.

A general peace made and broken. How all the house of Alexander was destroyed.

These ambitious heads, hauing thus wearied themselves with vneffectuall tra-uaille, in seeking to get more then any one of them could hold; were contented at length to come to an agreement: wherein it was concluded, that each of them should hold quietly, that which at the present he had in possession. As no priuate hatred, but meere desire of Empire had moued them to enter into the warre; so was it no friendly reconciliation, but onely a dulnesse growing vpon the slow aduancement of their seuerall hopes, that made them willing to breathe a while, till occasion might better serue to fight againe.

Besides that maine point, Of retaining the Provinces which euery man held, there were two Articles of the peace, that gaue a faire, but a false colour, to the businesse; That the sonne of Alexander by Roxane, should be made King, when he came to full age; and, That all the Isles of Greece should be set at liberty. The aduancement of yong Alexander to his Fathers Kingdome, seemes to haue beene a matter, forceably extorted from Antigonus; in whom was discovered a purpose, to make himselfe Lord of all. But this, indeede, more nearly touched Cassander. For in his custody was the yong Prince and his Mother: neither did he keepe them in sort answerable to their degree; but as close prisoners, taken in that warre, wherein they had seene the old Queene Olympias taken and murdered, that sought to put them in possession of the Empire. The mutuall hatred and feare betweene them, rooted in these grounds, of iniuries done, and reuenge expected, vpon this conclusion of peace, grew vp faster than any time before, in the heart of Cassander: who saw the Macedonians turne their fauourable expectation, towards the sonne of their late renowned King.

All this, either little concerned Antigonus; or tended greatly to his good. The yong Prince must first haue possession of Macedon: whereby Cassander should be reduced to his poore office, of Captaine ouer a thousand men, if not left in worse case. As for them that held Provinces abroad, they might either doe as they had done vnder Arideus; or better, as being better acquainted with their owne strength. He in the meane time, by his readi-nesse to acknowledge the true Heire, had freed himselfe from that ill-fauoured imputation, of seeking to make himselfe Lord of all that Alexander had gotten.

The like aduantage had he in that Article, of restoring the Greeks to their liberty. This libertie had hitherto beene the subiect of much idle discourse: but it neuer tooke effect.
Antigonus held scarce any Towne of theirs, Cassander occupied most of the Countrey: which if he should set free, he must be a poore Prince; if not, there was matter enough of quarrell against him, as against a Disturber of the common peace.

In the meane season, the Countries lying betwene Euphrates and the Greece seas, together with a great Armie, and money enough to entertaine a greater, might serue to hold vp the credit of Antigonus, and to raise his hopes, as high as euer they had beene.

With much disaduantage doe many men contend, against one that is equall to them all in puissance, Cassanders friends had left him in an ill case; but he could not doe with-all: for where euery one mans helpe is necessary to the warre, there may any one make his owne peace; but no one can stand out alone, when all the rest are weary. The best was, that he knew all their affections: which tended to no such end as the becomming Subiects vnto any man; much lesse to the sonne of an Asiaticke woman, of whom they had long since refused to heare mention. Therefore he tooke a short course, and caused both the childe and his Mother to be slaine: freeing thereby himselfe in a trice, from the dangerous necessity of yeelding vp his gouernment, which he must haue done when the childe had come to age. Roxane was a Lady of singular beauty, which was perhaps the cause, why Perdiccas desired to haue her sonne, being as yet vnborne, proclaimed Heire to the great Alexander. Immediately vpon the death of Alexander, she had vsed the fauour (if it were not loue) of Perdiccas, to the satisfying of her owne bloody malice, vpon Sta-tira, the Daughter of King Darius, whom Alexander had likewise married according to the custome of those Countries, wherein pluralitie of wiues is held no crime. For hauing by a counterfeit letter, in Alexanders name, gotten this poore Lady into her hands, she did, by assistance of Perdiccas, murder her and her Sister, and threw their bodies

bodies into a Well, causing it to be filled vp with earth. But now, by Gods iust vengeance, were she & her sonne made away, in the like secret fashion; euen at such time, as the nere approaching hope of a great Empire had made her life, after a wearisome imprisonment, grow dearer vnto her than it was before.

The fact of Cassander was not so much detested in outward shew; as inwardly it was pleasing vnto all the rest of the Princes. For now they held themselves free Lords, of all that they had vnder them; fearing none other change of their estates, than such as might arise by chance of warre; wherein euery one perswaded himselfe of successe, rather better than worse. Hereupon all of them (except Lysimachus and Seleucus, that had worke enough at home) began to rowze themselves: as if now the time were come, for each man to improue his owne stocke. Antigonus his Lieutenants were busie in Peloponnesus, and about Hellepont: while their Master was carefull in following other, and some greater matters that were more secretly to be handled. He pretended the liberty of Greece: yet did the same argument minister vnto Ptolomie, matter of quarrell, against both him and Cassander; Ptolomie complaining (as if he had taken the matter deeply to heart) that Antigonus had put Garrisons into some Townes, which ought, in faire dealing to be set at liberty. Vnder colour of redressing this enormitie, he sent an Armie into Cilicia, where he wan foure Townes, and soone after lost them, without much labour of his owne or his enemies.

After this putting to Sea with a strong Fleet, he ran along the coast of Asia, winning many places: and in that voyage allured vnto him a nephew of Antigonus (a good Commander, but discontented with the ill requitall of his seruices) whom finding shortly, as false to himselfe as he had beene to his owne Vncle, he was faine to put to death. But in doing these things, his desire to set the Greekes at liberty, appeared not so plaine, as he wished that it should: for their case was no way bettered, by his molesting Antigonus in Asia. Therefore to get the loue of that valiant Nation, He made at the last an expedition into Greece it selfe: where hauing set free some little Ilands, and landed in Peloponnesus, he raised to great an expectation of finishing the long desired worke, that Craesipolis, the Widdow of Alexander, *Polyperchon*s sonne, gaue vp into his hands the Townes of Sicyon and Corinth.

Ptolomie had conceived a vaine belife, that the Greekes emboldened by his countenance and assistance, would all of them take heart, and rise vp in armes: whereby with little labour, their liorty might be gotten; and he be acknowledged as Author of this immortal benefit. But long seruitude had well nere extinguished the ancient valour of that Nation: and their ill fortune, in many likely attempts to recover freedom, had soired their spirits, that they would no more stirre in pursuit thereof; but fate idly still, as wishing it to fall into their mouths.

The Lacedamonians, about these times, began to fortifie their Towne with wals; trusting no longer in their vertue (for both it, and the discipline that vpheld it were too much impaired) that had beene a wall to their Towne and Territorie.

The Athenians were become as humble seruants, as they had beene, in times past, insolent Masters: erecting as many statues in honour of Demetrius Phalereus, as there were daies in the yeere. This Demetrius was now their Gouvernor, and he gouerned them with much moderation: but in spight of their hearts, as being set ouer them by Cassander. By this base temper of the principall Cities, it is easie to gather, how the rest of the Countie stood affected. Ptolomie could not get them to set their helping hands to theirown good, and to furnish him with the promised supplies of monie and victuals. Credible it is, that he had a true meaning to deliuer them from thraldome; as iudging the commoditie that would arise by annexing them to his party, a matter of more weight, than the losse that Cassander should receiue thereby, who could hardly retaine them, if once Antigonus tooke the worke in hand. But when he found such difficulty in the businesse, he changed his purpose: and renewing his former friendship with Cassander, he retained Sicyon, and Corinth in his owne possession.

Before the coming of Ptolomie into Greece, Cassander had beene held occupied with very much worke. For (besides his paines taken in warres among barbarous Princes) hee found meanes to allure vnto himselfe, the Lieutenants of Antigonus, that were in Peloponnesus, and about Hellepont: making his owne aduantage, of their discoments. By the like skilfull practice, Hee freed himselfe from a greater danger, those those murders which he had committed seeme the lesse odious, by teaching his enemies to doe the like. Old Polyperchon, that had made so great a stirre in the reigne of Arideus, did after the death of Roxane and her Childe, enter againe vpon the Stage: leading in his hand another sonne of the great Alexander, and meaning to place him in his Fathers Throne.

The name of this yong Prince was Hercules: he was begotten on Barsine, the Daughter of Artabazus a Persian; but had beene lesse esteemed than the sonne of Roxane, either for that his Mother was held no better than a Concubine, or else perhaps, in regard of the fauour which Perdiccas, and after him Olympias, did beare vnto Roxane. At this time, the death of his brother had moued such compassion, and regard of his being Alexanders onely liuing childe, had procured vnto him such good will, that the demand which Polyperchon made in his behalfe, was deemed very iust and honourable. There were indeed more hearts then hands, that ioyned with this yong Prince: yet wanted he not sufficient strength of hands, if the heart of him that least ought, had not beene most false. Cassander had raised an Armie, to withstand his enrie into Macedon: but little trust could he repose in that Armie, whose wishes he perceiued to be with Hercules. Therefore he assailed Polyperchon himselfe, with gifts and promises, wherewith at length he preuailed so far, that the old Villaine was contented to murder his Pupill; choosing rather with many curses, and soule dishonour, to take the offered Lordship of Peloponnesus, and Commander of an Armie, than to purchase a Noble fame with dangerous trauaile, in maintaining his faith, vnto both his dead and liuing Soueraignes.

Antigonus had not all this while beene asleepe; though his losses were hitherto the chiefe wraethes, of his hauing beene a stirrer in these commotions. He thought it enough for him at the present, to retaine his owne: and therefore tooke order for the recouerie of those places, which Ptolomie had taken paines to winne. As for the rest, it no way grieved him, to see Cassander incur the generall hatred of men by committing those murders; of which the profit was like to redound vnto him that was the most powerfull: or to see Polyperchon and Ptolomie sweat, in a busie warre against Cassander. If they would haue continued their quarrels, he could well haue afforded them leisure, and haue thought the time well spent, in beholding their contentions. For he was thoroughly perswaded, that when the rest had wearied themselves in vaine with long strife, his armies and treasures, wherein he exceeded them all, would bring all vnder. According to these haughtie conceits, he demeaned himselfe among his followers; looking big vpon them, and like a King before his time. This was it that caused so many of them to reuolt from him: but it was no great losse to be forsaken by those that looked with enuious eyes vpon that fortune whercon their owne should haue depended. Against this enrie of his owne men, and the malice of others, Antigonus busily sought a remedy, such as was like to giue him a goodly title to the whole Empire.

Cleopatra, Sister vnto the great Alexander, lay for the most part in Sardes; whom he had a great desire to take to wife. This his desire was not without good hope: for howeuer she discourred much vnwillignesse thereunto, yet was she in his power, and might therefore be entreated, were it onely for feare of being enforced. But it was not his purpose, to get her by compulsiue means: either because his fancie being an old man, was not ouer-violent; or rather because his ambition, whereunto all his affections had reference, could haue made small vse of her, by doing such apparent wrong. She had beene married vnto Alexander King of Epirus, after whose death she came to her brother in Asia; hoping belike, to finde a new husband in his Campe. But neither any of those braue Captaines, that were, in times following, so hot in loue with her, durst then aspire vnto her marriage: nor did her brother, full of other cares, trouble himselfe with providing her of an husband. She therefore, being a lustie widow, suffered her blood, so farr to preuaile against her honour, that she supplied the want of an husband by entertainment of Paramours. Alexander hearing of this, turned it to a iest: saying, that she was his sister, and must be allowed this libertie, as her portion of the Empire. When by his death, the Empire lay in a manner, void, and the portion due to her therein, grew, in mens opinion, greater than it had beene: then did many seeke to obtaine her, while she her selfe desired onely a proper man, with whom she might leade a merry life. To this purpose did she inuite Leontatus vnto her; who made great haste; but was cut off by death, ere he came to her presence. Now at the last, after long tarrying, she had her choise of all the great Commanders: Antigonus, Ptolomie, Lysimachus, and Cassander, being all her earnest wooers. All these (Antigonus excepted) had wiues already; Ptolomie had many wiues, and many Concubines, whom he respected as much as his wiues, being noted of too much dotage in that kinde. This hindred not his suite: peradventure it aduanced it, by giuing to Cleopatra, some hope of mutuall toleration. To him therefore she bequeathed her selfe, and was taking her iournie from Sardes towards him; when Antigonus his Deputie in that Citie, made her to stay, vntill his Masters further pleasure should be knowne. Antigonus had now a Wolfe by the eares: he neither could well hold her, nor durst let her goe. Shee would not be his wife; hee had none honest pretence to force her; and to keepe her prisoner, had been the way, by which he might haue incurred a generall hatred, lasting perhaps beyond her life; as the course taken by Cassander against Roxane (a Lady lesse respected than Alexanders owne sister) did well testifie. Therefore he thought it the wisest way to procure her death: for to let any other enioy the commoditie of so faire a title to the Kingdome, it was no part of his meaning. To this purpose he sent instructions to the Governour of Sardes, willing him in any case to doe it secretly. So the fact was committed, and certaine women about her put in trust with the murder: which women afterwards were put to death, as malicious conspirers against the life of that good Lady. So was Antigonus freed from blame, at the least, in his owne opinion: but the world was lesse foolish, than to be so deluded. How the murder was detected, we neede not aske: for seldome is that bloody crime vn-revealed, and neuer so ill smothered, as when great persons are the Authors.

Thus was the whole race of Philip and Alexander the Great extinguished, and it was extinguished by the hands of such as thought vpon nothing lesse than the execution of Gods iustice, due vnto the cruelty of these powerfull, but mercilesse Princes. Wherefore the ambitious frames, erected by these Tyrants, vpon so wicked foundations of innocent blood, were soone after cast downe, ouer-whelming themselves or their children, with the ruines, as the sequele will declare.

How Demetrius, the sonne of Antigonus, gaue liberty to Athens, expelling the Garrisons of Cassander out of those parts. The immoderate honour decreed by the Athenians to Antigonus and Demetrius.

One being left aliue, that had any title to the Kingdome; it stood with good reason, that they which were Lords of the Prouinces, acknowledging no Superioriour, should freely profess themselves Kings in name, as they were already in substance. Yet had this name ill becemed the weaker, while the strongest of all did forbear it: neither seemed it conuenient in the iudgement of Antigonus, to crowne his last action with such a title, as if he had attained vnto greatness by that foule murder, the infamie whereof he was carefull how to discharge from his owne head. He purposed therefore to vndertake a plausible enterprise, euen the liberty of Greece: whereby it was apparent, that he might get such honour as would not onely drowne all bad reports, but make him be thought equall to any name of royalty, whereof in seeming modestie, hee was not couerous. To this purpose, he deliuered a strong Armie, with a Nauie of two hundred and fiftie saile, and fiftie thousand talents of siluer, vnto Demetrius his sonne: willing him to begin at Athens, and thence to proceede, in setting all the Countrey free.

Demetrius came to Athens before he was expected: so that without resistance hee entered the Hauen; it being thought that a fleet of Ptolomie, Cassanders good friend, had bene arriued. But when it was knowne, both who hee was, and what was the cause of his coming; the ioy of the Citizens brake out into loud acclamations; Demetrius Phalereus forsooke the Towne, and withdrew himselfe to Thebes, vnder safe conduct; onely the Garrison in Munychia stroued to make good that piece, which after a while was wonne vpon them by force. During the siege of Munychia, Demetrius went to Megara; whence he expelled the Garrison of Cassander, and so restored the Citie to libertie.

I thinke it not impertinent, sometimes to relate such accidents, as may seeme no better than meere trifles: for euen by trifles, are the qualities of great Persons as well disclosed disclosed, as by their great actions; because in matters of importance, they commonly straine themselves, to the obseruance of generall commended rules; in lesser things they follow the current of their owne Natures. The Lady Cratesipolis lay in Patras, and had a great desire to see Demetrius; hoping, belike, that she might, by his means, better her estate, and recouer her Townes of Sycion and Corinth, detained by Ptolomie, to whose Lieutenant, in those places, Demetrius before his departure out of Greece, offered money for the surrender of them. Yet the onely businesse pretended was loue. He being aduertised hereof, left his forces in the Countrey of Megara, and taking a company of his lightest armed, for guard of his person, made a long iournie to meete with her. This troupe also, he caused to lodge a great way from his Tent, that none might see her when shee came. As closely as the businesse was carried, some of his enemies had gotten knowledge of it; whereby they conceiued good hope, that the diligence of a very few men, might ouerthrow all the great preparations of Antigonus; and bring him to any tearmes of reason, by taking his deare sonne prisoner. Their proiect fell but a little short of the effect. For they came so suddenly vpon him, that he had no better shift, than to muffle himselfe in an old cloake, and creepe away disguised, leauing them to ransacke his Tent. There was in this Prince a strange medly of conditions; especially an extreame dissoluteness in wanton pleasures, and a painefull industry in matter of warre. He was of a most amiable countenance, a gentle nature, and a good wit; excellent in deuising Engines of warre, and curious in working them with his owne hands. He knew better how to reforme his bad fortune, then how to rule his good. For aduersitie made his valour more active: prosperity puffed him with ouerweening, wherein he thought, that he might doe what he listed. His fortune was changeable, as were his qualities: turning often round, like the picture of her wheele, till she had wound vp the threed of his life, in such manner as followeth to be shewed.

Returning to his Campe, and finishing his businesse at Megara; he resolved no longer to attend the issue of a siege, to assaile Munychia by force, that so he might accomplish the liberty of Athens: which, vntill it was fully wrought out, he refused to enter into the Citie. Munychia was strongly fortified: yet by continuance of the assault, the multitude without, through helpe of their Engines that scoured the wals, preuailed vpon the resolution of those that lay within it, and won the place in two dayes. The wals, and all the defences of that piece against the Citie, were leuelled with the ground, and so was it freely put into the Citizens hands, to whom withall was giuen their liberty, with promise to aide them in maintaining it.

The same of this action was lowder, than of any other victory, gotten by Demetrius with greater skill and industry. For the Athenians, hauing forgotten how to employ their hands, laboured to make vp that defect with their tongues: conuerting to base flattery, that eloquence of theirs, which the vertues of their Ancestors had suted vnto more manly arguments.

They decreed, vnto Antigonus and Demetrius, the name of Kings; they consecrated the place, in which Demetrius leaped from his Chariot, when he entered their Citie, and built there an Altar, calling it of Demetrius the a-lighter; they called them by the Names of the gods their Saviours, ordaining that euery yeere, there should be chosen a Priest of these gods; and further, that such as were employed by their State, in dealing with either of these two Princes, should not be called Embassadors, but Theori, or Consulters with the gods; like as were they, whom they sent vnto the Oracle of Iupiter or Apollo.

It were a fruitlesse diligence, to rehearse all their flatteries; these being so grosse. Hereby they not onely corrupted the yong Prince; but made that acclamation, which best would haue pleased the old man, to be of no vse. For he could not handsomely take vpon him the name of King, as imposed by the Athenians; vnlesse he would seeme to approve their vanity, in loading him with more than humane honors. Yet was he so tickled with this their fine handling him, that when their Theori, or Consulters came shortly after, desiring him to relieue them with Corne, and Timber to build ships, he gaue them almost a hundred thousand quarters of wheat, and matter sufficient to make a hundred Gallies. So gracious was his first Oracle: or rather, so weake is great power in resisting the assaults of flatterie.

§. XI.

The great victory of Demetrius against Ptolomy in Cyprus. How Antigonus and Demetrius tooke upon them the stile of Kings; wherein others followed their example.

From this glorious worke, Antigonus called away Demetrius, vnto a businesse of greater difficulty; meaning to imploy his seruice against Ptolomy in Cyprus. Before his departure out of Greece, he was willed to establish a generall Counsaile, that should treat of matters concerning the common good of the Countrey. About the same time, Antigonus withdrew his owne Garrison out of Imbros, committing their libertie entire, into the peoples hands; whereby it might appeare, that as hee would not permit any other to oppress the Greekes, so would he be farre from doing it himselfe. This was enough, to holde his reputation high, among these new purchased Friends: it followed, that hee should conuert his forces, to the winning of ground vpon his Enemies.

A pittifull Tragedy had lately hapned in Cyprus; through the indiscretion of Menelaus, Ptolomies brother, and his Lieutenant in that Isle. Nicocles, king of Paphos, was entered into some practice with Antigonus: yet not so farre that he thought himselfe past excuse; by which confidence, he was perhaps the more easily detected. To cut off this negotiation, and the false-hearted King of Paphos at one blow, Menelaus was sent thither: who surrouning Nicocles his house with Souldiers, required in Ptolomies name, to haue him yeelded to the death. Nicocles offered to cleare himselfe; but Menelaus tolde him, that dye he must, and bad him come forth quietly. This desperate necessity, caused the vnhappie King to rid himselfe of life: and his death strooke such an impression into his wife, that she not onely slew herselfe, but perswaded the wiues of her husbands brethren to do the like. Also those Brethren of Nicocles, vnto whom Ptolomie had intended no ill, being amazed with the sodainnesse of this calamity, did shut vp the Palace, and setting it on fire, consumed it, with all that was in it, and themselves together.

Whatsoever the crime objected was; Nicocles perished as a man innocent, because he was not suffered to make his answer. Of this sad accident, though Menelaus deserved the blame, for his rigorous proceeding: yet is it to be thought, that much dislike fell also vpon Ptolomie: as men that are greeued, cast an ill affection, euen vpon those, that gaue the farthest remoued occasion.

Not long after this, Demetrius came into Cyprus, with a power sufficient, against any opposition that Ptolomie was like to make. The Cypriots did little or nothing against him: either because they had small strength, or for that they held it a matter indifferent, whom they acknowledged as their Lord, being sure that they should not themselves haue the rule of their owne Countrey. Menelaus therefore, out of his Garrisons, drew forth an Army, and fought with Demetrius. But he was beaten, and driue n to saue himselfe within the wals of Salamis, where he was so hardly besieged, that without strong succour, he had no likelihood to make good the place, much lesse to retaine possession of the whole Island. His greatest helpe at the present, was the fidelity of his Souldiers; whom no rewards could win from him, nor good vsage (when any of them were taken prisoners, and inrolled in the enemies bands) keepe from returning to him, with the first opportunity. Most of them were Mercenaries: but all their goods were in Aegypt, which was enough to keepe them faithfull. Yet could not this their resolution haue stood long, against the odds of number, which Demetrius had of men as resolute, and against his terrible Engines of battery, if Ptolomie had not hastened to the rescue.

Ptolomie brought with him, a hundred and forty Gallies, besides two hundred ships of burden, for transporting his Army and Carriages. This Fleete made a terrible shew, when it was descried afarre; though more then halfe of it was vsnt for seruice, in fight at Sea. Wherefore to make the opinion of his forces the more dreadfull, Ptolomie sent vnto Demetrius, a threatening message: willing him to be gone, vnlesse he would be overwhelmed with multitudes, and trampled to death in a throng. But this yong Gallant repaid him with words of as much brauery, promising to let him escape, vpon condition, that he should withdraw his Garrisons out of Sycion and Corinth.

Demetrius had no more then one hundred and eightene Gallies; but they were, for the most part, greater than those of Ptolomy; better stored with weapons fit for that seruice; uice; and very well furnished with Engines in the prowes, to beate vpon the enemy. Nevertheless he stood in great doubt of threescore gallies that lay in the Hauen of Salamis, lest Menelaus with them should set vpon his backe: in which case, it was very likely that all should go very ill with him. Against this mischiefe, he bestowed ten of his own Gallies in the mouth of that Hauen, to keepe Menelaus from issuing forth, and setting his horsemen on the shore, to giue what assistance they could, he with the rest of his Fleete, puts to Sea against Ptolomy.

The fight beganne early in the morning, and continued long, with doubtfull successe. The Generals were not ranged opposite one to the other; but held each of them the left wing of his owne fleete. Each of them preuailed against the Squadron wherewith hee encountered; but the successe of Demetrius was to better purpose. For his victorie in one part was such, as caused others to fall out of order, and finally draue all to betake themselves vnto speedy flight. As for Ptolomy, hee was faine to leaue his aduantage vpon the enemy in one part of the fight, that he might relecue and animate those of his own which needed him in another. Wherein he found his losse ouer-great to be repaired, by contending any longer against the fortune of that day; and therefore he labored only to saue himselfe, in hope of better euent, that might follow some other time.

There fell out in this battaile no vsuall accident; yet was the victorie greater then could haue bene expected. The occasions whereof were, partly the great skill in Sea-fencing, which the Greekes and Phenicians, that were with Demetrius, had, aboue those which followed Ptolomie: partly the good furniture of the Ships, wherein consisted no lesse, than in the quality of those with whom they were manned. Further, wee may reasonably iudge, that the two hundred ships of burthen, carrying the strength of Ptolomies Army, did not more encourage his owne men, and terrifie his enemies the day before the fight; than breed in each part the contrary affections, when in the beginning of the fight they fell off, and stood aloofe. For though it were fitting, that they should so doe; yet a multitude, prepossessed with vaine conceits, will commonly apprehend very slight occasions, to thinke themselves abandoned. Besides all this, the expectation, that Menelaus issuing with his fleet out of Salamis, should charge the enemies in sterne, was vtterly frustrated. He was kept in perforce, by the ten ships appointed to barre vp the mouth of the Hauen: which they manfully performed, as great necessity required.

Such disappointment of expectation, doth much abate the courage of men in Fight; especially of the assailants: whereas on the contrary, they that finde some part of their feares vaine, do easily gather hopefull spirits, and conceiue an opinion of their own ability, to do more than they thought vpon, out of their not suffering the harme that they had imagined.

Whatsoever the causes of this victory were, the fruit was very great. For Ptolomy had no more than eight Gallies that accompanied him in his flight; all the rest of his fleet was either taken, or sunk. Neither did Menelaus any longer strue against the violence of Fortune; but yeelded vp all that hee held in Cyprus, together with his Army, consisting of twelue thousand foote, and a thousand and two hundred horse, and those Gallies in the Hauen of Salamis. The same deiection of spirit was found in the common Souldiour, as well that was taken at Sea, as that had serued the Egyptian by Land: none of them repoyning any more confidence in Ptolomie, but willingly becoming followers of a new Lord, whose Armie they now increased.

It was generally beleueed, that much more depended on the euent of this fight, than the Isle of Cyprus; for which they contended. Wherefore the common expectation was great; especially Antigonus, whom it most concerned, was deeply perplexed with cares, thinking every day a yeare, till he were aduertised of the issue. In this mood Aristodemus found him, a noble flatterer, whom Demetrius had honoured with the Message of these good newes. Aristodemus had bethought himselfe of a trick, whereby to double the welcome of his ioyfull errand: Hee caused his ships to ride at Anchor, a good distance from the shore; he himselfe landed in a Cock-boat, which he sent immediately backe to the ship; and so all alone, he went forward, looking very sadly that no part of his tydings might appeare in his countenance. Report of his arriual (for it was not knowne where he had bene) came presently to Antigonus, who sent Messenger after Messenger, to meet him on the way, and bring speedy word how all went. But neither any answer, nor so much of a looke, as might intimate the purport of his errand, could be wonne from this demure demure Gentleman. Thus marched hee faire and softly forward with a great throng at his heeles (that serued well to set out his Pageant) vntill he came in sight of Antigonus; who could not containe himselfe, but went downe to meete him at the Gate, and heare the newes. Then did Aristodemus, vpon the suddaine, with a high voyce salute Antigonus by the name of King; vttering the greatnesse of the victorie (with as much pomp, as before hee had couered it with silence) in the hearing of all the people; who with loude acclamations, gaue that name of King, both to Antigonus and his sonne Demetrius. Antigonus, in requitall of the long suspence, wherein Aristodemus had helde him, sayd, that it should also bee long ere hee receyued his reward. But the Title of King, together with the Diademe, which his friends did set on his head, hee could not with a sayrer occasion to assume: wherefore he readily accepted them, and sent the like to his sonne.

When it was once noysed abroad, that Antigonus and Demetrius called themselves Kings; it was not long ere their fellowes were ready to follow the good example. Ptolomie his friends would by no means endure, that their Lord should be thought a man dejected for the losse of a fleet; therefore they saluted him also King. Lyfimachus in Thrace had boldnesse enough, to put the Diademe about his owne head. Seleucus had, before this time, among the barbarous people, taken vpon him as King: but now hee vsed the stile indifferently, as well among the Greekes and Macedonians, as in dealing with others. Only Cassander held himselfe contented with his owne name: whereby howsoeuer he might shadow his pride, hee no way lessened the fame of his cruelty against his Masters house. But the name which he forbore, his sonnes after him, were bold to vsurpe, though with ill successe, as will appeare, when they shall enter vpon the Stage; whereon these old Tragedians, vnder new habits, as no longer now the same persons, begin to play their parts, with bigger lookes, and more boisterous actions, not with greater grace and iudgement, than in the Scenes already past.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Warres betweene the Kings of Egypt, Asia, Macedonia, Thrace, and others: vntill all Alexanders Princes were consumed.

§. I.

ALL the rest of these Kings had taken that name vpon them, in imitation of Antigonus himselfe, as becomming his greatnes: which was such as gaue him hope to swallow them vp, together with their new titles. Being not ignorant of his owne strength, he resolved to single out Ptolomie, and make him an example to others: who should hardly be able to stand, when the greatest of them was fallen. To this purpose hee prepared an Armie of eightene thousand foot, and eight thousand horse, with fourscore and three Elephants: as likewise a fleet of a hundred and fifty Gallies, and a hundred ships of burthen. The Land-forces he commanded in person: of the Navy Demetrius was Admiral.

When all was ready for the iourney, the Sea-men aduised him to stay yet eight dayes longer, and expect the setting of the Pleiades. But his hastie desire to preuent all preparations for resistance that Ptolomie should make, reiected this counsaile; imputing it rather to their feare than skill: wherefore he departed from Antigonion (a Towne which hee had built in Syria, and called after his owne name, that was soone changed into Seleucia, by his mortall enemie) and came to Gaza, where hee met with his Fleet. The neerer that he drew to Egypt, the more hastie he made: thinking by celeritie to preuaile more then by his great power. Hee caused his Souldiers to carrie tenne dayes provision of Victualles; and had manie Camels loaden with all necessaries for passing the Desert, ouer ouer which he marched with no small toile, though he met with no resistance. At Mount Casius, which is neere adioyning to Nilus, he saw his Fleet riding at Anchor, not farre from the shore; in ill case, and many shippes wanting. It had bene sorely bearen with foule weather, wherein some were lost, others driuen backe to Gaza, or scattered elsewhere into such creekes, as they could recouer: Demetrius himselfe, with the best and strongest vessels, did so long beat it vp against the wind, that all his fresh water was spent; in which extremity, he and all his must haue perished, had not the tempest ceased when it did, and Antigonus appeared in sight, from whom these ouer-wearied, thirsty and Sea-bearen Souldiers receyued reliefe. After these painfull trauailes, there followed a warre no lesse painfull than to little purpose; for Ptolomie had so fortified all the passages vpon the Riuer of Nilus, as he assured himselfe either to end the warre there, or if his guardes should happen to be forst, yet could it not be done, but so much to the weakning of the Assailants, as he should afterward, with a second Armie (which he held entire) entertain the Inuader vpon aduantage enough. All that Antigonus sought, was to come to blowes speedily: Ptolomie on the contrary, to beat Antigonus by the belly. It is true that Nilus gaue him water enough, but wood he had none to warme it, and while Antigonus assailed the Rampiers raised vpon the Riuer in vaine, Ptolomie assailed the faith of his souldiers with good successe, for with great gifts and greater promises, he ferried them ouer so fast, as had not Antigonus thrust some assured Regiments, vpon the passages next the enemy, and in the meane while taken a resolution to returne, Ptolomie had turned him out of Egypt ill attended.

Some of them indeede he laid hands on, in the way of their escape, and those he put to death with extreme torments; but in all likelihood with the same ill successe that Perdiccas had formerly done, when he inuaded Egypt: had he not readily remoued his armie further off, from the noise of their entertainment, that had already bene won from him. To preuent therefore as wel the present danger of his stay, as the shame following a forst retreat, he secretly practised the aduice of his Councell, vpon whom the burthen must be laid of his entrance, and leauing Egypt.

It is indeede lesse preiudiciall in such like cases, that errors, dishonours, and losses, be laid on Counsellors & Captaines, than on Kings; on the Directed, than on the Director: for the honour and reputation of a Prince is farre more precious, than that of a Vassall. Charles the first, as many other Princes haue done, laide the losse and dishonour he receiued in the inuasion of France, by the way of Prouence, to Antonie de Leua, whether iustly or no, I know not; but howsoeuer, all the Historians of that time agree, that the sorrow thereof cost that braue Captaine his life. Certainly to giue any violent aduice in doubtful enterprises, is rather a testimony of loue, than of wisdom, in the giuer; for the ill successe is alwaies cast vpon the Councell, the good neuer wants a Father, though a false one, to acknowledge it. Yet I haue sometime knowne it, that great Commanders, who are for the present in place of Kings, haue not onely bene dissuaded, but held in a kind by strong hand, from hazarding their owne persons, and yet haue those kinde of Mutiners neuer bene called to a Marshalls Court.

§. II.

How the Citie of Rhodes was besieged by Demetrius.

His departure of Antigonus, left behind it many dead carcasses, and a great deale of ioy in Egypt. Ptolomie held a solemne Feast, and sent Messengers abroad, laden with glad newes, to Seleucus, Lyfimachus, and Cassander his Confederates: strongly encouraging all that side, with the report of this his late felicity, though it appeared but in a defensiu Warre. Antigonus on the contrary, flattered himselfe with another interpretation, calling the ioyes of his enemies for witness of his owne greatnesse, seeing they arose but from so little things: his enemies being but bare sauers by the last bargain, and himselfe, as he supposed, hauing lost but a little time, and no part of his honour in the late retraite. Howsoeuer it were, yet he meant to follow his affayres henceforth in another fashion, for that which hee could not cleaue a-sunder by great blowes, he purposed by little and little to pare off, by cutting off the branches first, to fell the Tree it selfe with the more facilitie. To effect which, he resolved (leauing the great ones to grow a while) to roote vp the Dependants of his Enemies: Dependants, whom the the forenamed Confederates should be forst, either to relieue, or to lose; and heereby hee doubted not, to draw them into the field, where the aduantage of power, and of all other warlike prouisions, promised him victorie.

At this time the Citie of Rhodes was very mightie, being well gouerned, and hauing long held it selfe in good Neutralitie, it drew the better part of all the trade of those parts, and there a great deale of riches to it selfe, to maintaine which, and to increase it, it furnished and kept on the Seas a Fleet of well armed shippes, by which it not onely beate off all Pyrates and pettie Theeues, but the reputation of their strength was thereby so much increased, as all the neighbour Princes sought their alliance and confederacie.

In this so dangerous a time (in which they must either refuse all that sought them, and so stand friendlesse and apart, or ioyne themselves to some one, and thereby forgoe the peace, by which their greatnesse had growne) their affections carried them to the Egyptian: both because the greatest part of their trade lay that way, as also for that Antigonus his disposition, greatnes, and neighbourhood was fearefull vnto them. This affection of theirs, with some other passages, more apparent; gaue argument of quarrell to Antigonus, who began to declare himselfe against them by pettie iniuries, of taking some of their shippes, with such other grieuances, while hee made a more waighy preparation, to pursue the warre against them, openly and strongly. All things soon after ordered according to the greatnesse of the enterprise, hee employed his sonne Demetrius against them in their owne Iland, who brought such terror vpon the Citizens, that laying aside all respect of friendship and honor, they offered him their assistance, and seruice against whomsoever. Demetrius, who knew from whence this change came, and that the alteration was perswaded by feare, & not by loue; raised his demands to an intollerable height, requiring a hundred Hostages to be deliuered him, and liberty to lodge in their Port as many shippes of warre as himselfe pleased. These conditions more properly to bee imposed vpon a State already conquered, then on those who as yet had heard of nothing but a constrained assistance, restored vnto the Rhodians their lost courage, and made them resolute to defend their libertie to the last man: this taught them to infranchise all their able bond-men, and wisely rather to make them their fellow-Citizens, than to make themselves sellow-slaves with them.

Demetrius hauing refused the faire conditions offered, (as the Rhodians the fearefull ones propounded vnto them) makes preparation for a long siege, and finding no appearance to carrie the place in furie, hee set in hand with his Engines of batterie; in the inuention and vse of which, hee did neuer shew himselfe a greater Artisan, than in this warre. But in conclusion, after the Citizens had sustained all the assaults giuen them for a whole yeere, after many braue sallies out of the Towne, and the famine which they endured within the Towne, which had proued farre more extreame, if Ptolomie had not with many hazards relieved them, Demetrius by mediation of the Grecian Embassadors, gaue ouer the siege; a hundred Hostages they gaue him for performance of the peace made, but with exception of all the Magistrates and Officers of the Citie.

Hereunto Demetrius was brought by the vsuall policie of warre, and state: for while with the flowre of all his fathers forces, he lay before Rhodes, Cassander recovered many of those places in Greece, which Demetrius had formerly taken from him; neither did Cassander make the warre as in former times, by practice and surprize, but by a strong and well compounded armie, which he himselfe ledde as farre as into Attica, and therewith greatly distressed & endangered Athens it selfe. On the other side (though with lesse successe) did Polyperchon inuade Peloponnesus. These dangerous vndertakings vpon Greece, aduised the Athenians and Etolians to dispatch their Embassadors towards Demetrius, and aduised Demetrius, rather to abandon the enterprise of Rhodes, than to abandon the great honour which hee had formerlie gotten, by setting all Greece at libertie.

Demetrius was no sooner out of the Iland, then that the Rhodians erected statues in honour of Lyfimachus and Cassander, but for Ptolomie, whom they most affected, and from whom they receiued their most reliefe, they consulted with the Oracle of Iupiter, whether it were not lawfull to call him a god. The Priests which attended in the Temple of Hamon, gaue the same faire answer for Ptolomy, which they had formerly done for Alexander his his Master, for as Alexander consulted the Oracle with an Armie at his heeles; so was Ptolomie at this time Lord of the soile: and yet was this a farre more cleanly creation, than that done by the Athenians, who Deified Antigonus and Demetrius, by decree of the people. A madde age it was, when so many of Alexanders Captaines could not content themselves with the stile of Kings, but that they would needs be called gods.

§. III.

How Demetrius preuailed in Greece. Cassander desires peace of Antigonus, and cannot obtaine it. Great preparations of warre against Antigonus.

Demetrius comming with a strong Fleet and Armie into Greece, quickly draue Cassander out of Attica; and pursuing his fortune, chased him beyond the straits of Thermopyle. Herein his reputation did much auail him; which was so great, that sixe thousand of his enemies Souldiers revolted vnto him. So partly by the greatnesse of his name, partly by force, hee recovered in short space all that Cassander held in those straits, and giuing libertie vnto the people, hee bestowed vpon the Athenians those peeces, which had bene fortified against them, to blocke them vp. Then went hee into Peloponnesus, where hee found the like, or more easie successe: for hee suddenly tooke Argos, Corinth, Sicyon, and the most of the Countrie, bestowing libertie vpon such as needed it. The Towne of Sicyon he translated by consent of the Citizens, from the old seat into another place, and called it after his owne name Demetrias. This done, hee berooke himselfe to his pleasure. At the Isthmian games, he caused himselfe to be proclaimed Capitaine Generall of Greece, as Philip and Alexander had bene in former times: whereupon (as if hee were now become as great as Alexander) hee despised all others, making it a matter of isst, that any, saue himselfe or his father, should vsurpe the name of King. But in his behauiour he was so farre vnlike to a King, that in all the time of his leisure, he deserued none other name then of a drunken Palliard. Yet were the Athenians as readie as euer to deuise new honours for him: among which they made one Decree, that whatsoever King Demetrius should command, ought to be held sacred with the gods, and iust with men.

All Greece being now at the disposition of Antigonus, Cassander stood in great feare, lest the warre should fall heauily vpon him in Macedon: which to auoid, he knew no better way then to make peace with his enemies betimes. And to that purpose he sent Embassadors; but had no better answer from Antigonus, then that hee should submit his whole estate to his discretion. This proud demand made him looke about him, and labour hard in solliciting his friends, both to assist him, and take heed to themselves; neither found he them slow in apprehending the common danger: for Lyfimachus knew that if once Cassander had lost Macedon, Demetrius would soone be master of Thrace. Neither were Ptolomie and Seleucus ignorant of that, which was like to befall them, if Antigonus were suffered to put himselfe in quiet possession of those Prouinces in Europe. Wherefore it was agreed, that with ioynt forces they should all together set vpon the common Enemy.

Heereof Antigonus had notice: but scorned all their preparations, saying, That hee would as easily scatter them, as a stocke of birds are driven away with a stone. With these conceits he pleased himselfe, and no way hindred the proceedings of his Enemies. He lay at that time in his Towne of Antigonia (a name that it must shortly loose) where he was carefully providing to set out some stately game and Pageants, in ostentation of his glorie. But thither was brought vnto him the tumultuous newes of Lyfimachus his victories about Hellepont. For Cassander had committed vnto Lyfimachus part of his forces, wherewith to passe ouer into Asia, while hee himselfe with the rest should oppose Demetrius on Eurape side. So Lyfimachus passing the Hellepont, began to make hot Warre vpon the subjects of Antigonus; getting some of the Cities in those parts, to ioyne with him, by faire meanes: winning others by force, and waisting the Country round about.

To repress this vnexpected boldnesse, Antigonus made hastie iournies, and came soone enough to recouer his losses, but not strong enough to driue Lyfimachus home, or compell him to come to battaile. Lyfimachus waited for the comming of Seleucus; keep-ping himselfe the whilest from necessity of fighting. But Babylon was farre off; and Seleucus his preparations were too great to bee soone in a readinesse. The Winter also did hinder his iourney : which inforced them on both sides to rest in some quiet, without performing any matter of importance. This delay of debating the quarrell in open field, held all those Nations in a great suspense, & bred much expectation. Yet might all haue come to nothing, had not Antigonus been so forward, that he refused to yeeld vpon any peaceable conditions. At length Seleucus drew neere with a mighty Armie of his owne (for hee had gathered strength in that long time of leysure, which Antigonus had giuen him) and with great aid from Ptolomie, that was ioyned with his forces.

To helpe in this needfull case, Demetrius was called ouer into Asia by his Fathers letters: which hee readily obeyed. Before his departure out of Greece, he made peace with Cassander, vpon reasonable termes : to the end hee might not bee driuen to leaue any part of his Army for defence of the Countrey; and that his iourne might bee without any such blemish of reputation, as if hee had abandoned his Dependents : for one Article of the peace was, That all the Cities of Greece should bee at libertie. Cassander was glad to be so ridde of an Enemy that was too strong for him. Yet would this league haue done him little good, if things had fallen out contrariwise then they did in Asia; seeing the ratification thereof was referred vnto Antigonus. It sufficed, that for the present, euery one found meanes to cleere himselfe of all incumbrances else-where, to the end that each of them might freely apply himselfe to the triall of the maine contention in Asia.

§. IIII.

Seleucus, with his sonne Antiochus, ioyning with Lyfimachus, compounded a great Armie, which was (all considered) not inferiour to that of the Enemy. In greatnesse of name (that helpeth much in all warres, but especially in the 30 Ciuill) they were rather vnanswerable, than vnquall to their aduersaries: for Antigonus had of long time kept them vnder with a mastering spirit, and had beene reputed a King indeed, when the rest were held but Vsurpers of the title. Likewise Demetrius was generally acknowledged a braue Commander, hauing giuen prooffe of his worth in many great seruices of all kinds, and enriched the Art of war with many inuentions, which euen his enemies, and particularly Lyfimachus, did much admire. Seleucus, who had sometimes flattered Antigonus, & fearefully stolen away from him to saue his life; with yong Antiochus, a Prince not heard of before this iourne; and Lyfimachus; that had liued long in a corner, hardly keeping his owne from the wilde Tracians; wanted much in reputation, of that which was yeilded to their opposites: yet so, that as ancient Captaines vnder 40 Philip and Alexander, two of them were held worthy enough, to receiue any benefit that fortune might giue, and the third a Prince of great hope, whereof he now came to make experience.

The Souldiers, on both sides, were for the most part hardy & well exercised: many of them hauing serued vnder Alexander; though of those old Companies, the long space of two and twenty yeeres had consumed the greatest number. But concerning their affections, the followers of Seleucus were easily perswaded, that in this battaile they must either get the vpper hand, or put in extreame danger all that belonged vnto the Confederate Princes: whereas Antigonus his men could discerne no other necessitie of fighting, than the obstinate qualitie of their Lord, that needes would be Master of all. Antigonus 50 had about three-score and ten thousand foot, ten thousand horse, and three-score and fiftene Elephants. His enemies were fixe thousand short of him in number of their foot; in horse they had the oddes of five hundred; of Elephants they had foure hundred, and a hundred and twenty armed Chariots of warre; which helpe, though they little had auailed the Persians, yet were they not to be despised, in the hands of a good Captaine.

Antigonus himselfe, either troubled with the vnexpected greatnesse of his enemies forces, or presaging little good like to ensue, grew very pensiue, communing much in priu-

priate with his sonne whom he commended to the Armie as his successor: whereas in former times he had neuer been so iocund, as towards the houre of battaile, nor had been accustomed to make his sonne, or any other, priate to his counsaile, before it required execution. Other tokens of bad lucke, either foegoing the fight, or afterwards deuised, I hold it needlesse to recount: Diana of Ephesus dwelt neere to the place of battaile, a busie goddess in many great fights, and therefore likely to haue beene thrust into the fable; if any matter, neerely resembling a miracle, had chanced.

It is easie to beleue, that these two so gallant Armies, containing well-neere all the strength of Alexanders whole Empire, performed a notable fight, being led by such worthy Commanders, and whom the issue thereof did highly concerne. Yet are few of the particulars recorded: an easie losse in regard of the much variety, wherewith euery story aboundeth in this kinde. The most memorable things in the battaile, were these: Demetrius with his best force of horse, charged valiantly vpon yong Antiochus; whom when he had broken, and put to flight, he was so transported with the heat of his good successe, that he neuer gaue ouer his pursuit, but left his Father naked, and lost thereby both him, and the victory. For when Seleucus perceiued this aduantage, he enterposed his Elephants, betwene Demetrius and the Phalanx of Antigonus: and with many troupes of horse offering to breake vpon the enemies battaile, wherefoeuer it lay most open, he did so terrifie the Antigonians, that a great part of them rather chose to re-
20 posit from their Lord, whilst they were fairely inuited, than to sustaine the furie of so dangerous an impression. This cowardize or rather treason of some, discouraged others; and finally, cast them all into flight; exposing their Generall to the last end of his destinies. Antigonus was then foure-score yeeres old, very fat and vnweildy, so that he was vnapt for flight, if his high spirit could haue entertained any thought thereof. He had about him some of his most trusty followers, and as many others as hee could hold together. When one that perceiued a great troupe making towards his person, told him, Sir King, yonder company meanes to charge you; hee answered, well may they; for who defends me? but anone Demetrius will relieue vs. Thus expecting, to the very last, that his sonne should come to the rescue, he receiued so many Darts into his 30 body, as tooke away his lately ambitious, but then fearfull hopes, together with his troublesome life.

His great ability in matter of Armes, together with his vnfatiable desire of Empire, haue sufficiently appeared in the whole Volume of his actions. He was more feared by his enemies, than loued by his friends; as one that could not moderate his fortune, but vied insolent towards all alike, as if it had been some vertue neerest representing a Kingly Maiestie. This was the cause that so many of his followers reuolted to his enemies; and finally, that a great part of his Armie forooke him in his last necessity. For those Kings and Princes that call all the carefull indeuours of their Vassals, onely dutie and debt; and are more apt to punish the least offences, than to reward the greatest seruices: 40 shall finde themselves vpon the first change of fortune, (seeing it is loue onely that staies by aduersitie) not onely the most friendlesse, but euen the most contemptible, and despised of all other. This Antigonus found true in part, while he liued; in part he left it to be verified vpon his sonne.

§. V.

How Demetrius forsaken by the Athenians after his ouerthrow, was reconciled to Seleucus and Ptolomie, beginning a new fortune, and shortly entring into quarrels.

Or Demetrius, at his returne, from the idle pursuit of yong Antiochus, finding all quite lost, was glad to saue himselfe, with foure thousand horse and five thousand foot, by a speedy retraits vnto Ephesus, whence he made great haste vnto Athens, as to the place, that for his sake would suffer any extremity. But whilest he was in the middest of his course thither, the Athenian Embassadors met him with a decree of the people, which was, that none of the Kings should be admitted into their Citie. These were Embassadors, not Theori, or Consulters with the Oracle. It was a shamelesse ingratitude in the Athenians, to reward their Benefactor, in his miserie, with such a decree: neither did any part of his calamitie more afflict the vnfortunate Prince, than to see his aduersity despised by those whom he had thought his surest friends.

H h h h

Yet

Yet was he faine to giue good words. For he had left many of his ships in their Hauen, of which he now stood in great neede, and therefore was faine to speake them faire, that sometimes had grossly flattered him. But he shall liue to reach them their old language, and speak vnto them in another tune. VVhen he had gotten his ships, he failed to the Isthmus, where he found nothing but matter of discomfort. His Garrisons were euery where broken vp; the Souldiers hauing betaken themselves to his enemies pay. So that he was King onely of a small Armie and Fleet, without money or meanes wherewith to sustaine him and his followers any long time. All the rest, or the greatest part of his Fathers large Dominion, was now in diuiding among the Conquerers, and those few places which as yet held for him (hauing not perchance heard the worst of what had happened) he no way knew how to relieue: for to put himselfe into the field on that side of the Sea, he had no power; and to inclose himselfe in any of them, how strong foeuer, were but to imprison his fortune, and his hopes, or therein indeede to burie himselfe and his estate: He therefore creeping thorow those bushes that had fewest briars, fell vpon a corner of Lyfimachus his Kingdome, whereof he gaue all the spoyle that was gotten, to his Souldiers, his owne losses hauing beene too great to be repaid againe by small prizes.

In the meane while the Confederate Princes had wherewithall to busie themselves, in the partition of those Prouinces, of which their late victory had made them Lords, wherein Seleucus had a notable aduantage by being present, and Master of the field, so for neither Ptolomie nor Cassander were at the ouerthrow giuen, hauing onely sent certaine troupes to re-inforce the Armie which Seleucus led, who tooke hold of a part of Asia the lesse, and all Syria, being no otherwise deuided from his owne Territorie, than by the Riuer of Euphrates. For there had not any order beene taken by the Confederates, for the diuision of all those Lands: because they did not expect so prosperous an issue of that warre, which they made onely in their owne common defence. It was therefore lawfull for Seleucus, to make the best benefit that he could of the victory, at which, neuertheless others did repine; and though they neither could nor durst accuse him of ill dealing for the present, yet seeing the ouer-greatnesse of Seleucus brought no lesse danger to the rest of the new Kings, than that of Antigonus had done, they consulted vpon the same reason of State as before, how to oppose it in time. Neither was Seleucus ignorant of what they had determined, for he read it in the Law vniuersall of Kingdomes and States, needing no other intelligence. Hereupon they forget friendship on all sides, and cure themselves of all vnprofitable passion, the hatred of each to other, and their loues being laid on the one side, against their profits on the other, were found so farre too light, as Seleucus, who had to day slain Antigonus the father, and driuen Demetrius the sonne out of Asia, sought to morrow how to match himselfe with Stratonica, Demetrius his daughter, and so by Demetrius to serue his turne against Lyfimachus.

The storie of this Stratonica, with whom young Antiochus, the sonne of Seleucus fell so passionately in loue, and so distempered, as Seleucus his father, to saue his sonnes life, gaue her (though she were his wife) vnto him, and how his passion was discovered by his pulse, is generally noted by all Writers. But neither did this alliance betweene Seleucus and Demetrius; betweene Ptolomie and Lyfimachus; betweene Demetrius and Cassander; betweene Demetrius and Ptolomie, though for the present it brought him againe into the ranke of Kings; otherwise tye any of them to each other, than the marriages betweene Christian Kings haue done in later times, namely betweene the Austrians, the Aragonians, the French, and other Princes; neither haue the Leagues of those elder times beene found more faithfull, then those of the same later times haue beene; as in the stories of Charles the eighth of France, and of Charles the Emperour, of France so the first, and of the Kings of Naples, Dukes of Millan and others, the Reader may obserue: betweene whom from the yeere of our Lord, One thousand, foure hundred, nineteene and fine, when Charles the eighth vnderooke the Conquest of Naples, to the yeere one thousand five hundred fiftie and eight, when Henric the second died; the Histories of those times tell vs, that all the bonds, either by the bed or by the booke, either by weddings, or Sacramentall Oathes, had neither faithfull purpose nor performance. Yet did Demetrius reape this profit by giuing his daughter to his enemy Seleucus, that he recovered Cilicia from Plistarchus, the brother of Cassander; who had gotten it as his his share in the diuision of Antigonus his possessions: for the Intruder was not strong enough to hold it by his proper forces from him, that entred vpon it as a lawfull Heire, neither would Seleucus lend him any helpe, as by the rule of Confederacie he should haue done against the common enemy. So Plistarchus with very angry complaint, as well against Seleucus as Demetrius, went vnto Cassander, whither Phila, their sister, followed him shortly, to pacifie them both, and keepe all quiet; being sent for that purpose by Demetrius her husband, that was not strong enough to deale with Cassander, and therefore glad to make vse of that bond of alliance betwixt them, whereof in his owne prosperitie, he neuer tooke notice to the others good. About the same time hee tooke to wife a daughter of Ptolomie (plurality of wiues being familiar with these Macedonians, that had learned it in their Easterne conquests) and so was hee by two marriages rather freed from two enemies, then strengthened with two friends, for neither of them wished him any good, otherwise then might seeme to aduance their owne ambitious desires.

Seleucus and Ptolomie could both of them haue beene contented better, that Demetrius, with helpe of their countenance, should seeke his fortune somewhat farther off, than settle his estate vnder their noses. Particularly, Seleucus thought that Cilicia lay very fitly for himselfe: and Ptolomie had a great appetite (which yet he concealed a while) to the Isle of Cyprus. Now whether it were so, that Seleucus would faine haue set his new father in law vpon the necke of Lyfimachus; or whether he were indeede greedie of the bargain, he offered to buy of Demetrius for ready money, his late purchase of Cilicia. Hereunto Demetrius would not harken, but meant to keepe as much Land as he could, hauing already found in Cilicia twelue thousand talents of his fathers treasure, that would serue him to make sport a while. This refusall so displeased Seleucus, that in angry termes hee demanded the Cities of Tyre and Sidon, to be surrendered vnto him; which were the onely places in Syria, that had not followed the fortune of the late great bataille. Instead of giuing them vp, Demetrius rooke present order to haue them better manned; and spake it stoutly, That were hee ouer-come a thousand times, yet would hee not hire Seleucus to become his sonne in law. In this quarrell Seleucus was generally reprehended, as one of a malignant disposition, that would breake friendship with his father in law for two Townes, from whom hee had already taken more then well he knew how to gouerne. But the fire consumed it selfe in words, which had it fastned vpon armes, like it is that the weaker should haue found friends out of enuie to the stronger.

§. VI.

How Demetrius won the Citie of Athens, and preuailed in Greece, but lost in Asia. Of troubles in Macedon following the death of Cassander.

IN the meane while, the Athenians not knowing how to vse the liberty, which Demetrius had bestowed on them, were fallen by sedition, vnder the tyranny of Lachares. Through which alteration their distempered Citie was so weakened, that it seemed ill able to keepe off the punishment due to their late ingratitude. This aduantage hastened him, whom they had once called their God and Saviour, to present himselfe vnto them, in the habit of a reuenging furie. He brought against them all the force that he could well spare from other employments, which were at that time perhaps the more, because his doubtfull Easterne friends, were vnwilling to giue impediment to any business, that might entangle him in Greece. His first enterprise in Athens had ill successe; a great part of his fleet perishing in a tempest. But he soone repaired the losse, and (after some victories in Peloponnesus, where he wan diuers Townes that had fallen from him) returning to the enterprise, wasted the Countie of Attica, and cut off all reliefe from the Citie, both by Land and Sea.

Athens was not able to feede the great multitude within it, any long time: for it stood in a barren soile, and wanted now the command of those Ilands, and places abroad, from whence it was wont to be stored with victuals, being also destitute of meanes to keep such a Nautic, as might bring in supply, or dare to doe any thing at Sea, against that of Demetrius. Yet was there some hope of succour from Ptolomie, who (trusting thereby to win the loue of Greece) had laden a hundred and fiftie ships with corne, and sent them to releue the hungry Citie. But these hundred and fiftie were vnable to deale with three hundred good fighting ships, which Demetrius had; rather they feared to become a prey to him, and therefore hastened them away betimes, as hauing done enough, in aduenturing to come so neere, that they might be discried. This brake the heart of the people; among whom the famine was so extreame, that a Father and his Son did fight for a dead Mouſe, which dropped downe betwene them from the house top. Wherefore they sent Embassadors to yeelde vpon the Towne, and craue pardon, hauing so farre offended, that out of desperation, they made it a capitall offence, to propose any motion of peace. Yet were they faine to abolish this decree: rather because they knew not what else to doe, then because they hoped to be forgiven.

Demetrius, contented with the honour of the victory, did not onely forbear to take away the liues of these vnthankfull men, which they had submitted vnto his mercy; but out of his liberality gaue them foode, and placed in Office amongst them such as were most acceptable to the people. Neuerthelesse he was growne wiser then to trust them so farre as he had done in times past. And therefore, when (among other flattering acclamations) they bade him take their Hauens, & dispose of them at his pleasure, he was ready to lay hold vpon the word, and leaue a sure Garrison within their wals, to keepe them honest perforce. After this he went into Peloponnesus, vanquished the Lacedaemonians in two battailes, and was in very faire possibilitie to take their Citie: when the dangerous newes called him in all haste, of Lyſimachus and Ptolomie, that preuailed faster vpon him elsewhere, than himselfe did vpon his enemies in Greece. Lyſimachus had wonne many Towns in Asia; Ptolomie had gotten all the Isle of Cyprus, except the Citie of Salamis, wherein Demetrius had left his Children & Mother, that were straightly besieged. Whilst he was betinking himselfe which way to turne his face, a notable piece of businesse offered it selfe, which thrust all other cares out of his head.

Cassander was lately dead in Macedon, and soone after him, Philip his eldest son, whose two younger brethren, Antipater and Alexander, sought for the Kingdome. In this quarrell Theſſalonica the Daughter of King Philip, whom Cassander had married, seemed better affected to Alexander, then to her elder sonne: who thereupon grew so enraged, that most barbarously he slew his owne Mother. The odiousnesse of this fact gaue a faire lustre to Alexander's cause: drawing the generality of the Macedons to take his part, as in reuenge of the Queens death, vpon that wicked parricide Antipater. But Antipater was so strongly backed by Lyſimachus, whose daughter he had married; that Alexander could not hope to make his party good without some forreigne aide. For which cause he called in both Pyrhus and Demetrius, who how they dealt with him, it will soone appeare in the following Tragedy, of him and his brother. Their Father Cassander had bene one that thrust well for himselfe, at such time as euery man sought how to get somewhat, in the ill ordered diuision of the Empire. He was cunning in practice, and a good Souldier: one of more open dealing then were his Companions, but withall more impudent, rudely killing those, whom others would more wisely haue made away. He deeply hated the memory of Alexander, that had knocked his head against a wall, vpon some opinion of contempt. With Olympias he had an hereditary quarrell, deriued from his Father, whom he could not abide. Her feminine malice did so exasperate him, by cruelty, that she vsed against his friends, both aliue and dead, as it made him aduenture vpon shedding the Royall blood; wherewith, when once he had stained his hands, he did not care how farre he proceeded in that course of murder. His carefulnesse to destroy those women and children, whose liues hindred his purpose, argues him to haue bene rather skilfull in matters of Armes, than a valiant man: such cruelty being a true marke of cowardize, which feares a far off the dangers, that may quietly passe away: and seekes to auoide them by base and wicked meanes, as neuer thinking it selfe safe enough, vntill there be nothing left, that carries likelihood of danger. Of Olympias and Roxane it may be said, that they had well deserved the bloody end which ouer-tooke them; yet ill beleemed it Cassander to doe the office of a Hang-man. But Alexander's children had by no law of men, deserved to dye for the tyranny of their Father. Wherefore, though Cassander died in his bed; yet the diuine Iustice brought swords vpon his wife and children, that well reuenged the cruelty of this bloody man, by destroying his whole house, as he had done his Masters.

§. VII.

Of Pyrhus and his doings in Macedon. The death of Cassander's children. Demetrius gets the Kingdome of Macedon; preuailes in warre against the Greekes; Loseth reputation in his warre against Pyrhus, and in his ciuill Government, and prepares to win Asia. How all conspire against Demetrius. Pyrhus and Lyſimachus invade him, his Armie yeeldes to Pyrhus, who shares the Kingdome of Macedon with Lyſimachus.

Pyrhus, the Sonne of that vnfortunate Prince Acides, which perished in warre against Cassander, was hardly preserved, being a suckling Infant, from the furie of his Fathers enemies. When his Fosterers had conueighed him to Glaucias, King of Illyria; the deadly hatred of Cassander would haue bought his life with the price of two hundred talents. But no man can kill him that shall be his Heire. Glaucias was so farse from betraying Pyrhus, that he restored him by force to his Fathers Kingdome, when he was but twelue yeeres of age. Within the compasse of fixe yeeres, either the indiscretions of his youth, or the rebellious temper of his Subjects, draue him out of his Kingdome; and left him to trie the world anew. Then went he to Demetrius (who married his sister) became his Page; followed him awhile in his warres; was with him in the great batraile of Issus, whence he fled with him to Ephesus; and was content to be hostage for him, in his reconciliation with Ptolomie. In Agypte he so behaued himselfe, that he got the fauour of Berenice, Ptolomies principall wife, so that he married her Daughter, and was thereupon sent home, with monie and men, into Epirus; more beholding now to Ptolomie, than to Demetrius. When he had fully recovered the Kingdome of Epirus, and was settled in it, then fell out that businesse betwene the children of Cassander, which drew both him and Demetrius into Macedon.

Antipater, the elder of Cassander's sonnes, was so farre too weake for Pyrhus, that he had no desire to attend the comming of Demetrius, but made an hastie agreement, and diuided the Kingdome with his younger brother Alexander; who likewise felt the aide of Pyrhus so troublesome, that he was more willing to send him away, than to call in such another helper. For Pyrhus had the audacitie to request, or take as granted, by strong hand, Ambracia, Acarmania, and much more of the Countrey, as the reward of his pains: leaving the two brethren to agree as well as they could about the rest. Necessitie enforced the brethren to composition: but their composition would not satisfie Demetrius, who tooke the matter hainously, that he was sent for, and made afoole, to come so farre with an Armie, and finde no worke for it. This was a friuolous complaint; whereby it appeared, that Demetrius had a purpose to doe as Pyrhus had done, and so much more, by how much he was stronger. Hereupon it seemed to Alexander a wise course, to remove this ouer-diligent friend, by murdering him vpon some aduantage. Thus Demetrius reported the storie, and it might be true; though the greatest part, and perhaps the wisest, beleecued it not. But the issue was, that Alexander himselfe was feasted and slaine by Demetrius; who tooke his part of the Kingdome, as a reward of the murder; excusing the fact so well, by telling his owne danger, and what a naughtie man Cassander had bene, that all the Macedonians grew glad enough to acknowledge him their King. It fell out happily, that about the same time Lyſimachus was busied in warre with a King of the wilde Thracians: for thereby he was compelled to seeke peace of Demetrius, which to obtaine, he caused the remainder of Macedon to be giuen vp; that is, the part belonging to Antipater, his sonne in law. At this ill bargain Antipater grievously stormed, though he knew not how to amend it: yet still he stormed; vntill his Father in law, to saue the labour of making many excuses, tooke away his troublesome sonne. Thus in haste, with a kinde of neglect, and as it were to auoide molestation, were slaine the children of Cassander: of Cassander that had slaine his owne Masters children, in a wise course of policy, with careful meditation (so much the more wicked as the more long) studying how to erect his owne house, that fell downe vpon his graue, ere the earth on it was thoroughly settled.

It might be thought, that such an accessse of Dominion, added much to the greatnesse of Demetrius. But indeede it shewed his infirmity; and thereby made him neglected by many, and at length hated by all. For he had no Art of ciuill Government: but thought (or shewed by his actions that he thought) the vse and fruit of a Kingdome, to be none other, other, than to doe what a King listeth. Hee gaue himselfe ouer to Women and Wine, laughing openly at those which offered to trouble him with supplications, and the tedious discourse of doing iustice. Hee had more skill in getting a Kingdome, than in ruling it: warre being his recreation, and luxurie his nature. By long rest (as sixe yeeres reigne is long to him), that knowes not how to reigne one yeere) hee discovered so much of his worst conditions, as made the people both weary of his idleness; and the Souldiers, of his vanitie. He was freed from care of matters in Asia, by hearing that all was lost: though more especially, by hearing that Ptolomie had with great honour, entertained and dismissed his mother and children. This afforded him the better leisure, of making warre in Greece: where he vanquished the Thebans, and won their Citie twice in short space, but vsed his victorie with mercy. Against Lyfimachus hee would faine haue done somewhat (the peace betwene them notwithstanding) at such time as hee was taken by the Thracians; but Lyfimachus was freely dismissed, and in good case to make resistance ere Demetrius came; so as this iourney purchased nothing but enmitie. Another expedition he tooke in hand against Pyrrhus, with no better, or rather with worse euent. Pyrrhus held somewhat belonging to Macedon, which he had indeede as honestly gotten, as Demetrius the whole Kingdome; he had also made excursions into Thessalie. But there needed not any handsome pretence of quarrell, seeing Demetrius thought himselfe strong enough, to ouer-runne his enemies Countrey, with two great Armies. It is a common fault in men, to despise the vertue of those, whom they haue knowne raw Nouices in that facultie, wherein themselves are noted as extraordinarie. Pyrrhus was a Captaine, whom later ages, and particularly the great Hannibal, placed higher in the ranke of Generals, than either Demetrius, or any of Alexanders followers. At this time, hee mist that part of the Armie, which Demetrius led, and fell vpon the other halfe: which hee ouerthrew, not with more commendations of his good conduct, than of his priuate valour, shewed in single combat against Pantanchus, Demetrius his Lieutenant; who being a strong man of body, challenged this young Prince to fight hand to hand, and was vterly beaten. The losse of this battaile did not so much offend the Macedonians, as the gallant behauiour of Pyrrhus delighted them. For in him they seemed to behold the liuely figure of Alexander in his best qualitie. Other Kings did imitate, in a counterfeited manner, some of Alexanders graces, and had good skill in wearing Princely vntures: but (said they) none, saue Pyrrhus, is like him in deede, in performing the office of a Captaine.

These rumours were not more nourished by the vertue of the Epirot, than by dislike of their owne King; whom they began to disesteeme, not so much in regard of his vnprofitable iourney into Epirus (for hee had wasted much of the Countrey, and brought home his Armie in good case) as of his insolence, that grew daily more and more intolerable. His apparell seemed, in the eyes of the Macedons, not onely too sumptuous and new-fangled, but very vnmanly; and seruing chiefly to be a daily witnesse, how much he contemned them and their good opinion. Of his Souldiers liues hee was retchlesse: and suffered vnwisely this vn-princely sentence to escape out of his mouth; That the more of them died, the fewer he was to pay. Hee made a mockerie of iustice; and (as it were, to publish vnto all his Subiects, how little he esteemed it or them) hauing by a shew of popularitie inuited Petitioners, and with a gracious countenance entertained their Supplications, hee led the poore suiters after him in great hope, till comming to a bridge, hee threw all their writings into a Riuer; pleasing himselfe, in that hee could so easily and so boldly delude the cares of other men. By these courses hee grew so odious, that Pyrrhus gathered audacitie, and inuading Macedon, had almost wonne it all with little resistance. Demetrius lay then sicke in his bed: who recovering health, and taking the field, had such great oddes of strength, as made Pyrrhus glad to forsake his winnings and so be gone.

At length he began to haue some feeling of the generall hate; which to redresse, hee did not (for hee could not) alter his owne conditions; but purposed to alter their idle discourses of him, by setting them on worke in such an action, wherein his best qualities might appeare; that is, in a great warre. His intent was to inuade Asia, with a Royall Armie: wherein the fortune of one battaile might giue him as much, as the fortune of another had taken from him. To this end, he first made peace with Pyrrhus; that so he might leaue all safe and quiet at home. Then did he compose a mighty Armie, of almost a hundred thousand foot, and twelue thousand horses with a Nauie of five hundred saile, wherein were many ships, farre exceeding the greatnesse of any that had bene seene before; yet so swift and vifull withall, that the greatnesse was least part of their commendation.

The terrible fame of these preparations, made Seleucus and Ptolomie suspect their owne forces, and labour hard with Lyfimachus and Pyrrhus, to ioyne against this ambitious son of Antigonus; that was like to proue more dangerous to them all, than euer was his Father. It was easily discerned, that if Demetrius once preuailed in Asia, there could be no security for his friends in Europe, what league soeuer were of old concluded. Therefore they resolved to begin with him betimes, and each to inuade that quarter of Macedon, that lay next his owne Kingdome. Lyfimachus came first, and against him went Demetrius with a great part of his Armie: but whilst he was yet on the way, newes were brought into his Campe, that Pyrrhus had won Berrhea. The matter was not ouer great: were it not, that mindes prepared with long discontent, are ready to lay hold vpon small occasions of dislike. All the campe was in vpror: some wept, others raged, few or none did forbear to utter seditious words, and many desired leaue of Demetrius, to goe to their owne houses, meaning indeede to haue gone to Lyfimachus.

When Demetrius perceived the bad affection of his Armie, he thought it the wisest way, to leade the Macedonians further off from Lyfimachus their own countriman, against Pyrrhus that was a stranger: hoping by victory against the Epirot, to recouer the loue of his followers, in such sort that he might afterwards at leisure deale with the other. But herein his wisdom beguiled him. For the Souldiers were as hasty as he, to meet with Pyrrhus; not intending to hurt him, but longing to see that noble Prince, of whom they daily heard the honourable fame. Some spake of his valour; some enquired, others answered, of his person, his armour, and other tokens whereby he might be knowne; as particularly, by a paire of Goats hornes, that he wore on his crest. It was not likely, that these men should hurt him. Diuers of them stole away, and ranne ouer into Pyrrhus his campe: where the newes that they brought, were better welcome than their persons. For they said, and it was true, that if the Macedonians might once get sight of Pyrrhus, they would all salute him King. To trie this, Pyrrhus rode forth, and presented himselfe bareheaded in view of the campe, whither some were sent before to prepare his welcome. The newes of his arriuall found a generall applause, and euery one began to looke out, with desire to set eye on him. His face was not so well knowne as his Helmet; therefore he was admonished to put it on; which done, all came about him, and professed their seruice; neither were there any, that spake for Demetrius, onely some (and they the most moderate of tongue) bad him be gone betimes, and shift for himselfe. So Demetrius threw aside his maskers habit, and attyring himselfe poorly, did fearfully steale away out of his owne Campe, deseruing well this calamitie: whether it were so, that he would not hearken to the good counsaile of his friends, or whether his behauiour depriued him of such friends, as would dare to let him heare the vnpleasant sound of necessarity truth.

Whilst Pyrrhus was making this triumphant entry into the Kingdome of Macedon; Lyfimachus came vpon him very vnseasonably, and would needs haue halfe: saying, that he had done as much as Pyrrhus in the warre, and therefore had reason to challenge his part of the gaine. The bargaine was quickly made, and the diuision agreed vpon: each of them being rather desirous to take his part quietly, than to fight for the whole; as hoping each of them, to worke his fellow quite out of all, vpon better opportunitie.

§. VIII.

How Demetrius gathering forces, enterprised many things with ill successe, in Greece and Asia. How he was driven vpon Seleucus, and compelled to yeelde himselfe. His imprisonment and death.

The Athenians, were as vnthankfull to Demetrius in this his aduersitie, as they had bene in former times. For they presently forooke his friendship, and called Pyrrhus out of Macedon to be their Patron. Demetrius, when he went against Lyfimachus, had left a great part of his forces in Greece, vnder his sonne Antigonus. Therefore it is like, that he had soone gotten an Armie, though Phila his wife (who

(who is highly commended for a wife and vertuous Ladie) did poyson her selfe, vpon desperatē griefe for his misfortune. The first, vpon whom hee attempted to shew his anger, were the Athenians that had well deserued it. He began to lay siegeto their Town: but was pacified by Crates the Philosopher, whom they had made their spokelman; and taking faire words in stead of satisfaction, passed ouer into Asia, with eleuen thousand Souldiers, meaning to trie his fortune against Lyfimachus, for the Prouinces of Lydia and Caria.

At his first comming into those parts, fortune seemed to smile vpon him. For many good Townes, willingly, or by compulsion, yielded to his obedience. There were also some Captaines that fell from Lyfimachus to him, with their companies and treasures. But it was not long, ere Agathocles the sonne of Lyfimachus, came vpon him with an Armie so strong, that it was not for Demetrius his good, to hazard his last stocke against it. Wherefore, he resolved to passe through Phrygia and Armenia, into Media, and the Prouinces of the higher Asia; trusting to finde a Kingdome somewhere in those remote quarters. The execution of this counsaile was grieuouly impeached by Agathocles: who pursued him close, and cut off all his prouisions, driving him to take which waies hee could, without following his intended course. In many skirmishes Demetrius vanquished this troublefome enemy: neuertheless, he could not be shaken off, but continued afflicting the poore titularie King, with extreame famine. At length, in passing the riuer Lycaeus, so many of Demetrius his men were lost, that the rest could no longer make resistance: but were driuen to trauaile with such speed as might well be called a plaine flight. So that with famine, pestilent diseases following famine, and other accidents of warre, eight thousand of them were consumed: the rest, with their Captaine, escaped into Cilicia. Seleucus had gotten possession of Cilicia, whilst Demetrius was occupied in Greece: yet was it no part of Demetrius his errand, to lay claime to the Countrey; but with vehement and humble letters he besought his son in law, to call to minde their alliance, and to pity him in his great misery. These letters, at the first wrought well with Seleucus, and he condescended to the request: yet considering further how Demetrius had carried himselfe, when he recouered strength after the battaile at Ipsus, he changed his purpose, and went against him with an Armie.

Many treaties were held betwene them, of which none tooke effect, through the iellousie of Seleucus. Therefore, mere desperation enforced Demetrius, to fight like a mad man, and his furies got him some victories, though of small importance. At length sickness tooke and held him fortie dayes, in which time, a great number of his few men, ran to the enemy. This notwithstanding he still held out, and once had like to haue taken Seleucus in his bed, had not his comming beene discovered by fugitiues, that gaue alarme. Finally, when all his Armie had forsaken him, and left him with a few of his friends to shift for himselfe, he was compelled by the last of those adherents (for euen some of those few forsooke him) to yeelde vnto Seleucus.

Seleucus hearing this, was exceeding glad, and sent him very comfortable messages. But the approbation of his owne humanitie, by his followers, was such, as renewed his iellous thoughts, and hindred him from admitting Demetrius to his presence, though otherwise he vsed him with as much fauour, as any prisoner could wish. He was kept vnder sure guard in a demie-Iland, wherein were goodly walkes, Orchards, and Parkes for hunting. Hee had all that he asked royally, and friends allowed to visit him, at his, and their pleasure. Onely his libertie was reserued vnto the comming of young Antiochus and Stratonica, out of the high Countries. In this sort he spent three yeeres, liuing merily all the while (as one that now enioyed the happinesse, which with so much trauaile and blood-shed, hee had sought in vaine) and then dyed, leaving to his sonne Antigonus, the same which his father had left vnto himselfe; that is, friends and hope. His ashes were honourably buried in Corinth; his qualities haue appeared in his actions, and the fortune of his house will shew it selfe hereafter, in times and places conuenient.

The death of Ptolomie, of Lyfimachus, and of Seleucus, that was last of Alexanders Captaines: with other occurrences.

ABout the same time that Demetrius died, did also Ptolomie King of Egypt, a vertuous Prince, warlike, gentle, bountifull, and (which in those times was a rare commendation) regardfull of his word. He had, by many Wiues and Concubines, many children, out of whom hee selected Ptolomie Philadelphus, and caused him to reigne together with himselfe, two or three yeeres before he died, that so hee might confirme him in the inheritance of the Kingdome. At this, Ptolomie Ceraunus (for all of that house assumed the name of Ptolomie) was grieuouly incensed. But no man cared for his anger. Therefore he went to Seleucus, who gaue him louing entertainment. There were now onely two of Alexanders Captaines left, Seleucus and Lyfimachus. These two needs would fight for it, who should be the longest liuer of that braue Companie. The true ground of their quarrell was, their neere equalitie of strength, and want of one to part them. The pretence was the murders which Lyfimachus had committed vpon many of his Nobles, together with his poysoning Agathocles his eldest sonne: whose wife and children fled vnto Seleucus for aide.

The Macedons after seuen Moneths pause, having spent their first heate of admiration, began to harken so well to Lyfimachus, their naturall Countrey-man, that they forsooke Pyrhus, vpon none other ground than because he was an Alien. This they had knowne well enough before: but they did him no great wrong in taking lightly from him, that they lightly gaue him. Lyfimachus had reigned about five yeeres aloue, when the Citie of Lyfimachia (built by him, and called after his name) falling by an earthquake, appeared, by euents, to haue foreshewed the fall of his house. His owne iellousie, and the instigation of a mother in law, caused him to poyson his Sonne Agathocles, which drew vpon him that Warre, wherein (after the losse of all his fifteene children that were taken away by diuers accidents) he perished himselfe.

Seleucus was encountred by Lyfimachus on Asia side, where one battaile concluded the warre, with Lyfimachus his death. It pleased Seleucus more than the victorie, that he was the last of all the great Herōes that followed Alexander. For now he seemed to himselfe as Lord and Heire of all the conquered world. So hee passed ouer into Macedon, to take possession of Europe, where there was none to withstand him. But there hee ended his daies, and within seauen moneths followed Lyfimachus, and other of his fellows, by a bloudie death, being treacherously slaine by Ptolomie Ceraunus, whose friend and Patron he had beene. Seuentie and seuen yeere old he was, when hee fought with Lyfimachus, and Lyfimachus was seuentie and foure. With them ended the generation of olde Captaines, that had scene the daies as it were of another world vnder the Persian: yet was there left one equall to any of them in the Art of Warre: euen Pyrhus the Epirot, of whom we spake before; that is now ready to enter into warre with the Romanes, a more warlike people, than Alexander himselfe did euer encounter. Of which warre, and of which people, it is needfull that we heere make mention, as of a storie more important, than any likely to ensue in Greece, or in the great Kingdomes that were held by Alexanders Successors, with lesse (and still decreasing) vertue, than was that, by which they were first purchased.

CHAP. VII.

The growth of Rome : and setting of the Easterne Kingdomes.

§. I.

How the Romans enlarged their Dominion in Italie, from the death of Tullus Hostilius, vnto such time as they were assailed by Pyrrhus.

Ow Rome was founded by Romulus ; settled in good order by Numa Pompilius ; and by many, though small, victories, it gathered strength, vnto such time as it became the head of Latium, by the conquest of Alba, in the reigne of Tullus Hostilius : it hath bene already noted, in due order of time. But whereas now the Roman greatnes beginneth to encounter the power of Greece; and extending it selfe out of Italie, to ouerwhelme the Dominions of other States and Princes : I hold it conuenient (as in like cases I haue done) briefly to set downe the growth of this mightie

Citie, in a compendious relation, of those many actions, which could not haue bene deliuered in the ages, wherein they were severally performed, without much interruption of the Historie, that was then occupied in matter more important.

After the death of Tullus Hostilius (who when he had reigned two and thirtie yeares, was burnt together with his house by lightning) Ancus Martius, Grandchilde to Numa Pompilius by his daughter, and not much vnlike him in disposition, succeeded in the Kingdome of Rome. Hee walled the Citie about, enlarged it with the hill Auentine, which he enclosed; built a bridge ouer Tybris, & the Citie of Osia vpon the Sea, sixteene miles distant from Rome. Finally, hauing reigned foure and twenty yeeres, he died, and by his last Will he left his children in charge with one Lucumon, the sonne of Damaratus, a Corinthian, who auoyding Cypselus King of Corinth his tyranny, had fled into Hetruria, and dwelt in Tarquiny, by the name of which Town he was afterwards called Tarquinius. From that Citie in Hetruria comming to Rome, and encouraged by some ominous occurrences, together with his wife *Tanaquil*s propheticke, he grew a favorite of Ancus Martius; by his Gracian wit humouring the factions of the Roman Court, insomuch that after his decease, he became not onely Protector to the children, but Gouvernour to the Citie. He doubled the number of Senators, and enlarged the Centuries of Horsemen : neither was he lesse eminent in warre, than in peace : for he preuailed often against the *Tuscan*s, and from his victories, the chiefe ornaments of triumph tooke their originall. When this Lucius Tarquinius had reigned eight and thirtie yeeres, he was slaine by the sonnes of Ancus Martius, to whom he had bene left Guardian. But Tanaquil his wife, perceiving what was done, enformed the people, from out of an high Turret, that her Husband was wounded, and sicke, but not dangerously. And withall signified vnto them, that in the interim of his sicknesse, one Seruius Tullius, whom from his birth shee alwaies prophesied to be borne to great hopes, (the sonne of P. Corniculanus and Ocrista, a well descended, but captiue woman) brought vp in her house, and husband vnto her daughter, should supply her husbands place, in gouerning the State, vntill his recouerie : which gouernement, being thus at first obtained by cunning, he afterwards vsurped as his right. He first ordained Ratements, Subsidies, and valuations of the peoples wealth, among whom, at that time, fourescore thousand were mustered, of which number consisted their whole corporation; and by distinction of Dignities, Ages, Trades, and Offices, hee managed the Kingdome in as good sort, as if it had bene a priuate household. At length, hauing two daughters of different natures, the one milde and gentle, the other fierce and outrageous : and finding also that the two sonnes of Tarquinius Priscus, Sextus and Aruns, which had bene committed vnto his tuition, were of different dispositions, proportionably answering to his daughters ; hee (willing to adde water, not oyle, to fire) gaue the middle daughter to Sextus the hot-headed sonne; and the violent, to Aruns the gentle in marriage. But whether by intended courses, or by accident, it hapned; the two milde ones being made away, the furious natures were readily ioyned in marriage : who soone concurring, and calling the Senate together, began to lay claime to the Kingdome. Vpon this tumult, Seruius Tullius hastning to the Senate, (where he thought by authority to haue bridled insolencie) was throwne downe the staires, and going home sore bruised, was slaine by the way, when he had reigned fortie and foure yeeres. Then Tullia his daughter, first, proclaiming her husband Tarquinius Superbus King; returning home, enforced her Coach-man to driue his Chariot ouer her fathers corpes; whereupon the street had the denomination of wicked street. This Tarquine, exercising cruelty without iustice, and tyrannic without mercie, vpon the people and Senators; hauing tired himselfe and them at home, vsed the same rage of treacherie vpon his borders. He tooke Ocriculum, Succsa, Pometia, and the Gabij. The issue of besieging Ardea; a towne eightene miles distant from Rome, was of bad successe. In the heat of which warre, his sonne Sextus Tarquinius violently rauished that chaste Ladie Lucretia, his kinsman Collatines wife : who in way of expiation for so vnchaste a deed, thought good to wash out those spots of infamie with her owne bloud; so (hauing first bequeathed the reuenge vnto her father Sp. Lucretius Triptimus, her husband Collatine, & Iunius Brutus) she kild her selfe : whereupon (chiefly by Iunius Brutus his resolution) Tarquinius Superbus, with his wife and children, was depofed and banished; and fledde to Porfenna King of Hetruria for succour, in the five and twentieth yere of his reigne, and the two hundred fortie and fourth from the building of their Citie : in which space Rome had scarce gotten possession of fiftene miles round about her.

Iunius Brutus by the helpe of Collatine, hauing expelled Tarquine, and freed his Countrey from that heauy yoke of bondage, enforced the people by solemne oath, neuer to admit any gouernment by Kings amongst them : whereupon they ransacked their Kings goods, consecrated their fields to Mars, and conferred the gouernment of the State vpon Brutus and Collatine. But because the name of King was odious in their cares, they changed the manner of their gouernment, from perpetuall to annuall, and from a single gouernour to a double; left perpetuall or sole dominion might be some motiue to vsurpation; and in stead of Kings they called them Consuls, signifying, as it may be interpreted, Providers : that their titles might remember them of their place, which was to be alwaies mindefull of their Citizens welfare. And yet was it so hard feeling of troubled waters, that the people, after this innouation of State, scarce daring to assure themselves of their owne securitie, enforced Tarquinius Collatine to resigne vp his authoritie, fearing that tyrannic would bee hereditarie, and supposing that the very name and affinitie with the house of Tarquine, fauoured alreadie of their condition. In his roome was substituted Valerius Publicola, who that hee might (as his name importeth) be gracious in the peoples eies, gaue liberty, in matters of controuersie, to appeale from the Consuls to the people : and that hee might as well in goods as in person, auoyde occasion of suspition, caused his owne house to bee pulled downe, because it was built in a place defensible, as if it had bene a Citadell. Neither was Brutus any waies deficient in matter of greater moment; which concerned as well the peoples safetie, as their fauour : for hauing got intelligence, that some greener wits, and in the first ranke his owne sonnes, were itching after innouations, hoping to restore the banished Kings; hee caused them, publicly in the Market-place, to be whipt, and then to bee brought all vnpartially to the blocke.

Hitherto the Romanes, hauing by the vnblemished integritie of Brutus, wel appealed all inbred quarrels at home, now hereafter employ their military designements, against Forrainers; first, for their liberty; secondly, for enlarging of their possessions; and lastly, for defending their confederate Prouinces, and extending their Empire. For Rome, situated as it were in the mid-way betwene Latium and the *Tuscan*s, hauing as yet but narrow bounds, being in her minority, could not but giue occasion of offence to her neighbors; vntill by maine opposition, hauing preuailed against her borderers, she vsed them as instruments, whereby to obtaine the rest.

Their first warre, in the first yere of Consuls, was against Porfenna King of Hetruria : who being ouer-perfwaded by Tarquines lamentation, came to Rome, together with the banished King, and with great forces, to seate him againe in his Kingdome.

In the first conflict, Horatius Cocles, hauing long time borne the maine brunt of his enemies, on the bridge ouer Tybris; at length, feeling himselfe too faint to stand against so many, caused the bridge behinde him to be broken downe, and with his armour, leaping into the River, like a hunted Stagge, refreshed his hot spirits, and returned safe to his fellows, with the like resolution to sustaine a new charge. Porfenna although by this he had well-nigh won the hill Ianiculus, which is the verie entrance into the Citie, and found the victorie, in a manner, assuredly his owne: yet admiring their valour, and terrified by the constant resolution of Mutius Scauola (who hauing by error slaine Porfenna his Secretarie, in stead of the King himselfe, did in scorn of torments threatned, burne off his owne hand) he thought it not any whit preiudiciall, either to his safetie, or credit, to enter league with them at the worst hand. And yet the edge of Tarquinius his spleene, was not quite abated, though Aruns his sonne, and Brutus his enemie, in single combat, had slaine each other. And here the Romans, although they lost Brutus, got the field; and their Ladies, whose Champion he was, for their chastitie, nor for beauty, mourned the losse of him one whole yeere. Into his place, for the residue of his yeere, was subrogated Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, father to Lucretia: and in his roome (deceasing naturally before the yeere expired) Horatius Pulvillus.

Tarquine, vpon his ouerthrow, feeling the fates disastrous, thought it no boot to stiee against the streame, and spent the residue of his time, which was about fourteene yeeres, priuately at Tusculum. Yet his sonne-in-law Mamilius Tusculanus, stomaching a-fresh at those olde repulses, because Porfenna had made peace with the Romans, and denied further succor vnto the Tarquines, multered vp his Latines, and gaue battaile to the Romans, at the Lake Regillum; where the conflict was fierce, and the issue vncertaine, vntill Anulus Posthumus, the Roman Dictator, (for they had created this Magistracy greater than Consuls, purposely for this Warre, when first it was expected) to exasperate his Souldiers courage, threw their owne Ensignes amidst the Enemies; and Cossus or Spurius Cassius (master of the Horse-men, an assistant Officer to the Dictator) commanded to take off their bridles, that they might runne with free violence, to recouer againe their Ensignes. This fight was so well performed, that a report went of Castor and Pollux, two gods, who came on milke-white Steeds, to be eye-witnesses of their valour, and fellow-helpers of their victorie; for the Generall consecrated a Temple to them, as a stipend for their paines. After this the Romans fierce spirits, hauing no object of valour abroad, reflected vpon themselves at home; and the sixteenth yeere after the Kings expulsion, vpon instigation of some desperate backbouts, thinking themselves wrongfully oppressed by the Senate and Consuls, they made an vprore in the holy Mount; vntill by Meuenius Agrippa, his discret allusion, of the inconuenience in the head and bellies discord, to that present occasion, they were reconciled to the Senate: with condition, that they might haue some new Magistrates created, to whom they might appeale in cases of variance, and make them Solicitors in all their controuersies, the Consuls authoritie notwithstanding. This was enacted, and they were called the Tribunes of the people. After this attonement among themselves, they had continuall War with the Latines, concerning their bounds and limits, and with other neighbouring States. Amongst these, the Volsci and Aequi held them longest; who made Ware, of themselves, vpon the Romans: whereby they lost the best Citie in their whole iurisdiction, Corioli.

In this conquest, T. Martins got the surname of Coriolanus: a name honorable then, as deriued from a great victory: although, by reason of the poeury of the Town, a Roman General, in after times, would haue been ashamed of that title. But yet these graces had bin no occasion of disparagement, had he not afterwards, in a great time of dearth, aduised to sell corne, which they procured from Sicil, at too high a rate, to the people: whereupon, Decius Mus, their Tribune, in their behalfe, accused him, & after iudgement banished him. Coriolanus flying to the Volsci, whom lately before he had vanquished, incensed them to renew their forces againe; which being committed vnto him, and to Attius Tullus, he prevailed in field, so far forth, that he was come within foure or fise miles of the City. Incamping there, he made so sharpe warre, and was at such defiance, with his Country, that he would not relent by any supplication of Embassadors, vntill his Mother Veturia, & Volumnia his Wife, with a pittifull tune of deprecation, shewing themselves better Subiects to their Country, then friends to their sonne and husband, were more auaileable to Rome, then was any force of Armes. Heere vpon Coriolanus dismissing his Armie, was after pur to death among the Volsci, as a Traitor, for neglecting such opportunitie: or (as others surmise) liuing with them vntill old age, he died naturally.

Not

Not long after this, the Veij in Hetruria, prouoked the Romans, against whom the Fabij, three hundred and sixe in number, all of one Familie, intreated and obtained, that they only might be employed, as it had bin in a priuate quarrell. These Fabij, after some good seruices, lying incamped at Cremora, were circumuented, and all slaine: one only of that whole house, had been left, by reason of infancie, at home; from whom afterward sprang Fabius Maximus, who vanquished Hannibal.

In proceesse of time, the Romans were also troubled with the Volsci, at the hill of Algidum, two miles from Rome; where Lucius Minutius their Consul, with his whole Army, had bene discomfited, had not L. Quintius Cincinnatus chosen Dictator, and taken from the plough to the highest honor in Rome, with successe answerable to his expedition, dispersed his enemies, and freed his Countie in the space of sixteene daies. In the continuance of this Volscian warre it was, that Appius Claudius, one of the ten men, whom they had two yeeres before chosen Governours of the State, and inactors of Solons lawes amongst them, procured from Athens (abrogating in the meane while the Consuls, and all other Magistrates) would haue rauished Virginia, the daughter of T. Virginius, Captaine of a Companie, and lying then in campe at Algidum. Heere vpon the people, in an vprore,ooke the Hill Auentine, and after much variance, enforced the ten men, to resigne vp their authoritie againe, to new Consuls.

After this, either new quarrells, or desire to reuenge old losses, drew the Romans into a new war, against the Veientes, and their adherents, vpon whom hauing tried their forces, with diuersitie of Captaines, and varietie of euent, they vanquished the Falisci, and the Fidenates, and vterly subdued the Veientes. In conquering the Falisci, Furius Camillus shewed no lesse integritie then fortitude. For when a Schoolemaster, by trayning forth into the Roman campe, many children of the principall Citizens, thought to betray the Towne, yeelding them all vp as Hostages: Camillus deliuered this Traitor bound vnto his Schollers, willing them to whip him backe into the Citie; which forthwith yeelded vnto him in reuerence of his iustice. The siege of Veij was ten yerres, and so troublesome, that the Romans were there first enforced to winter abroad vnder beasts skinnes (to which they were the more easily induced, because then first they receiued pay) and to make vp vovues neuer to returne without victorie.

At length winning the Citie by a Mine, they got so large spoyle, that they consecrated their tenths to Apollo Pythius: & the whole people in generall, were called to the ransacking of the Citie. But yet they were no lesse vnthankfull to Camillus for his seruice, then before they had bene to Coriolanus; For they banished him the Citie, vpon some occasion of inequality in diuiding the spoyle: yet he requited their vnkindnesse with a new peece of seruice, against the furie of the Gauls: who being a populous Countie, and very healthfull, the fathers (as sometimes now) liued so long, that the sonnes, destitute of meanes, were enforced to roaue abroad, seeking some place, where to set vp their rest: and withall being a Nation vaste in body, rude by nature, and barbarous in conditions, wandered as Routers ouer many Countries. Some of them lighting on Italie, set vpon Clusium, a Towne in Hetruria: whereof Rome hauing information, (and being carefull of her Confederate Townes) sent Embassadors, warning them to desist from such iniurious enterprises. But the barbarous people, not regarding the message, vpon some iniurie offered by the Romane Embassadors, conuerted their forces from Clusium towards Rome; and giuing a great ouerthrow vnto the Romans, by the River Allia, vpon the sixteenth day before the Calends of August (which day was after branded for vn lucky, and called Alliensis in the Romane Kalendar) they hastened towards the Citie. Then was Rome the true map of miserie and desolation. For some leauing the Citie, some creeping into holes; Priests hiding their reliques; and euery one shifiting for himself, ere the enemie came; Rome was abandoned, as indefensible. The Vestall Virgins, in this tumult, were safely conuayed away; the Ancients of the City, gathering boldnesse out of desperate feare, did put on their Robes, and taking their leaue of the world, did seat themselves in Thrones, in their seuerall houses, hourly expecting the messengers of death, and meaning to die, as they had liued, in State. The younger sort, with M. Manlius their Captaine, tooke vpon them to make good the Capitoll.

By this, the Gauls were entred the Citie, who seeing all quiet, at first suspected some ambush; afterward finding all secure, they fell to the spoyle, committing all to the fire and sword. As for the old Senators, they sat in their Maiesty, with a graue resolution: hauing having first reuerenced them as gods, anon they tried whether they would die like men. When the Citie was thoroughly rifled, they attempted the Capitoll: which held them worke for the space of seuen Moneths. Once they were like to haue surprised it by night, but being descried by the gagling of Geese, M. Manlius did awaken, and kept them from entrance. At length a composition was agreed vpon: the Gaules being weary, and the Romans hungrie. The bargain was, that the Gaules should take a thousand pound waight in gold, to desist from their siege. Whilest the gold was in waighing, the Gaules, with open insolencie, made their waights too heauie: Brennus, their Captaine, casting his sword into the ballance, and, with a proud exprobration, saying, that the vanquished must be patient perforce. But in the midst of this cauilling came Furius Camillus, with an Armie, from Ardea, (where he had liued in his banishment) and fell vpon the Gaules, with such violence, that hee dispersed their troups, quenched the fire of the Citie with the r blood, forcing them to restore the spoyles with aduantage, and forbear the gold, in accepting which, they had lately beene so nice. Further, hauing rid the Citie of them, he so hotly pursued them, through a great part of Italie, that the remainder of their Armie, which escaped from him, was very small. Other Armies of the Gaules, which followed this first, had the like ill successe. They were often beaten by the Romans; especially the victories of M. Torquatus, and of M. Valerius Coruinus (each of which in single fight slew a seuerall Champion of the Gaules) abated their presumption, and restored courage to the Romans. Camillus, for his notable seruice, was afterwards accompted a second Romulus.

The people, after this destruction of their Citie, were earnestly bent to goe to the Veij to inhabite; but Camillus dissuaded them.

About the same time, somewhat before the siege of Veij, they changed their government from Consuls to militarie Tribunes. The government of these also, after some yeares, was by ciuill diffension interrupted: so that one while Consuls ruled, another while there was an Anarchie: Then the Tribunes were restored and ruled againe, till after many yeeres expired, the Consular authoritie was established; it being enacted, that one of the Consuls should alwaies be a Plebeian. This was after the building of the City 365. yeeres. And now Rome by suppression of her neighbour Countries, creeping well forward out of her Minoritie, dares set forth against the warlike Samnites, who dwelt almost one hundred and thirtie miles off: situated between Campania and Apulia. These did so strongly invade the Campanians their Neighbours, that they forced them to yeeld themselves subiects to Rome, and vndergoe any conditions of Tribute, or whatsoeuer else to obtaine protection: which the Romans, although both Countries had beene their Confederates, yet not willing that the greater, like fish, should deuoure the lesse, easily allowed of; aiming themselves at the good situation of Campania, the abundance of Corne and Wine, pleasant Cities and Townes, but especially Capua it selfe, the fairest Citie then in all Italie.

The families of the Papyrij and Fabij were most employed in the managing of this warre, which endured the space of fiftie yeeres. And in this season were the Romans oftentimes dangerously encountred by the Samnites, as when T. Veturius, and Sp. Posthumus were Consuls, and discomfited by Pontius at Caudium, with no small ignominy: and when Q. Fabius Gurges lost the field with three thousand men. But for those losses, many great victories made large amends: The greatest whereof were gotten by L. Papyrius, and by Quintus Fabius Maximus.

The Samnites drew the Hetrurians into their quarrell. But the force of the Samnites was well broken, ere the Hetrurians (the greater and richer, but lesse warlike Nation) began to stir. So the one and the other of these two Countries, became at length tributary to Rome. In the continuance of this long warre it was, (though in time of truce between the Romans and Samnites) that the Latines beganne to challenge equall freedom in the Corporation of Rome, and right in bearing office, so that they required to haue one of the Consuls yeerely chosen out of them.

This demand of the Latines, was not vnreasonable. For the Romans themselves were a Latine Colonie; besides all which, they made offer, to change their name, and to bee all called Romans. But the Romans were too proud, to admit any such capitulation. So a great battaile was fought betweene them: wherein the fortune of Rome preuailed, by the vertue of the Consuls.

Manlius

Manlius Torquatus, and the elder Decius, were then Consuls, whom the Soothsayers aduertised, that the side should be victorious which lost the Generall in fight. Hereupon Decius the Consul, exposed his life to the Enemy, and purchased victorie (as was beleued) by his death. In which kinde of deuoting himselfe for his Armie, the sonne of this Decius being after Consul, did imitate his father, in the Hetrurian warre. But (as Tallie well notes) it was rather the desperate resolution of these Decij, that purchased victorie, by rushing into the midst of the enemies, wherein their Souldiers followed them, than any great commendation of such a religion, as required the liues of so worthy Citizens, to be sacrificed for their Countrey. The discipline of Manlius was no lesse resolute, than the valour of Decius. He forbade any one to forsake his place, and fight single with an enemy. For breach of which order he caused his owne sonne to be per to death, who had slaine a Captaine of the Latines, being challenged in single fight.

When the Latines, the Aqui, Volsci, Hernici, Campani, Samnites, and Hetrurians, with some other people, were brought vnder obedience; it was a vaine labour for any people of Italie, to contend against the Romans.

Yet the Sabines aduentured to trie their fortune; and found it bad. For Curius Dentatus, the Roman Consul, waisting all their Countrey with fire and sword, from the Riuer Nar and Velia, to the Adriatique Sea, brought them into quiet subiection.

The last of the Italians, that made triall of the Roman Armes, were the Tarentines, and their adherents. These had interposed themselves as Mediators, between the Romans and Samnites; with a peremptorie denunciation of Warre, vnto that partie, which should dare to refuse peace, by them tendred. These threats which discouered their bad affection vnto Rome, ended in words; but when the Samnites were vterlie subdued, matter enough of quarrell was found, to examine their abilitie of performance.

The Romans complained that certaine ships of theirs were robbed, and sent Embassadors vnto Tarentum, to require amends. Vpon some wrong done to these Embassadors, was laid the foundation of that Warre, wherein the Lucans, Messapians, Brutians, and Apulians, ioyning with the Tarentines, procured the Samnites, and other Subiects of Rome, to rebell, and take their part. But some experience of the Roman strength, taughte all these people to know their owne weaknesse. Wherefore they agreed to lend for Pyrhus, by whose aide (being a Grecian, as the Tarentines also were) great hope was conceined, that the Dominion of Rome should be confined, vnto more narrow bounds, than all Italie, which already, in a manner it did ouer-spread.

§. II.

How Pyrhus warred vpon the Romans, and vanquished them in two battailes.

Pyrhus, forsaken by the Macedonians, and vnable to deale with Lysimachus, was compelled a while to liue in rest: which hee abhorred no lesse than a wiser Prince would haue desired. Hee had a strong Armie, and a good Fleet, which in that vnsterled estate of things, was enough to purchase a Kingdome: but the fall of Demetrius had so encreased the power of Lysimachus, that it was no point of wisdom, to make an offensive warre vpon him, without farre greater forces. Antigonus, the sonne of Demetrius, held Corinth at the same time, and some other Townes, with the remainder of his fathers Armie and treasures, left in his hand. Vpon him it is like that Pyrhus might haue wonne; but it was better to let him alone, that he might serue to giue some hindrance to Lysimachus.

In this want of imploiment, and couetous desire of finding it, the Tarentine Embassadors came very fitly to Pyrhus: and they came with braue offers, as needing no other aide then his good conduct, which to obtaine, they would cast themselves vnder his protection. They had in their company, some of the Samnites, Lucanians, Messapians, and others; which promised, in behalfe of their seuerall Nations, as much as could be desired. This encouraged Pyrhus, and filled him with hopes of goodly conquests; that hee might enlarge his Empire to the West, as farre as Alexander had gotten Eastward; and still by one victorie open the gate vnto another. To which effect it is said, that once hee answered Cyneas his chiefe Counsaillour, asking what hee meant to doe after eue of the victories which he hoped to get: that hauing wonne Rome, hee would soone bee Master of all Italie; that, after Italie hee would quickly get the Ile of Sicil; that,

CHAP. VII.

The growth of Rome : and setting of the Easterne Kingdomes.

§. I.

How the Romans enlarged their Dominions in Italie, from the death of Tullus Hostilius, vnto such time as they were assailed by Pyrrhus.

OW Rome was founded by Romulus; settled in good order by Numa Pompilius; and by many, though small, victories, it gathered strength; vnto such time as it became the head of Latium, by the conquest of Alba, in the reigne of Tullus Hostilius: it hath beene already noted, in due order of time. But whereas now the Roman greatnes beginneth to encounter the power of Greece; and extending it selfe out of Italie, to ouerwhelme the Dominions of other States and Princes: I hold it conuenient (as in like cases I haue done) briefly to set downe the growth of this mighty Citie, in a compendious relation, of those many actions, which could not haue beene delivered in the ages, wherein they were severally performed, without much interruption of the Historie, that was then occupied in matter more important.

After the death of Tullus Hostilius (who when he had reigned two and thirtie yeares, was burnt together with his house by lightning) Ancus Martius, Grandchilde to Numa Pompilius by his daughter, and not much vnlike him in disposition, succeeded in the Kingdom of Rome. Hee walled the Citie about; enlarged it with the hill Auentine, which he enclosed; built a bridge ouer Tybris; & the Citie of Ostia vpon the Sea, sixtene miles distant from Rome. Finally, hauing reigned foure and twenty yeeres, he died, and by his last Will he left his children in charge with one Lucumon, the sonne of Damaratus, a Corinthian, who auoyding Cypselus King of Corinth his tyranny, had fled into Hetruria, and dwelt in Tarquini, by the name of which Town he was afterwards called Tarquinius. From that Citie in Hetruria comming to Rome, and encouraged by some ominous occurrences, together with his wife *Tanaquil*s propheticie, he grew a favorite of Ancus Martius; by his Græcian wit humouring the factions of the Roman Court, in somuch that after his decease, he became not onely Protector to the children, but Governour to the Citie. He doubled the number of Senators; and enlarged the Centurions of Horsemen: neither was he lesse eminent in warre, than in peace: for he preuailed often against the Tuscans, and from his victories, the chiefest ornaments of triumph tooke their originall. When this Lucius Tarquinius had reigned eight and thirty yeeres, he was slaine by the sonnes of Ancus Martius, to whom he had beene left Guardian. But Tanaquil his wife, perceiving what was done, enformed the people, from out of an high Turret, that her Husband was wounded, and sicke, but not dangerously. And withall signified vnto them, that in the interim of his sickness, one Seruius Tullius, whom from his birth shee alwaies prophesied to be borne to great hopes, (the sonne of P. Corniculani and Ocristia, a well descended, but captiue woman) brought vp in her house, and husband vnto her daughter, should supply her husbands place, in governing the State, vntill his recouerie: which gouernment, being thus at first obtained by cunning, he afterwards vsurped as his right. He first ordained Ratements, Subsidies, and valuations of the peoples wealth; among whom, at that time, fourescore thousand were mustered, of which number consisted their whole corporation; and by distinction of Dignities, Ages, Trades, and Offices, hee managed the Kingdom in as good fort, as if it had beene a priuate household. At length, hauing two daughters of different natures, the one milde and gentle, the other fierce and outrageous: and finding also that the two sonnes of Tarquinius Priscus, Sextus and Aruns, which had beene committed vnto his tuition, were of different dispositions, proportionably answering to his daughters; hee (willing to adde water, not oyle, to fire) gaue the middle daughter to Sextus the hot-headed sonne; and the violent, to Aruns the gentle in marriage. But whether by intended courses, or by accident, it hapned; the two milde ones being made away, the furious natures were readily ioyned in marriage: who soone concurring, and calling the Senate together, began to lay claime to the Kingdom. Vpon this tumult, Seruius Tullius hastning to the Senate, (where he thought by authority to haue bridled insolencie) was throwne downe the staires, and going home sore bruised, was slaine by the way, when he had reigned fortie and foure yeeres. Then Tulla his daughter, first proclaiming her husband Tarquinius Superbus King; returning home, enforced her Coach-man to drine his Chariot ouer her fathers corpes; whereupon the street had the denomination of wicked street. This Tarquine, exercising cruelty without iustice, and tyrannie without mercie, vpon the people and Senators; hauing tired himselfe and them at home, vsed the same rage of treacherie vpon his borders. He tooke Orculanum, Suessa, Fundania, and the Gabij. The issue of besieging Ardea, a towne eightene miles distant from Rome, was of bad successe. In the heat of which warre, his sonne Sextus Tarquinius violently rauished that chaste Ladie Lucretia, his kinsman Collatines wife: who in way of expiation for so vnchaste a deed, thought good to wash out those spots of infamie with her owne blood; so (hauing first bequeathed the reuenge vnto her father Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, her husband Collatine, & Iunius Brutus) she kil'd her selfe: whereupon (chiefly by Iunius Brutus his resolution) Tarquinius Superbus, with his wife and children, was deposed and banished; and fledde to Porfenna King of Hetruria for succour, in the five and twentieth yeere of his reigne, and the two hundred fortie and fourth from the building of this Citie: in which space Rome had scarce gotten possession of fifteene miles round about her.

Iunius Brutus by the helpe of Collatine, hauing expelled Tarquine, and freed his Country from that heauy yoke of bondage, enforced the people by solemne oath, neuer to admit any gouernment by Kings amongst them: whereupon they rancked their Kings goods, consecrated their fields to Mars, and conferred the gouernment of the State vpon Brutus and Collatine. But because the name of King was odious in their eares, they changed the manner of their gouernment, from perpetuall to annuall, and from a single gouernour to a double; lest perpetuall or sole dominion might be some motiue to vsurpation; and in stead of Kings they called them Consuls, signifying, as it may be interpreted, Providers: that their titles might remember them of their place, which was to be alwaies mindefull of their Citizens welfare. And yet was it so hard settling of troubled waters, that the people, after this innouation of State, scarce daring to assure themselves of their owne securitie, enforced Tarquinius Collatine to resigne vp his authoritie, fearing that tyrannie would bee hereditarie, and supposing that the very name and affinitie with the house of Tarquine, fauoured alreadie of their condition. In his roome was substituted Valerius Publicola, who that hee might (as his name importeth) be gracious to the peoples eies, gaue liberty, in matters of controuersie, to appeale from the Consuls to the people: and that hee might as well in goods as in person, auoyde occasion of suspicion, caused his owne house to bee pulled downe, because it was built in a place defensible, as if it had beene a Citadell. Neither was Brutus any waies deficient in matter of greater moment; which concerned as well the peoples safetie, as their honour: for hauing got intelligence, that some greener wits, and in the first ranke his owne sonnes, were itching after innouations, hoping to restore the banished Kings; hee caused them, publickly in the Market-place, to be whipt, and then to bee brought all vnpartially to the blocke.

Hitherto the Romans, hauing by the vnblemished integritie of Brutus, wel appeased all rebred quarrels at home, now hereafter imploy their military designements, against Forreiners; first, for their liberty; secondly, for enlarging of their possessions; and lastly, for defending their confederate Prouinces, and extending their Empire. For Rome, situated as it were in the mid-way betweene Latium and the Tuscans, hauing as yet but narrow bounds, being in her minoritie, could not but giue occasion of offence to her neighbors; and by maine opposition, hauing preuailed against her borderers, she vsed them as instruments, whereby to obtaine the rest.

Their first warre, in the first yeere of Consuls, was against Porfenna King of Hetruria: who being ouer-perswaded by Tarquines lamentation, came to Rome, together with the banished King, and with great forces, to seate him againe in his Kingdom.

In the first conflict, Horatius Cocks, hauing long time borne the maine brunt of his enemies, on the bridge ouer Tybris; at length, feeling himselfe too faint to stand against so many, caused the bridge behinde him to be broken downe, and with his armour, leaping into into the Riuer, like a hunted Stagge, refreshed his hot spirits, and returned safe to his fellows, with the like resolution to sustaine a new charge. Porfenna although by this he had well-nigh won the hill Ianiculus, which is the verie entrance into the Citie, and found the victorie, in a manner, assuredly his owne: yet admiring their valour, and terrified by the constant resolution of Mutius Scauola (who hauing by error slaine Porfenna his Secretarie, in stead of the King himselfe, did in scorn of torments threatned, burne off his owne hand) he thought it not any whit preiudiciall, either to his safetie, or credit, to enter league with them at the worst hand. And yet the edge of Tarquinius his spleene, was not quite abated, though Aruns his sonne, and Brutus his enemy, in single combat, had slaine each other. And here the Romans, although they lost Brutus, got the field; and their Ladies, whose Champion he was, for their chastitie, not for beauty, mourned the losse of him one whole yeere. Into his place, for the residue of his yeere, was subrogated Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, father to Lucretia: and in his roome (deceasing naturally before the yeere expired) Horatius Pulvillus.

Tarquine, vpon his ouerthrow, feeling the fates disastrous, thought it no boot to strive against the frowne, and spent the residue of his time; which was about fourteene yeeres, priuately at Tusculum. Yet his sonne-in-law Mamilius Tusculanus, stomaching a-fresh at those olde repulses, because Porfenna had made peace with the Romans, and denied further succor vnto the Tarquines, mulstered vp his Latines, and gaue bataille to the Romans, at the Lake Regillum; where the conflict was fierce, and the issue vncertaine, vntill Aulus Posthumus, the Roman Dictator, (for they had created this Magistracy greater than Consuls, purposely for this Warre, when first it was expected) to exasperate his Souldiers courage, threw their owne Ensignes amidst the Enemies; and Cossus or Spurius Cassius (master of the Horse-men, an assistant Officer to the Dictator) commanded to take off their bridles, that they might runne with free violence, to recover againe their Ensignes. This fight was so well performed, that a report went of Cassius and Pollux, two gods, who came on milke-white Steeds, to be eye-witnesses of their valour, and fellow-helpers of their victorie; for the Generall consecrated a Temple to them, as a stipend for their paines. After this the Romans fierce spirits, hauing no object of valour abroad, reflected vpon themselves at home; and the sixteenth yeere after the Kings expulsion, vpon instigation of some desperate banderolles, thinking themselves wrongfully oppressed by the Senate and Consuls, they made an vprore in the holy Mount; vntill by Meuenius Agrippa, his discretallusion, of the inconuenience in the head and bellies discord, to that present occasion, they were reconciled to the Senate: with condition, that they might haue some new Magistrates created, to whom they might appeale in cases of variance, and make them Solicitors in all their controuersies, the Consuls authoritie notwithstanding. This was enacted, and they were called the Tribunes of the people. After this attencement among themselves, they had continuall War with the Latines, concerning their bounds and limits, and with other neighbouring States. Amongst these, the Volsi and Aequi held them longest; who made Warre, 40 of themselves, vpon the Romans: whereby they lost the best Citie in their whole iurisdiction, Corioli.

In this conquest, T. Martius got the surname of Coriolanus: a name honorable then, as deniued from a great victory: although, by reason of the poeury of the Town, a Roman General, in after times, would haue been ashamed of that title. But yet these graces had bin no occasion of disparagement, had he not afterwards, in a great time of dearth, aduised to sell corne, which they procured from Sicily, at too high a rate, to the people: whereupon, Decius Mus, their Tribune, in their behalfe, accused him, & after iudgement banished him. Coriolanus flying to the Volsi, whom lately before he had vanquished, incensed them to renew their forces againe; which being committed vnto him, and to Atius Tullus, he prevailed in field, so far forth, that he was come within foure or fife miles of the City. Incamping there, he made so sharpe warre, and was at such defiance, with his Country, that he would not relent by any supplication of Embassadors, vntill his Mother Veturia, & Voluntia his Wife, with a pittifull tune of deprecation, shewing themselves better Subiects to their Country, then friends to their sonne and husband, were more auailable to Rome, then was any force of Armes. Heere vpon Coriolanus dismissing his Armie, was after purto death among the Volsi, as a Traitor, for neglecting such opportunitie: or (as others surmise) liuing with them vntill old age, he died naturally.

Not

Not long after this, the Vej in Hetruria, prouoked the Romans, against whom the Fabij, hundred and sixe in number, all of one Familie, intreated and obtained, that they might be employed, as it had bin in a priuate quarrell. These Fabij, after some good success, lying incamped at Cremera, were circumuented, and all slaine: one only of that familie, had been left, by reason of infancie, at home; from whom afterward sprang Publius Maximus, who vanquished Hannibal.

In proesse of time, the Romans were also troubled with the Volsi, at the hill of Algidum, two miles from Rome; where Lucius Minutius their Consul, with his whole Army, had bene discomfited, had not L. Quintius Cincinnatus chosen Dictator, and taken from the plough to the highest honor in Rome, with successe answerable to his expedition, defeated his enemies, and freed his Countie in the space of sixteene daies. In the continuance of this Volsian warre it was, that Appius Claudius, one of the ten men, whom they chose two yeeres before chosen Governours of the State, and inactores of Solons lawes against them, procured from Athenes (abrogating in the meane while the Consuls, and all other Magistracies) would haue rauished Virginia, the daughter of T. Virginus, Captaine of a Companie, and lying then in campe at Algidum. Heere vpon the people, in an vprore,ooke the Hill Auentine, and after much variance, enforced the ten men, to resigne their authoritie againe, to new Consuls.

After this, either new quarrells, or desire to reuenge old losses, drew the Romans into a new warre, against the Veientes, and their adherents, vpon whom hauing tried their forces, the Romans sent out a varietie of euent, they vanquished the Falisci, and the Volturni, and vnterly subdued the Veientes. In conquering the Falisci, Furius Camillus showed no lesse integritie then fortitude. For when a Schoolemaster, by trayning forth the Roman campe, many children of the principall Citizens, thought to betray the Romans, yelding them all vp as Hostages: Camillus deliuered this Traitor bound vnto his Schollers, willing them to whip him backe into the Citie; which forthwith yeelde d vnto him in reuerence of his iustice. The siege of Vej was ten yeeres, and so troublesome, that the Romans were three first enforced to winter abroad vnder beasts skinnes (to which they were the more easily induced, because then first they received pay) and to make no returne without victorie.

At length winning the Citie by a Mine, they got so large spoyle, that they consecrated it to Apollo Pythius: & the whole people in generall, were called to the ransacking of the Citie. But yet they were no lesse vnthankfull to Camillus for his seruice, then before they had bene to Coriolanus; For they banished him the Citie, vpon some occasion of inequality in diuiding the spoyle: yet he requited their vnkindnesse with a new piece of seruice, against the furie of the Gauls: who being a populous Countie, and very healthfull, the fathers (as sometimes now) liued so long, that the sonnes, destitute of means, were enforced to roaue abroad, seeking some place, where to set vp their tent: and withall being a Nation vaste in body, rude by nature, and barbarous in conditions, wandered as Rovers ouer many Countie. Some of them lighting on Italia, vpon Clusum, a Towne in Hetruria: whereof Rome hauing information, (and being grieved full of her Confederate Townes) sent Embassadors, warning them to desist from such iniurious enterprises. But the barbarous people, not regarding the message, vpon some iniurie offered by the Romane Embassadors, converted their forces from Clusum towards Rome; and giuing a great overthrow vnto the Romans, by the Riuer Tiber, vpon the sixteenth day before the Calends of August (which day was after branched for vn lucky, and called Alliensis in the Romane Calendar) they hastened towards the Citie. Then was Rome the true map of miserie and desolation. For some leauing the Citie, some creeping into holes; Priests hiding their reliques; and euery one shifing for himselfe, ere the enemy came, Rome was abandoned, as indefensible. The Vestall Virgins, in this tumult, were safely conuayed away; the Ancients of the City, gathering boldnesse out of desperate feare, did put on their Robes, and taking their leaue of the world, did seat themselves in Thrones, in their seuerall houses, hourly expecting the messengers of death, and meaning to die, as they had liued, in State. The younger sort, with M. Manlius their Captaine,ooke vpon them to make good the Capitoll.

By this, the Gauls were entred the Citie, who seeing all quiet, at first suspected some ambush; afterward finding all secure, they fell to the spoyle, committing all to the fire and sword. As for the old Senators, they sate in their Maiesty, with a graue resolution:

having first reuerenced them as gods, anon they tried whether they would die like men. When the Citie was thoroughly rifled, they attempted the Capitoll: which held them worke for the space of seuen Moneths. Once they were like to haue surprised it by night, but being descried by the gagling of Geese, M. Manlius did awaken, and kept them from entrance. At length a composition was agreed vpon: the Gaules being weary, and the Romans hungrie. The bargain was, that the Gaules should take a thousand pound waight in gold, to desist from their siege. Whilest the gold was in waighing, the Gaules, with open insolencie, made their waights too heauie: Brennus, their Capitaine, casting his sword into the ballance, and, with a proud exprobration, saying, that the vanquished must be patient performer. But in the midst of this cauilling came Furius Camillus, with an Armie, from Ardea, (where he had liued in his banishment) and fell vpon the Gaules, with such violence, that hee disperfed their troupes, quenched the fire of the Citie with the rbloud, forcing them to restore the spoyles with aduantage, and forbear the gold, in accepting which, they had lately beene so nice. Further, hauing rid the Citie of them, he so hotly pursued them, through a great part of Italie, that the remainder of their Armie, which escaped from him, was very small. Other Armies of the Gaules, which followed this first, had the like ill successe. They were often beaten by the Romans; especially the victories of M. Torquatus, and of M. Valerius Corvinus (each of which in single fight slew a feuerall Champion of the Gaules) abated their presumption, and restored courage to the Romans. Camillus, for his notable seruice, was afterwards accompted a second Romulus.

The people, after this destruction of their Citie, were earnestly bent to goe to the Veij to inhabit; but Camillus dissuaded them.

About the same time, somewhat before the siege of Veij, they changed their government from Consuls to militarie Tribunes. The government of these also, after some yeares, was by ciuill diffension interrupted: so that one while Consuls ruled, another while there was an Anarchie: Then the Tribunes were restored and ruled againe, till after many yeeres expired, the Consular authoritie was established; it being enacted, that one of the Consuls should alwaies be a Plebeian. This was after the building of the City 365. yeeres. And now Rome by suppression of her neighbour Countries, creeping well forward out of her Minoritie, dares set forth against the warlike Sammites, who dwelt almost one hundred and thirtie miles off: situated between Campania and Apulia. These did so strongly invade the Campanians their Neighbours, that they forced them to yield themselves subiects to Rome, and vndergoe any conditions of Tribute, or whatsoever else to obtaine protection: which the Romans, although both Countries had bene their Confederates, yet not willing that the greater, like fish, should deuoure the lesse, easily allowed of; aiming themselves at the good situation of Campania, the abundance of Corne and Wine, pleasant Cities and Townes, but especially Capua it selfe, the fairest Citie then in all Italie.

The families of the Papyrij and Fabij were most employed in the managing of this warre, which endured the space of fiftie yeeres. And in this season were the Romans oftentimes dangerously encountred by the Sammites, as when T. Veturius, and Sp. Posthumus were Consuls, and discomfited by Pontius at Caudium, with no small ignominie: and when Q. Fabius Gurgus lost the field with threethousand men. But for those losses, many great victories made large amends: The greatest whereof were gotten by L. Papyrius, and by Quintus Fabius Maximus.

The Sammites drew the Hetrurians into their quarrell. But the force of the Sammites was well broken, ere the Hetrurians (the greater and richer, but lesse warlike Nation) began to stir. So the one and the other of these two Countries, became at length, tributary to Rome. In the continuance of this long warre it was, (though in time of truce between the Romans and Sammites) that the Latines beganne to challenge equall freedome in the Corporation of Rome, and right in bearing office, so that they required to haue one of the Consuls yeerely chosen out of them.

This demand of the Latines, was not vnreasonable. For the Romans themselves were a Latine Colonie; besides all which, they made offer, to change their name, and to be called Romans. But the Romans were too proud, to admit any such capitulation. So a great battaile was fought betwene them: wherein the fortune of Rome prevailed, by the vertue of the Consuls.

Manlius

Manlius Torquatus, and the elder Decius, were then Consuls, whom the Soothsayers sherrified, that the side should be victorious which lost the Generall in fight. Hereupon Decius the Consul, exposed his life to the Enemy, and purchased victorie (as was beleec- ed) by his death. In which kinde of deuoting himselfe for his Armie, the sonne of this Decius being after Consul, did imitate his father, in the Hetrurian warre. But (as Tallie well notes) it was rather the desperate resolution of these Decijs, that purchased victorie, by rushing into the midst of the enemies, wherein their Souldiers followed them, than any great commendation of such a religion, as required the liues of so worthy Citizens, to be sacrificed for their Countreie. The discipline of Manlius was no lesse resolute, than the valour of Decius. He forbade any one to forsake his place, and fight single with an enemy. For breach of which order he caused his owne sonne to be put to death, who had borne a Capitaine of the Latines, being challenged in single fight.

When the Latines, the Aqui, Volsci, Hernici, Campani, Sammites, and Hetrurians, with some other people, were brought vnder obedience; it was a vaine labour for any people of Italie, to contend against the Romans.

Yet the Sabines aduentured to trie their fortune; and found it bad. For Curius Dentatus, the Roman Consul, waisting all their Countreie with fire and sword, from the Riuer Ar and Felcia, to the Adriatique Sea, brought them into quiet subiection.

The last of the Italians, that made triall of the Roman Armes, were the Tarentines, and their adherents. These had interposed themselves as Mediatours, between the Romans and Sammites; with a peremptorie denunciation of Warre, vnto that partie, which should dare to refuse peace, by them tendred. These threats which discouered their bad affection vnto Rome, ended in words; but when the Sammites were vterlie subdued, matter enough of quarrell was found, to examine their abilitie of performance.

The Romans complained that certaine ships of theirs were robbed, and sent Embassadors vnto Tarentum, to require amends. Vpon some wrong done to these Embassadors, was laid the foundation of that Warre; wherein the Lucans, Messapians, Brutians, and Apulians, ioyning with the Tarentines, procured the Sammites, and other Subjects of Rome, to rebell, and take their part. But some experience of the Roman strength, taught all these people to know their owne weakness. Wherefore they agreed to send for Pyrrhus, by whose aide (being a Grecian, as the Tarentines also were) great hope was conceiued, that the Dominion of Rome should be confined, vnto more narrow bounds, than all Italie, which alreadie, in a manner it did ouer-spread.

§. II.

How Pyrrhus warred vpon the Romans, and vanquished them in two battailes.

Pyrrhus, forsaken by the Macedonians, and vnable to deale with Lysimachus, was compelled a while to lue in rest: which hee abhorred no lesse than a wiser Prince would haue desired. Hee had a strong Armie, and a good Fleet, which in that vnsettled estate of things, was enough to purchase a Kingdome: but the fall of Demetrius had so encreased the power of Lysimachus, that it was no point of wisdom, to make an offensive warre vpon him, without farre greater forces. Antigonus, the sonne of Demetrius, held Corinth at the same time, and some other Townes, with the remainder of his fathers Armie and treasures, left in his hand. Vpon him it is like that Pyrrhus might haue wonne; but it was better to let him alone, that he might serue to giue some hindrance to Lysimachus.

In this want of imploiment, and couetous desire of finding it, the Tarentine Embassadors came very ffly to Pyrrhus: and they came with braue offers, as needing no other aide then his good conduct, which to obtaine, they would cast themselves vnder his protection. They had in their company, some of the Sammites, Lucanians, Messapians, and others, which promised, in behalfe of their feuerall Nations, as much as could be desired. This encouraged Pyrrhus, and filled him with hopes of goodly conquests; that hee might enlarge his Empire to the West, as farre as Alexander had gotten Eastward; and still by one victorie open the gate vnto another. To which effect it is said, that once hee answered Cyneas his chiefe Counsellour, asking what hee meant to doe after eue- rie of the victories which he hoped to get: that hauing wonne Rome, hee would soone be Master of all Italie; that, after Italie hee would quickly get the Ile of Sicil; that, out of Sicill, he would passe ouer into Africk, and winne Carthage, with all the rest of the Countrey, and being strengthened with the force of all these Prouinces, he would be too hard, for any of those, that were now so proud and troublesome. But Cyneus enquired yet further, what they should doe, when they were Lords of all: Whereunto Pyrhus (fin- ding his drift) answered pleasantly, that they would liue merrily; a thing (as Cyneus then told him) that they presently might doe, without any trouble, if he could be contented with his owne.

Neuerthelesse, this Italian expedition seemed vnto Pyrhus, a matter of such consequence, as was not to be omitted, in regard of any scholasticall disputation. Wherefore he prepared his Armie, of almost thirty thousand men, well sorted, and well trained Souldiers: part of which he sent ouer before him vnder Cyneus, with the rest he followed in person. At his coming, he found the Tarentines very prompt of tongue, but in manner of execution, vtterly carelesse to prouide for the War. Wherefore he was faine to shur vp their Theater, and other places of pleasure and resort; enforcing them to take Arms, and making such a strict muster, as was to them very vnpleasing, though greatly behou- ing to their estate.

Whilest hee was occupied with these cares, Leuinus the Romane Consull drew neere, and began to waste Lucania, a Prouince confederate with the Tarentines in this Warre.

The Lucanians were not readie to defend their own Countrey; the Samnites were care- lesse of the harme, that fell not (as yet) vpon themselves; the Tarentines were better pre- pared than they would haue beene, but their valour was little: all of these had bene ac- customed to shrinke, for feare of the Roman fortitude: and therefore it fell out happily, that Pyrhus relied more vpon his owne forces, than the issue of the ir vnting promises. Hee was now driuen, either to set forward, with those that himselfe had brought into Italy; and the assistance of the Tarentines, wherein little was to be reposed; or else to weaken the reputation of his owne sufficiency, which by all meanes hee was carefull to vp- hold. In good time a great part of his forces, that had bene scattered by foule wea- ther at Sea, were safely come to him: with which hee resolved to assay the valour of the Romans, against whom he proudly marched.

Leuinus the Consull was not affrighted, with the terrible name of a great King; but so came on confidently to meet him, and giue him battaile, ere all his adherents should be ready to ioyne with him. This boldnesse of the Roman, and the slacknesse of the Messa- pians, Lucanians, Samnites, and others, whom the danger most concerned, caused Pyrhus to offer a treatie of peace: requiring to haue the quarrell betweene the Romans and his Italian friends, referred to his arbitrement. Whether he did this to winne time, that the Samnites and their fellows might arrive at his Campe; or whether, considering better at neere distance, the weight of the businesse, which he had taken in hand, hee were desirous to quit it with his honour; the short answer that was returned to his proposition, gaue him no means of either the one or the other: for the Romans sent him this word, that they had neither chosen him their Iudge, nor feared him their enemy.

Hereupon, both Armies hastened their march vnto the River of Siris: Leuinus in- tending to fight before the arriual of the Samnites; Pyrhus, to hinder him from passing that River, vntill his owne Armie were full. Vpon the first view of the Roman Campe, it was readily conceived by Pyrhus, that hee had not now to doe with barbarous people, but with men well trained in a braue discipline of warre: which caused him to set a strong Corps de garde, vpon the passage of the riuer, that hee might not be compelled to fight, vntill hee saw his best aduantage. But hee quickly found, that this new enemy was not onely skillfull in the Art of war, but courageous in execution. For the Roman Armie entered the Foord, in face of his Corps de garde; and their horse, at the same time, began to passe the Riuer, in sundry places: which caused the Greekes to forsake the defence of their banke, and speedily retire vnto their Campe.

This audacitie forced Pyrhus to battaile; wherewith hee thought it best to present them, ere the whole Armie had recovered firme footing, and were in order. So direct- ing his Captaines how to marshall his battailes; himselfe with the horse, charged vpon the Romans: who stoutly receiued him, as men well exercised in sustaining furious im- pressions. In this fight, neither did his courage transport him beyond the due tie of a carefull Generall; nor his prouidence in directing others, hinder the manifestation of his personall valour. It behoued him indeed to do his best; for he neuer met with better opposers. Once, and shortly after the fight began, his horse was slaine vnder him: after- wards, he changed armour with a friend; but that friend paid his life for the vse of his Kings armour, which was torne from his backe. This accident had almost lost him the battaile: but hee perceiuing it, discouered his face, and thereby restored courage to his men, and tooke from the Romans their vaine ioy. The fight was obstinate, and with the greater losse (at least of more eminent men) on Pyrhus his side, as long as onely speare and sword were vied. But when the Elephants were brought into the wings, whose vnu- suall forme and terrible aspect, the horses of the Romans (vnaccustomed to the like) were not able to sustaine; then was the victorie quickly gotten. For the Roman battailes, per- ceiuuing their horse put to rout, and driuen out of the field; finding also themselves both charged in flanke, and ouer-borne, by the force, and huge bulke, of those strange beasts; gave way to necessity, and saved themselves, as well as they could, by hasty flight: in which confederation, they were so forgetfull of their discipline, that they tarried not to defend their Campe, but ranne quite beyond it, leaving both it, and the honour of the day, entirely to Pyrhus.

The fame of this victory was soone spread ouer Italy; and the reputation was no lesse than the fame. For it was a matter very rare to be heard, that a Roman Consull, with a select Armie, should lose in plaine battaile, not onely the field, but the Campe it selfe, being so notably fortified, as they alwaies were. And this honour was the more brauely ascribed by Pyrhus, for that hee had with him none of his Italian friends, saue the vnwar- like Tarentines. Neither could he well dissemble his content that hee tooke, in hauiug the glory of this action peculiarly his owne; at such times as hee blamed the Lucans & Samnites, for coming (as wee say) a day after the faire. Neuerthelesse, he wisely considered the strength of the Romans, which was such, as would better endure many such losses, than hee could many such victories. Therefore hee thought it good to compound with them, whilest with his honour he might; and to that purpose hee sent vnto them Cyneus his Em- bassadour, demanding onely to haue the Tarentines permitted to liue at rest, and himselfe accepted as their especial friend. This did Cyneus, with all his cunning, and with libe- ral gifts labour to effect: but neither man nor woman could bee found in Rome, that would take any bribe of him; neither did their desire of recovering their captiues, or their danger, by the rising of many States in Italy against them, so incline them to peace, as the vehement exhortation of Appius Claudius, an olde and blinde Senator, did move them vp to make good their honour by warre. So they returned answer, that whi- lest Pyrhus abode in Italy, they would come to no agreement with him.

Such was the report, that Cyneus made at his returne, of the Roman puissance and ver- tue, as kindled in Pyrhus, a great desire of confederacie, with that gallant Citie. Heere- upon many kinde Offices passed betweene them: but still when hee vrged his motion of peace, the answer was, He must first depart out of Italy, and then treat of peace.

In the meane season, each part made prouision for warre; the Romans leauing a more mighty army than the former; and Pyrhus being strengthened with access vnto his for- ces, of all the East parts of Italy. So they came to triall of a second battaile, wherein (though after long and cruell fight) the boisterous violence of the Elephants gaue to Pyr- hus a second victorie. But this was not altogether so ioyfull as the former had beene: rather it gaue him cause to say, that such another victorie would be his vtter vndoing. For hee had lost the flower of his Armie in this battaile: and though he draue the Romans into their Campe, yet hee could not force them out of it, nor saw any likelihood of preuailling against them, that were like to be relieved with daily supplies, whilest hee should be dri- uen to spend vpon his old stocke. Neither could hee expect, that his Elephants should al- waies stand him in stead. A little knowledge of their manner in fight, would soone teach the Romans, that were apt Schollers in such learning, how to make them vserviceable. Wherefore hee desired nothing more, than how to carry his honour safe out of Italy: which to doe (seeing the Romans would not helpe him, by offering or accepting any faire conditions of peace, or of truce) hee tooke a slight occasion, presented by fortune, that followeth to be related.

§. III.

The great troubles in Macedon and Sicill. How Pyrrhus, being invited into Sicill, forsooke Italie; wanne the most of the Isle; and lost it in short space. Pyrrhus returnes into Italie; where he is beaten by the Romans, and so goes backe to his owne Kingdome.

When Ptolomie Ceraunus had traiterously murdered his Benefactor and Patron Seleucus, hee presently seized vpon all the Dominions of Lyfimachus in Europe, as if they had been the due reward vnto him, that had slaine the Conquerour. The houses of Cassander and Lyfimachus were then fallen to the ground: neither was there in Macedon any man of strength & reputation enough, to aduance himselfe against Ceraunus. The friends of Lyfimachus were rather pleased to haue him their King, than had (as hee professed) reuenged their Lords death; than any way offended with the outcomes of his fact, by which they were freed from subiection, to one, against whom they had stood in opposition. Many there were, that vpon remembrance of his Fathers great vertue, gathered hope of finding the like in Ceraunus: perswading themselves that his raigne might proue good, though his entrance had been wicked. These affections of the Macedonians did serue to defeat Antigonus the sonne of Demetrius, that made an attempt vpon the Kingdome. As for Antigonus, the sonne of Seleucus, he was farre off, & might be questioned about some part of Asia, ere he should be able to bring an Armie neere vnto Europe. Yet he made great shew of meaning to reuenge his Fathers death: but being stronger in monie then in Armes, he was content, after a while, to take faire words, and make peace with the murderer. While these three stroue about the Kingdome, Pyrrhus, who thought his claime as good as any of theirs, made vse of their dissention: threatening warre, or promising his assistance, to euery one of them. By these meanes hee strengthened himselfe, and greatly aduantaged his Italian voyage, which he had then in hand: requesting monie of Antiochus, ships of Antigonus, and souldiers of Ptolomie, who gaue him his daughter in marriage, and lent him a strong power of Macedonian Souldiers, and of Elephants (couenancing to haue them restored at two yeeres end) more for feare than for loue: that so he might free himselfe from trouble, and quietly enioy his Kingdome.

Thus Ptolomie grew mighty on the suddaine; and the power that by wicked meanes he had gotten, by meanes as wicked he increased.

All Macedon and Thrace being his, the strong Citie of Cassandria was held by Arfine his sister, the widow of Lyfimachus, who lay therein with her yong children. Her circumstance by making loue to her, and (according to the fashion of those times, wherein Princes regarded no degree of consanguinitie) taking her to wife, with promise to adopt her children: a promise that hee meant not to performe; for it was not long, ere he slew them, and draue her into exile.

In the pride of this good successe, which his villanie found, vengeance came vpon him from a farre, by the furie of a Nation, that hee had neuer heard of. Belgius a Captaine of the Gauls, hauing forced his passage through many Countries, vnto the confines of Macedon, sent a proud message to Ceraunus, commanding him to buy peace with monie, or otherwise, to looke for all the miseries of warre. These Gauls were the race of those, that issued out of their Countrey, to seeke new seates in that great expedition, wherein Brennus tooke and burnt the Citie of Rome. They had diuided themselves, at their setting forth, into two Companies; of which the one fell vpon Italie; the other passing through the Countries that lie on the Northerne side of the Adriaticke Sea, made long abode in Pannonia, and the Regions adioyning, where they forced all the neighbour Princes to redeeme peace with tribute, as now they would haue compelled Ceraunus to doe; vnto whose borders they came about an hundred and eight yeeres after such time as their fellowes had taken Rome.

When their Embassadors came to Ptolomie, asking what he would giue: His answer was, that he would be contented to giue them peace, but it must be with condition, that they should put into their hands their Princes as hostages, and yeeld vp their armes; for otherwise, he would neither pardon their boldnesse, nor giue any credit to their words. At this answer, when it was returned, the Gauls did laugh; saying, that they would soone confute with deedes, the vanity of such proud words. It may seeme strange, that that he, who had giuen away part of his Armie vnto Pyrrhus, for very feare; should be so confident in vnder-taking more mighty enemies. The King of the Dardaniens offered to lend him twenty thousand men against the Gauls; but he scorned the offer; saying, that he had the children of those, which vnder the conduct of Alexander, had subdued all the East. Thus hee issued forth against the barbarous people, with his famous Macedonians, as if the victory must needs haue followed the reputation of a great name. But hee soone found his great error, when it was too late. For the enemies were not only equall in strength of body, and fiercenesse of courage, but so farre superiour to the Macedonians in numbers, that few or none escaped their furie. Ptolomie himselfe grievously wounded, fell into their hands, whilest the battaile continued; and they presently strooke off his head, which they shewed to his men, on the top of a Lance, to their vtter astonishment.

The report of this great overthrow filled all Macedon with such desperation, that the people fled into walled Townes, and abandoned the whole Countrey as lost. Onely Sophones, a valiant Captaine, animating as many as he could, gathered a small Armie, with which he many times got the vpper hand, and hindred Belgius from vsing the victory at his whole pleasure. In regard of this his vertue, the Souldiers would haue made him King, which title he refused, and was contented with the name of a Generall. But (as mischiefs doe seldom come alone) the good successe of Belgius, drew into Macedon, Brennus, another Captaine of the Gauls, with an hundred and fiftie thousand foot, and fiftie thousand horse; against which mighty Armie, when Sophones with his weake troups made opposition, he was easily beaten, and the Macedonians againe compelled to hide themselves within their wals, leauing all their Countrey to the spoile of the Barbarians.

Thus were the Macedonians destitute of a King, and troden downe by a Nation, that they had not heard of; in lesse then fiftie yeeres after the death of Alexander, who sought to discouer and subdue vnknown Countries, as if all Greece, and the Empire of Persia, had bene too little for a King of Macedon.

Very seasonably had these newes bene carried to Pyrrhus in Italie, who sought a faire pretext of relinquishing his warre with the Romans; had not other tidings out of Sicill distracted him, and carried him away in pursute of nearer hopes. For after the death of Agaboles, who reigned ouer the whole Iland, the Carthaginians sent an Armie to conquer Sicill, out of which, by him, they had bene expelled. This Armie did so fast preuaile, that the Sicilians had no other hope to auoide slavery, than in submitting themselves to the rule of Pyrrhus; whom, being a Grecian, and a noble Prince, they thought it more for their good to obey, then to liue vnder the well knowne heavy yoke of Carthage. To him therefore, the Syracusans, Leontines, and Agraguntines, principall Elites of the Isle, sent Embassadors, earnestly desiring him to take them into his protection.

Ignoried Pyrrhus exceedingly, that two such notable occasions, of enlarging his Dominions, should fall out so vnluckily, both at one time. Yet whether he thought the business of Sicill more important, or more full of likelihood; or whether perhaps he beleened (as came after to passe) that his aduantage vpon Macedon would not so hastily passe away, but that he might finde some occasion to lay hold on it, at better leisure, ouer into Sicill he transported his Armie, leauing the Tarentines to shift for themselves, yet not leauing them free as he found them, but with a Garrison in their Towne, to hold them in subiection.

As his departure out of Italie, was rather grounded on head-long passion, than mature aduice; so were his actions following, vntill his returne vnto Epirus, rather many and tumultuous, then well ordered, or more-worthy. The Armie which he carried into that Isle, consisted of thirtie thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse: with which, soone after his descent in Sicill, he forced the Carthaginians, out of all, in effect, that they held therein. He also won the strong Citie of Eryx, and hauing beaten the Maerimes in battaile, he began to change condition, and turne Tyrant. For he draue Sofrasus (to whom his cruelty was suspected) out of the Iland, & put Thenon of Syracuse to death, being ialous of his greatnesse, which two persons had rashly stirred him, and deliuered the great and rich Citie of Syracuse into his hands. After this, his fortunes declined so fast, as he serued himselfe, and salued the disreputation of his leauing Sicill, by an Embassage sent him from the Tarentines, and Sammies, imploring his present helpe against against the Romans, who since his leauing Italie, had well-neere dispossessed them of all that they had.

Taking this faire occasion, he embarked for Italie; but was first beaten by the Carthaginian Gallies, in his passage, and secondly assailed in Italie it selfe, by eightene hundred Mamertines, that attended him in the straits of the Countrie. Lastly, after he had recovered Tarentum, he fought a third battaile with the Romans, led by M. Curius, who was victorious ouer him, and forc't him out of Italie, into his owne Epirus.

A Prince he was farre more valiant then constant, and had he beene but a Generall of an Armie, for some other great King or State, and had beene directed to haue conquered any one Countrey or Kingdome, it is to be thought, that he would haue purchased no lesse honour than any man of warre, either preceeding or succeeding him, for a greater Capitaine, or a valiant man, hath beene nowhere found. But he neuer staid vpon any enterprife; which was, indeede, the disease he had, whereof not long after he died in Argos.

§. IIII.

How Antigonus, the sonne of Demetrius, deliuered Macedon from the Gaules. How Pynhus wonne the Kingdome of Macedon from Antigonus.

His vertue of Sophenes being too weake, to defend the Kingdome of Macedon, and the fortune which had accompanied him against Belgius, failing him in his attempts against Brennus: the Macedonians were no lesse glad to submit themselves vnto the government of Antigonus, than they had formerly beene desirous to free themselves from the impotent rule of his father Demetrius. His conraing into the Countrie, with an Armie, Nauie, and treasure becomming a King, did rather breed good hope in the people, than fill them with much confidence: for he was driuen to vse against the Barbarians, onely those forces, which he brought with him, hauing none other than good wilhes of the Macedons, to take his part. Brennus, with the maine strength of his Armie, was gone to spoile the Temple of Apollo at Delphos, hauing left no more behinde him, than he thought necessary to guard the borders of Macedon, and Pannonia; which were about fiftene thousand foot, and three thousand horse. These could not beidle, but thought to get somewhat for themselves, in the absence of their fellows: and therefore sent vnto Antigonus, offering to sell him peace, if he would pay well for it; which by the example of Ceraunus, he had learnt (as they thought) not to refuse. Antigonus was unwilling to weaken his reputation, by condescending to their proud demands: yet he iudged it vsfit to exasperate their furious choler, by vn courteous words or vsage, as Ceraunus had ouer-fondly done. Wherefore he entertained their Embassadors in very louing and sumptuous manner, with a royall feast: wherein he exposed to their view, such abundance of massie gold and siluer, that they were not so much delighted with the meat, as with sight of the vessels, wherein it was serued. He thought hereby, to make them vnderstand, how great a Prince he was, and how able, if neede required, to wage a mighty Armie.

To which end, he likewise did shew vnto them, his Campe and Nauie, but especially his Elephants. But all this brauery serued onely to kindle their greedy appetites, who seeing his ships heavy loaden, his Campe full of wealth, and ill fortified, himselfe (as it seemed) secure, and his men, both in strength and courage inferior vnto the Gaules, thought all time lost, wherein they suffered the present possesours, to spend the riches which they accompred assuredly their owne. They returned therefore to their Companions, with none other newes in their mouthes, than of spoyle and purchase: which was carried the Gaules head-long, to Antigonus his campe, where they expected a greater bootie, then the victory ouer Ceraunus had giuen to Belgius. Their coming was terrible and suddaine; yet not so suddaine, but that Antigonus had notice of it, who distrusting the courage of his owne men, dislodged somewhat before their arrival, and conueighed himselfe, with his whole armie and carriage, into certaine woods adioyning, where he lay close.

The Gaules, finding his Campe forsaken, were not haffie to pursue him, but fell to ransacking the empty Cabbinnes of the Souldiers; in hope of finding all that was either lost or hidden. At length, when they had searched euery place in vaine, angrie at their lost labour, they marched with all speede towards the Sea-side; that they might fall vpon him, whilst he was busie in getting his men and carriages a ship-board. But the successe was no way answerable to their expectation. For being proud of the terrour which they had brought vpon Antigonus, they were so carelesse of the Sea-men, that without all order, they fell to the spoyle of what they found on the shore, and in such ships as lay on ground.

Part of the Armie had left Antigonus, where he lay in couert; and had saued it selfe by getting aboard the fleet: in which number were some well experienced men of war: who discouering the much aduantage offered vnto them, by the desperate presumption of their enemies, rooke courage, and encouraged others, to lay manly hold vpon the opportunity. So the whole number, both of Souldiers and Mariners, landing together, with great resolution, gaue so braue a charge vpon the disordered Gaules, that their contemptuous boldnesse was thereby changed into suddaine feare, and they, after a great slaughter, driuen to cast themselves into the seruice of Antigonus.

The same of this victory, caused all the barbarous Nations in those quarters, to re-entertaine their ancient belief of the Macedonian valour: by which, the terrible and resistlesse oppressors of so many Countries, were ouerthrowne.

To speake more of the Gaules in this place; and to shew how, about these times, three Tribes of them passed ouer into Asia the lesse, with their warres and conquests there; I hold it needelesse: the victorious armes of the Romans, taming them hereafter, in the Countries which now they wanne, shall giue better occasion, to rehearse these matters briefly.

How soeuer the good successe of Antigonus got him reputation, among the barbarous people, yet his owne Souldiers, that without his leading, had won this victory, could not thereupon be perswaded to thinke him a good man of warre: knowing that he had no interest in the honour of the seruice, wherein his conduct was no better, then creeping into a wood.

This (as presently will appeare) was greatly helpfull vnto Pyrrhus: though as yet he knew not so much. For Pyrrhus, when his affaires in Italie stood vpon hard teames, had sent vnto Antigonus for helpe: not without threats, in case it were denied. So was he faine to get, either a supply, wherewith to continue his warre against the Romans, or some seeming honourable pretence, to forsake Italie, vnder colour of making his word good, in seeking reuenge. The threats which he had vsed in brauery, mere necessitie forced him; at his returne into Epirus, to put in practise.

He brought home with him, eight thousand foot, and siue hundred horse: an armie too little to be employed, by his restlesse nature, in any action of importance; yet greater than he had meanes to keepe in pay. Therefore he fell vpon Macedon; intending to take what spoile he could get, and make Antigonus compound with him, to be freed from trouble. At his first entrance into this businesse, two thousand of Antigonus his Souldiers reuolued vnto Pyrrhus; and many Cities, either willingly or perforce, receiued him. Such faire beginnings, easily perswaded the courage of this daring Prince, to set vpon Antigonus himselfe, and to hazard his fortune, in trial of a battaile, for the whole Kingdome of Macedon.

It appeares, that Antigonus had no desire to fight with this hot warriour; but thought in the wisest way, by protracting of time, to wearie him out of the Countrie. For Pyrrhus overtook him in a streight passage, and charged him in the reare; wherein were the Gaules, and the Elephants, which were thought the best of his strength: a manifest prooffe that he was in retreat. The Gaules very brauely sustained Pyrrhus his impression; yet were broken at length (when most of them were slaine) after a sharpe fight: wherein it seemed that Antigonus keeping his Macedonian Phalanx within the streight, and not aduancing to their succour, tooke away their courage by deceiuing their expectation. The Capitaines of the Elephants were taken soone after; who finding themselves exposed to the same violence that had consumed so many of the Gaules, yielded themselves and the beasts. All this was done in full view of Antigonus, and his Macedonians, to their great discomfort; which emboldened Pyrrhus, to charge them where they lay in their strength. Where the Phalanx could be charged onely in a front, it was a matter of extreame difficulty (if not impossible) to force it. But the Macedonians had scene so much, that they had no desire to fight against Pyrrhus; who discouered so well their affections, that he aduentured adventured to draw neere in person, and exhorted them to yeelede. Neither the common Souldier, nor any Leader, refused to become his follower. All forooke Antigonus, a few horse-men excepted, that fled along with him to Thessalonica; where he had some small forces left, and money enough to entertaine a greater power, had he knowne where to leuie it. But whilest he was thinking how to allure a sufficient number of the Gauls into his seruice; whereby he might repaire his losse: Ptolomie, the sonne of Pyrrhus, came vpon him, and easily defeating his weake forces, draue him to fflye from the parts about Macedon, to those Townes a farre off in Peloponnesus, in which he had formerly lurked, before such time as he looked abroad into the world, and made himselfe a King.

This good successe reuiued the spirits of the Epirot, and caused him to forget all sorrow, of his late misfortunes in the Roman warre: so that he sent for his sonne Helenus (whom he had left with a Garrison, in the Castle of Tarentum) willing him to come ouer into Greece, where was more matter of conquest, and let the Italians shift for themselves.

§. V.

Pyrhus had now conceiued a great hope, that nothing should be able to withstand him; seeing, that in open fight, he had vanquished the Gauls, beaten Antigonus, and wonne the Kingdome of Macedon. There was not in all Greece, nor, indeede, in all the Lands that Alexander had wonne, any Leader of such name and worth, as deserved to be set vp against him: which filled him with the opinion that he might doe what he pleased. He raised therefore an Armie, consisting of five and twenty thousand foot, two thousand horse, and foure and twentie Elephants; pretending warre against Antigonus, and the giuing liberty to those Townes in Peloponnesus, which the same Antigonus held in subiection, though it was easily discovered, that such great preparations were made, for accomplishment of some designe more important, then warre against a Prince already vanquished, and almost vterly dejected. Especially the Lacedemonians feared this expedition, as made against their State. For Cleonymus, one of their Kings, being expelled out of his Countrey, had betaken himselfe to Pyrrhus: who readily entertained him, and promised to restore him to his Kingdome. This promise was made in secret; neither would Pyrrhus make shew of any displeasure that he bare vnto Sparta; but contrariwise professed, that it was his intent, to haue two of his owne yonger sonnes trained vp in that Citie, as in a place of noble discipline. With such colours he deluded men, euen till he entred vpon Laconia; where presently he demeaned himselfe as an open enemy: excusing himselfe and his former dissembling words, with a iest; That he followed herein the Lacedemonian custome; of concealing what was truly purposed. It had bene, indeede, the manner of the Lacedemonians, to deale in like sort with others, whom, in the time of their greatness, they sought to oppress: but now they complained of that, as falshood, in Pyrrhus, which they alwaies practised in Kingdome, till it made them distrusted, forsaken, and almost contemptible. Neuenthelesse, they were not wanting to themselves in this dangerous extremitie. For the old men and women laboured in fortifying the Towne; causing such as could beare armes, to reserue themselves fresh against the assault: which Pyrrhus had vnwisely deferred, vpon assurance of preuailling.

Sparta was neuer fortified, before this time, otherwise then with armed Citizens, soone after this (it being built vpon vneuen ground, and for the most part, hard to approach) the lower and more accessible places, were fenced with wals; at the present, only trenches were cast, and barricadoes made with Carts, where the entrance seemed most easie. Three dayes together it was assailed by Pyrrhus, exceeding fiercely; and no lesse stoutly defended. The desperate courage of the Citizens preserved the Towne the first day, whereinto the violence of Pyrrhus had forced entrance the second day, but that his wounded horse threw him to the ground, which made his Souldiers more mindefull of saving the person of their King, than of breaking into the Citie, though already they had come in sunder the barricadoes. Presently after this, one of Antigonus his Captaines got into Sparta with a good strength of men; and Arews the King returned out of Crete (where he had bene helping his friends in warre) with two thousand men, little knowing the danger, in which his owne countrey stood, vntill he was almost at home. These succours did not more animate the Spartans, then kindle in Pyrrhus a desire to preuaile against all impediments. But the third dayes worke shewed, how great his error had bene, in forbearing to assault the Towne at his first comming. For he was so manfully repelled, that he saw no likelihood of getting the place, otherwise than by a long siege: in which tedious course he had no desire to spend his time.

Antigonus had now raised an Armie, though not strong enough to meete the enemy in plaine field, yet able to hinder all his purposes. This made Pyrrhus doubtfull what way to take; being diuerly affected, by the difficultie of his enterprise in hand, and the shame of taking a repulse in his first attempt. Whilest he was thus perplexed, letters came from Argos, inuiting him thither, with promise, to deliuer that Citie into his hands.

Civil dissension raging then hotly in Argos, caused the heads of seuerall factions to call in Pyrrhus and Antigonus; but the comming of these two Princes, taught the Citizens wit, and made them desirous to rid their hand of such powerfull Assistants, as each of the two Kings pretended himselfe to be. Antigonus told the Argiues, that he came to saue them from the tyrannie of Pyrrhus; and that he would be gone if they needed not his helpe. On the other side, Pyrrhus would needes perswade them, that he had none other errand, then to make them safe from Antigonus; offering in like manner, to depart, if they so desired.

The Argiues tooke small pleasure, in hearing the Foxe and Kite at strife, which of them should keepe the Chickens from his enemy: and therefore prayed them both, to diuert their powers some other way. Hereunto Antigonus readily condescended, and gaue Hostages to assure his word: for he was the weaker, and stood in neede of good-will. But Pyrrhus thought it enough to promise: Hostages he would giue none, to his inferiours: especially, meaning deceit. This made them suspect his purpose to be such, as, indeede, it was. Yet he lesse regarded their opinions, than to hold them worthy of assurance, by giuing such a bond, as he intended to breake ere the next morning.

It was concluded, that a Gate of the Citie should be opened by night vnto Pyrrhus, by his Complices within Argos: which was accordingly performed. So his Armie, without any tumult, entred the Citie: till the Elephants, with Towers on their backs, cloyed the way, being too high to passe the Gate. The taking off, and setting on againe, of those Towers, with the trouble thereto belonging, did both giue alarme to the Citie, and some leisure to take order for defence, before so many were entred, as could fully master it. Argos was full of ditches, which greatly hindered the Gauls (that had the Vanguard) being ignorant of the wayes, in the darke night. The Citizens, on the other side, had much aduantage, by their knowledge of euery by-passage: and setting vpon the enemies on all sides, did put them to great losse, and more trouble.

Pyrrhus therefore, vnderstanding by the confused noise, and vnequall shoutings of his owne men, that they were in distresse, entred the Citie in person, to take order for their reliefe, and assurance of the place. But the darkenesse, the throng, and many other impediments, kept him from doing any thing of moment, vntill breake of day. Then began he to make his passage by force, and so farre preuailed, that he got into the Market-place. It is said, that seeing in that place, the Image of a Wolfe and a Bull, in such posture as if they had bene combatant, he called to minde an Oracle, which threatened him with death, when he should behold a Bull fighting with a Wolfe: and that hereupon he made retreat.

Indee, the comming of Antigonus to the rescue, the disorder and confusion of his owne men; with diuers ill accidents, gaue him reasonable cause to haue retired out of the Citie, though the Wolfe and Bull had bene away. The tumult was such, that no directions could be heard; but as some gaue backe, so did others thrust forward, and the Argiues pressing hard vpon him, forced Pyrrhus to make good his retreat, with his owne sword.

sword. The tops of the houses were couered with women, that stood looking on the fight. Among these was one, that saw her owne sonne in dangerous case, fighting with Pyrrhus. Wherefore, she tooke a tile-stone, or slate, and threw it so violently downe on the head of Pyrrhus, that he fell to ground astonished with the blow, and lying in that case, had his head cut off.

Thus ended the restlesse ambition of Pyrrhus, together with his life: and thus returned the Kingdome of Macedon to Antigonus, who forthwith possessed the armie, the body, and the children of his enemy. The body of Pyrrhus had honourable funerall, and was given by Antigonus vnto Helenus his sonne; which yong Prince he graciously sent home, into his Fathers Kingdome of Epirus. From this time forwards, the race of Antigonus held the Kingdome of Macedon; the posterity of Seleucus reigned ouer Asia and Syria; and the house of Ptolomie had quiet possession of Egypt: vntill such time, as the Citie of Rome, swallowing all vp, digested these, among other Countries, into the body of her owne Empire.

CHAP. I.

§. I.

A discussion of that problem of Liuius, Whether the Romans could haue resisted the great Alexander. That neither the Macedonian nor the Roman Souldier, was of equall valour to the English.

THAT question handled by Liuius, whether the great Alexander could haue preuailed against the Romans, if after his Easterne conquest, he had bent all his forces against them, hath bene, and is, the subiect of much dispute; which (as it seemes to me) the arguments on both sides doe not so well explaine, as doth the experience that Pyrrhus hath giuen, of the Roman power, in his dayes. For, if he, a Commander (in Hannibals iudgement) inferior to Alexander, though to none else, could with small strength of men, and little store of money, or of other needefull helpes in warre, vanquish them in two battailes, and endanger their Estate, when it was well settled, and held the best part of Italie, vnder a confirmed obedience: what would Alexander haue done, that was abundantly provided of all which is needfull to a Conquerour, wanting onely matter of employment, comming vpon them before their Dominion was halfe so well settled? It is easie to say, that Alexander had no more, than thirty thousand foot, and foure thousand horse (as indeede, at his first passage into Asia, he carried ouer, not many more,) and that the rest of his followers were no better than base effeminate Asiaticques. But he that considers the Armies of Perdiccas, Antipater, Craterus, Eumenes, Ptolomie, Antigonus, and Lysimachus, with the actions by them performed, euery one of which (to omit others) commanded onely some fragment of this dead Emperours power, shall easily finde, that such a reckoning is farre short of the truth.

It were needlesse to speake of Treasure, Horses, Elephants, Engines of batterie, and the like: of all which, the Macedonians had abundance; the Roman hauing nought, save men and armes. As for Sea-forces; he that shall consider after what sort the Romans, in their first Punic warre, were trained, in the rudiments of Navigation; sitting vpon the shoare, and beating the land with poles, to practise the stroke of the Oare, as not daring to lanch their ill-built vessels into the Sea; will easily conceiue, how farre too weak they would haue proued in such seruices.

Now for helpers in warre; I doe not see, why all Greece and Macedon, being absolutely commanded by Alexander, might not well deserue to be laid in ballance, against those parts of Italie, which the Romans held in ill-assured subiection. To omit therefore all benefit, that the Easterne world, more wealthy, indeede, than valiant, could haue afforded vnto the Macedonians: let vs onely coniecture, how the States of Sicill and Carthage, nearest neighbours to such a quarrell (had it happened) would haue stood affected. The Sicilians were, for the most part, Grecians; neither is it to be doubted, that they would readily haue submitted themselues vnto him, that ruled all Greece besides them. In what termes they commonly stood, and how ill they were able to defend themselues, it shall appeare anon. Sure it is, that Alexanders comming into those parts, would haue brought excessiue ioy, to them that were faine to get the helpe of Pyrrhus, by offering to become his subiects. As for the Carthaginians; if Agathocles, the Tyrant of Syracuse, hated of his people, and ill able to defend his owne besieged Citie, could, by aduenturing to saile into Africke, put their Dominion, yea and Carthage it selfe, in extreme hazard; shall we thinke that they would haue bene able to withstand Alexander? But, why doe I question their abilitie, seeing that they sent Embassadours, with their submission, as farre as Babylon, ere the warre drew neare them? Wherefore it is manifest, that the Romans must, without other succour, than perhaps of some other few Italian friends (of which yet there were none, that forooke them not, at some time, both before and after this) haue opposed their valour, and good militarie discipline, against the power of all Countries, to them knowne, if they would haue made resistance. How they could haue sped well, in vndertaking such a match, it is vnesaie to finde in discourse of humane reason. It is true; that vertue and fortune worke wonders: but it is against cowardly fooles, and the vnfortunate: for whose euer contends with one too mightie for him; either must excell in these, as much as his enemy goes beyond him in power; or else must looke, both to be ouercome, and to be cast downe so much the lower, by how much the opinion of his fortune and vertue renders him suspected, as likely to make head another time against the vanquisher. Whether the Roman, or the Macedonian, were in those dayes the better Souldier, I will not take vpon me to determine: though I might, without partialitie, deliuer mine owne opinion, and preferre that Armie, which followed not onely Philip and Alexander, but also Alexanders Princes after him, in the greatest dangers of all sorts of warre; before any, that Rome either had, or in long time after did send forth. Concerning fortune; who can giue a rule that shall alwayes hold? Alexander was victorious in euery battaile that he fought: and the Romans in the issue of euery warre. But foras much as Linie hath iudged this a matter worthy of consideration; I thinke it a great part of Romes good fortune, that Alexander came nor into Italie: where in three yeares after his death, the two Roman Consuls, together with all the power of that State, were surprized by the Samnites, and enforced to yeeld vp their armes. We may therefore permit Linie to admire his owne Romans, and to compare with Alexander those Captains of theirs, which were honoured sufficiently, in being thought equall to his followers: that the same conceit should blind our iudgement, we cannot permit without much vanitie.

Now in deciding such a controuersie, me thinks it were not amisse, for an Englishman, to giue such a sentence betweene the Macedonians and Romans, as the Romans once did (being chosen Arbitrators) betweene the Ardeates and Aricini, that stroue about a piece of land, saying, That it belonged vnto neither of them, but vnto the Romans themselues.

If there fore it be demanded, whether the Macedonians, or the Romans, were the best Warriour? I will answer: The Englishmen. For it will soone appeare, to any that shall examine the noble acts of our Nation in warre, that they were performed by no aduantage of weapon; against no savage or vnmanly people; the enemy being farre superiour vnto vs in number, and all needfull prouisions, yea as well trained as we, or commonly better, in the exercise of warre.

In

In what sort Philip wan his Dominion in Greece; what manner of men the Persians and Indians were, whom Alexander vanquished; as likewise of what force the Macedonian Phalanx was, and how well appointed, against such armes as it commonly encountered: any man, that hath taken paines to reade the foregoing storie of them, doth sufficiently vnderstand. Yet was this Phalanx neuer, or very seldome, able to stand, against the Roman Armies: which were embattailed into excellent a forme, as I know not, whether any Nation besides them haue vsed, either before or since. The Roman weapons likewise, both offensive and defensive, were of greater vse, than those with which any other Nation hath serued, before the fiery instruments of Gun-powder were knowne. As for the enemies, with which Rome had to doe: we finde, that they, which did ouer-match her in numbers, were as farre ouer-matched by her, in weapons; and that they, of whom she had little aduantage in armes, had as little aduantage of her in multitude. This also (as Plutarch well obserueth) was a part of her happinesse; that she was neuer ouer-laid with too great warres at once.
